Unfortunately, the Colorado voters rejected the proposed State constitution and with that put to an end this early chance for statehood. President Lincoln, as we know, was reelected without the help of Colorado electoral votes.

Advocates for statehood tried again a year later. They wrote another State constitution; squeaked this one past the voters by less than 200 votes; and ran head on into opposition from the new President, Andrew Johnson. President Johnson refused to issue the proclamation of statehood and argued that, with the first defeat by Colorado voters, the enabling legislation was no longer valid.

Colorado lived, some say suffered, under territorial government for another 10 years.

On December 8, 1873, in the first session of the 43d Congress, House bill 435 was introduced "to enable the people of Colorado to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of the said State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States."

The bill was reported to the Committee on Territories and debated on the House floor on June 8, 1874. A few amendments were discussed; someone asked about the value of salt springs; and then the bill was passed 171 to 66.

On February 24, 1875, the Senate debated H.R. 435 at some length; considered a number of amendments; and then passed the bill by a vote of 42 to 12.

With amendments adopted by both Houses of Congress, more work was needed before the bill was ready for final passage. But reflecting the troubled history of Colorado statehood, that final action was another cliffhanger.

On the last day of the session, March 3, 1875, a motion was made in the House to pass both the Colorado and New Mexico statehood bills and to agree to the Senate amendments. That motion failed.

We do not know the details, but can imagine a series of quick meetings off the floor or in the House cloakroom to work out the problem. Whatever the nature of these conversations, they were successful. Later that same day another motion was offered to pass just the Colorado bill with Senate amendments and not the New Mexico bill. That motion was adopted and enabling legislation for Colorado statehood passed into law.

Colorado went to work on a new State constitution, put that to the voters on July 1, 1876, with a favorable result, and on August 1, 1876, President Grant issued the necessary proclamation for statehood.

Thanks to those "few handfuls of miners and reckless bushwackers," we celebrate today as Colorado Day.●

SALUTE TO POLISH AMERICANS

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, on Wednesday, July 31, House Joint Resolution 106 was signed into law designating this August as Polish-American Heritage month. I believe that Polish-Americans have played an important role in American society and have greatly contributed to the rich fabric of American life.

Americans of Polish descent have fought in our wars, helped guide our national policy, and have enriched all of our lives through their leadership in the educational, business, cultural, scientific, Government, athletic and entertainment worlds.

I believe that this month will be a very special time for Polish-Americans throughout this country, and I am especially proud to represent one of the largest concentrations of Polish-Americans in the United States.

Finally, I hope that this commemorative month will not only serve to unite Polish-Americans across the country but will also give the rest of the Nation a chance to experience the beauty, splendor and richness of the Polish culture.●

SILVER ANNIVERSARY OF A REVOLUTIONARY PRODUCT

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, this year marks the 25th anniversary of commercial use of a machine without which we could not function: the plain-paper copier.

In 1960, the world's first such machine was sold by the Haloid Xerox, Inc., a company know in its headquarters city, Rochester, NY, but not much known elsewhere. A single, clear copy produced by the Xerox 914—so named because it could produce copies up to 9 by 14 inches—cost 5 cents, one-third the price of an inferior copy produced by other copying machines of the time.

The company changed its name that year; its product changed forevermore that way the world works.

Writing in the New York Times, on Janaury 14, 1972, James Reston said the Xerox system "now dominates the Federal Government and influences the flow of information in every other big institution in the country."

Today, much the same can be said for all countries. Every second, 18,750 plain-paper copies are made worldwide; 592 billion such every year. Not all, the good folk in Rochester would acknowledge, are made by Xerox products, but our language suggests otherwise.

How often do we hear, "I'd like a xerox of this"; or, "Will you xerox 10 copies of this?" and who among us does not refer to the Xerox machine, even if the copier in question is made by another company? An occasional product is fortunate enough, good enough, to have its trade name fixed in the public mind as the generic name. But it is rare, if not unique, for the trade name to enter our vocabulary as noun, verb, and adjective. This Xerox has done.

Mr. President, on August 20, 1985, David T. Kearns, the chairman and chief executive officer of the Xerox Corp. will present the original 914 machine to the Smithsonian Museum. It belongs there, alongside the Wright Brothers' Flyer I and the other technological marvels that changed our world.

I take an especial pride because the Xerox Corp. is based in New York. But we can all happily acknowledge the past and continuing success of this great American company. It has established a record none can copy.●

PROTECTION AND ADVOCACY FOR MENTALLY ILL PERSONS ACT OF 1985

● Mr. SIMON. Mr. President, yesterday the Senate approved by unanimous consent the bill S. 974, the Protection and Advocacy for Mentally Ill Persons Act of 1985. I would like to register my strong support for this bill, which I was pleased to be able to cosponsor.

I have one area of disagreement with the bill which was brought to the floor, but in general it is a good and much needed piece of legislation. Mentally ill persons are among the most vulnerable in our society, and are among the most likely to be victims blamed for their own crime. Senator WEICKER and his staff deserve great credit for the concern they have shown for this vulnerable group of persons and for bringing the problem of abuse and neglect of mentally ill persons in residential facilities to our attention.

The Subcommittee on the Handicapped staff report—the result of a 9-month investigation, with onsite inspection of 31 facilities for mentally handicapped persons in 12 States—is a thorough documentation of the conditions in our state-run institutions today. For those of us who would like to believe we have progressed to a humane attitude and treatment toward persons with mental handicaps, the report is extremely disturbing. The testimony we heard before the subcommittee reinforced the findings of the report in a number of areas.

For example, because the Joint Committee on Accreditation of Hospitals and Health Care Finance Administration reviews of institutions occur at predictable times and are primarily a paper review of the overall condition of the institution, they are ineffective in remedying individual cases of abuse. Internal advocacy systems for institutions are hampered by lack of authority to investigate reports of abuse or bring about disciplinary action. Advocacy efforts are also seriously limited in their effectiveness by the lack of sufficient and reliable funding. Testimony also documented the failure of the Office of Civil Rights of the Department of Justice to take prompt action to end flagrant abuses of the civil rights of institutionalized persons.

S. 974 would provide a modest funding authorization for State protection and advocacy organizations to investigate complaints of abuse and neglect of mentally ill persons in residential facilities. This is one relatively small but vital step toward solving the problems we have seen documented. Senator WEICKER has stated that he will be taking additional steps through further legislation to address the problems that will not be remedied by this bill. He will have my strong support in those efforts. The record shows there is a great deal more to be done to ensure that mentally handicapped persons are given the care and treatment they need to develop their potential, in addition to being assured of the simple justice of freedom from abuse.

I am grateful to Senator WEICKER for agreeing to treat Puerto Rico as a State for purposes of the allocation of funds under this bill. We too frequently treat Puerto Rico in a discriminatory manner when it comes to distributing Federal funds. This occurs despite the fact that there are more Americans living in Puerto Rico than in 25 of our States, and despite the fact that the per capita income of Puerto Rico is only 35 percent of our national average. Any social problem which is related to poverty—and most do have that relationship—is a problem for Puerto Rico as much or more than any other State. I am pleased that this bill does not make the common error of ignoring that reality.

I am also pleased that this bill will permit protection and advocacy agencies to assist individuals who are being discharged from an institution and ensure that their rights are protected as they make the transfer from the institution into a community setting. The discharge process is critical if these individuals are to be successfully placed in the community and not to be found sometime later among the homeless on our streets. The number of homeless in this country is now estimated to be possibly as high as 2 million, and an estimated one-third of our homeless are said to have experienced some form of mental illness. To whatever extent the wholesale emptying of State institutions may have contributed to this situation, we may hope that this bill will prevent the post institutional needs of patients from being ignored in the future.

I regret that S. 974 includes a provision which would establish a dual standard for the payment of attorneys who litigate on behalf of mentally ill persons. Unlike attorneys now awarded fees under other statutes—who are paid on the basis of the prevailing market rate—attorneys who successfully litigate under this legislation would be eligible for reimbursement only for documented expenses. This dual standard is discriminatory in its effect upon low-income persons who must rely upon public advocates, and sets a troublesome precedent for other fee-shifting statutes. A cost-based fee award may be unworkable from a practical accounting perspective. It assuredly will reduce the services—and the effectiveness of services—available to those who most need them. Although I support S. 974 because of its overall benefit to persons who are mentally ill, I hope the bill which moves through the House and conference will not include this double standard for the attorneys of the poor.●

EMPLOYEE EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I would like to inform my colleagues about a report recently published by the American Society for Training and Development [ASTD], entitled "Employee Educational Assistance: Who Pays? Who Benefits?" ASTD is an umbrella organization representing more than 50,000 employers engaged in training and retraining workers, from entry level employees to top management. Its report is the first significant and comprehensive study ever undertaken to assess the impact of tax exempt employee educational assistance, as permitted under section 127 of the Tax Code. The results are noteworthy.

Of 319 employers who responded to ASTD's questionnaire—ranging in size from 43 to 100,000 employees and with a combined employment of 6.6 million—309 offered employee educational assistance. The survey determined that 72 percent of employees receiving educational assistance at these companies have annual salaries under $30,000. The survey also found that lower paid employees are more likely to participate; those earning under $15,000 were twice as likely to receive assistance as those earning over $50,000.

Another beneficiary of educational assistance, according to this study, are the companies which provide the assistance. Apart from helping lower level employees move up the ladder—a good proportion of them women, minorities and the unskilled—educational assistance improves performance on the job, and hence productivity, according to 96 percent of the respondents. And 54.4 percent of the companies said it helps their employees learn basic skills such as reading and writing.

The tax exemption for employee educational assistance is scheduled to expire December 31, 1985. Legislation I am sponsoring with 18 of my Senate colleagues, S. 558, would make section 127 a permanent part of the Tax Code. President Reagan's most recent tax reform plan endorses our proposal. I believe the ASTD study demonstrates most forcefully the worthiness of current law in this area and the need for congressional action to guarantee a permanent tax exemption for employee educational assistance.

Mr. President, I ask that the full text of the ASTD study, "Employee Educational Assistance: Who Pays? Who benefits?," be printed in the RECORD. I also ask that another ASTD publication, "Taxation of Educational Assistance to Employees," a very informative question and answer discussion of the tax treatment of employee educational assistance, be printed in the RECORD.

The material, except for charts and graphs which are not reproducible in the RECORD, follows:

EMPLOYEE EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE: WHO PAYS, WHO BENEFITS

INTRODUCTION

Employee Educational Assistance provisions, added to the Internal Revenue Code in 1978 (Section 127), allow employees to receive educational aid from employers without it being considered personal income. This education provision is due to expire December 31, 1985. In order to gather data on educational assistance use, and to aid in consideration of the extension, the American Society for Training and Development initiated a study of employer-provided educational assistance in the Winter of 1984.

The study was conducted on behalf of the 50,000 employer-based members of the American Society for Training and Development. Motorola, Inc. chaired an ASTD task force on educational assistance that led to the development of the survey instrument. ASTD Government Affairs Director Dorothy Walsh supervised the study. The survey was mailed to 1,000 private and public employers in late February. At the March 29 cutoff date, 319 employers responded. The resulted were tabulated in April.

The study, one of the largest conducted on educational assistance, includes data from a broad cross section of industries and employers. Responding employers include about six percent of today's labor force. Responses ranged from organizations with 43 employees to organizations with more than 100,000 employees.

The survey results show that educational assistance (typically tuition-aid) is a small but important part of work place training and retraining. It is especially significant for upgrading employees, creating incentives for upward mobility, and providing remediation and basic skills training.

Findings from the survey include: 97% of all respondents have educational assistance plans; 87% of respondents with less than 500 employees have educational assistance plans; 72% of participants in educational assistance courses earn less than $30,000 per year; 96% of respondents said educational assistance was used for improving skills on-the-job.

The highest participation rate (14%) was found in organizations with less than 500 employees; 54.8% of respondents said educational assistance helps employees learn basic skills like reading and writing; 91% of respondents cited the local community college as a provider of educational assistance courses.

The survey also found that employers are complying with the requirements of Section 127. For example, 97 percent post announcements, and many employers print materials or brochures on educational assistance. 100 percent responded that other taxable benefits or compensation is not reduced for those employees receiving educational assistance. The law specifically states that educational assistance programs cannot discriminate in favor of employees who are officers, owners or highly-compensated. Our survey data shows that in every case, employers offer educational assistance to a broad cross section of employees with the highest participation rates in the low- to middle-salary levels.

We submit these findings as evidence of the value of educational assistance to participants and in the interest of maintaining the nation's competitive advantage.

Without Section 127, employers will be forced to go back to confusing, vague and discriminatory pre-1979 regulations for educational assistance. Employers would either have to withhold taxes on all educational assistance to employees or determine, on an individual basis whether each course an employee takes is "related" to present job responsibilities. The inevitable result would be to discourage employers from providing educational assistance.—Curtis E. Plott, Executive Vice President, American Society for Training and Development.

What Is Employee Educational Assistance and Who Offers It?

Employee educational assistance (e.g. "tuition aid") is the practice or program of payment, by an employer, of expenses incurred by or on behalf of an employee for courses to benefit the employee.

Sample Educational Assistance Plans:

"The company views your continuing formal education as an essential element in your life-long learning. Employees need to continue the learning process in order to keep up with the rapid rate of technological change."—Metals company.

"It is the company's intent to provide educational opportunities to all eligible employees, to increase their effectiveness on the job and improve their potential. This lessens the need for seeking talent on the outside to meet the needs of the company and reduces the possibility of job obsolescence of employees."—Electronics company.

"It is our policy to encourage the self-development of full-time, regular employees. Whenever such development will improve the employee's effectiveness and value on the job and/or will help to prepare the employee for positions of greater responsibility within the company, we're prepared to absorb part of the cost."—Small manufacturer.

"Every full-time employee is eligible to participate. People who have been with the company less than 90 days may participate only at the discretion of the plant manager."—Illinois manufacturer.

"Our police labor agreement allows $1,000 for educational expenses for uniformed officers. All other employees are eligible, as required for their jobs."—Pennsylvania city government.

"Full-time employees must have been in the employ of the hospital for at least six continuous months prior to the beginning of the course. Part-time employees who have completed five years of service and have been scheduled for 20 hours or more per week are eligible for a total of one-half the reimbursement amount of full-time employees."—Medical center.

Who Participates in Educational Assistance?

"At my age, going back to school was hard. I didn't know a thing about electronics. I think the future jobs are in the electronics area. In addition to tuition help, employees who've been laid off and not receiving UI because of full-time school, are eligible to receive a training allowance equal to half the employee's normal weekly pay."—Laid-off female employee receiving educational assistance.

"Former employees on layoff, who have six months' service, will be able to obtain tuition aid up to $1,200 per year for approved courses. Former employees on layoff will be eligible to receive a training allowance of 50% of weekly pay for a minimum of eight weeks while attending."—Large midwest manufacturer.

"The job-related distinction often seems both ambiguous and restrictive . . . If a person with little or no work experience is employed in an entry-level position, and receives education from his employer to advance to a job requiring some greater skills, the value of that education may be taxable. This discourages self-improvement."—Joint Committee on Taxation Revenue Act of 1978.

Under 500	$18,121
500 to 999	46,538
1,000 to 2,999	60,984

Impact on other programs:

Question: If one of your employees receives educational assistance, will this reduce any taxable benefit or compensation (e.g., wages) the employee is otherwise entitled to receive?

Responses: No, 100% Yes, 0.

Question: Do you provide educational assistance courses in-house that are not intended to improve employee performance on the job?

Only 32 of the 319 respondents said they offered any educational assistance programs in-house. These courses represent about 8.2% of their total educational assistance plan (average was 5%).

When courses are offered in-house, they tend to be remedial and job-related. Examples cited included remedial education, arithmetic, literacy and other basic-skill classes, English as a second language and business courses.

"It is not the company's intent to reimburse an employee for pursuing a preplanned college education."—Medium size firm.

"Courses must be of an educational or technical nature and related to the employee's present job duties or those to which he/she will be assigned in the foreseeable future as determined by his/her manager."—Entertainment company.

"Among our students taking courses with help from their employers, these are the most popular: computer science, electrical technician, business management, mechanical technician, accounting, civil engineering technician."—Eastern community college.

"This plan does not cover short seminars and noncredit courses, hobbies or sports classes unless part of an approved degree program."—West Coast Manufacturer.

"If you start an approved course and are subsequently laid off, you will still be reimbursed for successfully completing the course."—Manufacturer.

What courses do employees take?

Educational Assistance stimulates productivity: 97.3% of all respondents said employees receiving educational assistance take some courses to improve their performance in their current jobs. 86.2% of all respondents said at least one-half of the courses directly improve employees', skills for their jobs.

Educational Assistance helps upward mobility of employees: 52.4% of all respondents said at least ¼ of all employees receiving educational aid take courses in basic educational skills. The category "basic skills" (e.g., reading, writing, math, GED, etc.) was cited by 54.8% of all respondents.

Between 25% and 49% of employees participating in educational assistance take courses that could lead to a bachelor's degree, and thus a promotion, higher wages or expanded job responsibilities.

Educational Assistance encourages collaboration between employer and local community colleges: 42.7% of all respondents said at least ⅓ of all their employees receiving educational assistance take courses at local community or junior colleges.

The category "community or junior college" was cited by 91.7% of all respondents. Employees take a variety of courses including word processing, computer literacy, business English or technical, vocational classes.

Educational Assistance is not used extensively for graduate school: 76% of all respondents said none of their employees receiving educational assistance take courses that could lead to a law degree. In all cases, of those respondents who allow employees to take legal courses, less than ¼ of all participating employees take legal courses; 50% of all respondents allowed courses that could lead to an MBA. These participating employees, however, take less than 24% of all courses allowed. Only 7 of 309 respondents said more than 50% of participating employees take courses that could lead to an MBA; 5% of participating employees receive educational assistance for other graduate-level courses (e.g., engineering).

"Continued education for our employees is a must, not a luxury."—Hi-tech company.

"Illiteracy costs us thousands of dollars in lost productivity."—Metals company.

"60% of our courses are taken to enhance current job skills; and 40% for career advancement."—A large company.

"Growth and development of employees through educational assistance is viewed as a direct benefit to the company's profitability."—Aircraft manufacturer.

Employers follow Internal Revenue Service guidelines: 94% of all respondents prohibited sports, games or hobby courses. To the extent sports-type courses were allowed, the classes tended to be either fulfillment of degree requirements or directly connected to company product lines.

"There are grade and dollar requirements. You must earn a "C" or better in undergraduate courses. The annual maximum support available is $800. At the graduate level, you must receive a grade of "B" or better and the maximum amount per year is $1,000."—Small manufacturer.

"The educational assistance program provides substantial financial assistance if you take, on your own time, from an approved educational institution, approved courses of an educational or vocational nature, which will benefit both you and the company."—Midwest oil company.

"The company will refund up to 80 percent of your expenses for approved courses. Books and laboratory fees are not eligible for refunds."—New York publisher.

"The company encourages employees to enroll in courses of study that will enhance professional growth and development. Courses may be taken will be mutually beneficial to both you and the company. All courses for which you wish to be reimbursed must be approved prior to their beginning by your supervisor and the Human Resources Director. Upon completion of the course with a "B" or better, the company will reimburse you for tuition and books."—Small communications firm.

Who Conducted the Study?

What Types of Organizations Responsed?

This study was conducted on behalf of the 50,000 employer-based members of the American Society for Training and Development to provide data on the scope and characteristics of employer-provided educational assistance today.

Motorola, Inc. chaired a task force on educational assistance that led to the development of the survey instrument. The survey was conducted under the leadership of Curtis Plott, executive vice president for the American Society for Training and Development, and John Robinson, manager of research and development at Motorola's Corporate Training and Education Center. Dorothy Walsh, ASTD director of government affairs, coordinated the national planning and supervised the study. Statistical consultation and development of tables was done by Robert Calvert, Jr., a consultant to ASTD and a former deputy assistant administrator for statistical services at the National Center for Education Statistics. Within ASTD, Diane Charles and Adam Stoll processed incoming forms and, with Motorola, made follow-up calls. Motorola developed the case studies and contributed to the production of the final report.

A total of 1,000 survey forms was mailed to employing organizations selected at random from the ASTD membership and other private and public sector employer lists. 340 surveys were returned. As of the cutoff date (March 29, 1985), 319 employers had responded and 309 said they offered educational assistance to employees. The tables dealing with educational assistance are based on these 309 responses.

The 309 responses represent a good cross section of employers by size (as shown in Tables 9 and 10) and type of activity (as shown in Table 1). Total employment by responding employers was 6,609,932 or approximately six percent of today's labor force of 110,000,000.

Educational assistance is offered by a broad cross section of employers and participation rates concentrate in the lower salary ranges.

Note: Since the survey did not address the definition of cost, some respondents included such items as overhead and administrative costs. And many organizations don't collect data on educational assistance by salary and cost.

TUITION REIMBURSEMENT CASE STUDY SUMMARY

Effect of educational assistance upon employee's career

Carol L. returned to her company as a production assembler after raising her family. She advanced through the system and attended some junior college classes. Although she always had an interest in furthering her career through education, the demands of raising a family and the scheduling of time posed problems. However, when a new program became available at a local university, Carol decided to concentrate on her education. This accelerated program of one, full-semester class a month allowed her the opportunity of a college degree.

Without employer encouragement and educational assistance, Carol would not have achieved her present position as production manager.

A high school drop out, Charles M. entered a federally-funded training program. He attended technical school for five months and again dropped out. In 1979, Charles was employed as a tester analyzer. Taking advantage of the educational assistance program, Charles has pursued his goal of an AA degree in electrical engineering. He plans to continue his education and become a certified engineer and group leader in radio frequency products. Charles believes that his education courses have aided him in his present position as engineering lab technician.

In the early 1970's, Blanche R. entered the local community college to continue her career growth. She recognized that she needed a broader educational background than the company internal development courses offered. In 1982, she received her AA and today needs only one semester to complete her BA in business administration. Her education, combined with her practical background, has enhanced her value to her company.

As a black single parent, Blanche, who is financially responsible for her invalid parents, is strongly aware that her career advancement would have been jeopardized without educational assistance.

As a specialist production training senior, Yvonne A. can look back with pride on her 18 years with her employer. Starting her career as an assembler in a manufacturing area, Yvonne later transferred into a training department. Because of a desire for further career growth, she began classes at a community college for her AA. She then attended a university life experience credit program. Her advancement from illustrator to her present position as special production trainer has coincided with her educational progress.

In 1970, Donna T. joined her employer as an entry-level secretary in the patent department. The availability of educational assistance made the idea of a college degree a realistic goal. After several general business courses at a junior college, she transferred to a university. She rapidly advanced as a legal secretary and a paralegal. In June 1980, Donna graduated with a BA in business management. Based on her education and career background, Donna chose to pursue a career in industrial relations. Currently, Donna is taking courses in an industrial relations masters program.

Donna has found that her combination of legal and business experience has been a definite asset to her career; it has resulted in a 60% increase in salary in less than 4 years.

A shortage of teaching positions made Janice W. reassess her career choice. During her employment as a secretary, Janice began to investigate different job opportunities. Her vocational testing at her community college showed a definite strength in technical areas. Printed circuit board layout design became her chosen specialty. With educational assistance, she has completed various drafting, CAD and electronics classes. In 1981 she was hired for a new product, entry-level position. In six months she was transferred to a base station group where she acquired practical experience in drafting and design.

Janice's efforts to redesign a "T" connector resulted in product cost reduction of $12.98 and a co-inventor patent application was made. Her advancement has helped her operating group become more competitive.

"The main reason I went back to school was because my children were grown and I wanted to upgrade myself at work. Last summer [during the time Section 127 had expired], my employer withheld one-third of my tuition reimbursement money. I thought it was unfair for me to get penalized. I know of at least a dozen people at the bank who did not register this semester because they feared a tax on their education. They may have small children, or they are mothers on their own. $100 doesn't seem like a lot, but, in today's economy, you need the $100."—Bank employee.

"12.1% of our total educational-assistance participants earned promotions or job upgrading."—Medium-size firm.

"Among participants in our program, 22% are from minority groups and 53% are women."—Communications firm.

"Women and minority employees use our tuition program at a rate greatly exceeding their employment representation. Over half of our participants are hourly employees or low-level supervisors."—A large manufacturer.

"Most of our employees must attend training to keep up with changes in technology. Also, many must continue their studies to maintain licenses. Many of our lower-ranking staff use tuition reimbursement to prepare for higher level jobs."—Medical center.

"Our program is used primarily by employees in clerical or lower-paying jobs to advance within the organization. They acquire skills required to maintain their position or employment. All courses must be in a work-related area and all must be approved by the personnel office, which adheres closely to this policy."—Ohio manufacturer.

SUMMARY

The ASTD survey tends to be in agreement with other studies and national surveys on tuition aid. Available research from the federal government on adult education tends to correspond to this survey's results.

The responses received by the ASTD survey, as well as the information, brochures and other materials sent, show that educational assistance:

Is offered by a broad and diverse cross section of employers.

Is utilized by employees at different compensation levels with the highest concentration in the lower salary ranges.

Stimulates human resource development and improves performance in the work place.

Provides upward mobility and career development.

Helps laid-off workers to obtain new skills.

Allows employers to offer cost-effective programs for upgrading skills of employees.

Encourages workers to keep up to date with new technological and industrial developments.

Taxation of Educational Assistance to Employees

In 1978, Congress added a special provision to the Internal Revenue Code (section 127) that exempts from taxation education provided under employer educational assistance programs. Today these programs provide valuable training to millions of American workers. In order to increase understanding of educational assistance, the American Society for Training and Development has asked the law firm, Kilpatrick & Cody to review current law and legislative proposals. This pamphlet describes—in simple question and answer format—the tax rules that apply to educational assistance programs and legislative proposals to extend section 127 provisions.

In addition, this pamphlet describes the tax rules for similar education aid that does not qualify for exemption under section 127. Since section 127 is scheduled to expire on December 31, 1985, these rules could become critical to employers maintaining educational assistance programs and to their employees. These rules are also important for understanding the purpose and need for section 127, since it was the problems and complexities of these rules that sparked the 1978 enactment of section 127.

Except as otherwise noted in the text, the tax rules summarized in this pamphlet are those in effect on January 1, 1985.—Curtis E. Plott, Executive Vice President, American Society for Training and Development.

1. What education aid can qualify for tax-free treatment under Code section 127?

Education aid that an employer provides pursuant to a qualifying educational assistance plan can be excluded from federal gross income under section 127. To qualify, an educational assistance plan must not discriminate (i.e., favor highly-paid employees) and must meet certain other requirements described in Q/A-6 below. A qualifying plan may be designed to pay or reimburse expenses incurred by employees for education or to provide employees with education directly. "Education" is defined broadly by section 127 and includes "any form of instruction and training that improves or develops the capabilities of an individual." Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(c)(4). A typical example of an educational assistance plan is an employer "tuition aid" program.

2. What education aid does not qualify for tax-free treatment under Code section 127?

Section 127 does not exclude from gross income education aid provided under a plan that fails to meet the requirements described in Q/A-6 and Q/A-7. It also does not apply to:

Meals, lodging or transportation related to education;

Tools or supplies (other than text books) if they may be retained after the course is completed; or Education involving sports, games or hobbies unless the education involves the business of the employer or is required as part of a degree program.

The maximum amount that an employee can exclude under section 127, in any calendar year, is $5,000.

3. How does the $5,000 cap on the exclusion under section 127 operate and what special problems does it present?

The $5,000 cap on the exclusion under section 127 applies on an individual employee basis. Thus, regardless of the number of different employers that an employee has during the year, the employee may exclude only $5,000 of education aid under section 127. However, whether an employee's education aid in excess of $5,000 is subject to tax depends upon its tax status under other provisions of the tax law. (These other provisions are explained in Q/A-13 through Q/A-16 below.) For example, if under a qualifying section 127 program an employee receives $6,000 of education aid in a year, and $1,000 would be excludible under other tax law provisions, the entire remaining $5,000 is excludible under section 127. Therefore, for employees receiving education aid in excess of $5,000 annually, the tax provisions described in Q/A-13 through Q/A-16 have particular significance.

Applying the $5,000 cap may also involve questions of valuation. Some employers hire instructors directly, for a few courses, and provide their employees with in-kind education aid. In these situations, whether more than $5,000 of education aid is provided to any employee apparently depends upon the "fair market value" of the education. Reg. Sec. 1.61-2T Q/A-5. The employer's cost for the education cannot be used in applying the cap (even though it might be more easily determined and might roughly reflect the fair market value.) Specifically, IRS temporary employee benefit regulations only permit dollar limitations on employee exclusions to be applied based upon employer cost when the limitation is phrased in terms of employer cost. Reg. Sec. 1.61-2T Q/A-5 and Q/A-7. Although two bills presently pending in Congress (H.R. 1356 and S. 558) would modify the language of section 127 in this regard, the $5,000 limitation is not currently phrased in terms of employer cost. Therefore, at present, the $5,000 cap should be applied based on the fair market value of education received.

In valuing in-kind education aid for this purpose, employers should consider the price of comparable education provided on an arms-length basis. Reg. Sec. 1.61-2T Q/A-5 and Q/A-12. Because of this, the burden of valuation will fall most heavily on those few employers that provide unusual courses or that provide instruction under unusual circumstances, e.g., individualized instruction.

Valuation burdens may also fall on certain employers that do not provide education in-kind. If an employer receives tuition discounts from an educational provider, it may be necessary to apply the $5,000 cap based on the undiscounted price of the education. This possibility is suggested by the Service's recently-stated position regarding valuation of employer-provided cars. In that context, the Service has indicated that the value of the cars must be determined "without regard to any group or volume discount" that may have reduced their purchase price. Reg. Sec. 1.61-2T Q/A-13. Therefore, to apply the $5,000 cap, it may be necessary for employers to keep records based on the undiscounted price of education provided to employees.

4. Do withholding taxes apply to education aid that is excludible under section 127?

Education aid is not subject to Social Security, unemployment or income tax withholding if, at the time provided, it is reasonable to believe that the aid will be excludible under section 127. Internal Revenue Code Sections 3121(a)(18), 3306(b)(13), and 3401(a)(18). The "reasonable belief" standard that governs an employer's withholding obligation is intended to protect an employer that acts reasonably from under-withholding liability in the event an employee's exclusion is ultimately denied. The IRS has explained this same standard in a different context (i.e., in connection with moving expense reimbursements) by saying: "The reasonable belief . . . may be based upon any evidence reasonably sufficient to induce such belief even though such evidence may be insufficient upon closer examination by the district director or the courts finally to establish that [an exclusion] is allowable. . . ." Reg. Sec. 31.3401(a)(15)-1(a).

In practice, withholding on section 127 education aid has not generated extensive controversy; however, there are certain areas where questions can arise. To apply properly the $5,000 cap explained in Q/A-3, an employer must know the amount of education aid an employee has received from all employers during the year. For example, a mid-year hire may have received substantial education aid at a previous job. Therefore, a cautious employer may wish to have employees indicate the amount of any education aid received from other employers as part of an application or claim for education aid. While IRS guidance is not expected soon, it is understood that the IRS will at least consider exempting employers from any need to inquire about the amount of education aid provided by other, unrelated employers.

The problems of valuing certain types of education aid that arise in connection with the $5,000 cap were described in Q/A-3. Because of this limitation on the amount excludible under section 127, it is possible that an employer might be subject to underwithholding liability if it undervalues the education aid provided to an employee. However, an employer's exposure in this regard is limited significantly by the reasonable belief standard that governs the withholding obligation. While valuation is inevitably burdensome, so long as an employer's valuation of education aid is made in good faith and based on reasonable evidence, the employer should be generally immune from underwithholding liability.

5. Is education aid that is exempt from federal income tax under section 127 also exempt from state income taxes?

Since many state income tax statutes follow federal rules in defining gross income, education aid that is excludible under section 127 will generally be exempt from state income taxes as well. Nonetheless, there may be exceptions (for example, Georgia law may treat section 127 as expired), and therefore current local tax laws should be consulted.

6. In order to qualify under section 127, what requirements must an educational assistance plan meet?

In order to qualify under section 127, an educational assistance plan must be nondiscriminatory (see Q/A-7) and must meet the other requirements described in Q/A-6. An educational assistance plan that does not meet these requirements is not able to provide education aid that is excludible under section 127.

Separate written plan

To qualify, an educational assistance plan must be a separate written plan of an employer. This means that the terms of the plan must be set forth in a separate document, or documents, drafted to provide employees with only "qualifying educational assistance" (as defined below). Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(b). At least in the case of unfunded plans, the degree of formality of the document(s) appears largely up to the individual employer. IRS regulations impose only great requirements, and unfunded educational assistance plans are generally exempt from the plan document (and other) requirements of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974. Reg. Sec. 2510.3-1(k).

Qualifying educational assistance

The education aid provided under the plan must be solely "qualifying educational assistance." Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(c). This operational requirement compliments the similar documentary requirement described above. "Qualifying educational assistance" is defined as employee education aid, other than aid for meals, lodging and the other nonqualifying items listed in Q/A-2. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(c). Under IRS regulations, a plan is not deemed to provide solely qualifying educational assistance if "in form or operation" it permits employees to choose between education aid and any taxable remuneration. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(c)(2) (e.g., cafeteria plans). However, an employer may design its plan to be part of a more comprehensive program that permits employees to choose among various nontaxable benefits. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(b).

Exclusive benefit

A qualifying educational assistance plan is permitted to benefit only the "employees" of an employer. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(d). For this purpose, the regulations under section 127 define "employee" to include:

A retired, disabled or laid-off employee;

An employee on leave of absence; or

A self-employed individual. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(h)(1).

Thus, for example, a retraining program solely for disabled and laid-off employees could qualify under section 127. However, a program which provides education aid for employees' spouses and dependents (who are not themselves employees) would not qualify under section 127. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(d).

Reasonable notice

An employer must also provide its employees with the opportunity to benefit from an educational assistance plan by giving them fair notice of its terms. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(g). IRS regulations do not impose specific requirements regarding form, content or timing for this notice; rather, they require only that an employer provide "reasonable" notice of a plan's availability and terms to those employees who are eligible to participate.

An educational assistance plan which is nondiscriminatory and which meets the foregoing requirements will qualify under section 127. If an employer wishes, a plan may be submitted to the IRS for a ruling on its qualification; however, an IRS ruling is not required. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(a).

7. What nondiscrimination standards must an educational assistance plan satisfy?

In order to qualify under section 127, an educational assistance plan must satisfy two nondiscrimination standards—a 5 percent limitation on benefits for significant owners, and a general requirement for nondiscriminatory eligibility.

A plan meets the 5 percent limitation in any plan year only if no more than 5 percent of the plan's cost for such year is for education aid provided to "over 5 percent owners" (or their spouses and dependents who are employees). Internal Revenue Code (IRC) Sec. 127(b)(3). An individual is an "over 5 percent owner" if, on any day during the year, he/she owns more than 5 percent of either the capital or profits interest in the employer (if an unincorporated business), or more than 5 percent of the employer's total number of outstanding shares (if the employer is a corporation). Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(f)(2). In determining an individual's stock ownership in the employer, certain attribution rules are applied, i.e., the individual is deemed to own stock that is owned by certain related individuals or entities. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(f)(2)(iii). Similar rules apply in determining an individual's ownership in an unincorporated business. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(f)(2)(iii). (Ownership is determined in accordance with regulations under section 414(c).) IRS regulations require the 5 percent limitation to be applied based on the plan year that is specified in the written plan document; this plan year may be either the calendar year or the employer's fiscal year. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(f)(1).

Nondiscriminatory eligibility

In order to satisfy the nondiscriminatory eligibility requirement, an educational assistance plan must make education aid available to employees on terms that do not discriminate in favor of employees who are officers, shareholders, self-employed or highly compensated, or in favor of their spouses or dependents who are employees. Internal Revenue Code Sec. 127(b)(2). While this permits education aid to be made available on a selective basis, the group eligible must constitute a "nondiscriminatory classification" of employees. For this purpose, the longstanding nondiscriminatory classification standards used in connection with qualified retirement plans (Sec. 410(b)(1)(B) are generally controlling. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(e)(1). (For an example of a nondiscriminatory classification, see Rev. Rul. 83-58, 1983-1 C.B. 95.) Also, as in the retirement area, employees subject to collective bargaining may be disregarded in testing an eligibility classification, so long as educational assistance was the subject of good faith bargaining between the parties. However, in determining the scope of a classification, a plan's terms are not automatically accepted on their face. Instead, the availability of education aid to various employees is determined based on all the characteristics of the plan. Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(e)(1). For example, if a plan purports to be open to all employees, but only provides education aid for courses at the undergraduate level, only employees qualified to take courses at that level are deemed to be eligible in testing the plan. Unless this group constitutes a nondiscriminatory classification of all employees (other than employees who may be disregarded because of collective bargaining), the plan will not qualify under section 127.

If an educational assistance plan makes education aid available on a nondiscriminatory basis, disproportionate utilization of the program by employees who are officers, shareholders, etc. will not disqualify the plan. IRC Sec. 127(c)(5)(A); Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(e)(2)(i). Further, education aid will not be considered unavailable to eligible employees merely because the plan conditions reimbursement of expenses on successful completion of the course, attainment of a particular grade or satisfaction of a reasonable condition subsequent (such as remaining employed for one year after completion of the course). IRC Sec. 127(c)(5)(B); Reg. Sec. 1.127-2(e)(2)(ii). These special rules are important safeguards that help protect properly designed educational assistance plans from concerns about discriminating in operation. In essence, an educational assistance plan is required to provide a nondiscriminatory opportunity. Except as necessary to satisfy the 5% limitation, it need not compel nondiscriminatory utilization of that opportunity.

8. What reporting requirements apply to an educational assistance plan?

If an employer maintains an educational assistance plan during any "year" beginning after 1984, the employer is required to file an information return with the IRS setting forth the following information:

The number of employees of the employer;

The number of employees of the employer eligible to participate in the plan;

The number of employees who actually participate in the plan;

The total cost of the plan during the year; and

The employer's name, address, taxpayer identification number and type of business. IRC Sec. 6039D(a).

Reporting is apparently required with respect to the taxable year of the employer. See, H.R. Rep. No. 861, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 1175(1984) (legislative history of section 6039D's predecessor). Therefore, an employer with a taxable year that begins on July 1 should not have to report on the operation of its plan during the first six months of 1985. The IRS is authorized to establish the due date for this information return. IRC Sec. 6039D(a). While no guidelines have yet been issued, it appears the Service may require these returns to be filed within just a month or two after the close of an employer's taxable year.

In reporting the cost of a plan, presumably an employer should only include the cost of education aid that is actually provided under the plan. Therefore, if an employer provides, for example, in-house training to employees as part of its operational activities (as a cost of doing business), but not under the plan, it should not be necessary to determine and include the cost of this training as part of its return. For those few cases where in-house training is provided pursuant to the terms of a section 127 plan, special rules apply. The employer should report the cost of all "direct" expenses, such as instructor's salaries and the cost of books and supplies; "overhead" expenses like utility and copying costs need not be reported. H.R. Rep. No. 1049, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 7, n.2 (1984).

In addition to the reporting requirements outlined above, Code section 6039D gives the IRS the authority to require particular employers to file an additional return providing further information about their educational assistance plans. IRC Sec. 6039D(c) (e.g., information on employer cost by salary ranges might be required). If such additional reporting is required, it should only affect a small sample of employers maintaining educational assistance plans. The penalty for failing to file either information return is $25 for each day that the failure continues, up to a maximum of $15,000. IRC Sec. 6652(f).

The same legislation that enacted the reporting requirements described above, also contained a statement of congressional intent that may necessitate additional reporting. H.R. Rep. No. 1049, 98th Cong., 2d Sess. 7 (1984). Specifically, the legislative history of P.L. 98-611 indicates that employers should report to employees, who terminate during a year, the value of educational assistance received during that year. This information is intended to assist these employees in determining whether their educational assistance has exceeded the $5,000 annual cap. No IRS guidelines have been issued to clarify this requirement and it is not clear what penalty, if any, applies in the event an employer fails to provide this information.

EXPIRATION OF SECTION 127

9. When does section 127 expire?

Section 127 is currently scheduled to expire on December 31, 1985. Unless existing law is changed, educational assistance received after December 31, 1985 will not be excludible from income under section 127.

10. Have any proposals been made to extend section 127?

Yes, several. The President's tax reform proposal and at least two bills currently pending in Congress, S. 558 and H.R. 1356, would all make section 127 a permanent provision of the Internal Revenue Code. (The President's proposal also would make certain other changes to section 127; see Q/A-17 below).

11. If section 127 expires, would educational assistance become taxable?

As explained in Q/A-13 below, some education aid that is nontaxable under section 127 can also qualify for tax-free treatment under other provisions of the tax law. If section 127 expires, the taxability of education aid would be determined in accordance with these provisions. In addition, even if section 127 were to expire on December 31, 1985, Congress could restore the provision retroactively later on. For example, section 127 has already expired once before, on December 31, 1983. Thereafter, on October 31, 1984, P.L. 98-611 retroactively reinstated section 127 and extended the provision through December 31, 1985.

12. What withholding obligations would apply to education aid if section 127 expires?

If Congress declines to extend section 127, withholding taxes would apply to any education aid that is not excludible under other provisions of the tax law (see Q/A-13 and Q/A-14 below). On the other hand, if, when section 127 expires, it appears that the provision may be eventually restored, the answer is less clear. As explained in Q/A-4, education aid is not subject to withholding taxes if, at the time provided, it is reasonable to believe the aid will be excludible under section 127. If section 127 expires December 31, 1985, and early in 1986 it appears that section 127 will be retroactively re-enacted, then arguably an employer could "reasonably believe" that education aid provided at that time would ultimately be excludible under section 127. Nonetheless, when section 127 last expired, the Treasury Department indicated informally that it rejected this interpretation. Apparently in Treasury's view, section 127's likelihood of re-enactment could not be considered in determining whether withholding was required. The issue in 1984 was eventually defused by Congress, since the re-enactment of section 127 included a provision that waived penalties and interest for failures to withhold during 1984, P.L. 86-611, Sec. 1(g)(4). Nonetheless, Treasury's position in 1984 highlights the risks facing any employer who chooses not to withhold on otherwise taxable education aid in the event that section 127 should again expire.

NONCOMPENSATORY EDUCATION AID

13. Does any education aid qualify for tax-free treatment without regard to section 127?

Yes, education aid which qualifies as "noncompensatory" is excludible from the recipient's gross income without regard to section 127. Rev. Rul. 76-71, 1976-1 C.B. 308. In order to be considered noncompensatory, the education aid:

Must be for education that would meet the standards for an employees business deduction (see Q/A-16 below), and Must be received pursuant to an employer plan that provides only job-related education aid. Rev. Rul. 76-62, 1976-1, C.B. 12; Rev. Rul. 76-352, 1976-2 C.B. 37.

For this purpose, and employer plan meets the "job-related" test if it makes available only education that improves an employee's effectiveness for the duties of his job. Rev. Rul. 76-71, 1976-1 C.B. 308; Rev. Rul. 76-62, 1976-1 C.B. 12.

14. Do withholding taxes apply to noncompensatory education aid?

The Internal Revenue Service has ruled that noncompensatory education aid is not subject to Social Security, unemployment or income tax withholding. Rev. Rul. 76-71, 1976-1 C.B. 308. Nonetheless, in practice, many employers find it difficult to determine whether particular education aid qualifies as noncompensatory.

15. What tax treatment applies to education aid that is not excludible under Section 127 and that fails to qualify as noncompensatory?

Education aid that is not excludible under Section 127 and that fails to qualify as noncompensatory is includible in the gross income of an employee and is subject to withholding taxes; however, if the education involved satisfies the standards in Q/A-16, the employee may claim an offsetting business deduction for the amount included in his income. Rev. Rul. 76-352, 1976-2 C.B. 37. Since this deduction affects the computation of the employee's "adjusted gross income," it is available even if the employee does not itemize his deductions. IRC Sec. 62(2)(A); Reg. Sec. 1.62-1(f)(1). The practical effect of the deduction is to exempt the education aid from federal income taxes. Still, it does not cancel out any Social Security or unemployment taxes that have been withheld by the employer. Therefore, for employees who earn less than the Social Security wage base ($39,600 in 1985) the deduction will be less valuable than a comparable exclusion.

16. What education expenses are deductible as employee business expenses?

In order for an employer's education expenses to be deductible, they must be for education that satisfies the following requirements:

The education must either (1) maintain or improve skills needed by the employee for his current job, or (2) meet the employer's express requirements for retaining the job;

The education must not qualify the employee for a new trade or business; and

The education must not be needed to satisfy the minimum educational requirements of the employee's job. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5.

Maintains or improves skills

The deductibility of an employee's education expenses depends to a large degree on the relationship of the education to his current job. Education that provides new skills, or which supports skills that are only remotely related to the duties of a current job, generally will not satisfy the "maintains or improves" standard of the Regulations. See, McIlvoy v. Commissioner, 38 T.C.M. 142 (1979). This serves to disallow deductions for personal enrichment education that is not employment motivated; McAuliffe v. Commissioner, 40 T.C.M. 987 (1980) (literature courses); Mullen v. Commissioner, 29 T.C.M. 925 (1970) (philosophy courses). However, it also denies deductions for employment-motivated education that relates more to advancement than to an employee's current job. Smith v. Commissioner, 41 T.C.M. 1186 (1981) (foreman taking MBA program). Because the focus is solely on an employee's current job, it appears that lower-level workers (whose jobs tend to be narrower) often have the greatest difficulty in satisfying the "maintains or improves" standard of the regulations. Compare, McIlvoy v. Commissioner, 38 T.C.M. 987 (1979) (lower-level engineer denied deduction for MBA expenses); and Beatty v. Commissioner, 40 T.C.M. 438 (1980) (engineer with some managerial duties allowed deduction for MBA-type expenses).

Express requirements of the employer

In some cases where the education does not maintain or improve current job skills, a deduction may be available because the education satisfies the express requirements of the employer. The requirements must be imposed by the employer for a bona fide business reason (or be a requirement of law) and must be a condition of the employee's retaining "his established employment relationship, status or rate of compensation." Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(c)(2). In addition, only the least education necessary to retain the employee's position will qualify under this standard. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(c)(2).

New trade or business

Expenses incurred for education that qualifies an employee for a new trade or business are not eligible for deduction. However, education that prepares an employee for a "change of duties" does not fail this test if the new duties involve the same general type of work. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(b)(3)(i). Thus, for example, a classroom teacher may train to become a guidance counselor or principal; however, a nonlawyer may not deduct expenses for law school courses required by his employer if they could lead to taking the bar examination. Reg. Sections 1.162-5(b)(3)(i)(c) and (d), and (b)(3)(ii) Example (2); Rev. Rul. 76-62, 1976-1 C.B. 12. In general, the Tax Court has tended to apply the "new trade or business" test rather narrowly. (See, for example, the following cases where deductions were denied: Browne v. Commissioner, 73 T.C. 723 (1980) (bookkeeper/return preparer's courses toward an undergraduate accounting degree); Burt v. Commissioner, 40 T.C.M. 1164 (1980) (music courses taken by church's minister of music—disallowed because could be used for teacher's position); Josephs v. Commissioner, 39 T.C.M. 138 (1979) (technician's engineering courses).)

MINIMUM EDUCATIONAL REQUIREMENTS

Expenses for education that is necessary to satisfy the minimum educational requirements for an employee's job will not qualify for deduction. The fact that an employee already has a job does not establish that he has met the minimum educational standards for the position. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(b)(2)(i). Thus, some education that meets the "express requirements of the employer" will not qualify for deduction because it is needed to satisfy the "minimum educational requirements" for the position. For example, a temporary teacher studying for a bachelor's degree in order to obtain a permanent position may not deduct the cost of the education. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(b)(2)(iiii). On the other hand, once an employee has initially satisfied the minimum educational requirements for his job, any subsequent increases in those requirements are not considered in determining the deductibility of his education expenses. Reg. Sec. 1.162-5(b)(2)(i).

The rules for determining the deductibility of education expenses are detailed and complex. Because they depend upon a case-by-case determination of the facts, they have been a fertile source for taxpayer litigation. In addition, this same complexity has made it difficult and burdensome for employers to determine their withholding obligations on education aid that does not qualify for exclusion under section 127.

PRESIDENT REAGAN'S TAX PROPOSAL

17. What changes would President Reagan's Tax Proposal make to section 127?

In addition to making section 127 a permanent provision of the Internal Revenue Code, the President's tax reform proposal would make several other significant changes in section 127:

The $5,000 cap would be eliminated;

The percentage limit on aid to significant owners would be modified; and

Two new utilization-based tests for nondiscrimination would be added.

Percentage limit

The current percentage limit on education aid for significant owners would generally be liberalized (and made more complicated) by the President's proposal. The percentage limit used for the test would be increased from 5% to 25%, while the group to whom the limit applies would be significantly changed. Under the proposal, the 25% limit would apply to the 20 highest-paid members of the "prohibited group." In general, the term "prohibited group" refers to:

Employees owning at least 1% of the employer;

Employees paid at least $50,000 annually;

Employees within the highest-paid 10%; and Family members of these employees.

In addition, an employee, who is a prohibited group member in one year, would also be considered a prohibited group member in the two succeeding years. In applying the 25% limitation, only education leading to a degree would be considered and, therefore, employers would have to segregate degree and nondegree education in testing their plans.

New nondiscriminating tests

The proposal's new tests for nondiscrimination would, in contrast to present law, focus on the utilization of educational assistance under a plan. Under the first test, the percentage of prohibited group members actually receiving education aid under the plan could not exceed 125% of the percentage of other employees receiving aid. For example, if 20% of nonprohibited group employees received aid, then no more than 25% of the prohibited group could receive education aid under the plan. Under the second test, the average amount of education aid provided to members of the prohibited group could not exceed 125% of the average amount of aid provided to other employees. Thus, if the average education aid provided to nonprohibited group employees were $300, then the average amount of aid for prohibited group members could not exceed $375. In applying this second test, as in the case of the 25% limitation, only education leading to a degree would be considered.

Under the proposal, the penalty for failing a nondiscrimination test would fall solely on the prohibited group. Therefore, if a plan failed either utilization test or the 25% percentage limit described above, education aid provided to prohibited group members would not be excludible under Section 127. However, the aid apparently still could be tax-free under other tax provisions (see Q/A-13 through A/A-16).●

THE EXPERIMENTS OF DR. D. EWEN CAMERON

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I have long believed that when a person makes a mistake, the sooner he or she owns up to the mistake and does his or her best to rectify it, the better it is for all concerned. This principle applies as much to governments as to individuals, and I respectfully suggest that principle should be particularly applicable to the CIA-funded brainwashing experiments on unwitting Canadian citizens in the late 1950's and early 1960's. But, instead of making public apology and rectification to the Canadian citizens whose lives were wrecked by those experiments, the CIA has adamantly resisted the efforts of the Canadian victims of the experiments and their Government to obtain some recompense for the damage to the victims' lives.

The CIA was able to keep its actions secret from the Canadian people and the Canadian Government and from the American public until John Marks used the Freedom of Information Act in 1977 to break the story with his book "The Search for the Manchurian Candidate." At that time, the then CIA Director, Adm. Stansifield Turner, was aghast at what had happened and promised the Senate that he would find the people who had been subjected to these unwitting brainwashing experiments and would seek assistance for them. But that never happened. Instead, the CIA is even today stonewalling any fair settlement with the nine victims of the CIA-funded brainwashing experiments who have brought suit in the U.S. district court here.

The Washington Post did a great public service last Sunday in its story on one of the victims of the CIA-funded experiments and I am placing that story in the RECORD along with a number of editorials and pieces from the leading United States and Canadian newspapers which have called on the CIA to rectify its past errors in Canada.

Mr. President, I am as aghast as Admiral Turner at what the CIA did in Canada. But, I am even more aghast at the refusal of the United States Government to resolve this matter with the Canadian victims of the CIA actions. The suit of these nine victims has been pending for over 5 years and, instead of seeking a settlement on some reasonable basis, our Government and the CIA have placed every conceivable roadblock in the path of these victims. These people are now elderly—Louise Weinstein, the subject of the Post piece, is 79—and any further delays in fair recompense could literaly deprive some of the victims of any compensation at all. A fair settlement would serve the interests of justice and decency.

I ask that the material to which I have referred to be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

[From the Washington Post, July 28, 1985]

THE EXPERIMENTS OF DR. D. EWEN CAMERON

(By David Remnick)

Harvey Weinstein, a quite bearded man who practices psychiatry at Stanford University, say there are days when he is "ashamed" of his profession, nights when he cannot stop thinking about the Canadian psychiatrist who "ruined my father's life . . . Left him with nothing. It's nightmare that never ends."

With funding from the CIA, the late Dr. D. Ewen Cameron did a series of mind-control experiments on 53 people, including Harvey Weinstein's father, Louis, a prosperous Montreal businessman. All had come to the Allan Memorial Institute of McGill University in Montreal between 1957 and 1961 for treatment of various psychological ailments.

The experiments, Weinstein, say, left his father "a human guinea pig, a poor pathetic man with no memory, no life. He lost his business, he lost everything." Weinstein is one of nine plaintiffs in a lawsuit, seeking damages from the CIA.

To erase or "de-pattern" personality traits, Cameron gave his subjects megadoses of LSD, subjected them to drug-induced "sleep therapy" for up to 65 consecutive days and applied electroshock therapy at 75 times the usual intensity. To shape new behavior, Cameron forced them to listen to repeated recorded messages for 16-hour intervals, a technique known as "psychic driving," Cameron and the CIA were interested in brainwashing and the ability to redirect thought and action. The patients did not consent to the treatment and were never told they were being used for research.

"When you're 13 years old and you see your father—an independent, kind, smart person—become a different man before your eyes, it's impossible to accommodate that," Weinstein says. "I remember one of his first visits home from the hospital. He didn't talk much, and when he did talk it made no sense. When he wasn't sleeping he was drowsy. He asked us things about his parents, even though they'd been dead for years. His memory was gone. At night once, when I was in bed, I saw him come into my room and urinate on the floor, He didn't know where he was.

"My father has ended up feeling guilty that he had done something to deserve this punishment. He is convinced the CIA listens to his telephone. He's ashamed, embarrassed. My mother died without seeing the end of this. It will be a tragedy if my father dies without restoring some sense of dignity to his life." Today Louis Weinstein lives alone in Montreal, cared for by his two grown daughters.

No one knows the whereabouts of all the subjects, some of whom may be dead. But Louis Weinstein and eight others, including Velma Orlikow, the wife of a New Democratic Party member of the Canadian parliament, claim they have been injured irreparably the the experiments. "I'd say Velma operates at about 20 percent of capacity," David Orlikow says. "It's horrific."

The CIA's involvement in mind control experiments has been coming to light for years. The suit filed by the group against the U.S. government has been pending here in U.S. District Court since December 1980 before Judge John Garrett Penn. The plaintiffs originally asked for $1 million each in damages but have cut that to $175,000. The government has offered to pay $25,000. The group's attorney, Joseph Rauh Jr., calls the settlement offer "demeaning" and contends that the CIA has managed to delay the proceedings by "stonewalling."

The CIA's counsel, Lee Strickland, declined to comment on the case. Agency spokeswoman Kathy Pherson said, "We don't comment on cases under litigation. It's inappropriate to try cases in the press."

In Cameron's defense, Brian Robertson, the present director of the Allan Institute, and James Farquhar, a psychiatrist there, wrote in the Montreal Gazette that "we have not been able to uncover a single shred of evidence that Dr. Cameron knew of the CIA connection with his research funding." They said Cameron's work "must be placed in its historical context" and that "in Cameron's day [researchers] were not expected to inform their patients of the nature of their research in the way that they are today."

The CIA has asked Judge Penn to block Rauh from taking depositions from two key agency figures—Stacey Hulse and John Knaus, who have been publicly identified as former CIA station chiefs in Ottawa. They are both retired.

Cameron, who died of a heart attack while mountain climbing in 1967, had been one of the most prominent psychiatrists in North America. A former president of both the Canadian and American psychiatric association, he was selected to diagnose Nazi figures, including Rudolf Hess, during the Nuremberg trials. (He declared Hess sane.) But for his work on brainwashing and mind control, critics have called him a "mad scientist."

"We hanged Nazis for doing the sort of things Cameron did," says Rauh.

"Cameron wanted to be up there with Freud," says David Orlikow. "He wanted that stature, so he would do anything. Anything! It was horrific."

Since World War II, U.S. intelligence agencies have been interested in the techniques of controlling behavior and thought. The military was especially intrigued by interrogation techniques used on American POWs during the Korean War. Brainwashing entered the American vocabulary.

The CIA's first major project in the area, called Artichoke, was rudimentary compared to Mkultra, which succeeded it in 1953. Through front organizations, the CIA channeled about $10 million to dozens of universities and independent researchers.

In one highly publicized experiment an Army employe, Dr. Frank Olson, was given LSD without his knowledge. He was hospitalized and days later jumped out a window to his death.

Few people knew much about Mkultra and cases like those of Frank Olson until 1977, when requests for documents under the Freedom of Information Act exposed the nature and breadth of the CIA's activities. Such intelligence experiments have since been outlawed.

Former CIA director Richard Helms had ordered papers concerning the experiments in Montreal destroyed in 1973, but in 1977, acting on a Freedom of Information Act request by writer John Marks, then CIA director Adm. Stansfield Turner announced that some files had not been destroyed. Those documents form the basis of what is generally known about the work of D. Ewen Cameron.

A CIA chemist, Sidney Gottlieb, supervised the Mkultra project from within the agency, documents show. A CIA doctor, Lt. Col. James L. Monroe, worked undercover and ran the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, the organization that channeled money to Cameron and the Allan Institute.

Rauh contends that Cameron knew the CIA was interested in his work and actively solicited the grant. With the CIA's approval (and with checks drawn against U.S. Treasury funds), documents show that Monroe got at least $60,000 to Cameron.

Velma Orlikow:

"I suffer from chronic depression which sometimes becomes acute. I call those periods my 'black holes.' I don't see anybody and I won't leave the house. I can't read and I used to love to read. I can't write a letter. I have unexplained fears. I wake up at night afraid and I don't know why. I'm trying to limp through my life like someone who's been in a terrible accident that leaves them crippled.

"Dr. Cameron could be cruel if you didn't do exactly what he wanted. He was a god figure to the patients. He'd say to me,

'What's the matter with you, lassie?' I still hear his voice sometimes."

Ewen Cameron was born in Scotland and educated at the University of Glasgow, the Glasgow Royal Mental Hospital and at Johns Hopkins. He first won a measure of fame for setting up mobile psychiatric clinics in the '30s in Canada.

During the war, Cameron was part of an international committee of psychiatrists and social scientists who studied the origins and nature of Nazi culture. He published numerous articles on mass psychology during wartime.

Cameron began the Allan Memorial Institute in 1943 with the help of a grant from the Rockefeller Foundation. He gave numerous speeches on "the problem of Germany" and believed that the psychology and forces that gave to rise to Nazism may have been longstanding in German culture.

Although he was based in Montreal, Cameron became an American citizen and angered many in the bilingual community of Montreal for being an insistent English speaker.

More and more, Cameron came to believe in the possibility of changing the human mind, of altering thought and behavior patterns. But rather than experiment in psychotherapy, what Freudians have called "the talking cure," Cameron believed in quicker, organic means, including drugs and electroshock. He began experimenting on organic ways of controlling schizophrenia.

The experiments of 1957-1961 were done on patients, mostly women, who entered the Allan Institute voluntarily, usually at the recommendation of a private physician.

Louis Weinstein went to the institute suffering from respiratory and digestive difficulties caused by anxiety. After undergoing the complete treatment of LSD and other drugs, electroshock and psychic driving, Weinstein is, in his son's words, a "lost soul . . . My father has no social sense, how to keep clean, how to carry on a conversation." "They took his self away from him."

Velma Orlikow suffered from depression after the birth of her daughter. After several years of treatment with a private psychiatrist in Winnipeg, she entered the Allan Institute to speed her progress. Without being told the nature of the injections, she was given shots of LSD on 14 occasions and went through psychic-driving sessions. She found the treatments frightening but, according to her testimony, Cameron persuaded her to continue until 1963. Now Orlikow says she cannot concentrate well, can no longer read books or magazine articles.

Dr. Mary Morrow approached Cameron for a fellowship in psychiatry, but Cameron thought, after a physical exam, that Morrow appeared "nervous" and admitted her as a patient instead. For 11 days, Morrow says she underwent de-patterning experiments that included electroshock treatment, and barbiturates. The treatment resulted in a brain anoxia—not enough oxygen reaching the brain—and she was hospitalized. Today Morrow suffers from prosopagnosia—she cannot recognize people's faces.

The list goes on. Robert Logie, a native of Vancouver, says he cannot hold a steady job or sleep without the help of drugs. He suffers from severe depression and still dreams about the experiments. Lyvia Stadler of Montreal has been institutionalized.

In his court claim, Rauh claims that not only did the experiments have "no likely therapeutic value," they also violated the accepted standards of medical experimentation as formulated at the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials and ratified in the Charter of the United Stated Nations.

"The frustration is incredible," Harvey Weinstein says. "It's impossible to know, to ever know, what kind of life my father might have led, what kind of lives all these people might have led, if this had never happened. So much has been stolen from my father and everyone like him."

LOUIS WEINSTEIN'S NIGHTMARE

Last Sunday this newspaper carried a story that illustrated, in personal and human terms, a court case we have written about in this space. A Stanford University psychiatrist, Dr. Harvey Weinstein, described to Post reporter David Remnick the condition of his father, Louis, who was treated at a Montreal hospital in the late '50s for respiratory and digestive difficulties caused by anxiety. He is now, says his son, "a lost soul . . . a human guinea pig, a poor, pathetic man with no memory, no life . . . It's a nightmare that never ends." Louis Weinstein had been, without his knowledge or consent, the subject of horrible psychiatric experiments involving LSD, sleep deprivation, massive shock therapy and attempted brainwashing. The CIA financed those experiments in an attempt to learn more about mind-control techniques, and Mr. Weinstein and eight other Canadians who were similarly treated are now suing the U.S. government for redress.

It is possible to believe that the intelligence agency did not intend to harm innocent civilians in these experiments and simply put its faith in the psychiatrist who carried out the work. He was, after all, a former president of both that American and Canadian psychiatric associations and had a fine reputation. It is also possible to believe that the doctor, D. Ewen Cameron, did not foresee the terrible results of his experiments. Some psychiatrists have said, in his defense, that his work "must be placed in its historical context," since it was conducted at a time when informed consent was not generally required and when the long-term effects of powerful new drugs were unclear.

But it is not possible to consider it acceptable that such experiments be carried out on people without their knowledge or consent, And it is not possibe to refute facts: the Canadian plaintiffs were the involuntary subjects of Dr. Cameron's experiments. They have been grievously and permanently injured. And American taxpayers' money financed that research. The damages they seek—$175,000 each—are hardly more than symbolic and can in no way compensate for ruined lives and decades of suffering. Yet their case has dragged on in the U.S. District Court here for almost five years because the CIA refuses to settle or even to cooperate. There is no overriding security interest at stake here, only a few individuals and this nation's honor. It is shameful not to apologize and settle.

THE CIA'S CANADIAN VICTIMS

Remember how shocked you were when you learned that the CIA, using your tax money, had financed a series of psychiatric experiments on some unsuspecting fellow citizens? One victim, Frank Olsen, committed suicide as a direct result of having been given LSD in such "research." When this horrible history came to light during the Church committee investigation in the 1970s, apologies and compensation were offered, and assurances given that such conduct would never be repeated. But the shame lingers.

Now we learn that CIA-financed psychiatric experiments were not confined within U.S. borders. Canadian citizens were also involuntary and unwilling objects of experimentation in this grotesque program, and some were permanently and seriously injured. It happened at the Allen Memorial Institute, the psychiatric branch of the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal, in the late '50s. Dr. D. Ewen Cameron, who was once president of the Canadian Psychiatric Association, used CIA money to conduct experiments on mind control, brainwashing and behavior modification. His subjects were 53 patients who were given large doses of LSD and numerous electric shock treatments and were drugged into prolonged periods of sleep—weeks at a time—while attempts were made to brainwash them. These patients had all come to Dr. Cameron for treatment. Neither they nor their families were told that they were to be subjects in an experiment—let alone an experiment paid for by the CIA. Many still suffer the effects of this outrageous treatment; nine victims, including the wife of a member of the Canadian Parliament, have sued the United States for compensation.

The U.S. government is stonewalling these Canadians in their effort to obtain redress. A Feedom of Information Act request produced documentary evidence that the experiments occurred and that the United States officially apologized to the Canadian government—but not to the individual victims—for having financed them. But the apology itself has not been produced in spite of a request from Ottawa that a copy be made available to the litigants. Nor has the United States offered to do the right and sensible thing—settle these claims immediately and avoid a trial that would be difficult for those who have been injured and embarrassing to the agency responsible. That course would restore our valued good relations with the Canadians and do justice to innocent victims. It would signify a further rejection by this government of a policy abandoned years ago. It is the only right and decent thing to do.

[From the Washington Post, Apr. 18, 1985]

THE VICTIMS OF MKULTRA

Nine Justices of the Supreme Court this week agreed that Congress gave the CIA broad powers to conceal information obtained from intelligence sources. Justices Brennan and Marshall, in a concurring opinion, would have defined "intelligence sources" more narrowly, so as to protect only those persons who supplied information with a promise of confidentiality. But even they agreed with the result in the case at issue.

It is reasonable that the CIA be given special exemptions from the Freedom of Information Act, and in principle the court's decision is understandable. However, this is more than a case of dry statutory interpretation. It involves real human beings who were severely injured and who need help.

In the '50s, the CIA embarked on a program, "MKULTRA," to experiment with forms of mind control in order to catch up with what was assumed to be dramatic Soviet and Chinese advances in this field. Eighty institutions and 185 private researchers had contracts with the CIA to perform this work. Many individuals became, without their consent, the subjects of psychiatric and drug experiments. With a few exceptions, it is not known who these people are or what has become of them. The plaintiffs in the case the Supreme Court decided this week tried to force the CIA to turn over records of the experiments so that the victims could be traced and informed. They were unsuccessful.

From the few known cases, the results of the experiments were horrible. Some subjects, given LSD, were permanently mentally impaired. Some committed suicide over drug-induced fears and depressions. Some research was carried out in Canada, where a private psychiatrist experimented on patients at the Royal Victoria Hospital in Montreal. A group of surviving victims, one the wife of a member of the Canadian Parliament, has sued the U.S. government for compensation; the CIA persists in denying liability, and the case has dragged on in court for more than four years. In another case involving an American whose family discovered the CIA's involvement in his suicide only years after the fact, compensation was awarded. But most of those who were the subjects of the MKULTRA experiments still do not know it.

These victims of government action must be found and cared for. The courts will not order the CIA to reveal the required information, but the agency, acting on its own, can trace many victims through its contractors. If this isn't done, Congress, which ultimately makes the rules governing CIA activity, can order a search and provide compensation for the Canadians as well as the Americans involved. It is the only just and honorable thing to do.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 26, 1983]

WHAT WAS THE CIA UP TO IN CANADA?

All Canadians owe a debt of gratitude to David Broder for his March 13 column ["There's a Gorilla in the Hemisphere"] based on Lawrence Martin's invaluable book, "The Presidents and the Prime Ministers." Both the Broder piece and the Martin book expose a long history of ham-handed U.S. arrogance toward its Canadian neighbor. I am writing to attest to an additional instance of American callousness—the CIA-sponsored brain-washing experiments performed on unsuspecting Canadian citizens.

In those CIA-funded experiments during the late 1950s and early 1960s, patients at a Montreal mental hospital were subjected to some or all of the following procedures. They were given LSD and were "depatterned" by receiving large doses of drugs and/or intensive electro-shocks two or three times a day until they were reduced to a vegetative state. Some patients were subjected to "psychic driving"—tape recording repeated the same message over and over when played through speakers in the patients' pillows or headphones from 6 a.m. until 9 p.m. each day until the message had been repeated some one-quarter to one-half million times. Finally, to make some of the patients forget what had been done to them, powerful drugs were administered that caused them to sleep for a one week to 10 days.

All of this was done without even informing our government here in Canada, much less telling the patients who had come to the hospital seeking therapy that they were subjects of brainwashing experiments. As a Canadian citizen and a member of Parliament, the arrogance of the CIA angers me; but as a husband that anger knows no bounds—for my wife was one of the patients used as a guinea pig in the CIA-sponsored brainwashing experiments. I speak from distressing personal knowledge when I say that the CIA has caused great suffering and unhappiness to the Canadian citizens who were victimized by those unwitting experiments.

Concepts of justice and fairness require a person who injures another to recompense his victim, yet the U.S. government has consistently acted to conceal its wrongdoing and to shirk its responsibility. The CIA files relating to this program were ordered destroyed in 1973, but due to an oversight a limited portion of those documents survived and were found four years later. At that time, CIA Director Stansfield Turner promised the U.S. Senate that experimental subjects would be located and notified—yet not one Canadian victim has ever been contracted by the CIA.

To this day the U.S. government denies all responsibility toward the Canadians who were victims. When my wife and other Canadians who had been patients at the hospital approached the CIA seeking recompense, they encountered a stone wall of opposition. Those Canadian citizens were forced to sue for the compensation due them—a suit that the United States has resisted with all the resources available to it.

It is bad enough when, as Mr. Martin relates, the United States tries to station missiles in Canada with the purpose of making us a target for the Russians and when U.S. industries pollute so badly that acid rains kill our forests; but when the United States comes up here and uses our citizens as guinea pigs and then denies all responsibility, only one question remains: with friends like these.

DAVID ORLIKOW.

HORROR STORY

In all decency, the U.S. government should move promptly to settle the long-pending lawsuit brought against it by nine Canadian citizens who were the unknowing subjects of medical experiments 27 years ago in a Montreal hospital.

This is a horror story that came to light seven years ago, and the horror has never ended for the victims. The Central Intelligence Agency secretly funded a 25-year experiment in the control of the human mind. Involved were several medical research institutions and government hospitals in the United States and Canada.

Without their knowledge, selected patients in the Montreal hospital were given heavy doses of LSD. A member of the Canadian Parliament, David Orlikow, first learned of the experiments in newspaper accounts. His wife had entered the Montreal hospital for treatment of depression during the time of the experiments. She said that she had been given doses of hallucinogenic drugs, and, in the 27 years since, she said that she has been unable to concentrate and even now is unable to read an entire magazine article. Another victim, according to a report in the New York Times, said that the experiments left her with no memory of the births of her four children.

The Canadian government had not shown much interest in the suit until after the case was discussed recently on a nationwide Canadian television program. The Canadian embassy in Washington then sent a note to the U.S. State Department asking the United States to give relevant documents to the attorneys for the nine Canadians. Foreign Minister Allan J. MacEachen of Canada said that he was considering an appeal to the International Court of Justice in The Hague in behalf of the subjects of the experiments. His statement was considered a move to persuade the United States to settle the suit, which was filed in federal court in Washington, seeking $1 million for each victim.

The evidence is plain. There is no way to reconcile the CIA-sponsored medical experiments on unknowing subjects with conduct worthy of this nation. They never should have been permitted, and the U.S. government should meet its obligation to negotiate a settlement without dragging the victims through the ordeal of long and tortuous legal proceedings.

UNWITTING GUINEA PIGS FOR THE CIA

(By Allan Fotheringham)

Montreal's Allan Memorial Institute was grateful to get the money back in the late 1950s. As part of the Royal Victoria Hospital's funding, the annual grants coming from the Cornell University medical school's "Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology" were most welcome. Particularly since the financing was going to the brilliant Dr. Ewen Cameron, the Scottish-born doctor who has been called "the godfather of Canadian psychiatry." He was the first professor of psychiatry ever appointed at McGill, then known as one of the finest medical schools on the continent. Cameron's stature was such that when he presented his startling and severe new treatment for schizophrenia before the Second International Congress for Psychiatry in Zurich in 1957, the grand old man of the profession, Dr. Carl Jung himself, was in the audience listening. Jung seemed surprised at Cameron's harsh "de-patterning" methods, but the medical fraternity seldom attacks its own, now does it? It is the tightest union in the world, tighter even than the one the lawyers inhabit.

As it happens, old Carl Jung had reason to raise his eyebrows. The Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology has turned out to be a front for the celebrated U.S. Central Intelligence Agency and the good Dr. Cameron was using Canadians as guinea pigs in brain-washing experiments.

For 20 years, between 1953 and 1973, the CIA spent $25 million in attempts to learn how to control the human mind. The excuse was that the Soviets and the Chinese might be perfecting techniques in that esoteric field. The CIA front run through Cornell was involved with more than 50 universities in 21 countries. The idea was for the CIA to subsidize research by recognized academics who had no idea of their sponsor—nor the real purpose of the "research."

The code name for the grisly project was MKULTRA. The CIA in 1973 illegally burned the MKULTRA documents and Dr. Cameron's family, after he was killed in a mountaineering accident in 1967, destroyed his files. But the U.S. Freedom of Information Act (which, unlike the Canadian version, actually frees information) has unveiled the goods on the CIA experiments with the minds of 53 patients at the Allan Institute.

The medical excuse was the need for speed. Psychiatrists were impatient with the long and laborious treatment through psychoanalysis as developed by Sigmund Freud and Jung. They wanted swifter methods of restoring mental balance, and Dr. Ewen Cameron was a pioneer in the field.

In the United States the early experiments—often using the then-little-known drug LSD—were conducted on unsuspecting prisoners, prostitutes and other "undesirables" who functioned on the fringe of society. In Montreal, Cameron used ordinary people who came to him with severe problems. He used "sleep therapy," in which patients were heavily drugged and knocked out for as long as 65 days—disturbed several times a day through heavy electroshock treatments. His methods to repattern the troubled brain was something called "psychic driving"—patients tucked away in a "sleep room" where taped messages played up to half a million times were repeated into their drugged ears from speakers under their pillows. In a box in a stable behind his lab, Dr. Cameron put patients in total isolation—deprived completely of all sensory stimuli: nothing to see or hear or smell or feel. One woman was in the box for 35 days, allowed out only for toilet breaks and meals. At least one patient, Marian Jackson Robinson, died of what was called a stroke.

Val Orlikow is the wife of David Orlikow, the veteran NDP MP from Winnipeg North. She checked into the Allan Institute in 1956, suffering from neurosis and postpartum depression. Within two weeks she (unknowingly) began to receive heavy doses of the new drug LSD—14 treatments in all over two months. One thing the CIA was curious about was what techniques could be used to break down those interrogated by its agents and whether disinformation could be lodged in their memories. Mrs. Orlikow has lost the ability to concentrate, cannot read books or abide crowds and has probably suffered brain damage. Bob Logie of Vancouver, another guinea pig, lives on a disability pension (Cameron put him in a drug-induced sleep for 23 days) and still has nightmares over his stay at the Allan Institute.

Nine of the victims have sued the CIA, originally asking for $1 million each. It has dragged through U.S. courts for five years now, and the nine have reduced their demands—while legal costs drag on—to $175,000 apiece. They are represented by 74-year-old Joseph Rauh, one of the great civil liberties lawyers of this century. He and his junior partner have spent two years on the case. Orlikow and his clan have no money.

The U.S. refuses to budge on its offer of $25,000 to each of the nine. It admits guilt. Former CIA director Stansfield Turner says the experiments were "unethical" and left him "aghast." Joe Clark, supposedly our external affairs minister, says he has personally appealed to Secretary of State George Shultz—with no result. Rauh says he's appalled that Ottawa hasn't the guts to submit the case to the World Court in The Hague. There's the suspicion Ottawa is shy because of its own involvement in the Cameron experiments.

The Mulroney government makes much of its new, close, intimate relationship with the White House. This might be a very good test of the credibility of that claim. You say $25,000 measly bucks for lives ruined?

[From the Toronto Globe and Mail, Mar. 20, 1985]

THE COLD SHOULDER OF THE CIA

Guided apparently by the philosophy that you can't make an omelet without breaking a few eggs, the Central Intelligence Agency has taken many a bizarre misstep in its mission to make the world safe for democracy. One of its more appalling blunders was the funding of brainwashing experiments on patients at the Allan Memorial Institute in Montreal 25 years ago.

Quietly, the U.S. Government has acknowledged the episode and apologized for the CIA's hand in experiments involving the use of LSD and other powerful drugs, shock therapy and "psychic driving" by the use of tape recordings. There remains, however, a stubborn reluctance to make decent amends.

The suit filed in the U.S. District Court more than four years ago, on behalf of nine of the brainwashing victims, has been stonewalled. In an attempt to work around this, External Affairs Minister Joe Clark recently proposed a meeting of government officials and lawyers from both countries to settle the suit. This has been rejected by the U.S. Government, deepening the frustrations that have arisen from legal delays.

There have also been dark hints at Canadian complicity in the experiments. Scott Kragie, the U.S. Justice Department lawyer representing the CIA, says he is convinced that the late Dr. Ewan Cameron, the prominent Canadian psychiatrist under whom the experiements were conducted, would have conducted them with or without CIA funding, and that the Canadian Government knew about the experiments, helped pay for them and could have stopped them.

New Democratic Party MP David Orlikow, whose special interest in the subject stems from the fact that his wife, Velma, was one of the patients, has found no evidence that Canadian funding of Dr. Cameron's work was of anything but a general nature—the funding that would naturally flow to the research work of an eminent psychiatrist. The more sinister aspects of what went on at the Institute were, he believes, the exclusive product of CIA funding.

This is more or less conceded by the CIA, which believes the resulting suffering could be adequately soothed by a compensation offer of $20,000 to each victim. We think not.

[From the Toronto Globe and Mail, Jan. 18, 1985]

ON THE CIA'S BEHALF

The U.S. Central Intelligence Agency went shopping in Montreal in the late 1950s, and, using a front group called the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, financed the experiments of a renowned psychiatrist into the re-programming of human behavior. With the help of $60,000 contributed by the CIA between 1957 and 1960, Dr. D. Ewen Cameron subjected 53 patients to drug therapy with the hallucinogen LSD, electric shock treatment and chemically-induced sleep for up to 65 days.

Dr. Cameron died in 1967. When the news broke years later that the CIA had been behind his experiments, nine of his ex-patients launched a suit against the U.S. Government for $1-million each. Washington has now, on the CIA's behalf, offered an out-of-court settlement of $20,000 each—an astonishingly inadequate sum. As lawyer Joe Rauh says, "They are still saying to us this is a nuisance case and that's all you're going to get."

Some nuisance. When one patient, Velma Orlikow, entered the Allan Institute voluntarily in 1956 for treatment of neurosis and post-childbirth depression, she received instead 14 injections of LSD, administered without her knowledge, and a treatment called "psychic driving"—an attempt to break down her personality and rebuild it.

The Canadian Government has sent several sharp diplomatic notes to Washington, condemning the CIA's actions as an infringement of Canadian sovereignty, and has made 10 informal representations to the U.S. State Department for speedy compensation; the State Department in turn, says Canadian Ambassador Allan Gotlieb, "is trying to be helpful and is sensitive to our desire to expedite a solution or a settlement."

We see little evidence of it. The realism of a demand for $1 million may be open to debate, but the pitiful offer of $20,000 per head is an insult to the nine ex-patients and the Canadian Government, which is rightly indignant at the CIA's involvement, on Canadian soil, with psychological experiments on Canadians. More than two decades on, this sordid affair remains to be reasonably settled.

SAYING THEY'RE SORRY

The U.S. Government has said it is sorry that the Central Intelligence Agency funded the brainwashing of Montreal patients 25 years ago. We know this only because news of the apology leaked out. The U.S. Government refuses to make it public, and the Canadian Government says it can find no written copy of the apology.

It's a bizarre twist to a bizarre tale. The central character was Dr. D. Ewen Cameron, a respected psychiatrist who, before his death in 1967, served as president of the Canadian, American and World Psychiatric Associations. He was also director of McGill University's Allan Memorial Institute. It was here that, using $19,000 contributed by the CIA through a group called the Society for the Investigation of Human Ecology, Dr. Cameron treated patients with the hallucinogen LSD, electro-shock therapy and prolonged drug-induced sleep.

In 1979, former U.S. State Department official John Marks wrote that 53 people had undergone the treatments. One of them was Velma Orlikow, wife of Canadian MP David Orlikow, who entered the institute voluntarily in 1956 for treatment of neurosis and postchildbirth depression. What she received were 14 injections of LSD, administered without her knowledge, and a treatment, using pre-recorded tapes, called "psychic driving"—an attempt to break down her personality and rebuild it.

The CIA's interest was simple. It was intrigued by the thought that a spy's mind could be re-programmed with new patterns of behavior, and found in Dr. Cameron a phychiatrist willing to experiment on unsuspecting patients.

No one seemed to mind. Maurice Dongier, chairman of McGill's psychiatry department, said in 1979 that the experiments were designed to deprogram individuals who had anti-social delusions. (He added that they were found to have no practical application for spies. "In that sense, I guess you could say the CIA lost their money.") Barbara Wainrib, a psychologist who worked with Dr. Cameron at the institute, said he had been motivated by "a sincere desire to find some way of counteracting the schizophrenic pattern . . . He took drastic measures. My God, he took drastic measures. But in those days we all had a feeling that these drastic measures were for a very important goal—undoing the malfunctioning logical systems of schizophrenics."

Nine of those patients are now suing the U.S. Government for $1-million each. (Mrs. Orlikow has already sued the Royal Victoria Hospital, administrator of the institute, and received an out-of-court settlement of $65,000.) They say they were never told they were participating in experiments, and that their lives were all but destroyed by the treatments.

What they need now is the text of the U.S. apology and related documents. Last May, the U.S. Government asked the Canadian Government to "withhold from public disclosure the documents in question." A spokesman for the External Affairs Department, who could find no copy of the apology, said no information provided by the U.S. could be released without that country's permission. Since then, according to David Orlikow, officials from External Affairs have offered to provide any documents that will help his wife's case. "I am prepared to take them at their word, but on the basis of their slowness to date, I hope we will not be disappointed."

We share this hope. If it is too late to undo the harm done by Dr. Cameron, it is not too late for the CIA, which financed his experiments, to compensate the victims. Canada should do all it can to help.

[From the Vancouver Sun, Jan. 18, 1984]

MIND GAMES

When it was disclosed last year that the United States army had helped accused war criminal Klaus Barbie escape arrest by the French in 1949, the U.S. government studied the matter, admitted its guilt, and issued a prompt apology.

Canadians may well be wondering why there hasn't been a similar public apology for the Central Intelligence Agency's actions in funding nightmarish mind experiments on 50 patients at a Montreal hospital in the late 1950's.

True, there was a private apology made to the Canadian government after the experiments were disclosed in 1977, but that was apparently limited to regret that Canada hadn't been informed that the U.S. had paid for the experiments.

Declassified CIA documents indicate the spy agency admitted to itself that the experiments were "immoral and inhuman." But that hasn't prevented the agency and its government from blocking access to key files by a group of nine Canadians seeking redress in the courts.

The obstruction has provoked the Canadian government to exert diplomatic pressure and to threaten to take the case to the International Court of Justice in the Hague.

Unquestionably the Canadian litigants are entitled to some answers at least, for there is no denying they underwent terrible ordeals: exhaustive bombardment with tape-recorded messages, vicious electric shocks, repeated doses of mind-altering drugs, and sensory deprivation. For the victims, mostly women, the legacy is one of depression, amnesia, nightmares, brain damage, and Lord knows what else—thanks to secrecy surrounding the project, not all the names are known.

Blame rests not only with the CIA, which thought the experiments might shed light on wartime brainwashing techniques. The wife of Winnipeg MP David Orkikow, who suffered permanent brain damage after being injected with LSD on 14 occasions, sued the Montreal hospital where the experiments were conducted and won a $65,000 out-of-court settlement.

Dr. Ewan Cameron, the prominent Canadian psychiatrist who conducted the tests, apparently with determination, is dead, so the extent of his complicity in the outrage may never be fully known.

But all who do have knowledge of the episode should realize an obligation to do what they can to put the victims' minds at rest, at the very least. Secrecy is hardly merited on national security grounds, considering that the techniques and experiments involved have been utterly discredited.

The courts may find that the cases merit money damages too, which would be a small price toward expiating the crimes committed against that most fragile and precious of things, the human consciousness.

And finally, public apologies—simple things, really—are always respected among civilized people.

As The New York Times said in acknowledging the important gesture inherent in the U.S. government's mea culpa in the Barbie case: "How rare it is for a proud and powerful nation to admit shabby behavior."●

Whereas the Helsinki Final Act commits participating states to respect human rights and fundamental freedoms and confirms the right of the individual in each participating state to know and act upon his rights and duties in this field; and

Whereas, on May 12, 1976, Doctor Yury Orlov and his colleagues announced the formation of the Helsinki Watch Group and more than one hundred people openly became members of the group and its affiliates; and

Whereas today, fifty-one Helsinki Watch members are incarcerated in prisons, labor camps, psychiatric hospitals, or are serving terms of exile; and

Whereas eighteen Helsinki Watch members have emigrated to the West because of the threat of imprisonment in the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics; and

Whereas Doctor Yury Orlov, a sixty-year-old physicist and founder the Moscow Helsinki Watch Group was arrested in February 1977 and sentenced to seven years in a strict regime labor camp and five years of internal exile; and

Whereas Yury Orlov now lives in complete isolation in a remote part of Siberia in a workers' dormitory where he is abused and persecuted by local officials, where food is scarce, and proper medical care unavailable; and

Whereas Yury Orlov is in poor health, aggravated by years of harsh prison regimen, and suffers from kidney disease, the after effects of a skull injury, and other chronic illnesses; and

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed Messrs. D'AMATO, HATFIELD, STEVENS, BUMPERS, and HARKIN conferees on the part of the Senate.

SUPPORT FOR THE FARM CREDIT SYSTEM

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. ZORINSKY, I send to the desk a Senate resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 211) expressing the sense of the Senate regarding the need to maintain and assist the farmer-owned institutions of the Farm Credit System during this period of stress in agriculture.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ZORINSKY. Mr. President, this resolution is designed to provide assurances to Farm Credit System borrowers and investors. The resolution will place the Senate on record as recognizing the responsibility of the Federal Government to maintain a viable farm credit system.

May farmers are in a desperate financial bind because of high real interest rates, stagnant farm prices, rising production costs, and an erosion in the value of farm assets.

The severe financial problems of our Nation's farmers are adversely affecting the single most important source of agricultural credit—the Farm Credit System. The system has suffered record losses on loans over the past 4 years although—in its entirety—the system continues to show positive earnings.

Loan losses and the continued deterioration of the agricultural economy have been of great concern to the individuals and institutions who invest in Farm Credit System bonds. These investors provide billions of dollars in capital that the Federal land banks, production credit associations, and banks for cooperatives lend to farmers.

This understandable concern on the part of investors has resulted in the system having to pay higher interest rates to obtain capital. If this continues, farmers will have to pay more for their credit at a time when interest rates are generally declining.

The resolution notes that Congress created the Farm Credit System 50 years ago and that it provides an essential service—not just for farmers but the entire Nation.

Further, the resolution states that the Federal Government stands ready to assist the Farm Credit System if assistance is needed.

I believe the Farm Credit System has the resources to resolve its basic financial problems. However, if Federal assistance is needed, system borrowers and investors can rest assured that Congress will not allow the system to become impaired. The resolution will make that point clear.

I urge my colleagues to support the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 211

Whereas agriculture is the Nation's most basic industry, and its associated production, processing and marketing segments, together, provide more jobs than any other single industry;

Whereas it is in the Nation's interest to carry out an agricultural policy that will ensure an adequate and dependable supply of food and fiber at reasonable prices;

Whereas producers are the basic element in the food and fiber system and their ability to make a profit and meet their financial obligations is critical to their remaining in business;

Whereas the availability of an adequate source of sound credit is crucial to accomplish the objective of improving the income and well-being of American farmers;

Whereas for that purpose Congress more than fifty years ago created the farmer-owned institutions of the Farm Credit System, which lend only to agriculture and are directly tied to the success of that industry;

Whereas the cooperative Farm Credit System is today the single largest agricultural lender in the United States and provides essential financial services to many thousands of farmers and ranchers through production credit associations and Federal land bank associations: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that it is in the best interest of the Nation that the farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative Farm Credit System be maintained as a strong and viable source of credit for agriculture and that the Federal Government stands ready to assist efforts by the System in maintaining the System's ability to perform its vital role in financing U.S. agriculture during this time of financial stress in the farming sector.

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Senate that the Farm Credit System fully mobilize its resources to continue to address the financial problems of troubled farm credit banks and associations and their borrower-members.

SEC. 3. It is further the sense of the Senate that the leadership of the Farm Credit System work with the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration and the Secretary of Agriculture in furnishing to the Agriculture Committees of Congress as soon as practicable, but not later than September 10, 1985, a report on the present condition of the System and its ability to meet the credit demands of U.S. agriculture in 1986 and future years, including recommendations for any legislation the Secretary and the Governor deem necessary.

SEC. 4. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit copies of this resolution to the President, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BYRD. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

JOINT REFERRAL

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill introduced today by Senators LAXALT and HECHT dealing with the proposed settlement of legal disputes involving Pyramid Lake be jointly referred to the Committees on Indian Affairs, Energy and Natural Resources, and the Judiciary, provided that if the Indian Affairs Committee reports the measure, the Energy Committee and the Judiciary Committee have 15 calendar days in which to report the measure or be automatically discharged.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

REFERRAL OF S. 1504

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that S. 1504, administrative law judge compensation, be re-referred to the Committee on Labor and Human Resources.

ORDER FOR INDEFINITE POSTPONEMENT—S. 1105

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Calendar No. 260, S. 1105, the Federal Contractors Employees Flextime Act, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

FEDERAL CONTRACTORS FLEXTIME BILL

Mr. ARMSTRONG. Mr. President, I am delighted that S. 1105, the Federal Contractors Flextime bill has been added to the Defense Authorization bill. I have introduced this legislation as a separate bill many times and am very pleased that it has been added to the Defense Authorization bill with such bipartisan support.

Not often does Congress have the opportunity to enact legislation that will save taxpayers at least $1 billion in this decade and at the same time increase industry's productivity, improve employee morale, reduce labor costs, save energy, and modernize the workplace. Yet this is what Walsh-Healey reform legislation will accomplish if passed by Congress.

Under current law, Federal agencies allow Federal employees to work flexible work schedules. This legislation was enacted by Congress 3 years ago, but Congress failed to allow the same benefits to Federal contractors in the private sector. In essence, Federal contractors in the private sector must pay their employees overtime pay for hours worked after an 8-hour workday. This prevents employers and employees from benefiting from flexible work schedules such as 4 days a week, 10 hours a day workweek.

This legislation, will create permanent statutory authority for alternative work schedules for Federal contractors in the private sector. The Senate passed this legislation once before in 1980, but it was dropped in conference. It is time that we provide these Federal contractors in the private sector the same benefits other Government contractors and other workers in the private sector enjoy.

A year ago the Grace Commission reported that the current Walsh-Healy Act drives up Federal contract costs by reducing competition and artificially inflating labor costs. The Commission estimated that this outdated law costs the Federal Government between $673 million and $1.3 billion annually, reports the Grace Commission. The Congressional Budget Office—in a just-released study—estimates that once Walsh-Healey reform is fully implemented that annual savings to the Government will exceed $550 million annually.

The Commission specifically recommended that the current law be amended to eliminate the now required 8-hour-a-day threshold from the overtime-pay requirement, while retaining the 40-hour-per-week requirement.

The Commission stated that the 8-hour-per-day overtime provision in this act "is out of step with the times" and serves only to increase costs to the Government for work performed by these contractors. "Changes in the composition of the work force, particularly the influx of women and working mothers, have substantially altered the needs and characteristics of the average American workers. The patterns of working the 40-hour workweek have also shifted so that flexibility has replaced tradition as the basis of work schedules."

In addition to the advantages to the Federal Government, the Grace Commission listed a number of advantages that Walsh-Healey reform would have on the private economy;

MORE JOBS

Experience at the corporate level with compressed workweeks has resulted in an increase in the total number of jobs. Increase in productivity, competitiveness, and the number of shifts employed translates into more job opportunities.

BENEFITS TO EMPLOYEES

The compressed workweek shows that employee morale and job satisfaction increase as a result of the increased flexibility of a compressed workweek. This is a result of reduced commuting costs and actual time spent commuting, allowing for increased blocks of leisure time for family commitments, education opportunities, and personal fitness.

BENEFITS TO EMPLOYERS

Compressed workweeks provide benefits and more flexibility for employers including decreased overtime costs, more efficient use of plant and office facilities, and increased employee productivity due to better employee morale.

BENEFITS TO THE COMMUNITY AT LARGE

In addition to creating more jobs, the Commission's report stated that studies on the compressed workweek provide benefits to the community due to reduction in traffic congestion, air pollution, energy consummation, and also better service to the public as a result of increased hours of operation.

Mr. President, this legislation has one objective and one aim: To allow Federal contractors the option of alternative work schedules. The benefits of flex time, however, go far beyond less Government interference in the private sector. There are distinct advantages for companies who have chosen to implement the alternative schedule that should be noted. In addition to the Grace Commission, numerous other studies have been conducted on the optional "compressed workweek." These studies, including those done by the Comptroller General, the Bureau of Labor Statistics," The Revised Workweek: Results of a Pilot Study of 16 firms," and the National Center for Energy Management and Power "Feasibility Study of a System of Staggered Industry Hours," point out many of the same conclusions found by the Grace Commission, such as: first, greater productivity—higher weekly output, improved use of plant equipment, and improved employee morale; second, improved working conditions—reduced employee working costs, increased job satisfaction, and ease in recruitment: and three, energy conservation—reduction in fuel costs associated with commuting, and reduction in energy usage for heating and cooling plants or offices.

One possible advantage of particular interest to me deals with the problem of air pollution. We now have evidence, as a result of a study released by the Denver Regional Council of Governments in cooperation with the Denver Federal Executive Board, examining the travel habits of some 7,000 Federal employees on the compressed workweek schedule in the Denver area. The study concludes that the compressed workweek is one of the most effective transportation management actions that Denver's Federal agencies can take in addressing the concern of air pollution and traffic congestion.

It has been estimated that neither providing free transit service at peak periods for everyone in the area, nor an extensive and complicated program of carpool matching would even equal the impact on air pollution that resulted from only 7,000 employees on a compressed workweek. Imagine what would result if all employees of Federal contractors in the study were allowed to shift to a 4-day workweek.

A change in the Walsh-Healey Act will not in any way affect the Fair Labor Standards Act, which governs all workers and provides that overtime premiums be paid whenever employees work more than 40 hours a week. The proposal will not impact the collective bargaining process, nor will it conflict with any of the Federal labor laws. Nothing in this amendment shall be construed to cover employees specified in the Walsh-Healy Act and the Contract Work Hours and Safety Standards Act. Finally, the bill does not mandate a compressed workweek, it only restores to American business and workers serving the Federal Government the basic freedom of choice.

Mr. President, in the past, we have heard many unions and workers testify that Government employees are eager to see the Federal Employee Flexible Work Schedules Act become permanent. The same is true for the employees in the private sector working on a Federal contract. Many private sector collective bargaining agreements across the Nation encompass the 4-day, 40-hour workweek. Many labor contracts in my own State of Colorado include provisions for a compressed workweek—and are merely waiting for Congress to update the archaic law. In my opinion, it is only fair for Federal contractors to have the same advantages that private-sector and Government employees do.

Many labor contracts in my own State of Colorado include provisions for a flexible workweek—and were waiting for Congress to update that archaic law. I am glad to say that all workers and their employers will now be able to benefit from flexible work hours.

Mr. President, I would like to compliment the conferees for their wise decision to include this very important reform legislation in the Defense Authorization bill. I would especially like to thank Senator GRAMM for adding the Walsh-Healey reform legislation to the Senate Defense Authorization bill and seeing it successfully through the Conference. I would also like to thank Senator NICKLES, and his labor counsel Chuck Carroll, for all their work on this legislation over the years. Senator NICKLES held hearings on this legislation this year and led its unanimous passage in the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee just recently. I would also like to express my appreciation to Senator HATCH, as chairman of the Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee and Senator GOLDWATER, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, for their help and support of Walsh-Healey reform legislation. Without their help final passage of this legislation would not have been possible.

Mr. President, last but not least, I would like to conclude my statement by thanking the "Walsh-Healey Coalition" members for their diligent work on this legislative effort. This coalition, composed of private sector companies who have long ago recognized the benefits of Walsh-Healey reform, has been working on this issue for years to inform Congress and the public on the benefits of this much needed reform. It is largely due to their tireless efforts that this legislation has now become so popular resulting in its final passage. Mr. President, I would like to include the names of this coalition in the RECORD with a special thanks from me on the work they have done to spread the word on this important issue.

The charges to be made pursuant to paragraphs B(2) and (27) of the Agreement against NANA's land entitlements under this Act shall be reduced by an amount equivalent to the difference between that acreage conveyed pursuant to this subsection and the acreage that would have been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(1) of the Agreement but for this subsection.

"(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph A(3) of the Agreement, the Secretary shall not convey to NANA any right, title and interest of the United States in the lands described in such paragraph A(3) and the Secretary shall make no change to NANA's remaining entitlements under this Act with respect to such lands. "(2) The easement granted pursuant to this section shall be for a term of 100 years. The easement shall terminate prior to the 100-year term:

"(i) if it is relinquished to the United States; or

"(ii) if construction of the transportation system has not commenced within 20 years of the enactment of this subsection. Computation of the 20-year period shall exclude periods when construction could not commence because of force majeure, act of God or order of a court; or

"(2) The Secretary of the Interior, acting through the National Park Service, shall monitor the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, as provided in the Agreement. Any complaint by any person or entity that any aspect of the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion or reclamation of the portion of the transportation system on the lands subject to the easement granted to NANA by this section is not in accordance with the terms and conditions specified in the Agreement shall be made to the Secretary in writing. The Secretary shall review any such complaint and shall provide to NANA or its successors or assigns and to the complainant a decision in writing on the complaint within 30 days of receipt thereof. If the Secretary determines that the activity made the subject of a complaint is not in accordance with the terms specified in the Agreement, and NANA or its successors or assigns disagrees with that determination, the dispute shall be resolved according to the procedures established in Exhibit B to the Agreement.

"(i) The Secretary shall make available to NANA and its successors and assigns the right to use sand, gravel and related construction materials located in Sections 23, 24, 25, 26, 35 and 36 of Township 26 North, Range 24 West, Kateel River Meridian, Alaska, if the Secretary determines either (1) that use of such sand, gravel and related construction materials is necessary because there is no other sand, gravel and related construction materials reasonably available for the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion or reclamation of the transportation system; or (2) that use of such sand, gravel and related construction materials is necessary in order to construct, operate, maintain, expand, or reclaim the transportation system in an environmentally sound manner, consistent with the requirements of Exhibit B of the Agreement. The right to use such sand, gravel and related construction materials shall be subject to the terms and conditions of Paragraph A of Exhibit B of the Agreement and such other reasonable terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe.

"(j) Notwithstanding Paragraph 23 of the Agreement, the Secretary shall not agree to any amendment to the Agreement without first consulting with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and shall transmit copies of the text of any amendment to the Agreement to those Committees at the time of his agreeing to any such amendment.

"SEC. 35. (a) NANA Regional Corporation, Inc. ('NANA'), may convey by quit-claim deed to the United States any interest it has in the surface or subsurface estate in any lands located within the boundaries of any Conservation System Unit, as established and defined by the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487; 94 Stat. 2371, et seq.) and conveyed to NANA pursuant to this Act, as amended. Whenever NANA executes a quit-claim deed pursuant to this subsection, it shall be entitled to designate and have conveyed to it any lands outside the boundaries of a Conservation System Unit covered by any of its pending selection applications filed under any of the entitlement provisions of this Act, as amended, without regard to the entitlement provision under which such application was filed. Lands conveyed to NANA pursuant to this subsection shall be of a like estate and equal in acreage to that conveyed by NANA to the United States. The lands conveyed to NANA pursuant to this subsection shall be in exchange for the lands conveyed by NANA to the United States and there shall be no change in the charges previously made to NANA's land entitlements with respect to the lands conveyed by NANA to the United States. Lands received by NANA pursuant to this subsection are Settlement Act lands.

"(b) NANA may relinquish any interest it has under selection applications filed pursuant to this Act, as amended, in the surface or subsurface estate in any lands located within the boundaries of the Cape Krusenstern National Monument or any other Conservation System Unit, as established and defined by the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (Public Law 96-487; 94 Stat. 2371, et seq.), by formally withdrawing such application pursuant to this subsection. Whenever NANA formally withdraws a selection application pursuant to this subsection, it shall be entitled to designate and have conveyed to it lands outside the boundaries of a Conservation System Unit pursuant to any of its pending selection applications filed under any of the entitlement provisions of this Act, without regard to the entitlement provision under which the application was filed. Lands conveyed to NANA under this subsection shall be of a like estate and equal in acreage to the interest which NANA relinquished, and when the lands are conveyed to NANA, the conveyance shall be charged against the same entitlement of NANA as if the lands, had been conveyed pursuant to the relinquished selection applications. Lands received by NANA pursuant to this subsection are Settlement Act lands.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall remain in effect only until December 18, 1991.

"(d) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to alter or amend in any way NANA's selection rights or to increase or diminish NANA's total entitlement to lands pursuant to this Act.".

(b) Except as otherwise provided by this section, the Secretary shall convey to NANA, in accordance with the terms and conditions set forth in the Agreement, lands and interests in lands specified in the Agreement in exchange for lands and interests in lands of NANA, specified in the Agreement, upon fulfillment by NANA of its obligations under the Agreement, provided, however, that this modified exchange is accepted by NANA within 60 days of enactment.

(c)(1) The Secretary shall convey to NANA, pursuant to the provisions of paragraph A(1) of the Agreement, the right, title and interest of the United States only in and to those lands designated as "Amended A(1) Lands" on the map entitled "Modified Cape Krusenstern Land Exchange," dated July 18, 1985. The charges to be made pursuant to paragraphs B(1) and D(27) of the Agreement against NANA's land entitlements under this Act shall be reduced by an amount equivalent to the difference between that acreage conveyed pursuant to this subsection and the acreage that would have been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(1) of the Agreement but for this subsection.

(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph A(3) of the Agreement, the Secretary shall not convey to NANA any right, title and interest of the United States in the lands described in such paragraph A(3) and the Secretary shall make no charge to NANA's remaining entitlements under this Act with respect to such lands. Such lands shall be retained in federal ownership but shall be subject to the easement described in Exhibit D to the Agreement as if the lands had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(3) of the Agreement.

(d)(1) There is hereby granted to NANA an easement in and to the lands designated as "Transportation System Lands" on the map entitled "Modified Cape Krusenstern Land Exchange," dated July 18, 1985, for use in the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system. Use of the easement for such purposes shall be subject only to the terms and conditions governing the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, as set forth in Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(2) The easement granted pursuant to this section shall be for a term of 100 years. The easement shall terminate prior to the 100-year term:

(i) if it is relinquished to the United States; or

(ii) if construction of the transportation system has not commenced within 20 years of the enactment of this subsection. Computation of the 20-year period shall exclude periods when construction could not commence because of force majeure, act of God or order of a court; or

(iii) upon completion of reclamation pursuant to the reclamation plan required by Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(3) Within 90 days after enactment of this section the Secretary shall execute the necessary documents evidencing the grant to NANA of the easement granted by this section.

(4) Except as regards the trail easement described in Exhibit D to the Agreement (to which the "Transportation System Lands" shall be subject as if such lands had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to paragraph A(1) of the Agreement), access to the lands subject to the easement granted by this section shall be subject to such limitations, restrictions or conditions as may be imposed by NANA, its successors and assigns, but NANA and its successors and assigns shall permit representatives of the Secretary such access as the Secretary determines is necessary for the monitoring required by this section.

(e) The easement granted by this section makes available land for the transportation system, and is intended to be sufficient to permit NANA to comply with the laws of the State of Alaska which may be necessary to secure financing of the construction of the transportation system and the operation, maintenance or expansion thereof by the State of Alaska or by the Alaska Industrial Development Authority.

(f) The easement granted to NANA by this section may be reconveyed by NANA, but after any such reconveyance the terms and conditions specified in Exhibit B of the Agreement shall continue to apply in full to the easement.

(g) NANA is hereby granted the right to use, develop and sell sand, gravel and related construction materials from borrow sites located within the easement granted pursuant to this section as required for the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, subject to the terms and conditions specified in Exhibit B of the Agreement.

(h)(1) The construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of any portion of the transportation system on any of the lands subject to the easement granted to NANA by this section shall be governed solely by the terms and conditions of the Agreement, including the procedural and substantive provisions of Exhibit B to the Agreement, as if the lands covered by the easement granted to NANA by this section had been conveyed to NANA pursuant to Paragraph A(1) of the Agreement.

(2) The Secretary of the Interior, acting through the National Park Service, shall monitor the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion and reclamation of the transportation system, as provided in the Agreement. Any complaint by any person or entity that any aspect of the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion or reclamation of the portion of the transportation system on the lands subject to the easement granted to NANA by this section is not in accordance with the terms and conditions specified in the Agreement shall be made to the Secretary in writing. The Secretary shall review any such complaint and shall provide to NANA or its successors or assigns and to the complainant a decision in writing on the complaint within 90 days of receipt thereof. If the Secretary determines that the activity made the subject of a complaint is not in accordance with the terms specified in the Agreement, and NANA or its successors or assigns disagrees with that determination, the dispute shall be resolved according to the procedures established in Exhibit B to the Agreement.

(i) The Secretary shall make available to NANA and its successors and assigns the right to use sand, gravel and related construction materials located in Sections 23, 24, 25, 26, 35 and 36 of Township 26 North, Range 24 West, Kateel River Meridian, Alaska, if the Secretary determines either (1) that use of such sand, gravel or related construction material is necessary because there is no other sand, gravel or related construction material reasonably available for the construction, operation, maintenance, expansion or reclamation of the transportation system; or (2) that use of such sand, gravel or related construction material is necessary in order to construct, operate, maintain, expand, or reclaim the transportation system in an environmentally sound manner, consistent with the requirements of Exhibit B of the Agreement. The right to use such sand, gravel or related construction material shall be subject to the terms and conditions of Paragraph A of Exhibit B of the Agreement and such other reasonable terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe.

(j) Notwithstanding Paragraph D(23) of the Agreement, the Secretary shall not agree to any amendment to the Agreement without first consulting with the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate and shall transmit copies of the text of any amendment to the Agreement to those Committees at the time of his agreeing to any such amendment.

SEC. 35. (a) The terms and conditions of this section are solely applicable to the lands described in paragraph A(1) of the Agreement, which is defined by section 34(a)(1) of this Act and modified by section 34, and shall not affect the relinquishment by NANA described in section B(1) of such Agreement.

(b) NANA Regional Corporation, Inc. ("NANA"), may convey by quit-claim deed to the United States all of its interest in the surface and subsurface estate in any lands described in subsection (a) of this section, provided, however, NANA can relinquish only lands that are compact and contiguous to other public lands within the Krusenstern National Monument and, if the lands to be relinquished have been disturbed by NANA, the Secretary

(c) NANA may relinquish any interest it has under selection applications filed pursuant to this Act, as amended, in the surface and subsurface estate in lands described in subsection (a) of this section by formally withdrawing such application pursuant to this section, provided, however, NANA can relinquish only interests in lands that are compact and contiguous to other public lands within the Krusenstern National Monument and, if the lands have been disturbed by NANA, the Secretary must first determine that such disturbance has not rendered the lands incompatible with Monument values. Whenever NANA formally withdraws a selection application pursuant to this section, it shall be entitled to designate and have conveyed to its lands outside the boundaries of Cape Krusenstern National Monument and any other conservation system unit, as established and defined by the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (P. L. 96-487; 94 Stat. 2371, et. seq.) pursuant to any of its pending selection applications filed under either section 12(b), 12(c) or 14(h)(8) of this Act. Lands conveyed to NANA under this subsection shall be of a like estate and equal in acreage to the interest which NANA relinquished, and when the lands are conveyed to NANA, the conveyance shall be charged against the same entitlement of NANA as if the lands had been conveyed pursuant to the relinquished selection application. Lands recieved by NANA pursuant to this subsection are Settlement Act lands.

(d) The provisions of this section shall remain in effect only until December 18, 1991.

(e) Nothing in this section shall be deemed to alter or amend in any way NANA's selection rights or to increase or diminish NANA's total entitlement to lands prusuant to this Act.

Mr. MURKOWSKI. Mr. President, I rise today in support of S. 444, a bill to amend the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. This legislation was passed by the Senate by unanimous voice vote on July 18, 1985. The House of Representatives, by unanimous voice vote, passed the Senate bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute on July 29, 1985. I ask the Senate today to approve an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the Senate bill as amended by the House.

As passed by the House, this bill would grant to Nana Regional Corporation, Inc., a corporation created under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and owned by the Native people of northwest Alaska, an easement across Cape Krusenstern National Monument. A road connecting the Red Dog mineral deposit with a port site on the Chukchi Sea will be constructed on this easement. The Red Dog mineral deposit is a world class lead/zinc/silver prospect owned by Nana. The bill would also ratify, in modified form, a land exchange agreement between Nana and the Department of Interior which consolidates and reduces Nana's inholdings in the Cape Krusenstern National Monument.

The Red Dog Mine is landlocked and it is located northeast of Cape Krusenstern National Monument. Before the mine can be developed, an access road and port site will have to be built. A September 1984, environmental impact statement for the project determined that the environmentally preferred as well as economically acceptable route for such an access road was across the monument.

Mr. President, this legislation is exceptionally important to Nana, the native corporation which selected and received the lands containing the Red Dog deposit pursuant to the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act [ANCSA]. Since that selection, Nana has negotiated an agreement with Cominco Alaska, a mining company, to develop that deposit. Passage of this legislation will permit actual development of Red Dog to begin in the near future. Timely development of the Red Dog Mine is essential if the Nana shareholders are to enjoy the potential benefits of ANSCA.

At the present time there is no economic base within the Nana region that can offer even remotely sufficient job opportunities to the residents. This is an area comparable in size to the States of Rhode Island and Delaware combined with a population of less than 5,000 and an unemployment rate of about 70 percent. As a result, many of Nana's residents are seeking employment outside the region, creating a great deal of dislocation. Development of the Red Dog Mine will change all of that. When fully developed, the mine will employ approximately 400 individuals, most of whom will be residents of the Nana region and Nana shareholders. The estimated life of the project is 50 years, and the annual income from these jobs is estimated to be approximately $15 million.

S. 444, as passed by the House, recognizes the importance of permitting the proposed road across the monument. All of the Federal agencies and two conservation organizations which have reviewed this proposed road have concluded that the route across the monument is economically and environmentally preferable to any other route. More importantly, the residents of the area who have used these lands for subsistence purposes for hundreds of years, agree.

Passage of the bill today will ensure that construction of the road can be initiated as soon as possible. This will enable the mine to be developed expeditiously, which will greatly benefit the Native people of the Nana region, the State of Alaska and our Nation.

The House-passed bill, amended in several significant respects, the bill passed by the Senate. I have thoroughly reviewed those changes and find them acceptable with a few exceptions. The amendments proposed in this substitute address the concerns that I have with the House-passed bill.

The amendments all deal with the portion of the House-passed bill which created section 35 of ANCSA. Basically, that section would have carried the impact of this legislation outside of the Cape Krusenstern National Monument. The amendments I have proposed would limit the impact of the bill to only Cape Krusenstern. I understand that this approach is acceptable to the House of Representatives and the bill passed by the Senate tonight should be enacted by the House immediately after the August recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Kansas.

The motion was agreed to.

SPECIAL GOLD MEDAL FOR GEORGE AND IRA GERSHWIN

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 251, to provide for a special gold medal for George Gershwin and Ira Gershwin, reported out of the Banking Committee today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (H.J. Res. 251) to provide that a special gold medal honoring George Gershwin be presented to his sister, Frances Gershwin Godowsky, and a special gold medal honoring Ira Gershwin be presented to his widow, Lenore Gershwin, and to provide for the production of bronze duplicates of such medals for sale to the public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 251) was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

RE-REFERRAL OF S. 1313

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Judiciary Committee be discharged from further consideration of S. 1313, a bill to amend the Federal Trade Commission Act to allow certain actions by States attorneys general and it be referred to the Commerce Committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

STATUS QUO NOMINATIONS

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that during the adjournment of the Senate over until September 9, 1985, that all the nominations pending in the Senate remain in the status quo, with the exception of the following: Rosalie Silberman, Charles A. Trabandt, James W. Spain, Winston Lord, Raymond D. Lett, Richard H. Francis, Ann Brunsdale, Helen Marie Taylor, William McGinnis, Sidney Lovett, Richard John Neuhaus, W. Bruce Weinrod, and John Norton Moore.

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, the last four names, I do not have.

Mr. DOLE. And also William Bradford Reynolds.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS APPOINTMENTS

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, statements by administration officials have recently appeared in the press which border on total disregard for constitutional principles. I refer specifically to statements pertaining to the Senate's responsibility to advise and consent in Presidential appointments, and the authority granted to the President for recess appointments.

On June 27, 1985, the Senate Judiciary Committee rejected the nomination of William Bradford Reynolds for the position of Associate Attorney General. On July 16, the Washington Post contained a report that administration officials were "considering the possibility of installing Reynolds" as Associate Attorney General "as a recess appointee after the Senate adjourns August 2, sources said."

Further discussing the possiblilty of a recess appointment for Mr. Reynolds, an article in the Washington Post the following Day, July 17, quoted an unnamed White House official as saying "The tail is not going to wag the dog on these nominations. That Committee has to understand who is the President of the United States * * *. We expect to get our people confirmed * * *."

Mr. President, I have no desire to lecture the White House on constitutional law. The President's lawyers know full well that the recess appointment clause which appears in the U.S. Constitution was not created as a political loophole to thwart the will of the Senate. Article III, section 2, provides that officers of the United States shall be appointed by the President "with the advice and consent of the Senate." That appointment process was initiated by this administration when Mr. Reynolds was nominated for the position of Associate Attorney General. The nomination was rejected by the Senate Judiciary Committee on June 27, 1985, by a vote of 8 to 10. To attempt now to circumvent that rejection by making a recess appointment of Mr. Reynolds to the same position during our August break would make a mockery of the Senate's role. It would be wholly inappropriate and unacceptable, and I have so informed the White House, on behalf of Senate Democrats, in my letter to the President of July 16.

The recess appointment clause appears in article III, section 2, of the U.S. Constitution. It provides that:

The President shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session.

Mr. President, when the Constitution was drafted, the framers recognized the practical realities of their time. Communications were slow and uncertain. Travel from one 18th century American city to another was measured in terms of days rather than hours. Accordingly, in order to make American Government effective, the framers allowed the President to make appointments during "the recess of the Senate." I stress the word "the." In the early days of this Republic, as now, there was a recess of the Senate between sessions.

The phrase "the recess"—again emphasizing the word "the"—should be borne in mind, and should be read in context of the entire clause which then states that the recess appointment "shall expire at the end of their next session." Read in that way, it seems to me that the recess appointment clause was included in the Constitution as a practical solution to filling essential Government positions in the horse and buggy age during the recess which occurred betwen the sessions of the Congress.

Mr. President, this is not the first time this administration has misinterpreted the purpose of the recess appointment power. During the 24-day recess for the Fourth of July holiday in 1984, 17 recess appointments were made. In several cases, those recess appointments avoided serious and probing debate by the Senate on controversial issues. And there was no evidence that the needs of the Government required any of those appointments to be made as recess appointments.

Last year I introduced a Senate resolution in an attempt to make it absolutely clear that the recess appointment clause should not be used by any administration to thwart the will of the Senate, to skirt the "advice and consent" clause of the Constitution, or to avoid potential controversy. My proposal was introduced toward the end of the last term of the Congress and was not processed before the Senate adjourned for the year.

Because this issue is so fundamental to maintaining the delicate balance of powers which was incorporated into our constitutional system, and in view of the recurrence of this problem in the context of the Reynolds nomination, I am introducing a resolution on the same subject again today.

My resolution expresses the sense of the Senate that the exercise of the power to make recess appointments should be confined to a formal termination of a session of the Senate, or to a recess of the Senate, protracted enough to prevent it from discharging its constitutional function of advising and consenting to executive nominations. In addition, it expresses the sense of the Senate that the President should refrain from using his recess appointment powers unless there is a formal termination of a session of the Senate, or a recess that lasts longer than 30 days. Finally, my resolution expresses the sense of the Senate that a recess appointment should not be made of any individual whose nomination to the same office has been previously rejected by the Senate, or the appropriate Senate committee, during the same Presidential term.

By introducing this resolution, I am not suggesting that the President should never use his recess appointment power. Nor am I suggesting that there might never be a situation in which a recess appointment is necessary. In fact, I even recommended the use of the recess appointment power myself when an appointment was necessary to ensure that one of our important Government boards would have a quorum in order to continue to conduct its business.

However, the kinds of situations I have described today do not involve that kind of an emergency. The business of government, and the Department of Justice in particular, will, I am confident, function with efficiency during the month of August without a commissioned official serving in its No. 3 slot.

I am sure the administration is well aware of the practical purpose which was served by including the recess appointment clause in the Constitution. Introduction of this resolution is not intended to suggest that the issue is unclear. Senate Democrats have gone on record, separate and apart from this resolution, in their conclusion that Mr. Reynolds should not be a recess appointee. We went on record again this week in a letter to the President which expressed our views on the subject of recess appointments generally. However, I do believe the entire Senate should be on record in reinforcing our constitutional role with respect to Presidential appointments, and stating that we will not stand idly by and witness an erosion of our responsiblity and our duty under the law.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of my resolution, the two Washington Post articles, and my letters to the President, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The cosponsors of the resolution are: Mr. Byrd (for himself), Mr. Bradley, Mr. Chiles, Mr. Lautenberg, Mr. Leahy, Mr. Melcher, Mr. Dodd, Mr. Mitchell, Mr. Ford, Mr. Matsunaga, Mr. DeConcini, Mr. Hart, Mr. Biden, Mr. Baucus, Mr. Eagleton, Mr. Bumpers, Mr. Exon, Mr. Johnston, Mr. Inouye, Mr. Levin, Mr. Nunn, Mr. Pell, Mr. Proxmire, Mr. Riegle, Mr. Sarbanes, Mr. Sasser, Mr. Zorinsky, Mr. Simon, Mr. Kerry, Mr. Hollings, Mr. Bentsen, Mr. Stennis, Mr. Bingaman, Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Cranston, Mr. Kennedy, and Mr. Harkin.

Whereas, the United States Constitution in Article II, Section 2, Clause 2, vests in the Senate the power to give its advice and consent to presidential appointments,

Whereas, the Appointments Clause specifies the method clearly preferred by the Framers for the regular appointment of Officers of the United States,

Whereas, the Appointments Clause has been judicially determined to be an aspect of the principle of separation of powers woven into the United States Constitution (Buckley v. Valeo, 424 U.S. 1 (1976)),

Whereas, the reasons behind the Recess Appointment Clause, Article II, Section 2, Clause 3, like those supporting the pocket veto power, have been largely superseded by modern methods of instantaneous communication and the modern practice of Congress with respect to abbreviated intrasession adjournments (Kennedy v. Sampson, 511 F.2d 430 (D.C. Cir. 1974)),

Whereas, the adherence to Appointment Clause procedures, unlike a recess appointment that thereafter may be rejected by the Senate, precludes subsequent challenges with respect to the appointee's rightful exercise of significant authority pursuant to the laws of the United States; Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) The exercise of the power to make recess appointments should be confined to a formal termination of a session of the Senate, or a recess of the Senate, protracted enough to prevent it from discharging its constitutional function of advising and consenting to executive nominations;

(2) As the President as well as the heads of Executive and military departments are authorized to detail officers of the United States to fill vacancies in offices at all levels of the Federal Government, Chapter 33, Title 5, United States Code, which details are valid for at least thirty days, no recess appointment should be made when the Senate stands adjourned or recessed within a session for a period of less than thirty days; and

(3) No recess appointment should be made of any person to any office—

(a) if such person has previously, during the same presidential term, been nominated for appointment to such office; and

(b) (1) the Senate has voted not to give its advice and consent to such appointment; or

(2) the appropriate committee of the Senate has voted not to report such nomination to the Senate.

DEMOCRATS OPPOSE REYNOLDS PROMOTION: SENATORS WARN REAGAN AGAINST RECESS APPOINTMENT OF REJECTED JUSTICE DEPARTMENT NOMINEE

(By Howard Kurtz and Juan Williams)

Senate Minority Leader Robert C. Byrd (D-W.VA.) urged President Reagan yesterday not to name William Bradford Reynolds as associate attorney general during Congress' August recess, saying such a move "would be an insult to the Senate and an affront to the Constitution."

In a letter to Reagan on behalf of all 47 Democratic Senators, Byrd reminded the President that the Senate Judiciary Committee rejected Reynolds for the Justice Department's No. 3 position last month.

He said that "a recess appointment of the same individual to the same position would be inappropriate and unacceptable."

Even Republicans cautioned against a recess appointment. Senate Majority Whip Alan K. Simpson (R-Wyo.) said he did not want to see "a subterranean campaign of some kind that would be a distraction from the heavy work load we have around here."

The swift reaction appeared to let much of the steam out of efforts to revive the Reynolds nomination. However, Simpson and Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (Kan.) said they would support a "discharge petition" to force the nomination to the floor.

Dole said there was "widespread" GOP support for that idea.

Reynolds, who has headed the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division for the last four years, was voted down 10 to 8 amid criticism that he had been lax in enforcing civil rights laws and has misled the Senate Judiciary Committee in sworn testimony.

Republicans Arlen Specter (Pa.) and Charles McC. Mathias Jr. (Md.) joined the eight committee Democrats in opposition.

Byrd's letter to Reagan cited a report in yesterday's Washington Post which said that White House officials are calling senators to gauge whether they have enough support to force the Senate to vote on Reynolds' nomination.

But even if such a move is successful, key senators acknowledged, opponents would filibuster the nomination.

The Republicans are unlikely to bring the matter to the floor unless they can muster the 60 votes needed to break a filibuster—a prospect made more unlikely by yesterday's Democratic criticism.

The Post article also said that some administration officials, anticipating a filibuster, are considering giving Reynolds an unusual recess appointment that would allow him to serve through 1986 without Senate confirmation. "The president's laywers know better than that," Byrd said. "That's not what the recess appointment is for." Sources said that if the administration promotes Reynold in August, it would also have to give recess appointments to several top Justice Department officials because an angry Senate would refuse to approve them.

"You wouldn't even get a U.S. attorney through," a Senate official said.

Despite yesterday's negative reaction and the considerable obstacles in their path, some administration officials remain adamant in their desire to promote Reynolds.

These officials, led by Attorney General Edwin Meese III, have argued strongly in the administration that the fight for the nomination should be continued.

First, they believe the Reynolds defeat unfairly tarred the president's civil rights record.

Both White House and Justice Department officials are convinced that Reynolds was "nit-picked to death" by opponents who seized on discrepancies in his statements, rather than challenged on what they see as the heart of the administration's civil rights policy, its opposition to racial quotas.

Second, several administration officials contend that the president needs to have the Judiciary Committee "in line" before a possible Supreme Court nomination. They anticipate at least one opening soon, possibly to succeed Justice Lewis F. Powell Jr. who was recently hospitalized. "The tail is not going to wag the dog on these nominations," said a White House official. "That committee has to understand who is the president of the United States and this is not a good experience to have as we approach bigger battles.

"We expect to get our people confirmed, not to expose them to shooting-gallery politics that embarrasses the president. There will not be a seond Brad Reynolds . . . there shouldn't be a first.

Many in the administration believe they should not be in a position of defending their policies after a landslide reelection victory last November. They also want to respond to negative votes by Specter and Mathias.

"Winning starts with having your own team in line," a White House official said.

But some leading Republicans said the White House should accept defeat rather than spend more political capital on a fight it is unlikely to win.

WHITE HOUSE HOPES TO REVIVE REYNOLDS PROMOTION AT JUSTICE: RECESS APPOINTMENT, FORCED VOTE CONSIDERED

(By Howard Kurtz and Mary Thornton)

White House officials are checking whether they have enough support to force a vote by the full Senate on William Bradford Reynolds' nomination as associate attorney general, which was rejected by a Senate committee last month.

Some administration officials are also considering the possibility of installing Reynolds in the Justice Department's No. 3 job as a recess appointee after the Senate adjourns Aug. 2, sources said. They said some department officials believe that if the nomination were forced to the Senate floor, and, as expected, encountered a filibuster, a recess appointment could be justified.

"If they do that, this place would shut down," said one high-level Senate official. "They'd go absolutely berserk. It would be an open declaration of war."

Senate Majority Leader Robert J. Dole (R-Kan.) is taking a formal head count of Republicans to gauge the chances of approving a "discharge petition" to bring Reynolds' nomination to the floor.

"If the president wants us to push Brad Reynolds, then we're going to help," Dole said yesterday.

Republicans and Democrats said the alternative—a recess appointment—would be an unprecedented affront to the Senate Judiciary Committee, which turned down the nomination after three weeks of contentious debate. Committee members said they voted against Reynolds, now head of the Justice Department's Civil Rights Division, because he repeatedly misled the panel in sworn testimony and had a lax "four-year record of enforcing civil rights laws.

Under the rarely used procedure of naming a presidential appointee while Congress is in recess, experts say, Reynolds could serve as associate attorney general without confirmation during the 99th Congress, which runs through 1986.

Attorney General Edwin Meese III told reporters last week that he considers the Reynolds nomination to be "still before the Senate. No decision has been made with regard to the next step."

Reynolds did not respond to inquiries yesterday. His spokesman, John Wilson, declined comment on the possibility of a recess appointment, saying, "Some people who oppose him are floating that story."

Meese and other top department officials were at an American Bar Association conference in London and could not be reached.

White House lobbyists have been calling senators in recent days to assess the depth of support for moving Reynolds' nomination to the floor. This would require a majority of voting senators to approve a discharge petition, an unusual device to force an issue from a reluctant committee to the full Senate.

"They're not necessarily trying to raise the Titanic," a Senate official said of the administration. "They're just trying to find out how deep it's buried."

GOP officials cautioned that the Reynolds nomination could tie up the Senate for weeks, while Dole is trying to deal with the federal budget deficit and other key legislation.

"It's not a high priority," one said of the nomination. "We've known all along it would be . . . tough getting the votes. The White House would have to make a . . . convincing case that the votes were there."

A Democratic senator said recently that he told White House officials that resurrecting the Reynolds nomination is "a no-win proposition for the Republicans."

"It would be a source of embarrassment to the Republican senators to make them walk that plank," the senator said. "Either you vote against your president, or you vote for a guy who's painted as being terrible on civil rights."

But there may be some support for Dole's efforts. Judiciary Committee Chairman Strom Thurmond (R-S.C.) would support an effort to bring the nomination to the floor, according to a spokesman.

On June 27, the committee voted, 10 to 8, against the nomination, with Republicans Arlen Specter (PA) and Charles McC. Mathias Jr. (MD) joining all eight Democrats in opposition. Two subsequent votes on reporting the nomination to the floor—either with no recommendation or a negative recommendation—failed on a 9-to-9 tie.

President Reagan and others have complained that Reynolds' critics opposed the nominee on ideological grounds and raised questions about his testimony as a way to explain their votes against him.

While the nomination has remained in dispute, the administration has not moved to fill several other vacancies in the Justice Department. Among those widely reported to be in line for top jobs are Herbert E. Ellingwood, chief of the Merit Systems Protection Board, to head the Office of Legal Policy; Charles J. Cooper, a deputy to Reynolds, to head the Office of Legal Counsel, and Carolyn B. Kuhl, now a deputy in the Civil Division, for Reynolds' civil rights post.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC., July 16, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I am writing to you at the instruction of the Democratic Conference with respect to the attached article concerning Assistant Attorney General William Bradford Reynolds which appeared in this morning's Washington Post.

According to the Post report, Administration officials are "considering the possibility of installing Reynolds" as Associate Attorney General "as a recess appointee after the Senate adjourns Aug. 2, sources said."

As you know, on June 27, the Judiciary Committee failed to report Mr. Reynolds' nomination to the Senate by a vote of 8-10. The Conference has asked me to inform you that in view of the Committee's action, a recess appointment of the same individual to the same position during the August break would be inappropriate and unacceptable. We urge you not to make this recess appointment.

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

UNITED STATES SENATE,
OFFICE OF THE DEMOCRATIC LEADER,
Washington, DC., July 30, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As the Congress approaches adjournment for the August break, I would like once again to convey my views, and those of the Democratic Conference, on the subject of recess appointments. This same matter was the subject of my letter to you on August 6 of last year when I expressed my deep concern about the number of recess appointments which had been made during our brief July 1984 recess.

The forthcoming August recess should not, in our judgment, be considered the kind of extended recess contemplated by Article III, Section 2, Clause 3, of the Constitution. Rather, recess appointments should be limited to circumstances when the Senate, by reason of a protracted recess, is incapable of confirming a vitally needed public officer. Any other interpretation of the Recess Appointments clause could be seen as a deliberate effort to circumvent the Constitutional responsibility of the Senate to advise and consent to such appointments.

I would therefore ask that you refrain from making any recess appointments during the August break.

Your personal attention to this matter would be appreciated.

Sincerely,

ROBERT C. BYRD.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, I am privileged to join the distinguished minority leader in cosponsoring his resolution which calls on the President of the United States to respect the constitutional authority of the Senate to "advise and consent" on Presidential appointments to major Federal offices.

Article II, section 2 of our Constitution provides that officers of the United States shall be appointed "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate." While it also vests in the President the authority to fill temporarily any vacancies which may occur when the Senate is in recess, we must remember that this authority was granted at a time when the Congress was in session only 3 or 4 months each year and in recess for lengthy periods of 8 to 9 months. The state of the Nation's roads and Postal Service, too, made it impossible at that time for Senators to be notified and to return to the Capital to consider Presidential nominations in between sessions or during recesses. Today, the Senate is in session practically year-round and modern transportation and communication systems mean that the administration and Senators need never be out of constant touch.

Why then has the current administration used the Presidential "recess appointment" authority so frequently and so flagrantly? Many of us fear that this authority is being used to thwart the will of the Senate, as expressed by its standing committees, or to place in office candidates whose qualifications will not withstand a thorough examination. The Byrd amendment will serve to preserve the Congress as a coequal branch of Government, with specific constitutional prerogatives, which chief executives under stress tend to overlook.

Mr. President, I urge early and favorable consideration of the Byrd resolution.

SUSAN WEISS MANES

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, it has been said that life is a series of changes—some profound, some seemingly insignificant, and many others in between. For those of us who serve here in the Senate, this is true no less than for others. One of the ways in which change manifests itself for those of us who have served a number of terms here is when members of the Senate staff are given and accept career opportunities which move them away from this Chamber.

When a staff member has earned the trust and respect of a Member for whom he or she has worked, such departures always are bitter-sweet for the Member. It goes without saying that the staff member's contributions to the vital work that is done in this place will be missed very much. But on the other hand, of course, one must share in the pleasure when another person—particularly one who has worked so capably, energetically, and effectively—has an opportunity to grow or build professionally or explore other areas of life which the pressures of the Senate did not permit.

And so it is with a member of the senior Senate staff who will be departing at the end of this week. Susan Weiss Manes has been an employee of the Senate now for 8 years. She began her service as a legislative assistant for Floyd Haskell, a former Senator from Colorado. Later she served in that same role for Senator DON RIEGLE of Michigan, moving on to become staff director of the Senate Subcommittee on Alcoholism. In 1982, she joined the staff of the Democratic Policy Committee as Director of the Domestic Policy Office, and currently serves as staff director for the committee.

During this period of public service, it is clear that Senators recognized Susan's keen mind, unflagging energy, and determination to do nothing less than the best work. In fact, her capabilities and dedication were responsible for her path to occupancy of her current post which is one of the key Senate staff offices.

I know, too, because I have watched her relationships with her colleagues—both those on the Policy Committee staff and others—that she is held in the highest esteem by her peers. Such respect from those with whom one works on a day-in, day-out basis is not freely bestowed. It must be earned the old-fashioned way by being a man or woman whose word always is fully dependable; by settling for no less than the best work product; by having a genuine interest and concern for fellow human beings and by not being too busy or distracted to demonstrate that interest and concern to all with whom one comes in contact; and by unswerving allegiance to fundamental principles which she carefully chose as the basis and motivation for her life.

We who labor here in the Senate, Mr. President, are very fortunate to be aided by a great many staff members who also labor diligently in pursuit of the public good. Without them, this great institution would grind to a halt, and the public's business would go undone regardless of what we Members may have invested. But even among a group which sets a high standard, some inevitably will stand out. Susan Manes is such a person.

Consequently, I have no doubt that Susan deserves one of the most valued compliments that I believe can be paid: On many occasions, Susan made a difference for good by what she did or what she said.

I know I am joined, Mr. President, by all who worked with Susan here—Senators and staff—in offering her our thanks for a job well done and our best wishes in her future endeavors.

EXPRESSIONS OF APPRECIATION

Mr. BYRD. Mr. President, I have nothing, except I wish to congratulate the distinguished majority leader on the high performance that he has demonstrated in carrying out the responsibilities of the majority leader. He, at all times, has been very courteous and considerate with respect to the minority. I feel that he deserves the thanks of all Senators on this side. He has sought at all times to be cooperative with the minority leader and always understanding with respect to the times when perhaps the minority leader could not approve of various matters which the distinguished majority leader may have sought to put before the Senate.

I feel that he has done his duty, he has done it honorably, and I do not think anyone else in the Senate other than I could really understand the problems that the distinguished majority leader has had to confront. It is not an easy task. You cannot please everyone, and many times he pleases no one. I wish him a very restful recess, and a safe journey. I understand he is going to be going to China. I know that he will enjoy that visit, and I wish him Godspeed and good luck.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader. I certainly appreciated his cooperation. In fact, as I indicated earlier today, we have actually accomplished not everything—but the calendar is fairly clean. For that reason we would be able to come back on the fourth, and probably not do much the balance of that week. But we will come back on the ninth, and there will be votes on the ninth. So we will be in action when we return. But it has been possible through largely the cooperation of the distinguished minority leader, because he has been pushing on his side, and I have been pushing on my side to help my distinguished majority whip, Senator SIMPSON. I know Senator CRANSTON has been doing pretty much the same.

So we have covered a lot of matters. Some have been hanging around here for several years. Some we have accomplished, some we have been successful with, and I am frankly relieved to have sort of the budget behind us for awhile.

I think we have spent a great deal of time on that. Maybe we have become too focused on the budget. But I can advise my colleagues when we come back, there is going to be a lot of work to do in September, and October, and probably November even without tax reform. If tax reform comes from the House, obviously we will do what we can to complete action in the Senate.

But I appreciate not only the courtesies extended to me by the minority leader, but also the counsel from time to time and the fact that we have never taken each other by surprise. It is very helpful and reassuring. I have learned that it is impossible to please everyone most of the time. But I enjoy the work.

Mr. BYRD. If the distinguished majority leader will allow me, I apologize for taking additional time. I do want to extend my thanks, felicitations, and commendations to the distinguished Republican whip, who has been at all times at his post of duty, and at all times he has been very congenial, most cooperative, and I enjoy working with him.

I also want to compliment Mr. CRANSTON, the minority whip, who never ceases to be cooperative, understanding, and hard working, and I want to express appreciation for the hard work and the good work that he has done for the minority, and with the minority and also in cooperation with the majority.

I thank also DANNY INOUYE, our very highly respected secretary of the Democratic conference, who can always be counted upon, who works hard, is a good Senator, and a great American.

I thank all Senators on both sides of the aisle for the courtesies that have been extended to me and my staff. I congratulate our staff and the director, Susan Manes; the deputy staff director, Scott Bunton; members of the Democratic floor staff, Abby Suffold, Charles Kinney and Marty Paone. The highly skilled and dedicated policy issues staff; and the Communications staff headed by Linda Peek.

I also want to commend and thank the secretary for the minority, David Pratt, and his able staff for their excellent work.

I thank the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. President, I surely will not prolong the evening, but just very quickly say my appreciation to the majority leader for his remarkable guidance of this Senator in his new duty as assistant majority leader, and also to the Democratic leader for his patience, extreme patience, kindness to me in these rather rambunctious first 7 months of my tour of duty, and ups and downs thereof. Both of them are remarkably patient. It has been an extraordinary experience, a great experience for me, and particularly a pleasure to serve with them both, and I have come to know and enjoy them both. I appreciate that and deeply so. I thank them both.

I thank also Senator CRANSTON who, of course, I learned to work with through the Veterans' Affairs Committee, a rare treat also, and I thank the leaders.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I want to thank the Presiding Officer [Mr. TRIBLE] for his patience and his overtime. I appreciate that very much.

PROGRAM FOR SEPTEMBER 9, 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate convenes on Monday, September 9, 1985, the journal of the proceedings be approved to date; that the call of the calendar be dispensed with; that no resolutions come over under the rule; that following the recognition of the two leaders under the standing order, there be a special order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes, to be followed by a period for the transaction of routine morning business not to extend beyond 1 p.m., with statements therein limited to 5 minutes each; provided, further, that the morning hour be deemed to have expired.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

AUTHORITY FOR COMMITTEES TO FILE REPORTS ON WEDNESDAY, AUGUST 28, 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that during the adjournment of the Senate over until September 9, 1985, committees may file reports between the hours of 10 a.m. and 3 p.m. on Wednesday, August 28, 1985.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I just indicate when we come back on the 9th of September, we will convene at 12 noon, the two leaders under the standing order have 10 minutes each; there will be an order in favor of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. PROXMIRE] for not to exceed 15 minutes; routine morning business not to extend beyond the hour of 1 p.m., with statements limited therein to 5 minutes each.

At the hour of 1 p.m. there will be 3 hours of debate on the antiapartheid conference report, to be equally divided. At the hour of 4 p.m. on Monday, the cloture vote will occur.

Additional rollcall votes could occur during Monday's session. I think I can count on the cloture being invoked, and it may be possible to complete action on that conference report on the 9th of September, hopefully; if not, then on the 10th.

I am advised by the distinguished Senator from Wyoming that the immigration bill is ready. It can be disposed of in a fairly short time. So there will be a number of legislative opportunities as soon as we return.

ADJOURNMENT UNTIL MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 9, 1985

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 179, that the Senate stand in adjournment until 12 noon on Monday, September 9, 1985.

The motion was agreed to; and at 11:13 p.m., the Senate adjourned until Monday, September 9, 1985, at 12 noon.

The Reverend Robert A. Rusbuldt, Emmanuel Baptist Church, Penn Yan, NY, offered the following prayer:

If my people, which are called by my name, shall humble themselves, and pray, and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways; then will I hear from heaven, and will forgive their sin, and will heal their land.—II Chronicles 7:14.

God, our Heavenly Father, thank You for the dedication of these men and women in this great Chamber. We pray for wisdom, understanding, and justice to prevail in their dealings with each other and for the good of our land.

Help them to seek their strength from above and may they lead our people in the proper paths. We know that our Congress faces difficult problems and decisions, but may You give them the insight to see clearly the way they should go for the good of our great Nation.

REV. ROBERT A. RUSBULDT

(Mr. CAMPBELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to join me this morning in welcoming Rev. Robert A. Rusbuldt, senior pastor of the Emmanuel Baptist Church in Penn Yan, NY.

Reverend Rusbuldt has pastored churches in New York and New Jersey, and he is currently completing his 30th year in the ministry. Under his leadership, new church buildings have been erected, programs for the elderly, needy, and youth have been established, and many people have gained new confidence and direction in their lives through his ministry and several radio programs.

Throughout his distinguished service, Reverend Rusbuldt has served as president of the Eastern New York Bible Conference, president of the Finger Lakes Pastor's Fellowship, and a member of the board of directors of the Mid-State Baptist Youth Camp.

He has always provided special attention to our young people, giving leadership to an excellent school at Emmanuel Baptist Academy. Moreover, he has worked tirelessly to improve and enhance the spiritual, physical, and intellectual needs of our youth. I know he brings to his church, community, and spiritual mission a special dedication, understanding, and vigor that is an inspiration to all.

I have had the pleasure of knowing Reverend Rusbuldt through his son, and my former legislative director, Bob Rusbuldt. Mr. Speaker, it is an honor to have Reverend Rusbuldt as our guest chaplain today.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 1714, NATIONAL AERONAUTICS AND SPACE ADMINISTRATION AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1986

Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 1714) to authorize appropriations to the National Aeronautics and Space Administration for research and development, space flight, control and data communications, construction of facilities, and research and program management, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and request a conference with the Senate thereon.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I inquire as to whether this has been cleared with the gentleman from New Mexico [Mr. LUJAN]?

Mr. FUQUA. If the gentleman will yield, it has been cleared with the ranking minority member.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida? The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. FUQUA, BROWN of California, NELSON of Florida, ANDREWS, TORRICELLI, LUJAN, WALKER, and LEWIS of Florida.

AN INDEPENDENT AGENCY FOR SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. PICKLE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, the announcement by President Reagan that he would agree to an immediate removal of Social Security from the unified budget is startling, yet welcome, news.

The House should "call and raise" him by agreeing to split the budget and also passing a bill which I and 62 other Members, have introduced, H.R. 825, making Social Security an independent agency. While the unified budget and an independent agency for Social Security are two separate issues, they are intertwined and it should naturally follow that if Social Security is made an independent agency, then it should be removed from the unified budget.

The Social Security Subcommittee, chaired by the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. JONES, held hearings earlier this year on both issues and has indicated that he will pursue the matter.

Mr. Speaker, making Social Security an independent agency will remove Social Security from politics as much as possible. Whether we have a board or commission, there is always an element of politics depending upon who is President, but we can minimize the influence of politics and restore the confidence of the people in the system by creating an independent agency.

Some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle may have been surprised by what the President has proposed. But we should proceed with all due speed, accept the President's offer to remove Social Security from the unified budget and go him one better by also making it an independent agency.

THE DANGERS OF AN OUT-OF-CONTROL NATIONAL DEBT

(Mr. SENSENBRENNER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, "A national debt, if it is not excessive, will be to us a national blessing." This statement, Mr. Speaker, was made in a letter to Robert Morris by Alexander Hamilton, the founder of our financial system. Secretary Hamilton realized the dangers an out-of-control national debt would hold for our young Nation. Today, our debt grows daily. When the Congress returns in September, one of our first tasks will be to raise the debt ceiling over the $2 trillion mark.

The collapse of the budget process, mounting deficits, and the failure of any significant movement toward a balanced budget compelled me to become a member of CLUBB—Congressional Leaders United for a Balanced Budget. CLUBB was founded in October 1983, as a bipartisan, bicameral coalition to coordinate Senate, House, and State forces working to enact the balanced budget/tax limitation amendment.

Article V of the Constitution provides a method for States to call a constitutional convention if two-thirds of the States call for a convention. Thirty-two States, two short of the required number of States, have called for a constitutional convention and more State legislatures are planning to debate and perhaps pass additional resolutions calling for a convention. The Senate Judiciary Committee recently approved legislation establishing procedures for holding a constitutional convention.

As the ranking Republican member of the Judiciary Subcommittee on Civil and Constitutional Rights, I welcome the opportunity to explore the need for establishing procedures for a constitutional convention, thereby negating the concern over a "runaway convention."

Justice John Marshall endorsed the concept of constitutional change when he wrote in 1821, "The people made the Constitution and the people can unmake it. It is the creature of their own will, and lives only by their will."

Mr. Speaker, Chief Justice Marshall recognized the Constitution as a living, breathing document, one that could be changed if the circumstances required it. I believe change is warranted because of the historic and debilitating deficits we are now incurring. The danger of fiscal collapse is ever present. It is my belief a constitutional mandate is needed to force both the Congress and the Executive to come to grips with the deficit, and the cost of the deficit's interest payments.

The Business Roundtable estimated the Federal debt currently totals approximately $8,750 for every adult in the Nation. The interest alone on that debt will cost about $980 for every taxpaying American this year. I urge Members of this House and all legislative bodies to join together to amend the Constitution either through the traditional method in which the last 25 amendments have been approved or through the legislative mechanism established by our Founding Fathers in article V of our Constitution.

REPRESSION IS WIDESPREAD

(Mr. FOGLIETTA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FOGLIETTA. Mr. Speaker, human rights are very much in the national consciousness right now. The state of emergency in South Africa has made us once more realize that the basic freedoms we enjoy here are not widespread. Unfortunately, repression is widespread—even among those we call our allies.

In South Korea, the government of Chun Doo Hwan has once more demonstrated its determination to silence democratic voices of opposition to its policies. Kim Dae Jung, South Korea's most passionate advocate of democratic rights, is again under house arrest. Having returned to South Korea from his exile in the United States to carry on the peaceful struggle for democracy, Kim has found himself frozen out, his rights subject to the whims of the Chun government.

Kim has been placed under house arrest to prevent him from attending the national convention of the New Korea Democratic Party. Instead of being allowed to attend as a simple delegate and leader, and thus giving credibility to the Chun government's claims of belief in human rights, he has been banned. His arrest has given the opposition all the proof it needs that Chun will never allow democracy, and made a mockery of the promises of a truly free South Korea made by Chun in his state visit earlier this year.

The United States should protest loudly Kim's arrest, and demand his release. To do any less undermines our protests of injustice elsewhere in the world, and gives tacit approval to actions which cannot be justified.

The Chun government should release Kim Dae Jung.

Mr. FASCELL submitted the following conference report and statement on the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 242)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment as follows:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985".

FINDINGS AND DECLARATIONS

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the policy and practices of apartheid—

(F) tries to deprive many South African citizens of South African citizenship;

(2) the policy and practice of apartheid is repugnant to the moral and political values of democratic and free societies, and runs counter to United States policies to promote democratic governments throughout the world and respect for human rights; and

EXPANDING PARTICIPATION IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ECONOMY

SEC. 6. (a) The Congress declares that—

(1) the denial under the apartheid laws of South Africa of the rights of South African blacks and other nonwhites to have the opportunity to participate equitably in the South African economy as managers or owners of, or professionals in, business enterprises, and

(e)(1) All joint resolutions introduced in the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be referred immediately to the appropriate committees.

(3) A joint resolution under this subsection shall be considered in the Senate in accordance with the provisions of section 601(b)(4) of the International Security Assistance and Arms Export Control Act of 1976. (4) If before the passage by one House of a joint resolution of that House, that House receives a joint resolution with respect to the same matter from the other House, then—

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which is a substitute for the House bill and the Senate amendment. The differences between the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

SHORT TITLE

The House bill cited the act as the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985.

The Senate amendment cited the act as the Anti-Apartheid Action Act of 1985.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision.

FINDINGS AND POLICY DECLARATIONS

The House bill contains two congressional expressions of U.S. foreign policy: (1) Encouraging all nations to adopt policies guaranteeing broad human rights, civil liberties, and individual economic opportunities; and (2) condemnation and eradication of apartheid in South Africa.

The Senate amendment states that the policy and practice of apartheid harms the human rights of black South Africans, is repugnant to values of democratic societies, and runs counter to American efforts to promote democratic forms of government. It also declares that it shall be American policy to promote peaceful change in South Africa through diplomatic means, but where necessary through other measures as well.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision.

POLICY ON SANCTIONS

The Senate amendment states that it shall be the policy of the United States to impose economic sanctions against the Government of South Africa if, within 18 months of enactment but not later than March 1, 1987, significant progress has not been made toward ending apartheid.

The House bill did not contain a comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision, with an amendment changing the time period to within 12 months but not later than January 1, 1987.

NEGOTIATIONS ON SANCTIONS

The House bill provides that the President shall attempt to persuade other governments to adopt economic restrictions similar to those in this bill and that the President report annually to Congress on the status of such negotiations.

The Senate bill directs the President to develop appropriate multilateral economic sanctions against the Government of South Africa through negotiations with other nations and to report annually to the Congress on the status of such negotiations.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision.

REPORT ON STATUS OF APARTHEID

The House bill requires an annual report on progress or lack thereof by the South African Government in eliminating apartheid.

The Senate amendment requires the President to transmit to Congress by March 1, 1987, and annually thereafter, a report on the extent of progress made toward ending apartheid, including a Presidential determination as to whether significant progress has been made.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision with an amendment changing the date to January 1, 1987, and inserting the conditions provided for in the House waiver provisions for the House provisions that would prohibit new investments in South Africa and the importation of krugerrands.

ADDITIONAL ANTI-APARTHEID MEASURES

The House bill contains a sense of Congress that the United States should take additional measures unless the South African Government makes progress toward eliminating apartheid.

The Senate amendment provides that in the event the President determines that significant progress has not been made toward abolishing apartheid, a recommendation is to be made to the Congress as to which of the following sanctions should be imposed: A ban on new commercial investment in South Africa, a ban on the importation of krugerrands, a denial of most-favored-nation tariff status to South Africa, or other economic or political sanctions.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision with an amendment removing from the list of prospective sanctions the ban on the importation of krugerrands and adding a ban on the importation of coal and uranium.

RESTRICTIONS ON NEW INVESTMENTS

The House bill requires the President to prohibit U.S. persons from making directly, or through a foreign affiliate, any investment (including bank loans) in South Africa. It exempts from this prohibition: (1) A loan or extension of credit for educational, housing, or health facility which are available to all persons and accessible to all population groups, or a loan agreement entered into before enactment of this act; (2) an investment of earnings from a business enterprise in South Africa established before enactment of the bill and which is made in the same business enterprise; and (3) the purchase, on a securities exchange registered as a national securities exchange under section 6 of the Securities Exchange Act of 1934, of securities in a business enterprise in South Africa established before enactment of the bill.

The Senate amendment authorized a ban on new investment as one of the prospective sanctions which the President may impose if he determines that no significant progress toward abolishing apartheid has been made and Congress approves.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision.

PROHIBITION ON IMPORTATION OF GOLD COINS

The House bill prohibits importation of South African krugerrands or other gold coins from South Africa.

The Senate amendment provides for a similar prohibition after 18 months if the President determines there is no significant progress toward abolishing apartheid and Congress approves.

The conference substitute is the same as the House provision.

MINTING OF U.S. GOLD COINS

The Senate amendment provides for minting of a U.S. gold coin.

The House bill did not contain a comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision with an amendment adding language to provide that: (1) The gold coins shall be legal tender at their face value; (2) the Secretary of the Treasury shall make bulk sales of the coins at suitable discounts; (3) the profits from the sale of the coins shall be used solely to reduce the national debt; (4) the Secretary of the Treasury shall take all necessary action to assure there is no net cost to the government; and (5) a reaffirmation of current law that the coins and other gold and silver coins cannot be obtained dollar for dollar from the Secretary of the Treasury.

WAIVERS OF RESTRICTIONS ON NEW INVESTMENT AND IMPORTATION OF GOLD COINS

The House bill provides that the President may waive the prohibitions on new investment and gold coins for not more than 12 months if the President determines that one or more of eight conditions have been met and Congress approves the determination.

The Senate amendment does not contain a comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the same as the House provision, except it applies only to the ban on the importation of krugerrands.

EXPORTS OF COMPUTERS TO THE SOUTH AFRICAN GOVERNMENT

The House bill amends the Export Administration Act of 1979 to prohibit the direct or indirect export of computers, computer software, or goods or technology intended to service computers to or for use by the Government of South Africa or any corporation, partnership, or other organization controlled by the Government of South Africa.

The Senate amendment contains a comparable provision but specifies the government agencies of South Africa affected by the prohibition. It does not amend the Export Administration Act.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision with an amendment adding several entities to the proscribed list. This provision restricts sales to the South African government of computers, computer software or goods or technology intended to service computers, allowing such sales only to those entities of the South African Government whose services are of benefit to nonwhites, or both whites and nonwhites except that this restriction may be waived if the sale is necessary for humanitarian purposes. The provision prohibits sales of computers and related parts and software to South Africa's military, police, and agencies which enforce apartheid, including national security agencies. This term is defined broadly to include all those entities that have a national intelligence function.

A major purpose of this legislation is to make certain the ban is complete on computer sales to the South African police, military, and other entities that enforce restrictions on blacks' freedom of movement, as well as on entities which have no beneficial impact on the nonwhite community. It is intended to close loopholes in current regulations, such as those relating to personal computers, and to prevent circumvention of the ban by the South African Government.

It is expected that in enforcing this ban, the administration will put into effect a system of end-use verifications on all computers covered by this provision sold to the South African Government, and on all computers for which spare parts and servicing are permitted. The end-use verifications must be adequate to assure that the computer in question is not used for prohibited purposes. The President is required to provide a detailed annual report to the Congress on the enforcement of the end-use verification system.

Computer companies are urged not to sell small- and medium-sized computers or to provide software or spare parts for computers owned by entities whose services are not available to nonwhites, even though the legislation explicitly bans such sales only if they have a contract value over $100,000.

NUCLEAR EXPORTS

The House bill prohibits all nuclear cooperation between the United States and South Africa, including prior licenses or authorizations.

The Senate amendment prohibits the export of goods or technology to be used in any South African nuclear production or utilization facility, prohibits the authorization to engage, directly or indirectly, in production of special nuclear material in South Africa, prohibits the export to South Africa of component parts or other items or substances relevant because of their significance for nuclear explosive purposes, and prohibits the retransfer to South Africa of any of these goods, technology, special nuclear material, components, items, or substances unless the Secretary of State certifies that South Africa has become a party to the Treaty on the Non-Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons.

The conference substitute is the same as the Senate provision.

LABOR PRACTICES OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT IN SOUTH AFRICA

The Senate amendment directs the Secretary of State to take necessary steps to apply fair employment (Sullivan) principles to U.S. Embassy and contracts for services.

The House adopted a similar provision which applied only to Embassy direct hire personnel in H.R. 2068 (The Department of State authorization bill).

The conference substitute is identical to the Senate provision.

EMPLOYMENT PRACTICES OF U.S. NATIONALS IN SOUTH AFRICA

The Senate amendment imposes mandatory fair employment practices for U.S. nationals controlling companies in South Africa. It establishes reporting requirements for U.S. companies and for the Secretary of State on U.S. and foreign company compliance.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision with an amendment establishing an advisory committee and procedures for onsight inspection.

REGULATORY AUTHORITY

The House bill requires the President to issue regulations to carry out the act.

The Senate amendment contains regulatory authority in the provisions dealing with computer exports and employment practices.

The conference substitute is a combination of the two provisions.

ENFORCEMENT AND PENALTIES

The House bill provides authority for the President to ensure compliance with the act and sets forth penalties for violation.

The Senate amendment contains specific violation provisions in the provision on computer exports and labor practices.

The conference substitute is the same as the House provision.

TERMINATION OF PROVISIONS OF THE ACT

The House bill provides for termination of the provisions of the act upon enactment of a joint congressional resolution concurring in a Presidential determination that apartheid has been abolished.

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the same as the House provision.

SCHOLARSHIPS FOR BLACK SOUTH AFRICANS

The Senate amendment sets aside $15 million of the funds authorized for the education and human resources account for the Agency for International Development for scholarships for black South Africans to attend South African universities, colleges, and secondary schools. It provides for the U.S. Ambassador to appoint the selection panels who will select students for the assistance.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision with an amendment setting the funding levels at $8 million in fiscal year 1986, $11 million in fiscal year 1987, and $15 million thereafter and allocating half the funds for scholarships in accordance with the selection process described in the Senate amendment and half the funds for nongovernmental antiapartheid groups to carry out education, training, and scholarship programs.

HUMAN RIGHTS FUND

The Senate amendment makes permanent section 116(c)(2)(A) of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961 which provides assistance for human rights and increases the funding for these human rights grants to $1,500,000 annually. Twenty percent of the funds are reserved for legal defense of victims of apartheid. In addition, authority to make these grants is transferred to the Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision with an amendment changing the 20 percent to $350,000 and expanding the criteria to include aid to community groups nonviolently resisting apartheid. These funds are intended to be in lieu of, not additional, to similar authority provided in chapter 4 of Part II of the Foreign Assistance Act of 1961.

EXPANDING PARTICIPATION IN THE SOUTH AFRICAN ECONOMY

The Senate amendment urges the U.S. Government to assist in all appropriate ways the realization by South African blacks of their rightful place in the South African economy.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision.

OVERSEAS PRIVATE INVESTMENT CORPORATION

The Senate amendment makes OPIC insurance and guarantees available for joint ventures between American investors and black South Africans and waives the requirement for a government-to-government agreement.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the House position.

EXPORT-IMPORT BANK

The Senate amendment instructs the Export-Import Bank to take active steps to encourage use of its facilities by business enterprises owned by black South Africans and waives the Evans amendment which prohibits Eximbank activities in South Africa.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision.

HEALTH CONDITIONS IN THE HOMELANDS

The Senate amendment directs the Secretary of State to conduct a study and to report to Congress on health conditions in the Homelands.

The House bill contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the Senate provision.

APPLICABILITY TO EVASIONS OF ACT

The House bill makes provisions of the bill applicable to persons who act to evade those provisions.

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the House provision.

CONSTRUCTION OF THE ACT

The House bill provides that nothing in the act is to be construed as U.S. recognition of the "Homelands".

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is the House provision.

IMPORTS OF COAL AND URANIUM FROM SOUTH AFRICA/NAMIBIA

The House in H.R. 1555 (foreign aid bill) contains a provision which prohibits imports of coal and uranium from South Africa/Namibia.

The Senate amendment contains no comparable provision.

The conference substitute is to provide that this is one of the sanctions which may be imposed in the future if the Government of South Africa does not achieve significant progress in abolishing apartheid.

Managers on the Part of the Senate.

REQUEST TO MAKE IN ORDER CONSIDERATION ON THURSDAY, AUGUST 1, 1985, OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER OF SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 32, FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it shall be in order to consider at any time on Thursday, August 1, or any day thereafter, the conference report on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986, or any amendment reported in disagreement from the conference, that all points of order against the conference report be waived, that it shall be in order for the House by motion to recede from its amendment with an amendment or amendments, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on such motion.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask, if I may, the ranking Republican on the Budget Committee if he could answer a couple of questions from our perspective about it.

Could the gentleman give us some idea as to what the Budget Committee is likely to come to the House with in terms of first-year savings in the resolution?

Mr. LATTA. If the gentleman will yield, I would be happy to respond to the gentleman.

We are about $55 billion hard savings. We have taken out the contracting in, and we have, I think, crafted a budget that will be bipartisan that we can support on our side. We did not get everything that we wanted in the conference in the way of savings and termination of programs.

I might say to the gentleman that I have been on every conference since the Budget Act came into being and this has been the most difficult conference of them all, and the longest. There were differences on taxes and differences on COLA's, but through hard work on both sides, I think that we have come up with something that we can support.

Overall, we have about $276 billion in savings in 3 years, no new taxes, we have preserved COLA's, and I think it is something that we can be satisfied with when it comes.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give us some idea as to how much of that $276 billion over 3 years is reconciled in the proposal?

Mr. LATTA. If the gentleman will yield further, about $68 billion at the moment, but we have not quite completed our conference.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and further reserving the right to object, I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] if he has any comments.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the gentleman from Ohio, the ranking member of the Budget Committee, has adequately described the situation. I think those terms are in the ballpark. We still have a way to go. We have not completed a budget resolution.

All this unanimous-consent request does is allow us, if we are able to complete one when the conference resumes at 11:30, if we are able to complete one it essentially allows this body to act on it before we depart.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that explanation.

One question I am getting from our side is, with the gentleman's unanimous-consent request, can we assume that the gentleman does have hopes that we will get this before us sometime yet in this legislative day?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield further, the reason we are bringing this unanimous-consent request before the body is because we do have just that hope.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, I would be glad to yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Let me say that is my extreme hope that we can do that this afternoon.

Mr. WALKER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand this proposal would increase budget authority for defense by $10 billion over 1985?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield, at this time we do not have an agreement on a budget authority for the entire budget, and there has not been a finalization of the 050, or the defense number.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Further reserving the right to object, I think it is premature to make this request because I remember what happened last October 1. We were in conference on the continuing resolution. There was an agreement made by others to increase budget authority for the Defense Department by $8 billion. That became the floor for the defense part of the bill in conference.

A budget resolution is a goal for the Appropriations Committee. This is more binding on the House than the authorization bill. The authorization bill is a mere authorization and appropriations can be and are often less. We are talking here about a goal for the appropriation. You lock in a $10 billion increase in the goal for the authorization, and when we get into the conference on the continuing resolution on October 1, we will be required to take $10 billion out of other programs or else the deficit reduction will be cut by $10 billion. There is no other way to do it.

I think the House is entitled to a separate vote on whether or not they want to eliminate the freeze on military. If the majority want to vote to go up $10 billion, I would accept it but we ought to have a separate vote. If we grant a unanimous-consent request on this, there is no possibility. That eliminates the necessity to go to the Committee on Rules. The Committee on Rules will not have the opportunity to give us a separate vote on that.

For the last 3 weeks we have been passing little piddling thousand-dollar decreases to get bills down to the authorization or 1985 level on those bills, and we should not have one bill with a goal for a $10 billion increase that would, way more than offset all that we have done in the last 3 weeks on appropriations bills.

For that reason, I have to object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I will further reserve the right to object if somebody wants to say something.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman would like me to respond, I will be glad to respond.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask unanimous consent to strike part of the remarks that he just made?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman reserves the right to object?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman will yield, let me respond to the distinguished gentleman, who is a senior member of the Committee on Appropriations, on which I also serve, and simply say at this time all this does is allow us to bring before the body a budget resolution conference report if we should achieve one. We do not know what the final figures will be, and certainly there are many Members who will have concerns about those final figures in a variety of areas.

There will be those who will dispute the target or the ceiling in function 050, or defense. There may be those who will dispute and have strong feelings about the low-income programs that some of us are hoping will be fully funded. There will be those who will not agree with certain assumptions with regard to eliminations, et cetera.

However, let me remind the body that we will have ample opportunity to express our wills individually on all of these issues because there will be a defense conference report of the authorizing committee that will come before this body some time. There will also be a defense appropriation bill that will come before this body, as the gentleman knows, which will come out of the committee on which he serves. There will be authorizations and appropriations committee bills where this House will have an opportunity.

All the budget resolution does is set a target and a ceiling. I would point out to the body, and particularly to those members of the Committee on Appropriations, that so far, the bills that have come forth from the Committee on Appropriations—I think there have been about four of those bills that have passed this House—are $8 billion below the target set.

Thus, when you vote for the budget resolution, if there is a vote today, which I hope there will be, so that we can go home and tell the American people that we do have a budget, all this does is allow us to do that. We will be saying that these are the ceilings, these are the optimum targets.

However, as everyone knows, you will get an opportunity to vote on authorization bills, on conference reports, and on appropriations bills where this body will be able to work its legislative will if there are those who do not want to reach the ceiling.

So I would hope that we would not delay the possibility of passing a budget, sending a strong message to the financial markets of this Nation and to the American people that we are quite serious about fiscal responsibility simply because we see a ceiling and we are concerned about it. We will have an opportunity to work our will on the defense authorizing conference report as well as the appropriations bill, as well as others.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, here is the problem: If you get this unanimous consent, then when you come back with the resolution, we will have waived the 3-day rule; we will have also waived the 5 hours of debate. We then will not have an opportunity for a separate vote on whether or not we want to freeze the military. The only possibility of getting that, as I understand it, is if we do not waive those rules, and go to the Rules Committee, and the Rules Committee can grant a rule for a separate vote on an amendment freezing the military function at the 1985 level.

I think, after we have struggled on eight appropriation bills for 3 weeks to reduce $8 billion below the 1985 level, we ought not pass a budget resolution under this procedure and increase the military function by $10 billion over 1985 and more than offset what we have done in the last 3 weeks.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague, the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. GLICKMAN. Mr. Speaker, I guess what concerns me, I say to my colleagues, No. 1, as I understand it, whatever allocation would come in from the Budget Committee, it is a maximum allocation that could then be cut in the appropriation bill or in a separate vote on the authorization bill.

No. 2, if my colleague will yield further, what we are doing here is basically delaying the process because it appears to me that if an objection is raised right here, we will in fact go to the Rules Committee. The House will basically take up this same budget after a rule has been passed, and we will be here Friday or Saturday to do that kind of thing, and in fact we will end up with the same budget that the gentleman is proposing now.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, all I want is a separate vote on whether or not we are going to freeze military before September 30. We are going to get that military appropriations bill as the last bill this year, after we have done all this cutting. Then we are going to go over to the continuing resolution conference and the Senate conferees are going to say, "Hey, we have already agreed on this; the goal was for a $10 billion increase," and that will be the end of it and all of our work on other bills will be down the drain.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could address the chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], and make this inquiry:

Whatever the figure that the conference committee might reach on the 050 function, the defense function, would be, would it not, a maximum figure that would then be subject to further action in the appropriations process, and even in the unresolved authorization process, to determine what the actual level of authority for defense would be; is that correct?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman from Washington is absolutely correct. It is a maximum. It does not mean that the House is limited in its actions.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. As a practical matter, it does not work that way.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, I think it is important to emphasize this point: that we are in no sense, in accepting a figure for the defense function, saying that is the minimum figure or that that figure is not subject to further consideration downward possibly by the appropriation process.

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, before I yield further, let me have the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Would the gentleman from Pennsylvania—and I would not object if he would do this—agree to amend his request to provide that the House shall have a separate vote on whether or not to increase defense over 1985?

Mr. RUSSO. Mr Speaker, will the gentleman yield on that point before he gets an answer from the chairman?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to have an answer to that question.

Mr. RUSSO. I think I can clarify that for the gentleman from Iowa if I can bring up what happened at the meeting.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to have the chairman of the committee respond to that.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield further, the answer to the gentleman's question is that that would violate the rules of the House, as I understand it, with regard to the unanimous-consent request with regard to the Budget Act.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. But by unanimous consent, we can waive the rules of the House. You can do that by unanimous consent. I am just asking the gentleman, will he amend his unanimous-consent request to do that?

Mr. RUSSO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like for the chairman of the committee to answer.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, while the gentleman is consulting, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, would it meet the gentleman's purpose if he were assured that in the consideration of the authorization bill on the Department of Defense authorization, a separate vote could be obtained by Members on the figure of that authorization level?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, as a practical matter, I went through this last year, and I know what happens. Regardless of what is in the authorization, if we have your goal and we have established it by a vote in the House and the Senate and the goal is $10 billion over 1985, when we get in that continuing resolution conference, they are going to say, "Hey, you have already decided that. You have decided that, so you take it out of other things." Then you will have reconciliation, and I know what they will be on. They will be on fisheries, they will be on law enforcement, they will be on the things that the administration did not request.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think it is, with respect, not a situation where the budget figure controls the authorization figure except as a maximum where the budget figure controls the appropriation figure, except as a maximum, and I think I can assure the gentleman that there will be an opportunity, regardless of what figure is set in the budget, for a lower figure, including a level of the previous position of the House to be considered in the authorization and the appropriation process.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, we need to do it in this process right here. What is wrong with unanimous consent to give us a separate vote on that? If the majority does not want it, all right, the majority said so.

What is wrong with the majority having an opportunity to vote on that?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding under his reservation.

Let me just say to my good friend—and he is my good friend; as a matter of fact, we came to this Congress together, and we know something about what goes on around here—let me say that if we start amending the budget process to permit individual votes on everything that comes along, then we are going to have to go down the list and have individual votes on all the things that we have agreed on. We have never done this, and the gentleman knows that.

As has been explained by the gentleman from Washington, we will have an ample opportunity, as the gentleman well knows, when the appropriate spending bills come along to offer amendments. You can make your voice known then.

Certainly this is a very tenuous situation that we face, and let me stress this. This has not been easy. We have had a Senate that has been very, very difficult to deal with, and if we start doing these things, this is going to fall apart. I want to assure the gentleman that may happen, and he does not want that. I know he does not want that. The American people and the financial markets are waiting on action by this House on this particular piece of legislation. I am certain the gentleman would not want the finger pointed at him as the individual who stopped the budget resolution in its tracks. If we do what you want, I can assure the gentleman there is not going to be any conference report on the budget; it is not going to pass, and it will come all apart.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania and everybody who has been working on this have had the country's interests at heart in all of this. I could start and name function after function that I disagree with, and I would like to have a separate vote, but I do not want to prolong the procedure. We could go on for days arguing about all these things, and we do not want that.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I am not talking about separate votes on everything. I am talking about a vote on just one thing, and that one thing is the biggest function in the budget and it determines whether we are going to have a freeze or whether we are not going to have a freeze.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield for just one further thing—defense is taking the biggest cut, $27 billion out of the $55 billion in savings that comes out of 050. Does the gentleman know that? That is what is coming out of that particular function in the budget resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will call for regular order.

Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT: THE TIME IS NOW

(Mr. SLAUGHTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SLAUGHTER. Mr. Speaker, the time has come to make a serious effort to end the many years of deficit financing by this body. For 25 of the last 26 years, Congress has had to borrow money to finance the programs it has authorized. Our national debt now totals over $1.8 trillion. The interest on this debt is staggering: Last year it totaled $111 billion, a full 13 percent of the Federal budget.

This is fiscal irresponsibility, and it is time for it to end.

I am cosponsoring House Joint Resolution 27, the balanced budget amendment, as the best first step toward responsibility.

For the answer to soaring deficits is certainly not more taxes; the answer is fiscal responsibility. This body must discipline itself to establish priorities for financing Federal programs. Those with highest priority will get financed; those with lower priority must be cut back or eliminated. The answer is possible if only Congress would learn how to say "no."

Years of experience have shown that Congress cannot or will not do this; it cannot discipline itself to establish priorities. It seems that the only thing this body can say is "yes."

This balanced budget amendment would force Congress to establish national priorities for Federal spending. And it is only through establishing these priorities that we can begin to make some real progress toward reducing deficits. I think this can be done and I think it must be done.

I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this amendment.

SAVE AMERICAN JOBS

(Mr. TRAFICANT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, a recent news article reports that AT&T plans to move production of residential telephones to Singapore. These phones are currently produced in Shreveport, LA—and although this is not in my district this move is illustrative of what is happening to American jobs. About 875 jobs will be lost at the Shreveport plant, and over the next 5 years, AT&T will invest $30 million in the Singapore operation, which will employ 1,000 workers who will be paid 25 percent of what American workers would be paid.

Unfortunately, this is not just an isolated incident. Increasing numbers of U.S. multinational corporations are turning their backs on American workers, setting up operations overseas and across the Mexican border. What this means is jobs for foreign laborers and more unemployed Americans. This has got to stop. This is crazy!

I have introduced a bill, the Foreign Subsidiary Tax Equity Act, that would discourage American corporations from moving overseas by plugging the current loophole in the Tax Code by requiring these runaway plants to pay tax on the income generated in tax haven countries.

The time has come for Congress to take action to stop American corporations from pulling up stakes and taking away American jobs. American workers need our help! I urge all of you to cosponsor H.R. 1914, the Foreign Subsidiary Tax Equity Act.

CONGRESSWOMAN HOLT RETIRING FROM HOUSE

(Mrs. HOLT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. HOLT. Mr. Speaker, after some months of prayer and deliberation, I am announcing that I will not seek reelection to an eighth term in the House of Representatives.

The reason I have decided to retire from the House is that I simply want more time with my wonderful husband, Duncan, and our seven grandchildren.

Mr. Speaker, serving in this House has been a high honor of which I dreamed when I was a schoolgirl many years ago. I thank God that I have had this great privilege. I tried to represent my constituents to the best of my ability and I cherish the many wonderful friends I have come to know in this body.

I truly love this House and all that it means to this great, free country.

THE BUDGET RESOLUTION

(Mr. WHITTEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, as most of you know, I was cochairman of the committee that promoted the Budget and Impoundment Control Act and then served upon the Budget Committee. The Budget Act today is far different than was intended.

Let me just say to you that our appropriation bills are under the House-passed budget resolution. I hope the Senate will agree with us.

Again we are living within the House passed resolution, but to go and add $10 billion to the debt as insisted upon by the Senate is to step backward. It means little if there is no payment on the debt or deficit. In fact, none of the proposed budget resolutions require any reduction in either the debt or the deficit. If what we save goes to increase the carryover or the expenditures for military spending, it only means a transfer from domestic programs.

When we set up the Budget Committee, we did so because 42 percent of Federal spending was going around the annual review of our Committee on Appropriations. Now, after 10 years of operating with the Budget Act, 46 percent of our expenditures are beyond the annual appropriations review.

Not only that, but only 15.1 percent of spending is subject to action of Congress for discretionary spending. The other is tied down and in effect mandatory or for military spending.

The projected spending, however, for the Department of Defense as submitted in the budget for the next 5 years would increase to a figure which would leave nothing to run the domestic economy. I tell you now, defense must have public support. It must have behind it a strong economy, or we will have no defense. Military spending is just as dependent on our economy and our domestic programs as can be.

We just got through with a supplemental appropriation bill, which will come up again today. We argued and fussed with each other about every dime when it was to be used in this country. When we were asked to and did provide $2,250 million for increased foreign aid for the last 2 months of the fiscal year, August and September, we heard no criticism, no discussion, no editorialism—nothing. They took it for granted that it was necessary to increase foreign aid.

We argue and fuss with each other about doing anything to protect our own country. I tell you again, you have given us a total figure and we are living within it. We in the House do have a budget resolution. All we need to do is insist that our Senators will agree with us. We cannot afford to go into debt further when we have such a large deficit—and we must reduce the deficit and the debt. Nothing in the budget resolution that we deal with requires that.

Again, not a dime that you heard discussed in savings goes to reduce the deficit or the debt. We hope it will, but, if you are going to save it on one side and increase spending on the other side, we will go backward. We don't have to have the Senate to agree. We can draw the line and in conference insist that it be kept.

I ask you, give our Appropriations Committee a total figure as you have done and let us work it out as we are doing. Do not listen to a couple of economists to upset our hard work.

Our committee held hearings with thousands of witnesses with many years of experience. We are holding the line. Don't give our savings away—$10 billion.

LET US NOT FORGET THE SEVEN AMERICANS HELD HOSTAGE IN LEBANON

(Mr. O'BRIEN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, on January 8, 1985, negotiations between Israel and Lebanon for the withdrawl of Israeli forces from southern Lebanon were suspended.

The United States and the Soviet Union agreed to open wide-ranging arms control talks in Geneva.

In New York, the jury in the trial of Gen. William Westmoreland's charges of libel against CBS began hearing the defendant's case.

First Lady Nancy Reagan was Time magazine's cover story for the week.

The Cubs lost relief pitcher Tim "White Shoes" Stoddard when he signed with the San Diego Padres.

And at 7:30 a.m., that morning of January 8, 1985, Father Lawrence Jenco my friend, was kidnaped at gunpoint in Beirut on his way to work as director of Catholic Relief Services for Lebanon.

Today marks the 205th day Father Jenco has been held hostage in Lebanon.

Today is the 503d day William Buckley has been held hostage in Lebanon.

Today is the 450th day of captivity for the Rev. Benjamin Weir.

Terry Anderson, the Associated Press bureau chief in Beirut, has been held hostage for 138 days today.

Today is the 52d day Thomas Sutherland has been held hostage.

Today is the 65th day of captivity for David Jacobsen.

Today also marks the 240th day since the disappearance of Peter Kilburn in Beirut.

Mr. Speaker, America has had a hostage crisis in Lebanon 500 days old. As each of us returns nightly to our homes, to eat supper with our families, to sit with them in a family room, to watch a ballgame, a movie, a favorite program, to enjoy a cup of hot coffee and a piece of homemade cake, let us not forget the seven Americans still held hostage in Lebanon. Pray for them.

THE SLAUGHTER IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. OWENS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. OWENS. Mr. Speaker, for the second time in this century, millions of human beings are about to be slaughtered by a racist, diabolical government. In the 1930's and the 1940's, it was the government of Adolf Hitler in Nazi Germany who perpetrated the slaughter against the Jews. In the 1980's, it is the racist Government of South Africa about to slaughter their fellow countrymen.

The storm troopers, commanded from Johannesburg, have descended on the black townships with blitzkrieg speed and efficiency and isolated those townships and are now about to make those townships concentration camps.

We are going to witness a slaughter unlike any we have seen before and this time we cannot say that we did not know it was going on. We can expect the South African Government to dig in if it has no more pressure from the U.S. Government.

I urge all of my colleagues to understand what is going on and to join the Congressional Black Caucus members in requesting that the President revise his constructive engagement policy immediately and call on the South African Government to free Nelson Mandela and allow Nelson Mandela, who is the only recognized leader of all of the South African blacks, to participate in meaningful negotiations.

They should also call upon the South African Government to set a timetable for the granting of full and equal rights to the black population of South Africa.

WHAT IS A TERRORIST?

(Mr. COURTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, for some, the word "terrorist" is an epithet, a label governments apply to an enemy's guerrilla fighters but never to their own.

But this makes no sense. A terrorist is a man who deliberately seeks out the innocent, who deliberately maims or murders the uninvolved, for the purpose of enhancing the political shock effects of his crime.

It is therefore not true that "one man's terrorist is another man's freedom fighter." No murderer of innocents is fighting for freedom. It is equally false to pretend that every government prosecutes foreign terrorists while sheltering its own violent zealots.

We have been waiting since December for Iran to bring to the bar of justice the Shiites who murdered two American passengers on a Kuwaiti airliner at Tehran airport. We are still waiting for Nabih Berri, who carries the title of Lebanese Minister of Justice, to see justice done for the murder of Robert Stethem. On the other hand, in Israel, 15 Jewish terrorists have just been convicted under Israeli law for crimes against Arab lives and property. The judges condemned their countrymen to prison, some for life sentences.

Mr. Speaker, some governors rule according to their inclinations, while others rule according to law.

COMMEMORATION OF BRIDGEWATER, VA, SESQUICENTENNIAL

(Mr. OLIN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. OLIN. Mr. Speaker, today, the small town of Bridgewater, VA, will begin a 10-day celebration of its sesquicentennial—the 150th anniversary of its charter being granted by the Virginia General Assembly.

Bridgewater is a fine example of a small Shenandoah Valley town. Settled in the mid-1700's, first by the Scotch-Irish, then by the English, Dutch, Welsh, and Germans, the early community served as a prosperous port on the North River, one of the three forks of the Shenandoah River.

It has survived the Civil War, with opposing troops on each side of the river; it has survived disastrous floods; and it has prospered, by the efforts of hardworking, churchgoing people who share a spirit of community and commitment. The influence of Bridgewater College, a small, private school founded in 1880, extends well beyond the town, preparing teachers, doctors, lawyers, ministers, business and community leaders for service throughout Virginia and the Nation.

Bridgewater is one of the treasures of the Shenandoah Valley. I am pleased to offer my congratulations as the celebration begins on its 150th birthday. I hope all of you will be able to visit us sometime.

SUPREME COURT ATTEMPTS TO SEVER GOVERNMENT AND RELIGION

(Mr. BARTON of Texas asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the Supreme Court's so-called neutrality principle of religion, especially as it relates to the school prayer issue.

On June 4, 1985, in the case of Wallace versus Jaffree, the Supreme Court declared unconstitutional an Alabama statute authorizing a 1-minute period of silence in all public schools for meditation or voluntary prayer. While the Court allowed for the period of silence, it stated that the use of the phrase, "for meditation or voluntary prayer," respected the establishment of religion and thus violated the first amendment.

Justice Stevens, who deliberated the opinion of the Court, states that the Alabama statute "is not consistent with the established principle that the Government must pursue a course of complete neutrality toward religion."

Does the Court mean to imply that this self-declared neutrality requires the Government to be wholly secular and devoid of any acknowledgement of a Supreme Being and Creator?

That would, indeed, be odd, for the Supreme Court itself begins its sessions with the invocation, "God save the United States and this Honorable Court." And we ourselves begin each session with a specific prayer to a very specific God.

Therefore, I would like to suggest that the Supreme Court's so-called neutrality is nothing more than an attempt to remove any connection whatsoever between Government and religion.

In order to get religion back in the public schools, we need to sign Discharge Petition No. 1 at the desk today.

THE RACKETEER WEAPONS AND VIOLENT CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1985

(Mr. RODINO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, with my distinguished colleague from New Jersey, Mr. HUGHES and joined by Congressemen GREEN and WHITEHURST, I am today introducing a bill to help law enforcement officers combat crime by keeping guns out of the hands of criminals. This bill provides for a reasonable waiting period before a handgun can be purchased to ensure that potential criminals cannot obtain a handgun. At the same time, it also attempts to address some concerns of sportsmen and gun dealers.

Over 100 police chiefs have called for a waiting period. So do the major police organizations, who have urged me to submit this bill. They have good reason: Two-thirds of all police officers who died in line of duty last year were killed by handguns.

Public opinion polls show an overwhelming majority of the people support a waiting period. Newspapers endorse it. The Attorney General's 1981 Task Force on Violent Crime recommended it. And many sportsmen—tired of seeing reasonable law enforcement measures destroyed in their name—think it's a good idea.

As a nation, it is time to take the guns out of the hands of criminals.

COMPARABLE WORTH

(Mr. MONSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. MONSON. Mr. Speaker, one of the controversial issues reemerging here is that of comparable worth—or equal pay for different work. The creative minds behind this proposal claim comparable worth is the same as equal pay. This is simply not true. Equal pay is the legal requirement that an employer must pay equal wages to men and women who do the same work. Comparable worth requires equal wages for jobs that are dissimilar but are thought to have the same worth.

As I have explained this difference to residents of my district in Utah, many have been surprised that Congress would spend time debating such a preposterous idea. Still, many are fooled by the rhetoric that this concept means fairness and equality.

The theory of comparable worth has many major flaws. First, it fails to address the reasons for the wage gap and presumes discrimination on the mere existence of a wage difference. Second, it ignores the civil rights and equal pay laws already on the books. Third, it assumes that each job has a measurable economic worth that can be scientifically and pragmatically determined and compared to different jobs.

I urge my colleagues in this body to look beyond the superficial and misleading language on this concept and examine the many flaws associated with it. Comparable worth is a concept that will not stand up under close scrutiny.

IT IS TIME TO BRING HOME THE REST OF THE HOSTAGES

(Mr. MINETA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, for more than a year now Rev. Ben Weir has languished as a hostage in Lebanon. The Reverend Weir is one of seven such hostages whose fate concerns me deeply.

Reverend Weir's father-in-law lives in my district; and during the last year I have come to know and admire Reverend Weir's family as they struggle to obtain his release.

We must not forget these hostages. We cannot allow this case to slip from our consciousness. We must insist that our Government do absolutely everything possible to bring these seven people back.

Frankly, I say this because along with many of the hostage families, I am not convinced that bringing these seven back is a top priority of this administration or of our State Department.

The hostage families tell me they feel that the administration is doing little, if anything, to bring these people home. At the time of the TWA hijacking, our President said he was committed to bringing all of the hostages home. Yet once the TWA hostages came home, we have seen the White House's focus on this problem dissolve and fade into vague statements.

Reverend Weir has been held for 450 days. It is time to bring him and the others home.

LET US SOLVE THE IMPUTED INTEREST IMPASSE

(Mr. HARTNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. HARTNETT. Mr. Speaker, as we prepare to leave Washington for our 5-week summer recess, I must remind my colleagues that because Congress has failed to act in a timely manner, thousands of seller-financed transactions of real estate are on hold and our economy will suffer substantially from this impasse.

You will all remember that on two occasions in the past year, this body has voted nearly unanimously to address the imputed interest problem created by the 1984 Tax Act. However, we have succeeded in passing only stopgap relief which expired more than a month ago. Still remaining is adoption of a conference report—and it is that action which this body should take before concluding our legislative agenda this week.

It is my understanding that the differences in the imputed interest bills passed by the House and Senate are few. Only nongermane, minor areas of disagreement remain.

Please join me in urging the leadership in the Ways and Means Committee to work in a bipartisan spirit to remove the serious uncertainty which exists in this marketplace because of the lack of a final imputed interest solution.

PLEASE MEET WITH US, MR. PRESIDENT, ON THE STATE OF EMERGENCY IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. LELAND asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, South Africa has now become a Fascist nation without question. On just yesterday the South African Government imposed the worst kind of cruelty on black people; the South African Government on yesterday, Mr. Speaker, denied black people the right to participate in public funerals.

Mr. Speaker, we have asked for a meeting, those of us in the Congressional Black Caucus, with the President of the United States to discuss with him the state of emergency in South Africa.

The President has yet to respond positively to that request.

We urge the President to sit down with those of us who care about the humanity of the people of South Africa, to meet with us. Over 900 people are incarcerated, Mr. Speaker, just as a matter of going to demonstrations against the imposition of the state of emergency, the curtailment of any kind or any inkling of human rights in South Africa.

Little schoolchildren are being arrested because they sing freedom songs in South Africa. Many hundreds of people now are suffering from all kinds of physical impairment and death, Mr. Speaker.

Something has to be done. Can we please get the President to respond positively to this issue?

TWO-TRILLION-DOLLAR DEBT PLUS INEFFICIENT BUDGET EQUALS A SCANDAL

(Mr. CRAIG asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Speaker, the dog days of summer are here. With Congress out of town in August the press is known for reporting scandals—real or imagined.

I know of one scandal that deserves the examination of the American press. The scandal is perpetrated here in this great building. It is a growing debt—$2 trillion and a budget process that, even when it works, is factually dishonest.

There is one way that Congress can come clean—can make this system honest again. That way is adopting a balanced budget tax limitation amendment to the U.S. Constitution. It's time has come.

PRESIDENT REAGAN SHOULD MEET WITH BLACK CAUCUS ON DETERIORATING SITUATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. CONYERS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I join with the Chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus and its entire membership to join in a request that that body be permitted to meet with the President of the United States at his earliest convenience with reference to the deteriorating situation in South Africa.

I hope that many Members in the Congress on both sides of the aisle will join in urging that this meeting between the President and this part of the House of Representatives, the Congressional Black Caucus, be agreed to and be arranged at his earliest convenience.

As is well known, the situation in South Africa is deteriorating, deteriorating at a rate faster than the news can report it. The U.S. Government and especially through the House of Representatives and the Senate have now taken measures to restrain the apartheid government and our relationship to it in a conference that was reported only last night. We are moving, but I think a meeting between the American black Representatives in Congress and the President of the United States is imperative.

Mr. Speaker, I urge that all of us join with the Congressional Black Caucus in facilitating this request and seeing that such a meeting is held forthwith.

THE IRS IS LICKING ITS CHOPS ON THIS ONE

(Mrs. VUCANOVICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I don't believe we should be leaving this Chamber for the August break without resolving an important issue.

As you know, the House and Senate have passed legislation enabling homeowners and small businessmen to use seller financing in the sale of their property.

However, there has been no conference on this matter and therefore, as of July 1, 1985, the IRS started licking its chops.

They see these transactions going on as we speak and without any law to protect the seller; the IRS may begin to penalize these sellers.

It is our job to provide certainty in the marketplace and nothing is happening.

I call on the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee to move quickly to a conference so that we can go home and tell our constitutents that the IRS has been held at bay.

POLISH-AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

(Mr. KLECZKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KLECZKA. Mr. Speaker, today marks the first day of Polish-American Heritage Month. It is a time to honor the important role that Poles and Polish-Americans have played in developing our Nation's culture and history.

This is an opportunity to send a message to Poles struggling for freedom and democracy in their country. We can send that message by honoring Poland's native sons and daughters who have brought with them ideas and talents nurtured over centuries of Polish history. We stand in solidarity with those brave individuals seeking to stem the tide of social injustice in Poland.

Poles and Polish-Americans have played important roles in shaping America's political and military history. Glancing back through the pages of history, we note names such as Casimir Pulaski and Thaddeus Kosciusko, heroes from the Revolutionary War, or more recently, Zbigniew Brezezinski and Edmund Muskie, to name only a few.

Polish-Americans have also contributed to America's cultural, educational, scientific, athletic, and entertainment heritage. Without a doubt, our Nation has been greatly enriched by the contribution of Polish-Americans.

Mr. Speaker, as a representative of a district with a large Polish-American constituency, and as a Polish-American myself, I am proud to rise in recognition of the first day of Polish-American Heritage Month. During this month, let us be especially cognizant of the important contribution that Poles and Polish-Americans have made to the patchwork of our Nation's heritage.

BIRTHDAY OF FRANCIS SCOTT KEY

(Mrs. BENTLEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 206th anniversary of the birthday of Francis Scott Key, a man who made many valuable contributions to his native State of Maryland but gave his greatest gift to the country, our national anthem.

Born in Frederick, MD, August 1, 1779, Key was the son of a lawyer and a descendant of the original settlers in Maryland. He was raised on the beliefs that founded this Nation: freedom of speech, freedom of religion, and the right to bear arms.

At Fort McHenry, in Baltimore, the British met their first major upset in the War of 1812. It was this battle which inspired Francis Scott Key to write the famous words: "Oh, say, does that star-spangled banner still wave, o'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?"

Yes, my distinguished colleagues, thanks to American patriots such as Francis Scott Key throughout history, the flag does still wave. Two hundred and six years later, Key's words are as powerful and true as the day he wrote them. We, in Maryland, are proud on this day as should be the rest of this great country.

MISSING CHILDREN: SHAWN MICHEAL GERDON

(Mr. NELSON of Florida asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. NELSON of Florida. Mr. Speaker, every mother and father can understand how it feels to see their children after being apart even for a short time. But tragically, many parents in our Nation live each day in uncertainty about the welfare and whereabouts of their sons and daughters. I am delivering these comments today because I want to help bring attention to the problem of missing children.

I have been informed by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children that one of my young constituents in Florida has disappeared and is now listed as missing by the Center. According to the information provided to me by the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children, Shawn Micheal Gerdon was abducted by his father on November 16, 1979. He has not been seen or heard from since. In this photograph, the latest one we have of Shawn, he is shown at age 3.

Shawn was born on March 10, 1977, now 8 years old, has blonde hair and brown eyes. He is from Melbourne, FL. The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children has asked that anyone having information about Shawn, please call 1-800-843-5678.

I would like to add that special efforts are now underway in my home State of Florida to help find missing children. The Adam Walsh Child Resource Center, located at 227 South Orlando Avenue, Winter Park, FL, (305) 629-1811, and the Missing Children Help Center, at 410 Ware Boulevard, Suite 400, Tampa, FL, (813) 623-KIDS, are excellent organizations designed to bring our sons and daughters home.

Each year 1.8 million children disappear. I urge all Americans to join us in helping to locate these youngsters.

SELLER-FINANCED PROPERTY TRANSACTIONS IN TAX LIMBO

(Mr. DREIER of California, asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DREIER of California. Mr. Speaker, at this moment, it remains to be seen whether or not we will pass a budget resolution before adjournment. Yet it appears that we will break for the August recess without taking care of some other vital business.

In May, we passed legislation protecting the rights of private property owners to use seller financing in the sale of property.

The Senate passed this measure in June. No conference has taken place and on July 1, 1985, seller-financed transactions went into tax limbo.

I ask the Ways and Means Committee to solve this dilemma before we go home.

THE TIME HAS COME FOR U.S. SANCTIONS AGAINST APARTHEID

(Mr. FAUNTROY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, it has been 2 weeks now since the racist apartheid regime in South Africa declared a state of emergency, and with every passing day, the iron fist of Fascist repression has tightened. Twenty-five more people have been killed; 1,300 have been arrested without charge and without recourse. Only on yesterday, the regime added to the ban on blacks owning property and blacks voting and blacks' freedom of movement, a ban on the right of blacks to bury those who are being killed by the apartheid regime.

It is a sad time in world history. Quite frankly, however, we have seen some signs of hope as the world's conscience and its leaders have begun to respond. Last week, our ally in the free world, France, decided to do what we have been pondering for nearly 1 year now; banning new investments and the sale of Krugerrands in France.

The United Nations has now met and voted to recommend that member countries act voluntarily to impose sanctions. The tragedy is that we, in the United States, have, in response to the emergency, forfeited our rightful position at the forefront of this moral crusade.

The administration not only refused to agree to mandatory sanctions, but has maintained that it will not alter its position on constructive engagement. We must meet with the President on this critical question and I hope that Members of conscience in the House will join the Congressional Black Caucus in requesting that meeting.

THE WOMEN OF AMERICA DO NOT WANT COMPARABLE WORTH

(Mr. ARMEY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, a recent nationwide poll conducted by Decision/Making/Information shows some very interesting results. The poll, conducted between November 26 and December 4, 1984, sampled 2,704 adult Americans and focused on a broad range of issues but concentrated primarily on specific issues of concern to women.

Here are some of the key findings: 80 percent of all female respondents favor providing more information about existing laws as a means of eliminating sex discrimination rather than passing more laws. Only 18 percent of the respondents would choose the passage of more laws.

Only 56 percent of the female respondents have heard of comparable worth. Of those who have, over 26 percent are only slightly familiar with the issue.

In general the poll showed that among the issues that particularly affect women, the most important topic was equal pay for equal work. Discrimination, of course, was also important. Interesting, though, was the way women felt about how remedies for discrimination should be carried out. Respondents tended to feel that private industry, or women themselves, should remedy discrimination in the workplace.

In short, not even the women of America want comparable worth. What they want, and what they rightly should receive, is better enforcement of equal pay laws for that already exists on the books.

AMERICA'S MASSIVE INTERNATIONAL TRADE DEFICIT—AN ISSUE BURNING THROUGHOUT THE NATION

(Ms. KAPTUR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. KAPTUR. Mr. Speaker, over the last several months, many of my colleagues and I have taken to this floor in an effort to highlight the issue of America's massive international trade deficit. Our goal has been to elevate an issue which was dormant here in Washington, but has been burning for a long time throughout this Nation. From the industrial heartland in the Midwest, to the high tech centers on both coasts; from the breadbasket of the Great Plains, to the textile communities of the South; from the timber centers of the Pacific Northwest to the oilfields of the Southwest—patience is running out. The House of Representatives has pushed and pushed this administration. We have done everything within our power to get the Reagan administration to grab hold of this issue and move it to the front burner—to take charge and lead our Nation on trade. America's standard of living is at stake. Nothing less.

Now, as we prepare to return to our districts, the ball is in the administration's court. We hope that we have been able to wake them up down there at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue. We hope that during this next month, the administration will formulate a plan of attack on the trade deficit as the new Trade Representative makes his first official trip to Japan. Then, when Congress comes back, we can work together to solve this problem and give American workers and businesses a fair shake.

(Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

REVOLVING DOOR

(Mr. BENNETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Speaker, Since the House-Senate conference on the Defense authorization bill issued its report, there has developed some confusion as to the precise meaning of section 921 in that report, the "revolving door" provision. Some of the press have covered the revolving door matter in a rather awkward and inaccurate manner, and I would like to address some of these questions, briefly.

For example, some press reports said that the House-Senate language covered "the" primary person negotiating a contract, when actually that was changed in conference to say "a" person. This was done for the express purpose of not requiring the coverage to be limited to principal leadership.

Then some press went on to say that I was satisfied with the conference. Well, of course, anybody knows I was not very satisfied with it. But I had two things on my mind: One was the pressure to conclude the conference and the other one was that there is my conflict-of-interest bill which has been approved by the House Armed Services Committee and which will be coming to the floor dealing with the question of the revolving door issue. This bill may help solve this problem in a much better way.

The third thing which has been said in the press is that there are very few people covered by this bill. As a matter of fact, there are many thousands covered by the bill. The only way in which you could arrive at saying that not very many people are covered is by saying it does not include the military. But it does include the military. In conference, just prior to agreeing on the language we would use this very question was discussed, and I said that the words "in Federal employment" were broad enough to cover the military. I have since been advised by legislative counsel that they are indeed broad enough. The actual language is on page H6523 in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on July 29, 1985, and is as follows:

PART B—PROCUREMENT PERSONNEL MATTERS

SEC. 921. POST-GOVERNMENT-SERVICE EMPLOYMENT BARS ON SENIOR DEFENSE OFFICIALS

Whoever being a Presidential appointee in Federal employment acts as a primary government representative in the negotiation of a government contract or the settlement thereof with a defense contractor shall not within two years after the termination of said activities with such contractor accept employment from that contractor and upon a knowing violation of this provision the employee shall be punished, upon conviction, with a prison term of up to one year and a fine of up to $5,000 and said defense contractor shall forfeit up to $50,000 in liquidated damages to the Federal Government which shall be provided for in the contract. The Secretary of Defense shall implement this provision by appropriate regulations.

I think this language is very clear. It includes both military and civilian employees of the Federal Government. This is what we intended; and we discussed it in detail in connection with the other phrase "a Presidential appointee", concluding that it would reach down to captains in the Army and comparably in the other services.

Webster's Dictionary tells us that "employment" means: "the state of being employed with a job that pays wages or a salary." That clearly applies to both civilian and military employees of the Federal Government.

When the Office of Management and Budget lists total Federal employment in its "Special Analyses, Budget of the United States Government" it lists civilian and military employment. When OMB wants to distinguish between the two it referes to "Federal civilian employment", and, of course, that makes sense. Unless one distinguishes, it is common practice to assume that Federal employment refers to both military and civilian. That's what the conferees intended and that is what the English words mean.

Finally, the managers report makes clear on page H6647 of the July 29, 1985, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, that the House and Senate bills were both concerned with limiting the post-Government employment activities of Department of Defense employees. The report notes that the Senate bill covers "employees (O-4 or GS-11 and above)," that is, "employees" clearly refers to both civilian and military employees. The report further notes that "the House receded with an amendment which would add a new provision to the Senate bill * * *."

I will take this matter up in more detail in September, but I would also like to say that my conflict-of-interest bill which was approved by the Armed Services Committee will also be coming to the floor. If, for whatever reason, the revolving door situation in the Department of Defense is not adequately addressed through the amendments to the authorization bill we will have another opportunity to do so when my separate revolving door bill comes before the House.

STUDENTS TO END NATIONAL DEFICITS WILL S.E.N.D. A MESSAGE TO CONGRESS

(Mr. PORTER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, today Congressman ANDY JACOBS and I announce the creation of a brand new nationwide youth organization. It's called Students to End National Deficits [S.E.N.D.].

These young people will no longer sit quietly by while Congress drowns their future in a flood of red ink. No, they're going to start speaking out. Loudly, eloquently and persistently.

They will no longer tolerate $200 billion deficits, or the big-spending compromises which cause these deficits year after year. No, they're going to demand action. Now; and no more excuses.

These young debt busters, who stand to pay for all this fiscal profligacy, just might arouse the conscience of America. Let me ask any college student who wants to know more about Students to End National Deficits to write or call my Washington office.

America's young people are angry about the burdens Congress is placing on their future and Congress is going to hear from them.

UNITED STATES MUST ACT NOW FOR PEACE IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. CROCKETT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. CROCKETT. Mr. Speaker, Commonsense tells us that the only way to prevent a bloody racial struggle in South Africa is for the Government to talk—now and face to face—with credible black leaders. Yet, the Pretoria regime, in its obstinacy, travels in the opposite direction. It refuses to meet with Bishop Tutu and it continues to imprison more and more black leaders.

Mr. Speaker, the recent tragic developments in South Africa bring us back again to the crucial point noted in the Mandela Freedom Resolution adopted by the last Congress and sent to President Reagan. If the United States is to be a catalyst for peace in the South Africa situation, then President Reagan must publicly urge South Africa's white leaders to unconditionally release Nelson Mandela from prison and to participate with him and other black leaders in meaningful talks aimed at ending apartheid.

Mr. Mandela is key to any meaningful negotiations. The United States, like the British Foreign Office and the U.N. Security Council, can focus on this important need to free Mandela and, by doing so, demonstrate both to black South Africans and to the international community our commitment to the abolition of apartheid.

CONGRESS SHOULD NOT RECESS UNTIL IT HAS A BUDGET

(Mr. KASICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. KASICH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday 49 of my colleagues joined me in sending you a letter urging consideration for keeping the House in session until a responsible budget has been passed by Congress. We believe that the House has the responsibility to address the deficit issue now and must not leave for the recess until this task is completed.

While I am very encouraged by recent news that the budget conferees are making substantial progress, we must all resist the temptation to make unreasonable demands on the budget negotiators. I hope the rejection of the Budget Committee's chairman unanimous-consent request does not signal the House's unwillingness to adopt a reasonable deficit reduction package. As with all conference committee compromises—and the Members here know it—no one will ever be totally satisfied. However, Chairman GRAY and Mr. LATTA are attempting to hammer out a bill that meets the concerns of this House, including defense spending, and I say let's give them a chance.

While you may or may not agree with this opinion, I think we must agree that the House should not go on vacation, Members of Congress should not go on vacation until they complete our most important assignment, and that is to have a budget. I think we owe the American people that much.

WESTWAY LANDFILL

(Mr. GUARINI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GUARINI. Mr. Speaker, bipartisan support of a bill to bar construction of the Westway landfill in New York City continues to grow. Liberals, conservatives, Republicans, Democrats from every quarter of our State and Nation are united against this megahighway and private real estate development which would consume between $4 billion and $10 billion from our highway trust fund.

The damaging Westway landfill will eliminate a vital striped bass industry, and it paves over a significant part of the Hudson River. Moreover, New Jersey's lowlands would face severe flooding and drainage.

Public officials, private citizens, taxpayers, and environmental groups have gone on record opposing the project. Our colleague TED WEISS, in whose district Westway would be built, has fought it for more than 10 years. He favors trading in Westway for an alternate highway and aid to mass transit, and so do 74 of the cosponsors of H.R. 1888.

Westway is a threat to the future of our Federal Highway Program, our fiscal crisis, and our environment. I urge your support for H.R. 1888 and an amendment to the transportation appropriations bill which will be offered as a measure to prevent construction of the Westway landfill.

THE BALANCED BUDGET AMENDMENT

(Mr. DELAY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELAY. Mr. Speaker, I am addressing the House today to talk about an issue which is a high priority to my constituents, the balanced budget amendment. As a matter of fact, polls have shown that this amendment is a national priority.

The people of this Nation want their elected Representatives to act responsibly. Yet this Congress has failed to balance the Federal books for the last 15 years. We have now entered an era of seemingly perpetual $200 billion deficits. Why? Because there is no fundamental rule that says the budget must be balanced. There are laws that say we should have a balanced budget. The rules of the House are supposed to help us do that. But those rules are easily ignored and easily abused.

We've already done that numerous times this year.

The American people deserve, and the American people demand, a guarantee of fiscal sanity. A guarantee that their future and their children's future will not be spent away for political convenience. And this guarantee must ensure that our Nation will not be taxed into poverty to finance the spending programs which have created our present deficit.

The remedy is, of course, drastic. As a strict believer in the sanctity of our Constitution, I do not take this lightly. But such a serious and fundamental problem calls for drastic action. I implore my colleagues to heed their constituencies and get behind the balanced budget/tax limitation amendment.

KIM DAE JUNG UNDER HOUSE ARREST

(Mr. FEIGHAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FEIGHAN. Mr. Speaker, the only effective human rights policy is a vigilant and consistent human rights policy. Though we may protest violations at different times, our disapprobation means nothing if our eyes are easily diverted or our censure soft. The danger, of course, is that with the passage of time we lose the sharpness with which we originally view a problem. Such is the case today in South Korea.

When Kim Dae Jung made his return trip to South Korea in February, the attention of the world focused on a U.S. democratic ally that had no freedom of the press, arbitrary political rights, curtailed freedom of speech, and a president with virtually unchecked constitutional powers.

But the attention that Mr. Kim's return focused on his country produced results. In the months that followed, 13 political opposition leaders had their political rights restored. Kim Dae Jung was released from House arrest and allowed to meet with other political opposition leaders. For the first time in years, Mr. Kim's picture appeared in the newspapers. And in a surprisingly strong showing, the new Korea Democratic Party, the party of Kim Dae Jung and Kim Young Sam, surpassed the Government-sanctioned opposition in the national assembly elections.

Many of us in the Congress who had spoken out against the political repression in South Korea were equally vocal in our praise of these signs of progress. Yesterday, however, we learned that Kim Dae Jung had once again been placed under house arrest. He was told not to leave his home just hours before the start of his party's political convention. Mr. Speaker, this is the same capricious and peremptory political censorship we had all hoped to see an end of in South Korea. It has no place in a full democracy, and it is my sincerest hope that my colleagues in the Congress will join me in decrying this action against Kim Dae Jung.

President Chun must know that our attention continues to focus on our friend, South Korea, and that we still hold his government to the highest standards of political pluralism and democratic principles.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON APPROPRIATIONS TO FILE PRIVILEGED REPORT ON A BILL MAKING APPROPRIATIONS FOR FOREIGN ASSISTANCE AND RELATED PROGRAMS FOR FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. OBEY. Mr. Speaker I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Appropriations may have until midnight tonight to file a privileged report on the bill making appropriations for foreign assistance and related programs for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana reserved all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

SUPPORT EXPRESSED FOR THE CONFERENCE REPORT ON SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. GINGRICH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. GINGRICH. Mr. Speaker, I will support the conference report on South Africa. Furthermore, I urge the President to sign that conference report, and I will actively fight to override any veto. I share with the eloquent members of the Black Caucus their anguish and concern over the repression in South Africa.

However, we must be concerend about oppression whether it is against blacks by whites in South Africa; against blacks by blacks in Ethiopia; against Islamic Afghans by Russians in Afghanistan, or by Russians oppressing Poles, Lithuanians, Ukrainans and over other Russians in the Soviet Union.

For every black arrested in South Africa, there are literally a thousand whites arrested in the Soviet Union. For every black killed in South Africa, there are literaly a thousand Muslims killed by Soviets in Afghanistan.

Today we stand with the Black Caucus on behalf of human rights in South Africa. In September, when we return from the recess, I hope the Black Caucus will join us in forming a truly nonracial human rights effort that looks at the entire world and seeks freedom and rights for every human being in every country.

BEING PROTECTIVE OF AMERICA IS NOT PROTECTIONISM

(Mr. LEVIN of Michigan asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LEVIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a couple of days ago the Prime Minister of Japan delivered his country's plan to ease its huge trade surplus with the United States. Among other things, he said that he, "Does not understand the attitude of the U.S. Congress."

Mr. Prime Minister, as Congress adjourns today, let me try to explain our attitude. It is based on an assessment of the needs of our individual districts and States. It is based even more so on an assessment of our Nation's needs.

Your country has targeted American industries for Japanese economic efforts. We feel it is time for our Nation to target our industries in order to preserve them.

Your country has organized itself to expand its industrial base. We feel it is time for America to organize itself to preserve our industrial base.

If the shoe were on the other foot, and we are not producing many shoes anymore in the United States, if you had a $40 billion trade deficit with the United States, you would not depend only on the good will of America. Your country would act. That is why we in Congress are insisting that Japan act and that our own administration act.

Being protective of America is not protectionism. Our efforts in Congress are not, it should be clear, anti-Japanese; they are pro-America.

THE HOUSE DESERVES AN APOLOGY

(Mr. WALKER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, one of the basic rules that we operate under in this body is the rule which says that we as Members are not to ascribe intent to that which another Member is doing. The basic rule, because what we attempt to do is have a spirit of comity in which what a Member is doing is considered to be serious.

Those rules not only apply to us as Members, they apply to the officers who serve this House. We in the minority have been told that those officers serve this House on a bipartisan basis. Today we have a memo from the Office of the Doorkeeper, in which the Doorkeeper or his staff has taken upon themselves to ascribe intent to amendments to be offered by members of the minority.

This memo, relating to the Pay Equity Act, describes amendments to be offered by Mr. BURTON as dilatory and frivolous. Amendments to be offered by Mr. ARMEY as dilatory. I would say that that is absolutely unacceptable. It is unacceptable under the rules of this House. It is unacceptable as a manner in which officers of this House treat members of the minority.

I think that those two Members deserve an apology. I think the House deserves an apology from the officer.

THE LEADERSHIP WILL COME FROM HERE, NOT THE WHITE HOUSE

(Mr. MITCHELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not want to be dilatory in the presentation of my remarks.

Mr. Speaker, a number of my colleagues have been in the well of this House to speak out against the infamous conduct of the Government in South Africa. Indeed, my associate, Mr. GINGRICH of Georgia, just joined in that effort. I greatly fear that we are going to witness a bloodbath in South Africa unless this Nation takes the leadership that it should.

The tragedy of a bloodbath is that when people are caught up in a frenzy, white South Africans who have fought against apartheid will be hurt by blacks. There is no reasoning that goes on during a bloodbath.

Let me indicate to you that while I applaud the efforts of the Congressional Black Caucus to have a meeting with the President, I know that the President is not going to meet with us. He is not going to do it. During his entire administration he has chosen the people that he wants to meet with; only those who knuckle under to him and espouse his point of view.

I do not think that the President is going to move to free Nelson Mandela; he just does not have that kind of mentality insofar as people of color are concerned in other parts of the world. But I am not discouraged by these things.

On the other hand, I am very encouraged that in a Senate-House conference which ended last evening, there was an agreement that we would take strong sanctions against South Africa. So the leadership will come from here, this Congress, not from the White House.

WE NEED TO ACT DURING A DETERIORATING SITUATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. BROOMFIELD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, a few minutes ago I joined Chairman FASCELL before the Rules Committee requesting a rule on the conference report on the House-Senate agreement on the South African antiapartheid bill. I want to indicate that while I opposed this legislation when the issue was before the House, I believe the conference report reflects not only a fair and reasonable compromise, but also reflects a need to act in view of the deteriorating situation in South Africa in recent weeks.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I believe it is most urgent and morally right that this body stay in session until we have an opportunity to act on this important legislation.

THE 100TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE KANYAKU IMIN IN HAWAII

(Mr. AKAKA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. AKAKA. Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honor and privilege for me to rise today in commemoration of the 100th anniversary of the first arrival of the "Kanyaku Imin" or the "government contract immigrants" who came from Japan to Hawaii.

As a nation of immigrants, we are all justly proud of the diversity of our ethnic heritage and of the tremendous contributions that each group has made to our country. This year, we in Hawaii are honoring the largest group of immigrants, the Japanese, who came to Hawaii, beginning in 1885, 100 years ago. They came as immigrant contract labors to toil in our sugarcane fields and were the backbone of our early farm labor force, responsible in large measure for the successful development of our largest and most important agricultural enterprise, the sugarcane industry in Hawaii. The Japanese remained to become an integral and respected part of our community.

We are honoring this group of immigrants with a year-long series of activities and festivities in recognition of their contributions and accomplishments. As is true of many immigrant groups, their contributions were more recognized and appreciated as a group effort, in this instance, of providing the labor essential for a fledgling sugar industry rather than for individual achievements and sacrifices which nonetheless did occur. They fulfilled their contracts and acquitted themselves with honor.

Without overshadowing or detracting from the splendid accomplishments of the "Kanyaku Imin," no tribute to them would be complete without mentioning the contributions of their sons and daughters, products of their upbringing and a true credit to them, through whom they realized their finest hopes and aspirations. Today, they include two U.S. Senators, a Governor, a mayor, a State school superintendent, numerous other elected officials, many members of our judiciary, and outstanding professionals and businessmen. Not too many years ago, the list also included a university president, a State supreme court chief justice and a Congresswoman.

For all this, the "Kanyaku Imin" are grateful and humbly proud, that in this land of opportunity, all this was possible in one generation. Today, many are American citizens by choice and not by accident of birth.

Mr. Speaker, this gentleman expresses his gratitude to and salutes the "Kanyaku Imin."

OUR ACTION ON APARTHEID ONLY A DROP IN THE BUCKET

(Ms. OAKAR asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I, too, am very grateful that there has been an agreement regarding the conference report on the apartheid issue. I, however, think that while I welcome that, I think it is only a first step in the right direction. It is an initial step. Frankly, it is a drop in the bucket.

We want an end to apartheid in South Africa. I think our country could be demonstrating its leadership qualities more by showing the kind of vision and force that other countries are doing in that direction.

TAKE SOCIAL SECURITY OUT OF UNIFIED BUDGET

On another subject, I am gratified to see that there is movement in taking the Social Security trust fund out of the unified budget. I have had a bill to do that which I have introduced with many bipartisan cosponsors for the last 4 years. It is H.R. 151. Let us catch that momentum. Let us depoliticize Social Security, take it out of the budget, the way it was when President Roosevelt signed it into law 50 years ago.

It would be very fitting if we did that this year because this is the 50th anniversary of that great social program and it would be appropriate to put it back where it belongs—out of the unified budget—so that we would not try to get our hands on what belongs to the senior citizens and the disabled people of our country.

IMPUTED INTEREST/SELLER FINANCING CONTROVERSY

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the country is increasingly frustrated at the inability of Congress to act, at the inability of the House and Senate to agree on legislation.

The budget for 1986 is the most outstanding example,

But, another issue of concern to many, including many in my congressional district, is the imputed interest/seller financing controversy.

Some 15 months ago Congress promised realtors and others that the rules regarding seller financed real estate sales would be settled by the July 1, 1985 interim deadline which was established.

Now, in spite of the fact that both the House and Senate have passed bills which would permit seller financed transactions, while at the same time stop the potentially abusive mismatch of interest income and deductions that can permit tax avoidance, that deadline has passed.

Right now realtors and all those wishing to sell property are in a quandary. They don't know if future legislation will be retroactive to July 1, 1985. They don't know what the rules will be.

These taxpayers are losing faith with the Congress, Mr. Speaker, and with good reason. I hope the House and Senate managers of the respective imputed interest bills can get together.

We need a bill to resolve this important and outstanding issue.

A MEASURE TO PREVENT USE OF BANKRUPTCY AS BOTH A SHIELD AND A SWORD

(Mr. BOSCO asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BOSCO. Mr. Speaker, today I submit the names of 65 cosponsors from both sides of the aisle for H.R. 2870, a measure to prevent bankruptcy from being used as both a shield and a sword.

A good example of what we are trying to prevent is Texas Air Corp.'s attempt to take over Trans World Airlines at a time when Texas Air's major subsidiary, Continental Airlines, is in chapter 11, owing almost a billion dollars to banks, insurance companies, suppliers, travel agents, ticket holders and a host of other victims. This same company now seeks to take over another of our Nation's largest airlines.

I thank our colleague, Mr. MINETA, for scheduling hearings on this subject as a majority of the Public Works Committee are now co-sponsors, and I encourage the Department of Transportation to give this transaction extraordinary scrutiny. Those who use our bankruptcy laws as a shield against creditors cannot at the same time use the same laws as a sword to conquer others.

ON BEING A PROTECTIONIST

(Mr. JENKINS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, it always amazes me that we want to inflict a sense of guilt upon ourselves when it comes to the question of protecting American industry and jobs. We have no hesitancy whatsoever to be called protectionists when we want to defend our country through military buildup. That is a protectionist attitude, and we should have it.

But it always amazes me that when we talk about trade, and when we talk about American jobs, when we talk about American industry, we shy away from the term "protectionist." There is nothing wrong with it. It is not alien to our basic thinking to want to protect American jobs, American industry. That is the reason we are strong today.

As we go back into our districts over the holidays, over the recess, I want my colleagues to go into the little mills, whether it is the lumber mills of the Far West or the steel mills of Minnesota or the automobile plants of Ohio and Michigan, or the textile mills of the South. I want my colleagues to talk to those people they do not hear from too much, those people who simply work day in and day out, pay their taxes, defend their country in times of emergency, and yet are beginning to lose everything that they believe in, because of our fear of the term "protectionism". Let us not be afraid to protect anything that is good for America.

I urge Members to do that and do not have a sense of guilt. There is nothing wrong with it.

ENVIRONMENTAL MISPERCEPTIONS ABOUT NEVADA

(Mr. REID asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. REID. Mr. Speaker, it's interesting how perceptions are developed. Some are passed from person to person. Others are transmitted through the media. Still others are developed from firsthand experience.

Recently, Public Lands Subcommittee Chairman JOHN SEIBERLING, other Members of Congress and I had the opportunity to get such firsthand knowledge of Nevada, information that will be used to dispel environmental misperceptions about the State.

We viewed more than 1 million acres of potential wilderness areas. In Nye County alone we spent 2 days touring more than three quarters of a million acres.

And what beauty we saw:

Areas with high peaks, wild lands and trout streams, as well as bighorn sheep, mountain lions and deer.

Geological landmarks that attest the former glaciation that shaped the highest great basin mountains.

A mountain with meadows and aspens, where elk roam freely.

Volcanic rock formations, dramatic cliffs, limestone geology, and even prehistoric archeological sites.

I'm proud that this sampling of Nevada geography not only creates a positive perception but also provides a critical foundation for those of us in Congress now working on wilderness legislation to protect Nevada lands for generations to come.

REVIEW OF 1960 ARTICLE SHOWS SITUATION IN SOUTH AFRICA HAS WORSENED

(Mr. DYMALLY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, more than 25 years ago I met a young soldier in the Army who was also a radio announcer for the U.S. Information Service and a writer. Twenty-five years ago he wrote about the oppression and the repression in South Africa. The magazine in which his article appeared became defunct and the article was lost. Much to my delight, he sent me a copy of the article last week.

Have things changed in South Africa? Yes, they have gotten worse. The situation today in South Africa, with the oppression, the fascism, the racism, the bigotry, the hate, and the discrimination, is worse today than it was in 1960 when I met my friend, who is now the State senator from Watts that famous community in California. My friend and senator, Bill Green, pointed out that the situation in South Africa, Mr. Speaker, is worse now than it was when he wrote that article in 1960.

Today this House, indeed the Congress, will have an opportunity to send at least a first message, if not a strong message. I hope that all the Members on both sides of the aisle will join in sending that message, not only to South Africa but to the President of the United States. And I say to my friend, the gentleman from Georigia [Mr. GINGRICH], that the Congressional Black Caucus accepts his challenge to join in a bipartisan, biracial effort to bring about human rights all over the world, including South Africa.

A LOSS OF DIGNITY

(Mr. FRANK asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat surprised that among the momentous issues we were to talk about today was the accusation that the Doorkeeper had hurt the feelings of some Members on the minority side. I believe it would be a mistake for people to accept the assertion that some impropriety had been committed because the Doorkeeper characterized certain amendments. As I heard the characterization, I would agree that it was less than accurate. It seemed to me excessively flattering.

I am a little surprised that some of the Members on the other side who are great believers in very vigorous debate and who are not always averse to imputing mistakes to people on the other side can be so sensitive when people respond. It seems to me that sensitivity ought not to be a one-way street. I would just remind my colleagues to muse on the general principle that one rarely looks more ridiculous than when one is excessively concerned about one's dignity.

Mr. Speaker, the principle of open and free debate is a very important one, and it seems to me it ought even to extend to the Doorkeeper of this institution.

HOUSE ARREST OF KIM DAE JUNG

(Mr. PEASE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, this week Kim Dae Jung has been placed under house arrest, just days before the new Democratic Party is scheduled to hold its political convention in South Korea. This cynical display of power by the Government of South Korea represents a serious setback to the ongoing effort to secure a restoration of basic human rights and democratic institutions in that country.

I commend my colleague, Congressman ED FEIGHAN, for leading the effort to protest the placement of Kim under house arrest. Hopefully, the Reagan administration will take appropriate action.

FURTHER SUPPORT FOR ENTERPRISE ZONES SOUGHT FROM THE PRESIDENT

(Mr. GARCIA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, yesterday my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JACK KEMP] and I once again introduced a bill that we have been sponsoring since the days of Jimmy Carter—The Urban Enterprise Zone Act. Last year, in the 98th Congress, we had 283 cosponsors. In the 99th Congress I believe we will probably get over 300 cosponsors.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that the President, who every year in his State of the Union Message, either asks the Speaker to give him enterprise zones as a birthday present or asks us as Members of Congress to work with him on this issue, will take an active role in seeing that this legislation is passed. I do not often agree with the President, but on this issue I do. I, therefore, hope that he will make every possible effort, using all his persuasive powers to help us pass an enterprise zone bill. I believe we can make good use of enterprise zones. In some States they are presently in place, and they are working without Federal taxes, without the benefit of the support of Congress and of this legislation. We certainly need something to cut back on the high unemployment in our inner cities.

COMMISSION ON THE U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BICENTENARY

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the resolution (H. Res. 249) establishing the Commission on the U.S. House of Representatives Bicentenary, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

Mr. ALEXANDER (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I reserve the right to object simply to make certain that I understand the procedure here. It is my understanding that this has been cleared by the minority?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, the gentleman is correct. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield and if I may respond further, the resolution is for the purpose of establishing a Commission on the Bicentenary of the U.S. House of Representatives. It has been cleared by the minority. There are no funds required for its implementation, and it is simply for the purpose of planning, directing, and consummating a program for the commemoration of the bicentenary of the U.S. House of Representatives.

Mr. WALKER. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the gentleman's explanation, and I am particularly appreciative of his making the point that this is a resolution that requires no new funding, and that in fact any expenses that will be incurred from this will be out of the office for the bicentennial in the House of Representatives, and that that is previously appropriated money.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, the gentleman is correct. The Bicentenary Commission will be paid for and administered by funds and staff that are currently provided for.

Mr. WALKER. It is also my understanding that the representation on the Commission is equal between the majority and the minority in this particular instance?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Yes, it is equal, and it is bipartisan in makeup.

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the original request of the gentleman from Arkansas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A PLEA TO THE PRESIDENT TO REPUDIATE OPPRESSION IN SOUTH AFRICA

(Mr. WHEAT asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, last week I joined with my colleagues in the Congressional Black Caucus in sending a telegram to the President of the United States requesting an urgent meeting on the crisis in South Africa. Mr. President, we sought that meeting to bring you a message of deep concern about the deteriorating situation in that troubled country.

Last night the conference committee on this body and of the other body endorsed that message and called upon the Congress to pass the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. Upon passage of that legislation, Mr. President, we will call upon you to carry our message to the world, and our message is a simple one: The United States will no longer condone oppression in South Africa.

While you are sincere in your efforts to engage the South African Government in constructive dialog, that Government and the rest of the world perceive constructive engagement as tacit American approval of oppressive practices in South Africa. Mr. President, even the mere perception that Americans would tolerate South African repression is morally repugnant, and we call upon you now to repudiate that offensive misperception.

THE INSANITY OF APARTHEID

(Mr. DELLUMS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Speaker, I rise this morning to join with all my colleagues who have taken the well to challenge the insanity of apartheid, the cruelty and oppression of the reality of what is taking place in South Africa at this very moment and to raise the point that a number of my distinguished colleagues, as well as this gentleman, have asked the President of the United States for a terribly important meeting to discuss this incredible issue.

Over the last several days we received a report that Mr. Botha of South Africa refused to meet with Bishop Desmond Tutu, but there are those of us who reside in this Chamber who have a compelling, obvious, yet not exclusive interest in what is taking place in South Africa, who have the right to expect more from our President.

We can understand ignoring Bishop Tutu in the context of the madness of South Africa, but this is obstensibly a democratic society.

The President of the United States, whether or not we agree ideologically, is the President of all the people and in my estimation has a moral, a political, and intellectual obligation to meet with all of the persons who are duly elected and respected representatives of major constituents in this country. The President has a profound obligation and, indeed, a responsibility to meet with us on this incredible issue.

USE OF OFFICIAL GOVERNMENT MAIL TO LOCATE MISSING CHILDREN

Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate bill (S. 1195) entitled "An Act to require that a portion of the mail of Congress and the executive branch include a photograph and biography of a missing child," with Senate amendments to the House amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments to the House amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments to the House amendments, as follows:

(2) Section 733 of title 44, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the second sentence of the second undesignated paragraph the following: "Franks may also contain information relating to missing children as provided in section 3220 of title 39.".

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TORRES). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, the minority has no objection.

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL SCHOOL-AGE CHILD CARE AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 60) to designate the week beginning September 1, 1985, as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, and I will not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. McKERNAN] who is the chief sponsor of House Joint Resolution 60.

(Mr. McKERNAN asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, every day 3 to 6 million children return home to an empty house after school. Single-parent families, two working parent families, are in fact a reality in this country. Over 50 percent of women with young children are in the work force today and therefore have child care needs.

This country needs to address our child care needs and we especially need to address the needs of those who return home to an empty house, so-called latch-key children. Especially those needs are children who return home to an empty house after school and also who need care before school.

I hope that the House will pass this resolution because I believe that by passing it we can call attention to what is a growing problem in this country through the designation of the first week of September as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week," and that will heighten the awareness of this growing national problem.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, with the permission of my colleague, the gentleman from Utah, I yield to my colleague, the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS].

Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as the chair of the Crisis Intervention Task Force of the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, I certainly do not object to this resolution, but applaud it, because it will be a great encouragement and help to all the people who are engaged in the very compelling business of child care in the United States.

I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. McKERNAN. Mr. Speaker, I just want to commend the gentlewoman from Louisiana for her work in the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families, on this important issue. It is one that we really highlighted in the last session of Congress in the Select Committee on Children, Youth and Families and it is one that I think her leadership has made a big difference in throughout the country, and I thank the gentlewoman for supporting this resolution.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 60

Whereas more than half of the children in the United States are in families in which both parents are in the work force;

Whereas more than one in five children in the United States are in a one-parent family;

Whereas changes in the composition of American families and the American work force have resulted in an increased demand for child care for children of all ages;

Whereas the demand for child care for school-age children has increased at a greater rate than the availability of school-age child care;

Whereas estimates show that millions of school-age children between the ages of six and thirteen, often referred to as latchkey children, may return alone after school to an empty house or in the supervision of a slightly older brother or sister;

Whereas research studies have indicated that children in self and sibling care run greater physical and psychological risks, including accidents and feelings of fear and loneliness, than children who are cared for by an adult;

Whereas the Congress has begun to examine the issue of child care and the role of Federal and State government, the private sector, and parents in providing child care;

Whereas the parents, communities, employers, and agencies serving youth that have recognized the shortage of adequate and affordable school-age child care have developed after school programs for children in their communities; and

Whereas many more parents, communities, employers, and agencies serving youth need to address the problems facing these children and to maximize the use of State and Federal resources in collaboration with these efforts: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning September 1, 1985, is hereby designated as "National School-Age Child Care Awareness Week" and the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate programs and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL DRUNK AND DRUGGED DRIVING AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 137) to designate the week of December 15, 1985, through December 21, 1985, as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awarness Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform that House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, as the chief sponsor, I would like to speak to it for just a moment.

Mr. Speaker, in 1981 I had the opportunity of going to the White House and talking to the President of the United States about the problem of drunk driving. I pointed out to him that 26,000 people a year died as a result of drunk driving and 450,000 people a year suffered because of bad backs, paraplegics, quadraplegics, and injuries such as that.

He picked up a memo and he penned a letter to Secretary of Transportation Lewis. Out of that came the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving, on which I had the privilege to sit with my colleague, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

We found a lot of things, Mr. Speaker, that were very interesting. We found that in America we do not take this too seriously. I notice today we are very serious about the problem in South Africa, and it truly is a problem, the problem in Chile and the problems in other areas, and they are truly problems; but here in America we seem to think it is all right to get ourselves up to a 0.05 blood alcohol count or 0.10, whatever it may be, getting in 2 tons of steel barreling down the road and kill 26,000 people per year.

We further found that the people in America who talk about this issue, especially our very respectful law enforcement people, have very little knowledge on how to recognize someone who is drinking and driving.

We found in this Commission that they actually use the archaic discovery methods of touching their nose, counting to 10 backward, doing one-legged pushups, and we find, and I say this very respectfully, that all over our 50 States they cannot identify a person who has been drinking and driving.

We further found, Mr. Speaker, that someone who gets in an S-turn with just a 0.05 blood alcohol count cannot make it. No one in America can make an S-turn with a 0.05 blood alcohol count.

We further found that all of our laws were to a 0.10 or 0.08. So we find in America that we are letting all these people loose every night to get in their cars with 2 tons of steel and go out and kill people. We can only recognize by archaic methods 26,000 of them that are killing people. It is absolutely amazing that we find this.

Out of this, however, Mr. Speaker, we were fortunate enough to have almost 40 States that have considered new drunk driving laws. Along came people who started things like Mothers Against Drunk Driving, Students Against Drunk Driving, Rid the Roads of Drunk Drivers, and fortunately we are starting to mitigate this problem in America.

If I may say in the most respectful terms, Mr. Speaker, I notice that every night we go to receptions around here and if people would carry in their wallets, as I do, and I am a teetotaler, that says, a card that says, "Know your capacity"—that says that one drink will bring you above a 0.05 and then we noticed that our colleagues and the rest of us from both Houses and the executive branch go to these receptions, we have a drink or they have a drink at every one of these, and then get in their cars and go out on the road.

I would assume that the vast majority of these people who should be an example to the world find themselves with those who actually would lead to it. I hope the good Lord blesses them as they go out on the roads, because fortunately it has not come back to haunt this body or the body next to it, because of their own capacity of handling intoxicating beverages.

It would seem to me, Mr. Speaker, if I may say so, that it really is not too bright to get in a car after having a few drinks. Can we not let somebody else drive us? Can we not take a taxi, and above all the laws which are merely speed bumps, what we really should do is, like our friends from Sweden who we talked to, on this Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving, have in our hearts and in our minds that we do not want to kill other Americans. If we get down to that, the laws absolutely do not mean a thing.

I would hope that we would realize that to drink and drive is absolutely stupid, as it is to take drugs and drive.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Joint Resolution 358, designating the week of December 15 through December 21 as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week." As an original cosponsor of this measure I wish to thank the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] and the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES] for introducing this important piece of legislaiton.

Drunk and drugged driving has risen to epidemic proportions. Over the past decade our country has witnessed the death and injury of millions of Americans; death and injury directly attributable to alcohol and/or drug abuse. This horrifying social cost is further compounded by the tremendous economic cost of over $20 billion each year. The tragic effect on our Nation's youth is especially alarming: drunk and drug-related driving is the leading cause of death of thousands of teenagers today.

As the ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Narcotics, I can attest to the select committee's involvement is not only the drug abuse problem, but the alcohol problem as well. Although the phrase "driving under the influence" is most often associated with alcohol, we must not ignore the fact that drug-related driving incidents are also an ever-increasing problem.

Drug use in our Nation has grown considerably, among both the young and old. While we will continue to crack down on drunk and drugged drives alike, there is no substitute for an increased awareness among our parents, our teachers, and children on the disasterous effects of drunk and drugged driving. In this regard, I would like to commend the gentleman from from Utah and my colleagues for establishing "Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week" each year since 1982 during the December holiday season.

The designation of National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week has a special significance at that time of year as the holiday season is a time of good will toward our neighbors and friends. Observance of this week will serve as a timely reminder and continue to draw attention to the serious effects of drunk and drugged driving.

Once again, I commend the gentleman for introducing House Joint Resolution 358 and urge my colleagues to fully support its adoption.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HANSEN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to also extend my commendation to the gentleman. I think this is a very important symbol of a horrendous thing that is taking place.

I have one of my former staff members who was hit by a drunk driver and her future fiance was killed. She is now in a kind of comatose state and has been for about 2 years. When you see the reality of how this affects a family, and everyone on the Hill who knew Mora, it just really hits home.

This kind of event happens to thousands of Americans every year, and indeed, hundreds every day, and I think that we really have to do something in our country to end this horrendous tragedy which takes more lives than I think any war we have ever participated in.

So I really want to congratulate you, and certainly I think we will pass this unanimously.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the kind words of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 137

Whereas traffic accidents cause more violent deaths in the United States than any other cause, approximately forty-four thousand in 1984;

Whereas traffic accidents cause thousands of serious injuries in the United States each year;

Whereas more than 60 per centum of drivers killed in single vehicle collisions and 45 per centum of all drivers fatally injured in 1984 had blood alcohol concentrations above the legal limit;

Whereas the United States Surgeon General has reported that life expectancy has risen for every age group over the past seventy-five years except for Americans fifteen to twenty-four years old, whose death rate, the leading cause of which is drunk driving, is higher now than it was twenty years ago;

Whereas the total societal cost of drunk driving has been estimated at over $24,000,000,000 per year, which does not include the human suffering that can never be measured;

Whereas there are increasing reports of driving after drug use and accidents involving drivers who have used marijuana or other illegal drugs;

Whereas driving after the use of therapeutic drugs, either alone or in combination with alcohol, contrary to the advice of physician, pharmacist, or manufacturer, may create a safety hazard on the roads;

Whereas more research is needed on the effect of drugs either alone or in combination with alcohol, on driving ability and the incidence of traffic accidents;

Whereas an increased public awareness of the gravity of the problem of drugged driving may warn drug users to refrain from driving and may stimulate interest in increasing necessary research on the effect of drugs on driving ability and the incidence of traffic accidents;

Whereas the public, particularly through the work of citizens groups, is demanding a solution to the problem of drunk and drugged driving;

Whereas the Presidential Commission on Drunk Driving, appointed to heighten public awareness and stimulate the pursuit of solutions, provided vital recommendations for remedies for the problem of drunk driving;

Whereas most States have appointed task forces to examine existing drunk driving programs and make recommendations for a renewed, comprehensive approach, and in many cases their recommendations are leading to enactment of new laws, along with stricter enforcement;

Whereas the best defense against the drunk or drugged driver is the use of safety belts and greater safety belt usage would increase the number of survivors of traffic accidents;

Whereas an increase in the public awareness of the problem of drunk and drugged driving may contribute to a change in society's attitude toward the drunk or drugged driver and help to sustain current efforts to develop comprehensive solutions at the State and local levels;

Whereas the Christmas and New Year holiday period, with more drivers on the roads and an increased number of social functions, is a particularly appropriate time to focus national attention on this critical problem;

Whereas designation of "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week" in each of the last three years stimulated many activities and programs by groups in both the private and public sectors aimed at curbing drunk and drugged driving in the high-risk Christmas and New Year holiday period and thereafter; and

Whereas the activities and programs during "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week" have heightened the awareness of the American public to the danger of drunk and drugged driving: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week of December 15, 1985, through December 21, 1985, is designated as "National Drunk and Drugged Driving Awareness Week" and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate activities.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL ADULT DAY CARE CENTER WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 229), designating the week beginning September 22, 1985, as "National Adult Day Care Center Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues know, I have long been committed to improving the quality of life for all people, both in the United States and abroad. Today, I am pleased to be able to give my support to the recognition of a program that improves the quality of life for our elderly and their families. I am proud to cosponsor House Joint Resolution 229, a bill to designate the week of September 22, 1985, as "National Adult Day Care Center Week." I thank the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HERTEL], for bringing this legislation before the House.

Adult day care is an organized program of structured activities designed to maintain or improve the physical, mental, and emotional functioning of frail, dependent, or isolated persons. Adult day care is a cost-effective alternative that can prevent premature or inappropriate institutionalization, provide respite to caregivers, curtail health care costs, and enable individuals to maintain their independence.

Our Nation has been experiencing the aging of our population. With improved nutrition and medical technology, more people are living longer. The group of persons aged 60 and older is the largest growing segment of our population. With this "graying of America" has come the need to provide support for those no longer able to be totally independent.

At the same time, we seem to be overburdened with health care and service costs. It is important, therefore, that we find innovative and cost-effective ways to provide the services needed by the people of this great country, especially our elderly. Day care programs for adults may be one way to accomplish this.

Adult day care programs provide various activities and services in a social group setting. These may include exercise; health and mental health screening; assistance with improving skills needed to perform activities of daily living, including the provision of occupational and physical therapy; reality orientation; and discussion group exercises to maintain or improve communication skills and memory. Nutritious, well-balanced meals are also provided.

An important function of adult day care is to prevent or delay costly institutionalization and to maintain independence. Many of our elderly have been prematurely or inappropriately placed in an institutional, long-term care facility, such as a nursing home, simply because the individual and his or her family had no alternative. More than 25 percent of those in nursing homes do not need to be there. Adult day care programs enable individuals to maintain their independent living by providing a safe, professional environment for them to spend 6 to 10 hours during the day. Adult day care also provides an important respite for families who want to care for their elderly relatives, but are hesitant to leave them alone during the day. A structured, supportive day program enables families to care for their elderly relatives at home while relieving the time and financial burden that home or institutional care places on family members. Many centers also offer support groups and other programs for the caregivers of the elderly. Day care is a welcome alternative to institutionalization for many individuals and their families.

According to the National Institute on Adult Day Care [NIAD], many activities will be held during "National Adult Day Care Center Week." The approximately 1,000 adult day care centers nationwide will be providing educational programs and holding open houses and ceremonies to increase the public's awareness about adult day care. Additionally, several new adult day care centers will be opening during the week of September 22.

I am proud to be able to say that one of the centers scheduled to open during "National Adult Day Care Center Week" is located in my 22d Congressional District of New York, which I am proud to represent. Homemaker Service of Orange County, Inc., a nonprofit organization, is scheduled to open its adult day care center in Middletown, NY, during the week of September 22. This program is an innovative combination of public and private resources working together to provide a needed service in a cost-effective manner, providing a savings to both the individuals and to the public. This program was initially funded through a grant by the Orange County Office for the Aging, and is now funded by a grant from the city of Middletown's Community Development Block Grant Program as well as through private sources. I am proud of the cooperative efforts made by the private and public sectors in my district and look forward to joining in the events marking "National Adult Day Care Center Week."

The theme selected by the National Institute on Adult Day Care is "adult day care: Rising to the Challenge." I encourage my colleagues to join in actively supporting "National Adult Day Care Center Week," to assist Adult Day Care programs to indeed be able to "Rise to the Challenge" of informing the public about this alternative long-term care program and improving the quality of life for all of our senior citizens.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Whereas there are 1000 adult day care centers nationwide providing a safe and positive environment to partially disabled adults and senior citizens in need of daytime assistance and supervision;

Whereas adult day care centers provide necessary health maintenance functions and medical care, including medication monitoring, therapies, and health education, and are operated by professional staffs who identify the need for additional health services and make appropriate referrals;

Whereas adult day care centers provide opportunities for social interaction to otherwise isolated individuals and assist them in attaining and maintaining a maximum level of independence; and

Whereas these centers offer relief to families who otherwise must care for disabled elderly persons on a twenty-four-hour-per-day basis: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the week beginning September 22, 1985, is designated "National Adult Day Care Center Week".

The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe that week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENSE OF CONGRESS COMMENDING MEDICARE ON ITS 20TH ANNIVERSARY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 9) expressing the sense of the Congress that Medicare be commended on its 20th anniversary for the program's success in protecting older Americans against the high cost of health care, and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation, I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GILMAN].

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 9, recognizing the 20th anniversary of the Medicare Program. As a cosponsor of this measure, I commend the gentleman from Florida, the distinguished chairman of the Select Committee on Aging, Mr. PEPPER, for introducing the House companion bill, House Concurrent Resolution 88. I urge my colleagues to join in supporting this measure which demonstrates our firm commitment to maintaining the integrity of the Medicare Program.

Since the inception of the Medicare Program 20 years ago, countless individuals—the infirmed, the elderly, and the disabled, have enjoyed protection under this program. Indeed, over 28 million older persons and 3 million disabled individuals make Medicare the single largest personal health care financing program in the United States. Hundreds of thousands of physicians and more than 20,000 hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies, labs, and clinics participate in the Medicare Program.

In more recent years the Medicare Program has had to respond to both the growing elderly population in this country and to the rising health care costs. Congress has been able to address in part, the changing face of health care in this Nation by increasing Medicare benefits to include hospice and health maintenance organization [HMO's] services. Our task is, however, by no means finished. Throughout this Congress, as we continue in the fiscal year 1986 budget process, and as we attempt to enact significant deficit reduction measures, we must make the continued solvency of the Medicare Program our top priority. I believe that efforts to control escalating health care costs while improving the delivery of health care, is one of the most difficult and pressing dilemmas facing this Congress. By adopting this resolution we will be recognizing the enormous success of this program while reaffirming our commitment to the elderly and the disabled to protect their continued access to quality health care.

Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to commemorate the 20th anniversary of the Medicare Program by adopting Senate Concurrent Resolution 9.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 9

Whereas Congress authorized Medicare in 1965 under title XVIII of the Social Security Act to consist of hospital insurance and supplemental medical insurance;

Whereas Medicare has contributed immeasurably to the security, improved health and extended longevity of older Americans;

Whereas Medicare provides health insurance coverage to thirty-one million aged and disabled persons, and is the largest personal health care financing program in the United States;

Whereas over half of all physicians serve Medicare patients, and over twenty thousand organizations—hospitals, nursing homes, home health agencies, labs, and clinics participate in Medicare;

Whereas Medicare is one of the most vitally important and successful programs in the history of the United States, without which many older Americans could not afford basic health care; and

Whereas one of the greatest social issues facing our Nation today is maintaining the integrity of Medicare to ensure the health and well-being of all older Americans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That Medicare be commended on its twentieth anniversary for the program's success in helping to protect older Americans against the high cost of health care.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

RECOGNIZING 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF RURAL ELECTRIFICATION PROGRAM

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 144), recognizing the 50th anniversary of the Rural Electrification Program, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 144

Whereas in 1935, most of rural America did not have electric lighting—nine out of ten farms were without central station electricity;

Whereas fifty years ago, on May 11, 1935, President Franklin D. Roosevelt created the Rural Electrification Administration (REA) by signing Executive Order 7037;

Whereas since 1936, Congress has passed and the President has signed legislation strengthening the role of the Rural Electrification Administration in assisting rural electric systems to ease the burdens of farm labor and meet the power needs of America's farmers, ranchers, and rural residents;

Whereas today, rural United States has electric power, nearly one thousand membership-owned rural electric systems provide service to about twenty-five million people in forty-six States, Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands;

Whereas Rural Electrification Administration borrowers have established a record of responsibility in meeting their repayment obligations unmatched in any other Federal program of financial assistance;

Whereas since 1961 Rural Electrification Administration borrowers have helped establish and expand more than twenty thousand commercial and industrial enterprises and community facilities that have created nearly one million new jobs; and

Whereas the Rural Electrification Administration, its borrowers, and rural people have formed a partnership that has brought electric power to those who live off the main roads and outside of the cities, thereby permitting them more fully to contribute to and share in the American dream: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the Sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) the Rural Electrification Program must continue to provide financing and technical assistance at reasonable cost to ensure that the modern living standards of rural Americans and the quality of their communities are preserved through access to reliable and competitively priced electricity;

(2) the fiftieth anniversary of the creation of the Rural Electrification Administration and the Rural Electrification Program should be recognized; and

(3) the people of the United States and Federal and State governmental agencies are encouraged to commemorate, on the occasion of the fiftieth anniversary of the Rural Electrification Administration, the past accomplishments and continuing achievements of America's Rural Electrification Program with appropriate ceremonies and activities paying tribute to the thousands of rural electrification leaders throughout the Nation, who, in partnership with their Government, have made the United States Rural Electrification Program the symbol of hope and a model of excellence for other nations throughout the world.

● Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Resolution 144, recognizing the 50th anniversary year of the Rural Electrification Program. This resolution, which I introduced with the Honorable EDWARD R. MADIGAN, ranking minority member of the Committee on Agriculture, has the support of 147 cosponsors. The resolution, as amended, was unanimously approved by the Committee on Agriculture on July 30, 1985.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute that I offer was adopted unanimously by the Committee on Agriculture. It differs from the resolution as originally introduced only to reflect the fact that the 50th anniversary date of the Rural Electrification Program has already passed—it was observed on May 11, 1985. This amendment does not alter the meaning nor the intent of the original resolution.

It was 50 years ago that President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed an Executive order creating the Rural Electrification Administration. In those 50 years, the REA has worked with rural residents across the United States to better the quality of life of farm families and other rural residents through its Rural Electrification Program.

The Rural Electrification Program has an impressive record of accomplishments over the past 50 years. By working cooperatively with the REA, rural residents have built nearly 1,000 member-owned rural electric systems that provide electric power to about 25 million people in 46 States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands. In the process, the REA has created nearly 1 million jobs, and improved the living standards of millions of rural Americans.

As important as the past accomplishments of the Rural Electrification Program, however, is the work ahead. Low commodity prices, high real interest rates, plummeting land values, heavy debt loads, and declining export markets have brought serious economic problems to farm families and small towns across rural America. Reasonably priced electric power is an important farm input. The Rural Electrification Program can continue to make electricity available to the American farmer at a reasonable cost, through the Nation's rural electric cooperatives.

House Resolution 144 expresses the sense of the House of Representatives that the Rural Electrification Program must continue to provide reasonably priced financing and technical assistance for rural electric systems that serve rural residents. I urge my colleagues to join me in commending the Rural Electrification Program for 50 years of service to rural America, and in expressing our support for the program's continued success.●

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. DE LA GARZA

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. DE LA GARZA: Strike out the text of the preamble and the resolution and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Whereas today, rural United States has electric power, and nearly one thousand membership-owned rural electric systems provide service to about twenty-five million people in forty-six States, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and the Virgin Islands;

Whereas Rural Electrification Administration borrowers have established a record of responsibility in meeting their repayment obligations unmatched in any other Federal program of financial assistance;

Whereas since 1961, Rural Electrification Administration borrowers have helped establish and expand more than twenty thousand commercial and industrial enterprises and community facilities in rural areas that have created nearly one million new jobs; and

Mr. DE LA GARZA (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DE LA GARZA].

The amendment in the nature of a substitute was agreed to.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL FAMILY WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 31) to designate the week of November 24 through November 30, 1985, as "National Family Week," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but I simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker and colleagues, I thank the chairman and the ranking Member for bringing this issue up.

Back in 1970, a constituent of mine who was a schoolteacher, and still is a schoolteacher but not a constituent any longer, brought the idea of observing National Family Week to me. I introduced it in that year, and I have been introducing it every year since 1970. In fact, this year it is the only observation that I have introduced or cosponsored.

The purpose of the National Family Week is simple: It sets aside a specific time during the year to pay homage to the one institution which has given so much meaning to human life and provided a stable structure to our society. It recognizes the importance of the family as the foundation of American life and the fundamental role the family has played in securing those values upon which our Nation was founded.

Today, more than ever, recognition of the American family is important.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that we cannot make this permanent legislation because of an agreement that the committee has to not consider these for payment status. Since 1972 the President has proclaimed the week including Thanksgiving, which is most appropriate, in my judgment, as National Family Week as a tribute to the American family.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this legislation which is most appropriate.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 31

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized and requested to issue a proclamation designating the week of November 24, 1985, through November 30, 1985, as "National Family Week", and inviting the Governors of the several States, the chief officials of local governments, and the people of the United States to observe such week with appropriate ceremonies and activities.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARCIA: Amend line 5 by inserting after "November 30, 1985," "and the week of November 23, 1986, through November 29, 1986,".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TITLE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARCIA

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Title amendment offered by Mr. GARCIA: Amend title so as to read: "Joint resolution to designate the week of November 24 through November 30, 1985, and the week of November 23 through November 29, 1986, as 'National Family Week'."

The title amendment was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

NATIONAL NEIGHBORHOOD CRIME WATCH DAY

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 168) designating August 13, 1985, as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day," and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution as follows:

S.J. RES. 168

Whereas neighborhood crime is of continuing concern to the American people;

Whereas the fight against neighborhood crime requires people to work together in cooperation with law enforcement officials;

Whereas neighborhood crime watch organizations are effective at promoting awareness about, and the participation of volunteers in, crime prevention activities at the local level; and

Whereas citizens across America will soon take part in a "National Night Out", a unique crime prevention event which will demonstrate the importance and effectiveness of community participation in crime prevention efforts by having people spend the period from 8 to 9 o'clock postmeridian on August 13, 1985, with their neighbors in front of their homes: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That August 13, 1985, is designated as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day", and the President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation calling upon the people of the United States to observe such day with appropriate programs, ceremonies, and activities.

Mr. COUGHLIN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Joint Resolution 168 designating August 13, 1985 as "National Neighborhood Crime Watch Day." It is the Senate companion to House Joint Resolution 312 which I introduced earlier this year.

I am pleased that the Congress, by enacting this joint resolution, will be recognizing both the effectiveness and the growth of local crime watch organizations throughout the Nation.

The National Association of Town Watch is a national organization whose purpose is to promote and assist local crime prevention groups which work in cooperation with law enforcement officials. The National Association of Town Watch is sponsoring "National Night Out" on August 13, 1985, when neighbors are urged to spend the hour of 8–9 p.m. on their lawns, porches, and steps in front of their homes as a demonstration of community support for volunteer efforts to reduce crime in their neighborhoods. It is based on the idea that neighbors looking out for one another where they live and work is the most effective form of crime prevention.

A similar event last year successfully highlighted the efforts of local crime prevention programs, generated support for crime watch activities, and signaled to criminals that neighborhoods are pulling together to fight crime.

I urge that the resolution be passed.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SOCIAL SECURITY DAY AND SOCIAL SECURITY WEEK

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service be discharged from further consideration of the joint resolution (H.J. Res. 300) designating August 14, 1985, as "Social Security Day," and the week of August 11, 1985, through August 17, 1985, as "Social Security Week", and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not object, but simply would like to inform the House that the minority has no objection to the legislation now being considered.

Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to my good friend, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BUSTAMANTE].

Mr. BUSTAMANTE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Utah for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge passage of House Joint Resolution 300, which declares August 14, 1985 as "Social Security Day" and the week of August 11-17, 1985, as "Social Security Week." I thank the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA] and the gentleman from Utah [Mr. HANSEN] for their support on this resolution.

On August 14, 1935, President Franklin Delano Roosevelt signed the Social Security Act into law. Fifty years later, Social Security is a vital system. In 1984 at least 36 million people received benefits under the Social Security Act. At the same time, more than 116 million workers continue to contribute over $200 billion annually to the Social Security trust funds.

Social Security is the most significant legislative and social achievement of the 20th century. Each time we use our Social Security number, we are reminded of how much Social Security has become a part of our lives.

House Joint Resolution 300 has received the endorsement of the National Gray Panthers, the National Association of Area Agencies on Aging and the National Association of State Units on Aging. These organizations and others across the country are planning their own programs for the August 14 anniversary. The Social Security Administration has also scheduled a week-long program of activities. Furthermore, the governors of a dozen States, including my State of Texas, have issued proclamations declaring August 11-17 as "Social Security Week."

A congressional resolution will enhance this anniversary celebration. I thank my colleagues for their support, and I hope this golden anniversary will be a memorable occasion.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, under my reservation of objection, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COUGHLIN].

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

H.J. RES. 300

Whereas the original Social Security Act, which was signed into law by President Franklin Delano Roosevelt on August 14, 1935, represents the most significant social and legislative achievement of the 20th century;

Whereas, in the words of President Roosevelt, the Social Security Act represents the cornerstone of the Nation's commitment "to protect Americans from the hazards and vicissitudes of life";

Whereas basic income security under the Social Security Act has been provided to the elderly since 1935, to their survivors and dependents since 1939, and to disabled workers since 1956, and has included medical insurance coverage of the elderly and the disabled since 1965;

Whereas, in 1984, at least 36,000,000 people received benefits under the Social Security Act;

Whereas more than 116,000,000 workers jointly contributed over $200,000,000,000 annually to the Social Security Trust Funds;

Whereas, before the enactment of the Social Security Act, two-thirds of our Nation's elderly Americans had no means of support, except that which could be obtained from their friends, families, and private charities; and

Whereas, because of the protections of the Social Security Act more than 85 percent of elderly Americans have incomes above the poverty line and 14,000,000 other Americans who would otherwise have incomes below the poverty line have incomes above it: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) August 14, 1985, is designated as "Social Security Day", and the week of August 11, 1985, through August 17, 1985, is designated as "Social Security Week".

(b) The President is authorized and requested to issue a proclamation—

(1) commemorating August 14, 1985, as the 50th anniversary of the signing into law of the Social Security Act; and

(2) calling upon the people of the United States to observe the week of August 11, 1985, through August 17, 1985, with appropriate, ceremonies, and activities.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Joint Resolution 300, just passed, as well as on the commemorative legislation passed today, including House Resolution 144.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2068, FOREIGN RELATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEARS 1986 AND 1987

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the order of the House of Thursday, July 25, 1985, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, and ask unanimous consent that the statement of managers be read in lieu of the report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the statement.

(For conference report and statement, see proceedings of the House of July 30, 1985, at page H6812.)

Mr. MICA (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the statement be considered as read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA].

Mr. MICA. Today we bring to the floor the conference report on the Foreign Relations Authorization Act, known in this body as the State Department authorization. It has within it security for U.S. embassies and our personnel abroad, U.S. Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and other foreign affairs activities.

Mr. Speaker, I would like my colleages to know that, of course, we passed a freeze on this legislation when it moved through this body some months ago. I think they would be proud to know that not only has that freeze been maintained in this conference report, but we are $200 million, over a 2-year period, below that freeze figure.

I think we still carry out the vital functions of the State Department and related agencies and activities.

Some of the major provisions in the bill include diplomatic security, of course, some legislative initiatives regarding secure actions on fraud, visa, passport, and the like, and trying to strengthen our efforts to combat illegal and illicit drugs.

Mr. Speaker, we have a number of other items in the bill, but suffice it to say this: We have worked out some 95, I believe it was over 100 amendments in contention, have come up to an agreement that I think all sides have come to approve.

The other body has already approved this legislation. I would like to commend the other body and its chairman for the diligent work they have done on this legislation, and the staff, to take 100 amendments in contention and work it out with as little trouble was really quite a feat in that time.

Also, I would like to commend my ranking minority member, Ms. SNOWE, for the work that she has done; the Foreign Affairs Committee staff for the fine job they have done; in particular the leadership of our chairman, Congressman FASCELL of Florida, the tremendous job he has done.

I think this is the smoothest and the best approach we have seen in a number of years on this legislation, and I am very proud to present it to the House in this fashion.

Mr. Speaker, today we bring to the floor the conference report on the Foreign Relations Authorization Act which provides funding authority for the Department of State, security for the U.S. embassies and personnel abroad, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and other related foreign affairs activities.

The conference substitute is approximately $200 million under the House-passed freeze level for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

Some of the major provisions of the bill include:

Greater funding of security to our diplomats;

New legislative authorities to strengthen counter-espionage efforts;

Further strengthening of efforts to combat illicit drugs;

Funding to speed modernization of broadcasting facilities of the Voice of America and Radio Free Europe/Radio Liberty;

New authority for a scholarship program for undergraduate students from developing countries designed to counter Soviet efforts particularly in the Western Hemisphere; and

New arms control initiatives, including a 2-year authorization for the arms control and disarmament agency.

I want to commend the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee in the other body and his staff for their exhaustive efforts and their spirit of cooperation. I would also like to thank our House Foreign Affairs staff for their efforts over the last few weeks, and I would particularly like to thank the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the full committee, Mr. FASCELL, for his guidance in managing this bill.

Mr. Speaker, I will not belabor the discussion, but urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

Several technical problems have been discovered in the conference report since it was filed last night.

Although section 113 reflects a change in the date by which the UNHCR is directed to comply with the section's specified audit, that new date is not reflected in the managers' statement. It was also the intent of the managers that the conference report language specify that the term "independent consultancy" as used in the bill, means a recognized, management consulting firm which is independent from the United Nations.

The conference report also indicates that the House provision establishing a commission in the Department of State to investigate Soviet and international Communist behavior has been accepted by the conference committee. Instead, it is the understanding of the conference committee that State Department's Bureau of Intelligence and Research will perform the study.

In section 812, entitled "Japan-United States Security Relationship," the word "should" in subsection 812(c) was intended to read as "shall."

In addition, in section 813(b) of the bill entitled, "Diplomatic Equivalence and Reciprocity," the reporting requirement is stated as a "sense of the Congress." The committee of conference intended that the Secretary of State and the Attorney General shall prepare a report for the Congress pursuant to section 813, and that the sense of the Congress phrase be deleted.

Section 150(c) was intended to provide that the nomination, appointment, and initiation of the new Office of Inspector General would be accomplished, or substantial progress made on or before 6 months after the date of enactment of this act. This would coincide with the report requirement in subsection (c). It is recognized that, during this period of time, the Department would continue to perform inspection functions under existing law, that is under section 209 of the Foreign Service Act.

After negotiations of the managers on a provision entitled, "Employees of the United Nations," dealing with the extent to which international civil servants employed by the United Nations are required to return all or part of their salaries to their respective governments, an error was made in recording the agreement on subsection (c). Section 151(c) of the legislation should now read: (c) reduction in contribution if substantial progress not made.—If the Secretary of State determines pursuant to subsection (b) that substantial progress has not been made in correcting this practice, the United States shall thereafter reduce the amount of its annual assessed contribution to the United Nations by the amount of that contribution which is the U.S. proportionate share of the salaries of those international civil servants employed by the United Nations who are returning any portion of their salaries to their respective governments.

I would also note that the conferees share in the concern over the worsening U.S. trade deficit, particularly the imbalance in trade between the United States and Japan. We do not want this problem exacerbated in the area of air-freight services. We believe that the viability of U.S.-flag-carrier freighter services is essential to the development of U.S. exports and to our national defense through the Civil Reserve Air Fleet Program.

In particular, the conferees are aware that the Japanese recently received valuable additional air-freight rights in the course of bilateral negotiations. The conferees request that no further expansion of Japanese access to U.S. air-freight markets occurs during the period covered by this authorization in order to enable the U.S. Government to state a clearly defined policy on international air-freight service. That policy statement shall encompass the already established congressionally mandated goals for U.S. air-freight service and shall be formulated jointly and submitted to the appropriate committees of Congress by the Departments of State, Commerce and Transportation, and the U.S. Trade Representative.

The conference report as printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD also contains a sentence on page H6837 relating to employees of the United Nations which reads as follows: "The conference substitute does not make mandatory a reduction in the U.S. contribution to the United Nations." It was the intent of the managers that this sentence be deleted from the conference report.

Mr. HAWKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MICA. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida some questions of clarification.

It is my understanding that language under sections 112 and 118 of the conference agreement will permit the Secretary of State the descretion to make determinations respecting the applicability of section 2(f) of the State Department Basic Authorities Act and any other law administered by the Secretary of State to individuals employed by contract to perform personal services abroad.

The Committee on Education and Labor is concerned that the language "any other law administered by the Secretary" could be construed to grant the Secretary of State authority to decide questions of eligibility of such individuals for medical and disability benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act [FECA].

Is it your understanding that the authority to decide such questions is exclusively that of the Secretary of Labor?

Mr. MICA. The distinguished Chairman is absolutely correct. We have discussed that, and the answer is yes.

Mr. HAWKINS. If the gentleman will yield further, is it also your understanding that in no way can the language in sections 112 and 118 of the conference report be construed to affect the Secretary of Labor's existing authority under FECA to determine questions involving an individual's employment relationship with the U.S. Government?

Mr. MICA. The Chairman is correct, yes.

Mr. HAWKINS. Can we, therefore, conclude that the language as expressed in the conference agreement is consistent with the position of the House?

Mr. MICA. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. HAWKINS. Can we also conclude that the conference agreement is consistent with the recommendations contained in Secretary Brock's letter of July 29, 1985, to the chairman, Mr. FASCELL, and the ranking Republican member, Mr. BROOMFIELD?

Mr. MICA. Yes, Mr. Chairman; that is also correct. That is with respect to the provisions in the FECA.

Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would ask that that letter be included in the RECORD. It is my understanding that a letter from the Secretary of State regarding this matter is en route and is consistent with the language of the conference agreement.

Mr. MICA. Yes; that is also my understanding.

Mr. HAWKINS. I would ask that this letter also be included in the RECORD upon its arrival. I thank the gentleman for this clarification.

The letters follow:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
SECRETARY OF LABOR,
Washington, DC, July 29, 1985.

Hon. DANTE B. FASCELL,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: This is to request that the House conferees agree to an amendment on H.R. 2068, a bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the United States Information Agency and the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes. The amendment would be consistent with what we believe to be the intent of the House in adopting two provisions concerning the availability of Federal workers' compensation benefits for persons hired pursuant to personal service contracts under authority created by this legislation. By separate letter we are requesting that the Senate conferees recede to the House with the same amendment.

This action by the conferees is necessary in order to prevent the bill from establishing an unfortunate precedent for coverage under the Federal Employees' Compensation Act (FECA). FECA provides workers' compensation benefits to Federal employees and persons who are deemed to have an employment-type-relationship with the Federal Government. Sections 110 and 115(b)(3) of the Senate substitute, however, would go beyond this current FECA approach by explicitly providing benefits for individuals who have no employment-type relationship with the Federal Government. Specifically, the Senate substitute would make FECA benefits available to independent contractors who have entered into business relationships with U.S. missions abroad whenever any such contractor is injured on the job. This would not only be contrary to the intent of the FECA, but also open the door to extention of the program to cover other independent contractors, both within the U.S. and abroad.

The House bill contains language that was intended to solve this problem. Even though we believe that the intent of the House is clear, the text of the House provisions seems to indicate that those hired under contract authority are not Federal employees for any purpose, including FECA, regardless of the nature of their actual employment relationship with the Federal Government under traditional legal concepts. Accordingly, we recommend that the conferees accede to the position of the House in this matter, but accept an amendment of the House provisions to help ensure that the intent of the House is properly effectuated.

A copy of appropriate amendments is enclosed. The amendments would use language first suggested by the Administration in S. 659. The language is identical to that used in connection with personal service contract authority in the Foreign Assistance Act (22 U.S.C. 2396(a)(3)). The amendments state that personnel hired under the personal service contracts in question are not Federal employees with respect to laws administered by the Office of Personnel Management. By not specifying the status of these personnel under FECA, which is adminstered by the Department of Labor, it allows this Department to determine—as it has for many years in similar situations—whether an individual has the necessary employment relationship with the Federal Government to establish FECA coverage.

The amendments would also affect the application of the provisions in question to the Federal Tort Claims Act (FTCA). Both the House bill and Senate substitute deal with FTCA coverage in connection with the personal service contracts involved in the same manner as they deal with FECA coverage. Our proposed amendments would, as with FECA, allow case-by-case determinations of employment status for FTCA purposes.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

The Office of Management and Budget advises that it has no objection to the submission of this letter to the Congress.

Very truly yours,

WILLIAM E. BROCK.

Hon. WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD,
Ranking Minority Member, Committee on Foreign Affairs, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: This is to request that the House conferees agree to an amendment on H.R. 2068, a bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the United States Information Agency and the Board of International Broadcasting, and for other purposes. U.S. Department of State,
Washington, DC, August 7, 1985.

Hon. AUGUSTUS HAWKINS,
CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Dear Mr. Chairman: In connection with the pending enactment of H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization bill for FY 86-87, I would like to clarify our understanding as to the intent and effect of sections 112 and 118 of the bill.

Sections 112 and 118 concern the overseas contracting authority of the Secretary of State. It is the position of the Administration—and we understand that this position is consistent with that of the managers of the bill for the House of Representatives and the Senate—that neither sections 112 or 118 contained in the Conference Report may be construed so as to affect the Secretary of Labor's existing authority under the Federal Employees Compensation Act to determine questions involving the employment relationship of any individual with the United States Government and the application of any benefits under that act to any such individual. It is further understood by the Administration that the terms "any other law administered by the Secretary (of State)" may not be construed, and is not intended to grant the Secretary of State any authority to decide questions of eligibility of such individuals for medical and disability benefits under the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

In addition, the Department of State is in full accord with Secretary Brock's letter of July 29, 1985 on the same subject with respect to the Federal Employees Compensation Act.

I would appreciate it if you could make this letter a matter of record in connection with the enactment of this measure.

With best wishes,

Sincerely,

WILLIAM L. BALL III,
Assistant Secretary
Legislative and Intergovernmental Affairs.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman from Florida, the chairman of the Subcommittee on International Operations, the gentlewoman from Maine, the ranking minority member, and the other members of the subcommittee, all of whom were conferees, for the outstanding job they did in handling this complex legislation so adroitly, first in the House and then in conference.

Agreement on this major legislation where there were more than 90 differences between the House and Senate versions is another strong indication of congressional determination to work in a bipartisan manner to assure that the views of Congress are taken into account in the shaping of our national security policies.

Increasingly America's security and our economic welfare are linked to events around the globe. We have no choice other than full involvement in world affairs. To be successful the United States must maintain a strong, first-rate diplomatic establishment just as we sustain a strong military.

Congressman DAN MICA, chairman of our International Operations Subcommittee, and his colleagues on the subcommittee have done an outstanding job in crafting legislation which will assure that the President has the kind of foreign policy instruments needed to protect and promote American interests abroad. I also want to commend my counterpart, Senator RICHARD LUGAR, for the vigorous leadership he has displayed in assuring that both this bill and the foreign aid bill will soon be law.

I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Senate and the House, and in particular the two subcommittee chairmen, the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER], and the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], as well as the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], for their successful effort to establish in this legislation a clear statutory basis for international telecommunications satellite policy. This provision assures that, as the international telecommunications networks enters upon a newly competitive era, the United States will firmly support policies that assure the continued viability of Intelsat. Intelsat has served well U.S. national and foreign policy interests since it was created by the Communications Satellite Act of 1962, and this provision will assure that it will continue to be able to do so.

Finally, I would like to thank the members of the full committee staff and the staff of the International Operations Subcommittee for the excellent job they did in assisting us with this very important legislation.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I join with my colleague from Florida in urging the House to adopt the conference report for the State Department authorization, and I want to take this opportunity to commend him for his excellent leadership on this legislation. He has managed this legislation in a fair, efficient manner during the entire process, from subcommittee hearings through the resolution of over 90 differences in conference. I also would note for the Members of the House the speed with which this legislation has moved through the legislative process. This authorization, along with the foreign aid bill, are the first major authorizations to be passed in final form. I think all the members of the full Foreign Affairs Committee, particularly our chairman and ranking Republican, deserve considerable credit for the work they have done.

I would also like to thank my colleagues on the International Operations Subcommittee for their valuable contribution. Each of the members played an important role in the development of this authorization, and it was because of their efforts that we have before the House legislation that should receive your strong support. And I should not go on without also praising the efforts of our staff. Their work over the past 2 weeks is responsible for what was certainly the most cooperative and productive conference I have ever experienced.

At every stage of this bill's progress through the House, those involved have worked together in a genuine spirit of cooperation and compromise. I am pleased to say that that process continued during conference. The conference report we have before us now represents a fair compromise with the other body, contains a number of important new initiatives, and comes in below a freeze from last years appropriations,

Unlike the foreign aid bill, the issues contained in the State Department authorization do not create headlines. But while the foreign aid bill is Congress' strategic input into U.S. foreign policy, the State Department authorization deals with the tactical nuts and bolts of foreign policy. Through the State Department authorization, Congress has great influence on the structure and direction of U.S. foreign policy. This bill authorizes appropriations, and establishes policies for a wide array of bodies, such as the State Department, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and a range of international organizations.

Expenses and fiscal constraints have been constantly in our minds as we have worked to fashion this bill. The conference report is $70 million below fiscal year 1985's appropriated level. We achieved these reductions even while maintaining the important modernization programs of Voice of America, Radio Free Europe, and Radio Liberty.

The heart of the bill, of course, is authorization for the basic functions of the Department of State. Although the State Department is the smallest of the Federal departments, it is involved in many vital areas not usually thought of as core State Department activities. Such efforts range from international drug control, to combating terrorism, to control over the export of sensitive technology.

Many of the new initiatives contained in the bill were requested by the administration, but the legislation before us is very much an expression of congressional will. Probably the most significant new initiative in the bill is the first congressional action on the Inman panel report on overseas security, on which my colleague on the International Operations Subcommittee—the gentleman from Florida—served so ably. The improvements contained in this bill for security measures at the Department of State and U.S. missions abroad, is a reflection of the Inman panel's call for a new security ethic at the Department of State. But while the increased profile for embassy security in the bill is significant, the task before us is far more vast than can be fully addressed in this legislation. I can assure the Members of the House that we will continue working to implement the full scope of the Inman panel recommendations, so that U.S. missions abroad will cease to be easy targets for terrorist threats.

I would like to draw special attention to several other provisions relating to the State Department. During subcommittee hearings, the State Department requested that its permanent authority to provide funding for United Nations and Middle Eastern peacekeeping forces be abandoned. I, and other members of the Subcommittee, felt that such an action would move in the wrong direction. We believed that it would be more productive to bring Congress earlier into peacekeeping decisions by requiring yearly authorization for the appropriation of funds for U.N. peacekeeping forces. I am pleased that this provision was retained in the conference report.

This bill also addresses the thorny issue of reform in the U.N. budget process. For the first time, both bodies passed provisions dealing with needed financial reform in the United Nations, and the final legislation before us would give the President leverage to encourage real reform at the United Nations. Agreement was reached that if the United Nations has not instituted weighted voting on budget matters after two more General Assemblies, the United States would cut back its contribution to no more than 20 percent of the U.N. budget. Presently, the United States is assessed 25 percent of the U.N. budget, but we have one lone vote on deciding how much money the United Nations should spend, and how our money should be used. Let me assure my colleagues that this provision will carry out the intent of Congress.

The automatic majority of votes on spending proposals from countries that provide negligible funding, is a direct cause of the U.N.'s fiscal irresponsibility. Thanks to the efforts of my colleague from New York [Mr. SOLOMON], who offered the House provision on the United Nations, we are all aware of the excessive salaries and pensions of U.N. employees. What may not be as well known, is the number of needless projects and programs that get underway because of the current voting practices at the United Nations.

For instance, in the midst of the severe and tragic famine in Ethiopia, the United Nations decided to build a new multimillion-dollar conference center in Addis Ababa, the capital of Ethiopia. Of course, the United States is still expected to pay a quarter of the costs.

The provision in the conference report, however, should not be construed as anti-United Nations. This is made clear in the statement of managers, and in fact the bill authorizes a full U.S. contribution to the United Nations for the next 2 years in anticipation that progress will be made. There is a growing consensus on both sides of the aisle, in both bodies, and in the United Nations itself, that budget reform will be key to the continued health and viability of the United Nations.

Before moving away from the Department of State, I would like to mention that the conference report contains the basic language passed by the House expressing our concern over the murder of DEA agent Camarena in Mexico, and that country's slow progress in taking action against drug traffickers that endanger all U.S. citizens unfortunate enough to be mistaken for drug agents. A compromise was reached that would urge in the strongest terms that the State Department issue a travel advisory for the most dangerous areas of Mexico until the cases of a number of murdered and missing Americans are resolved.

Another major provision in the State Department bill authorizes funding for the U.S. Information Agency. Last year USIA began a much needed modernization program. The subcommittee looked carefully at actual outlays in this program at USIA, and decided that the administration's request for the agency could be scaled back without endangering the modernization program.

The bill also shifts a requested $3.3 million for USIA's new Worldnet Television Program to the Book Program, which has long suffered, the subcommittee believed, from insufficient funding. This shift provides for more controlled and purposeful growth in Worldnet.

The bill and the conference took several important actions relating to the National Endowment for Democracy, which has been controversial in the past. Subcommittee members and conferees approached this issue with the determination to arrive at agreements that all sides could support. We provide in this bill for full disclosure of the Endowment's actions as if it were a Government agency to reassure those who questioned its activities. We did this, however, without placing an undue burden on the small staff and resources of the National Endowment for Democracy. We reached agreement with the other body on support for the important activities of the party institutes, while ensuring that the institutes have no financial connection with the parties, and have no involvement in political campaigns, whether foreign or domestic.

A third major area in the legislation is authorization for the Board of International Broadcasting, which oversees the activities of Radio Liberty and Radio Free Europe. There are two significant provisions relating to the Board for International Broadcasting. One provision allows for the inauguration of a radio program to Soviet-occupied Afghanistan, if it proves technically feasible. Another provision urges increased broadcasting to the Jewish population in the Soviet Union, and calls for a study on the advisability of establishing a separate Radio Maccabee to broadcast to Soviet Jewry.

I urge my colleagues to vote for passage of this legislation, so that before we begin the August district work period, we can take some pride in having achieved final passage this week on the two key foreign affairs authorizations: The foreign aid bill, and the State Department authorization. This will have been a considerable accomplishment, especially considering the difficulties with the foreign aid bill over the past few years. Such an accomplishment would be due largely to the energy and spirit of cooperation of the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida, and the ranking Republican of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan.

In addition, I have nothing but praise for my colleague from Florida on the subcommittee for his leadership on this legislation. As the new chairman of the International Operations Subcommittee, the gentleman did an exemplary job managing the bill, and as the new ranking Republican on the subcommittee, I always found him cooperative, and most of all fair. I look forward to working with him on other issues to be considered by the subcommittee and on oversight of these agencies.

Mr. Speaker, we have brought the House a sound authorization bill, and I urge the Members to support the conference report.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I would just like to take a moment to thank the gentlewoman for the very fine compliments and say that the cooperation that we have seen on this subcommittee, the full committee and on the floor of this House I think has been unmatched this year, and it would not have been possible without your work and the work of the minority, and we are very pleased that we have come this far this way.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for his comments and also his exemplary leadership on this issue. Not only has he been cooperative but he has been fair in every respect.

So I would urge, Mr. Speaker, passage of this conference report.

Mr. Speaker, I now yield such time at he may consume to the distinguished ranking Republican on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD].

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I offer my support for the conference report before us. Thanks to the hard work of both Members and staff and the spirit of cooperation which has prevailed, the report before us was made possible. I urge my colleagues to adopt the conference report for the State Department authorization.

The conference report we have before us represent a fair compromise with the other body. The report contains a number of important new initiatives and has authorization levels below the 1985 freeze levels.

Through the State Department authorization, Congress has great influence on the direction of U.S. foreign policy.

This bill authorizes appropriations, and establishes policies for a wide array of bodies. These include the State Department, the U.S. Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and a range of international organizations.

Unlike the foreign aid bill, which was recently passed, the issues contained in the State Department authorization do not create headlines. The authorization, however, is critical in that it deals with the nuts and bolts of foreign policy.

It is commendable that fiscal constraints have been carefully considered in the crafting of this bill. The conference report is not only $150 million below the House-passed bill, but is $70 million below fiscal year 1985's appropriated levels as well.

Although the State Department is the smallest of the Federal department, it is involved in many vital areas not usually thought of as traditional diplomatic activities.

The most significant new intiative in the bill is the first congressional action on the Inman panel report on overseas security. The improvements contained in this bill for security measures at the Department of State and U.S. missions abroad are a reflection of the Inman panel's call for a new emphasis on security at the Department of State.

Another important aspect of the bill is a call for financial reform in the United Nation's budget process. A key provision allows for the inauguration of a radio program to Soviet-Occupied Afghanistan and urges increased broadcasting to the Jewish population in the Soviet Union.

I urge my colleagues to support this conference report and pass the State Department authorization.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker. I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. MCCAIN].

Mr. MCCAIN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentlelady from Maine [Ms. SNOWE] for yielding to me, and I would also like to echo her views concerning the outstanding work of our subcommittee chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], who has done yeoman-like work in order to achieve a bipartisan and widely supported piece of legislation.

I do not believe that it could have been possible without the active participation and leadership of Congresswoman SNOWE.

I would like to discuss the issue of the National Endowment for Democracy, which has been the subject of a great deal of scrutiny and debate over the last few years. Valid concerns have been raised.

And I believe that this bill addresses most of these concerns. Some of those concerns were allegations of improper grants to questionable organizations; possible use of NED funds for direct involvement in a country's political activities, and the question of funding for the Democratic and Republican Party institutes.

I believe that beginning at the subcommittee level, these issues were largely resolved. The USIA now has the right to audit the National Endowment for Democracy. Language setting out restrictions on grant activities including consultations with U.S. chiefs of missions overseas is included.

Specific language on limitations of the activities of the party institutes, a very important item, is in this bill.

The conference substitute leaves full coverage of the Freedom of Information Act in place, yet it relieves some of the Freedom of Information Act's burden.

The USIA will be responsible for all costs and litigation relating to requests for the release of information.

There was some questions about how the grants were made and the decisionmaking process that was involved. I believe that the Freedom of Information aspect of this bill will clear up a lot of controversy surrounding that issue.

The National Endowment for Democracy has an important role to play and has already made great strides in aiding the establishment of Democratic institutions in other countries. With the language included in this year's authorization, I believe we have made it more accountable to the American taxpayer, important changes have been made, and I believe they deserve our support.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCAIN. I yield to the gentlewoman from Maine.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I want to compliment the gentleman for his efforts in this area and I am pleased the conference committee accepted his recommendation and initiative. The gentleman from Arizona certainly has made a valuable contribution in developing the proper approach to opening up the files and providing access to the documents at the National Endowment for Democracy.

Mr. Speaker, the Members of the House should know the contribution the gentleman has made, because it was his insight that led to an appropriate solution without creating an undue burden on the agency. So I want to commend the gentleman for his leadership on this issue and also other issues within the jurisdiction of the subcommittee.

Mr. MCCAIN. I thank the gentlewoman from Maine.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SUNDQUIST. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to express my appreciation to the distinguished chairman of this committee, the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee as well as the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, our ranking member [Mr. BROOMFIELD], and the distinguished gentlewoman from Maine for their cooperation and their assistance and understanding. I wanted to express it not only to all of you but to the staff as well.

Ms. SNOWE. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. SNOWE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding, and I join my colleagues in commending the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA], our ranking minority member, the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE], and our distinguished chairman, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] and our ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], for bringing this measure to the floor in such an expeditious manner, similar to the expeditious manner in which we adopted the foreign aid bill just a few days ago.

I want to particularly commend our staffs for having worked out the numerous complex issues that were involved in this measure, saving valuable time on the floor and in conference.

This measure, Mr. Speaker, deals with some extremely important issues: Security of diplomatic posts, the National Endowment for Democracy, and particularly those sections relating to narcotics trafficking which strengthen the International Narcotics Matters Bureau's personnel system and increase interagency cooperation with respect to the sharing of information on drug traffickers. We also urge new extradition treaties and the creation of a new International Commission on Narcotics.

With regard to security, this conference report provides authority, as provided in the House, but not the Senate bill, for State Department special agents to make arrests and carry firearms as they discharge their duties. The Senate accepted House provisions for the protection of foreign missions.

We have in this conference report a requirement that the Secretary of State increase his efforts to negotiate updated extradition treaties relating to narcotics offenses.

The conference report also contains information on such issues as an earmark for expenses associated with certain games for the handicapped, such as the Special Olympics—referred to the statement of the managers, because of a typographical error, as the "Senior Olympics", games organized by the National Handicapped Sports and Recreation Association, and other important international events sporting events, such as the Pan American Games, to be held in Indianapolis, IN, in 1987.

Mr. Speaker, this bill also includes provisions providing for a scholarship program aimed at disadvantaged students from developing countries to study in the United States. The committee has found that under present arrangements, an insufficient number of underprivileged students are reaching our shores for college study. The fact is that many of the bright, but disadvantaged, to manage to reach positions of influence in their home countries. The bulk of such students are now coming to the Soviet Union for their university studies. We should be making opportunities available for all sorts of individuals to come and study here, and the conference substitute, which tracks a provision of the House foreign aid bill, does just that.

The bill contains compromise language on the degree to which Japan is currently meeting its obligation to defend the West. I think it is unfortunate that the Congress now singles out just one of many of our allies who may be lacking in some respect, in our view, with respect to their contributions to the defense of the West. It is possible that this language may be counterproductive in our efforts to continue to engage Japan in constructive discussions on the efforts they may make in the future, and perhaps does not sufficiently recognize the efforts that have been made up to this point by the Japanese Government under the leadership of Prime Minister Nakasone. I would not want the language of the bill or the report to be misinterpreted in Japan as indicating anything near widespread dissatisfaction with the Japanese effort. I think that the Japanese effort may be misunderstood, but is substantial and increasing. It is possible that the report called for in this bill, while perhaps singling out one of the allies unjustly, will make it easier for the American people, and the Congress, to see just how well Japan is doing, and laying some fears to rest, while allowing us to concentrate on the areas in which more progress might be needed.

Mr. Speaker, while this legislation is highly complex and technical, and it is not by any means glamour legislation, it is necessary for the operation of the American foreign policy machinery. Moreover, it contains certain items by which the Congress has been able to express its will on important policy matters. I congratulate once again the Members and staff who have worked so hard on the legislation and urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN].

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. I thank the chairman, the gentleman from Florida, for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, there has been a great deal of concern by a number of members of the border caucus with respect to the original language contained in the measure mandating to the State Department that a travel advisory be issued for the state of Jalisco in Mexico, and certainly I wanted to have the gentleman from Florida respond, if he would, as to what the language now contains and what the intent of the committee is.

Mr. MICA. Essentially, the language now has gone from a mandatory travel advisory to a recommendation to the Secretary of State to issue a travel advisory if he deems so appropriate.

The Secretary is also required every 90 days to supply a report to the Congress on the progress made on this situation.

I might indicate that I am fully aware of the sensitivity of this issue, and that was addressed by the conferees in attempting to make a recommendation, as they would with any country that they have some concerns that there might be a problem with.

Our comment from the State Department was, No. 1, they welcome this recommendation; No. 2, they will give us comment as to the Secretary's feelings as to how far Mexico has gone to comply with our desires in this particular case.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. And I would just reiterate that it is up to the Secretary of State to make that determination rather than the Congress.

Mr. MICA. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. I thank the gentleman. I want to just tell the gentleman that I very much appreciate the fact that this committee has worked with our caucus.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. I thank the gentleman for yielding, and want to commend the gentleman from Texas [Mr. COLEMAN], and the border caucus for their efforts to combat narcotics trafficking.

Mr. Speaker, I welcome the gentleman's concern about the Mexican trade advisory issue. We have addressed that issue with the Secretary of State and have been informed that the Department of State does not feel at this time that the conditions in Mexico warrant the imposition of a travel advisory. The Department further advises that information on the Camerena and other disappearance cases have been provided to the State Department and is presently available to the Congress, and that the State Department is continuing monitoring the safety of our citizens in all countries and issues travel advisories as warranted. The State Department notes that the Mexican Government is fully aware of the concerns of the Congress in regard to this issue and has taken additional steps to improve the safety of Americans in Mexico.

I might add that both our Foreign Affairs Committee and the Select Committee on Narcotics are closely monitoring developments with regard to the narcotics issue in Mexico.

Mr. COLEMAN of Texas. I thank the gentleman. I appreciate the language of the committee and the work it has done in this area.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BONKER].

Mr. BONKER. I thank the chairman for yielding. I want to take this opportunity to commend the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MICA] and the ranking minority Member [Ms. SNOWE] for a really extraordinary task of resolving the 90-some issues in this authorization bill, and actually being able to accomplish it without a formal session of the conferees. We are proud of the efforts that were made and the final product.

I think the chairman understands my disappointment with respect to the conferees' decision which in effect will allow the appointment of Defense Department personnel as part of the U.S. permanent delegation at Cocom in Paris, but I am pleased to see that our language on Intelsat, as we amended the bill in the House, has remained intact. I want to note that this Intelsat language, of course, will supersede any report language by any other committee of this body.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BONKER. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. MICA. I would just like to say, for the record, with regard to the Cocom issue, my disappointment is as strong and as great as the gentleman's, and I cannot tell him how much I am concerned about it. I expect to pursue this directly and hope the gentleman will join me with the Secretary of State as soon as we complete this legislation.

Mr. BONKER. I appreciate the chairman's comments and his support of our efforts to see that the State Department be retained as our representative of the U.S. delegation at Cocom.

Mr. Speaker, as we today consider the conference report on H.R. 2068, the State Department authorization bill, I would like to call to my colleagues attention two important issues in this legislation.

The decision of the conferees to allow the appointment of Defense Department personnel to the U.S. permanent delegation at Cocom—the international coordinating committee on multilateral export controls located in Paris—is a serious setback for U.S. foreign policy interests in general, and American exporters, specifically. Amid intense administration lobbying and at the insistence of the Senate majority conferees, a House provision to retain the State Department as the single U.S. voice at Cocom was deleted from the final legislation. That action also permits $2 million of Defense Department funds to be used for the expansion of the Cocom facilities.

Although the Secretary of State retains the legal authority to represent the United States at Cocom, it will now be most difficult for the State Department to exercise that responsibility. Defense Department personnel alone will outnumber diplomatic representatives, and other U.S. departments and agencies will now demand permanent representation at Cocom comparable to the Defense Department's presence. This loss of control by the State Department will cause interagency disagreements on export control policy previously settled in Washington to erupt in Paris, confusing and irritating our allies who participate with us in controlling the export of advanced technologies through the Cocom process. Any semblance of unity in U.S. policy and negotiating positions will be lost. This has happened all too often in the past, when various departments and agencies sent mere advisors to Cocom. It will be a far more serious problem with them permanently represented there. The net effect of this multiagency permanent U.S. delegation can only be less U.S. effectiveness, thereby weakening multilateral export control efforts at a time when they are the most critically needed.

I intend to continue my efforts to achieve unity and efficiency in U.S. export control administration by restoring exclusive State Department representation on U.S. positions at Cocom. I will reintroduce my amendment shortly as a separate bill, and look for a legislative vehicle to send that provision to the President's desk as soon as possible.

In the meantime, the American business community should make no mistake about it—the administration, stretching to the maximum extent possible its discretionary authorities under the Export Administration Act, has turned over the U.S. export control system to the Department of Defense. This militarization of the Cocom process has been done unilaterally, in violation of the rule of consensus that governs Cocom. No other Cocom nation has appointed military personnel to its permanent delegation at Cocom, and no common policy to do so has been adopted by Cocom.

I predict the practical effect of these developments will be greater delays and rejections of the more than $10 billion in proposed U.S. exports which must clear Cocom each year. These obstacles will occur from broader export controls insisted upon by the Defense Department officials, and from retaliation against U.S. export control demands.

The responsibility for these developments and the damage to U.S. trade, which I believe will be severe, now rests squarely on the shoulders of the Reagan administration and the senior majority members of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and the Senate Banking Committee who insisted on this action. U.S. companies, large and small, encountering problems at Cocom with their export licenses should hereafter address their complaints and appeals for help to those who have given the Defense Department the controlling hand in U.S. export control policy.

On the issue of U.S. telecommunications satellite policy, Congress in this legislation establishes a clear and definitive statutory basis for U.S. policy initially prescribed by the Communications Satellite Act of 1962. The legislation commands U.S. support for competition in international satellite service, to the extent that this competition does not prevent Intelsat's global network from serving the unifying aims laid down in the 1962 act.

The legislation accomplishes two principal objectives. First, it codifies in statute Presidential Determination No. 85-2, and the conditions established thereunder by Secretary of State Shultz and Secretary of Commerce Baldrige. This determination provides that, in order to meet our international obligations and to avoid significant economic harm to Intelsat, U.S. sponsored separate international satellite systems must be coordinated with Intelsat pursuant to article XIV(d) of the Intelsat Agreement, and must be limited to providing private, customized telecommunications services. They must not be interconnected to public, switched networks. As indicated in the Statement of Managers, the Congress anticipates that the President will review Determination No. 85-2 from time to time, to see if its terms continue to serve the aims of protecting the viability of Intelsat and ensuring an efficient and responsive telecommunications system, as well as other U.S. interests, and, further, that he will recommend to the Congress any changes he finds may be necessary.

Second, the legislation assures U.S. support for an amendment to the Intelsat Agreement, article V(d), necessary to ensure that Intelsat has the tools to compete in the new competitive environment that the United States is taking the lead in establishing. Such an amendment must authorize Intelsat in exceptional circumstances to establish cost-based charges for individual traffic routes. Without such an amendment, Intelsat could be artificially constrained from meeting competition. The terms of this important provision in the conference report, which was much discussed when the legislation was on the House floor in May, are virtually identical to the original House version. Its substance is unaltered: The Secretary of State has discretion in determining the scope and character of an appropriate amendment, but he must support amending article V(d) to confer, in meaningful form, the authority for Intelsat to establish cost-based rates for individual routes.

In this regard, I would note that certain language touching on this issue appears in the Statement of Managers of the Conference Report on the fiscal 1985 supplemental appropriations bill, H.R. 2577. This report language would appear to make U.S. support for an amendment to article V(d) contingent upon the absence of a Presidential determination that such an amendment is not in the national interest. Such language, similar to language offered and rejected while H.R. 2068 was before the House, was also offered and also rejected in connection with the conference. It is inconsistent with a basic purpose and the express provisions of this legislation. As mere report language, is overridden by it. I understand that there are other provisions of this report language which could be construed to make U.S. support for an appropriate amendment to article V(d) discretionary or contingent. These are likewise superseded by the adoption of this bill.

In addition to the above provisions taken from the House bill, the conferees reported a new subsection c(2). This subsection, to ensure that rates by Intelsat are cost-based, the Secretary of State after consultation with the Secretary of Commerce and the chairman of the Federal Communications Commission shall instruct Comsat, the U.S. signatory to Intelsat's Operating Agreement, to ensure that significant documentation is provided by Intelsat to verify that such rates are in fact cost-based. As explained by the Statement of Managers, the new subsection also provides that the Government shall see that such documentation is made available to interested parties on a timely basis. This new subsection does not necessarily contemplate the provision of any further information by Intelsat to Comsat or the U.S. Government than is now routinely provided. Comsat, as a holder of 23 percent of the voting power on Intelsat's Board of Govenors, has immediate access to all information about Intelsat's revenues and costs, and the basis for its charges, and such information is promptly made available to the U.S. Government by Comsat.

I should emphasize that the limitations in the new subsection on disclosure and dissemination of Intelsat financial information are intentional and very important. In particular, the less precise and less carefully delimited provisions in the report of the fiscal 1985 supplemental appropriations conference report—providing for the "release" of such information, and providing for disclosure of information about "allocation of costs" as well as information about "revenues and costs"—are overridden by the legislation now before the House. Such provisions were offered and specifically rejected in connection with the conference on H.R. 2068.

● Mr. HYDE. Mr. Speaker, on July 18, I introduced H.R. 3043, to require the Secretary of State to promulgate regulations which would, for the first time, allow the United States to monitor and control improper or illegal activities of certain employees of the U.S. Secretariat.

This legislation was introduced as a free-standing bill because the State Department authorizations bill had already been considered in the House and because intelligence authorizations were considered under a restricted rule. Fortunately, Senator WILLIAM V. ROTH, of Delaware, successfully offered nearly identical language as an amendment to State authorizations in the other body. The goal of H.R. 3043 was to draw attention to this serious problem and to assist House conferees to accept this important language.

Our colleague, Mr. RUDD of Arizona, pointed out the report of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Senate Print 99-52, reveals a relentless abuse of the U.N. personnel system and unrestricted travel by Soviet and other employees of the Secretariat. This House will lose a great friend of freedom when the gentleman from Arizona leaves this body. He, more than many of us, saw the pressing need to control the information hemorrhage to the enemies of freedom caused by this egregious loophole.

I wish to commend the 40 bipartisan cosponsors who have joined me in sponsoring H.R. 3043. And I particularly commend the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, Mr. FASCELL of Florida; the ranking Republican member of Foreign Affairs, Mr. BROOMFIELD of Michigan; the chairman and ranking Republican of the Subcommittee on International Operations, Mr. MICA of Florida and Ms. SNOWE of Maine for their assistance in preserving the other body's language with technical amendments as contained in H.R. 3043. Of course, I also salute the other conferees for addressing this pressing problem.

It is my hope that the Secretary of State will work closely with interested Members of Congress, the intelligence community, and individuals vitally concerned with drug smuggling so as to effectively apply stringent standards to those few United Nations employee who have exploited their privilege of living in the United States to break our laws and raid information sources.

Section 141 of the conference report to accompany H.R. 2068 is a major breakthrough and is a shining example of bipartisanship and cooperation between both Houses of Congress.●

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I go on record today as being opposed to the outrageously high level of funding authorized in the conference report on the Foreign Assistance Act authorizations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987.

It is unconscionable that Congress should vote nearly $13 billion in foreign assistance at a time when our own citizens are being asked to bear the brunt of domestic spending cuts, many of which will affect the elderly and youths seeking an education. We owe it to our senior citizens to keep the promises made to them in the past, and yet I constantly receive letters from members of this community which urge me to vote for measures which would entail considerable sacrifice on their part in order to reduce the escalating national debt. These people understand that we cannot continue to spend vast amounts in excess of revenues without risking bankruptcy.

Furthermore, it is deplorable to note that half the amount authorized is earmarked for military aid, rather than economic or development assistance. All countries, with the possible exception of one, need humanitarian and economic aid, not our security assistance, in the amounts we send.

Please understand that I am not insensitive to the plight of many of our allies, who are threatened with either vast social problems or the imminent threat of totalitarian aggression. I am, however, suggesting that we must first put our own house in order, lest we shortly find ourselves in a position where we are powerless to help ourselves, let alone the rest of the world.●

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Speaker, having no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, having no further requests for time, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the conference report.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. HENRY. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 350, nays 74, not voting 9, as follows:

Messrs. HANSEN, RUDD, and JENKINS changed their votes from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. DICKINSON changed his vote from "nay" to "yea."

So the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, during rollcall vote No. 286, the vote on the conference report on the State Department authorization, I was unavoidably detained and missed the vote. Had I been present, I would have voted "aye."

CORRECTING ENROLLMENT OF H.R. 2068, FOREIGN RELATIONS AUTHORIZATION ACT, FISCAL YEARS 1986 AND 1987

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 181) to correct the enrollment of the bill H.R. 2068, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 181

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That, in the enrollment of the bill (H.R. 2068) to authorize appropriations for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 for the Department of State, the United States Information Agency, the Board for International Broadcasting, and for other purposes, the Clerk of the House of Representatives shall make the following corrections:

(1) At the end of title I of the bill, after section 154, insert the following new section:

"SEC. 155. SOVIET AND INTERNATIONAL COMMUNIST BEHAVIOR.

"Not later than one year after the date of enactment of this section, the Secretary of State shall prepare and transmit to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, an unclassified report on the advisability of establishing a permanent office in the Department of State to study Soviet and international Communist behavior that violates the concepts of national sovereignty and peace between nations. In conducting the study required by this section, the Secretary may make use of suitably qualified journalists and scholars.".

(2) In the table of contents contained in section 1(b), after the item relating to section 154, insert the following new item:

"Sec. 155. Soviet and international Communist behavior.".

(3) In section 812(c), strike out "The President should submit" and insert in lieu thereof " The President shall submit".

(4) In section 813(b), strike out "It is the sense of the Congress that the Secretary of State and the Attorney General should" and insert in lieu thereof "The Secretary of State and the Attorney General shall" and strike out "should transmit" and insert in lieu thereof "shall transmit".

(5) In section 151, amend subsection (c) to read as follows:

(c) REDUCTION IN CONTRIBUTION IF SUBSTANTIAL PROGRESS NOT MADE.—If the Secretary of State determines pursuant to subsection (b) that substantial progress has not been made in correcting this practice, the United States shall thereafter reduce the amount of its annual assessed contribution to the United Nations by the amount of that contribution which is the United States proportionate share of the salaries of those international civil servants employed by the United Nations who are returning any portion of their salaries to their respective governments.

Mr. MICA (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the concurrent resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. TRAFICANT). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report on H.R. 2068, just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

A POINT OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] wishes to state a point of personal privilege, and the gentleman is recognized.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this morning the Doorkeeper's office issued the floor today report, and in this report, the integrity of myself and another member of the minority, I believe, was impugned because it stated that we were offering more than 100 dilatory and frivolous amendments to a very important piece of legislation, that being the pay equity bill, which is going to be debated later today, and I feel that is enough reason for a point of personal privilege.

I serve on the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, and I have worked long and hard on this particular piece of legislation and proposed a number of amendments in committee, as well as a substitute. Along with my colleague, I considered it an affront when the majority party Doorkeeper indicated on the floor today that our amendments were frivolous and dilatory.

I have since talked with the Doorkeeper of the majority party, Mr. Molloy. He was very kind and said it was an error. We accept that, and we hope it does not happen in the future. Both sides should be respected in this body as far as their amendments are concerned, and I feel confident in the future that they will be.

Mr. Speaker, if my colleague, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY], does not have a request for time, I yield back the balance of my time.

A POINT OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, I, too, rise on a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inquire, does the gentleman rise for the same reason as the previous one?

Mr. ARMEY. For the same reason, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY] is recognized.

Mr. ARMEY. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], I think, explained the situation very well. I was offended by this language, and I did talk to the Doorkeeper and he, being the gentleman that he is, gave me an explanation. It was an error on their part.

Unfortunately, a member of his staff copied the exact language by which my amendments were described as "dilatory" and the amendments of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] as "dilatory and frivolous" from the Democrat Study Committee's morning report. Obviously, we cannot expect the Doorkeeper's staff to be responsible for such language as appears in the Democrat Study Committee's report, and I did indeed accept his apology. I think he was quite a gentleman about it. He gave us a full explanation.

I do not choose to take the entire hour that I have allotted for this discussion, for two reasons: first, although I am prepared to discuss each and every one of these amendments and demonstrate them not to be dilatory, I do not believe I need to explain that at this point. We will have ample opportunity to do that during the debate on the bill. The other reason is, if indeed I were to take that hour and delay the day's work and perhaps even preempt some bills from being brought to consideration today, that indeed would be dilatory, and I would not want to do that to this body.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

AUTHORIZING THE CLERK TO MAKE CORRECTIONS IN ENGROSSMENT OF H.R. 3011, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND RELATED AGENCIES APPROPRIATION BILL, 1986

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk be authorized to correct any technical and grammatical errors in the engrossment of the bill H.R. 3011, making appropriations for the Department of the Interior and related agencies for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1986, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

WAIVING CERTAIN POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 1460, ANTI-APARTHEID ACT OF 1985

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 251 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 251

Resolved, That all points of order against the conference report on the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes, and against consideration of the conference report are hereby waived. The conference report shall be considered as having been read when called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House now consider House Resolution 251?

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 349, nays 75, not voting 9, as follows:

□ 1340

Mr. DANNEMEYER changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. SWEENEY, Mrs. BENTLEY, and Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the House agreed to consider House Resolution 251.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WHEAT] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, for purposes of debate only, I yield the customary 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT] and pending that, I yield myself such time as I may use.

Mr. Speaker, this rule would permit consideration of the conference report on H.R. 1460, the bill to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa.

Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House conference reports are privileged and are considered in the House under the hour rule with no amendments in order. In this instance, the conferees reached agreement on this matter just last night and the report was filed in the House this morning. This rule simply facilitates expeditious consideration of the conference report by waiving all points of order, including any point of order against consideration of the conference report. In addition, the rule provides that when the conference report is called up for consideration, it shall be considered as having been read.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I object to considering this rule at this time for the simple reason that Members do not have an opportunity to review the conference report. This rule waives all points of order against the conference report. Ordinarily, the Rules Committee specifies what points of order it is waiving. But this was brought up in the Rules Committee as an emergency matter, and on such short notice that the Parliamentarian did not have adequate time to determine just what provisions violate which rules.

We were told that there is a possibility this violates the scope rule for conference reports because this contains a sanction relating to the importation of uranium and coal that was not contained in either the House- or Senate-passed versions. Under House rules, a scope violation, if sustained on a point of order, would prevent the consideration of the conference report.

We are also told that there are nongermane provisions and a reappropriation provision in this conference report. We don't know any of this for sure because there was not time to thoroughly examine this bill before a rule was reported. And there certainly is not time for the House to learn what the conferees have done before it votes on this. This is no way to legislate. I urge defeat of this rule so that we can come back another day when we have a better idea of what we are doing.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time so that I might be able to respond if there are any comments the chairman would like to address to me.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER], chairman of the Committee on Rules.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I unavoidably missed the vote on the rule to bring up this resolution. If I had been here, of course I would have supported it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, we recognize that we are bringing up this measure under expeditious proceedings of the Rules of the House of Representatives. However, in light of the fact that this measure has been debated thoroughly by the House before and there is ample time allotted the rule and under the rules of the House for consideration of the measure, we would ask that the House proceed to adopt the rule and consider this important legislation.

Mr. Speaker. I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2577) entitled "An act making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes.".

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate numbered 2, 5, 6, 7, 14, 23, 29, 35, 41, 45, 51, 57, 63, 65, 70, 75, 77, 87, 91, 92, 102, 109, 121, 130, 131, 132, 147, 150, 153, 164, 166, 167, 168, 178, 180, 183, 194, 199, 200, 202, 203, 204, 211, 214, 230, 234, 235, 249, 257, 258, 260, 261, 272, 289, 299, 307, 330, and 340 to the above-entitled bill.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112 with an amendment as follows: After "legislation" at the end of the last sentence, insert: "; except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986".

The message also announced that the Senate recedes from its amendment numbered 262 to the above-entitled bill.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 1460, ANTI-APARTHEID ACT OF 1985

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the bill (H.R. 1460) to express the opposition of the United States to the system of apartheid in South Africa, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to House Resolution 251, the conference report is considered as having been read.

(For conference report and statement, see prior proceedings of the House of today.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL].

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the conference report that we are considering is an important conference report because, on its adoption, the Congress of the United States will be making a statement on behalf of the American people with regard to the deplorable situation in South Africa.

There are many ways to interpret legislative action. I just want to give my own. As far as the details of the conference report are concerned and the legislation that will be considered, as you know, the bill was overwhelmingly adopted in the House, went to the other body and at that time it did not seem that there would be any strong action taken, considering the nature of the bill that was passed in the other body.

But a series of unfortunate, but yet dramatic, events took place and the whole atmosphere changed and it became more important than ever for us to make the statement which we are making today in this bill to indicate our disassociation from the Government and the actions of the Government of South Africa.

While I recognize the limitations of economic sanctions or any kind of sanctions, I think it is proper to state that the legislation makes a moral statement that far exceeds any economic leverage, as important as economic leverage may be.

It is for that reason that I personally think that this conference report is vital and particularly appropriate at this time.

We must make it clear not only to that Government, but to the rest of the world that we are disassociating in the strongest possible way by taking this legislative action, imposing an economic sanction, to demonstrate our position.

I want to compliment the distinguished gentleman who is the chairman of the Subcommittee on Africa, Mr. WOLPE, and Mr. SOLARZ, The Black Caucus, the Members of the minority, my colleague, Mr. BROOMFIELD from Michigan and others who have worked very, very diligently in a real bipartisan effort to bring you a measure which all of us, or at least most of us can genuinely support even though I know there are earnest and sincere differences of opinion as to the value of such action, that is economic sanctions.

But I dare say even though there may be disagreement or maybe differences of opinion with respect to the value of economic sanctions in bringing about a change in another government, I think there can be absolutely no difference of opinion, I would submit, on the issue that now is the time for the American people to make this moral statement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has consumed 4 minutes.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, join in offering my strong support for this bipartisan report that we have before us. We have what I call a very reasonable compromise, given the seriousness of the present situation in South Africa. While I originally opposed the House bill on this issue, much has happened in recent weeks that demands action by the House today.

I deplore the ongoing violence in South Africa and believe that sanctions are imperative and morally right. We must tell that government that America is concerned about the shameful system of apartheid in South Africa and the senseless bloodshed in that land. Pressure on South Africa cannot, however, be unilateral; we need the support of our allies if this effort is to succeed.

The report basically calls for immediate and weighty sanctions against the South African Government; Krugerrands, computers, nuclear goods, and bank loans would be affected. Additional sanctions are to be imposed in the future if no progress is made ending apartheid.

While sanctions by our country against South Africa are necessary, the cooperation of our allies in the effort is also essential and imperative. Pressure on the Government cannot be done by the United States alone. Over the years I have been a supporter of the policy of constructive engagement. That approach to our relations with South Africa has been useful and some progress has been made. The U.S. business in that country voluntarily complied with the provisions of the Sullivan code and South African blacks benefited from those efforts.

In recent months, however, the tension between groups in South Africa has increased and much senseless bloodletting has occurred. Something has to be done. I urge the Congress to pass this conference report.

Mr. Speaker, it is not only essential, I think it is morally right to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has consumed 2 minutes.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE].

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I think that the conference agreement that was reached last night was in many respects historic for this institution and for our country. I cannot tell you how proud I was personally as an American and as a Member of this institution to see House and Senate conferees, on a totally bipartisan basis, express a commitment to move in a new direction in our relationship toward South Africa. The conference agreement that was passed, a very creative and constructive agreement, will send to South Africans an unmistakable message that, henceforth, the United States will no longer enter into an accommodation with apartheid.

We are also signaling the South African regime that if the Afrikaners attempt to maintain the system of apartheid, and if they continue to manifest the repression and brutality that we have seen so much in evidence in recent days, that they will be increasingly isolated in their relationship to the United States and to the international community and they will experience increasing economic and political costs as a consequence of that repression and that brutality.

My colleagues, there is a terrible tragedy in the making in South Africa. Unless the international community joins with forces within that country that are seeking to eliminate the system of apartheid, a bloodbath will be inevitable.

The white minority regime will abandon apartheid, will agree to enter into negotiations with the credible black leadership of the majority of the population, only at that point when it concludes that it has more to lose than to gain by attempting to hold on to apartheid.

Throughout the debate on sanctions, those who have resisted the imposition of sanctions have argued that they will only hurt the black population. My colleagues, there is no argument that has been advanced in this debate that is more off target.

The reality is that it has been the current ambivalence of American policy which, on the one hand, verbally condemns apartheid but, on the other, practices business as usual that has done more than anything else to compound the repression and to add to the violence. This is because the message that has been heard by the Afrikaners is that they indeed do have a free hand to do what they will. We have signaled them in advance that there was not going to be any response, no matter how repressive they became internally and no matter how aggressive they were in their actions toward their neighboring states.

Make no mistake about it: Blacks in South Africa are themselves engaging in a policy of economic pressure and economic sanctions. They are pursuing boycotts now throughout the country, not because they wish to inflict economic hardship upon the black majority, but because they understand that it is that economic pressure, both internally and externally, that represents the only hope to avoid a massive bloodbath in South Africa.

We are in this legislation beginning to send straight signals to the South African Government. We are letting them know in advance that this system of apartheid cannot be maintained indefinitely, and it is up to the Afrikaners to take steps now to enter into negotiations with the black majority to achieve a new political order in which all citizens of South Africa will indeed be citizens of their own country, and full participants in the political system of that country.

Let me say one other thing, Mr. Speaker. There are some very profound moral issues at stake, and that is why I was so proud of my colleagues last night. And I want to pay tribute to the Republican leadership as well as the Democratic leadership, to Mr. BROOMFIELD as well as Mr. FASCELL on our side, and to the Republican as well as Democratic leaders in the Senate, for their willingness to join together in a genuinely bipartisan way.

I cannot tell you how important that unity is in terms of what we are conveying to the South Africans and to the rest of the world.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to speak with one voice in voting to approve the conference report.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. CHALMERS WYLIE, a member of the conference committee and ranking member on the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. WYLIE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act.

The recent deterioration of events in South Africa lead me to the conclusion that the time is right to take stronger steps against the Government of South Africa. We do this with the fervent hope that our actions will aid all of the people in South Africa.

Mr. Speaker, other conferees more knowledgeable than I have and will address many important foreign policy aspects of this conference report. Since I was appointed as conferee on several sections because of my service as the ranking Republican member on the House Banking Committee, I will confine my remarks to the provisions under our jurisdiction.

First, the conferees adopted the House provision to immediately ban the importation of Krugerrands. The President may waive this ban if certain conditions are met as set forth in this conference report.

Second, the conferees agreed to a House amendment to the Senate provision which provided for the minting of U.S. gold coins to compete with the Krugerrand. This House amendment offered by my friend Mr. ANNUNZIO, the chairman of our Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee, creates four new gold coins which are both legal tender and have face values of $50, $25, $10, and $5. These coins truly will be American gold coins which should compete fiercely against the Krugerrand on the world markets. The significance of this coin is heightened by the symbols we will have on the 1-ounce gold coins; that is, a symbol of liberty on the obverse side and a family of American eagles on the reverse side.

The gold for these coins is to be acquired only from natural deposits in the United States or from the gold reserves held by the United States. All the profits from the sale of these coins are to be used for sole purpose of reducing the national debt.

Moreover, at my suggestion, Chairman ANNUNZIO graciously accepted language which states that the Secretary of the Treasury shall ensure that the minting of these gold coins will not result in any net cost to the U.S. Government.

In all fairness, I must tell my colleagues that the Treasury Department does not support these gold coins. Having said that, I have to believe that they will like the version adopted by the conferees more than the original Senate language, which provided for a legal tender coin without an assigned face value. In a letter to Senator JAKE GARN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs, dated April 19, 1985, Mrs. Katherine Ortega, Treasurer of the United States, pointed out that the unprecedented nature of the Senate proposed coin was addressed by President Reagan's Gold Commission, on which I served, which stated that the legal tender status of such gold bullion coins "could compel their acceptance by private creditors for debts or by the Treasury for taxes. Formidable problems involving profits and losses to private creditors and debtors could arise in assigning gold coins legal tender status at a fluctuating rate." Mrs. Ortega went on to say that a legal tender coin of the realm whose value would depend entirely upon the fluctuations of the precious metal market would represent a major departure from 200 years of coinage legislation.

I also should note that while nominal face values have been specified for the gold coins established by this act, the coins will be sold and traded at their market values. Specifically, I believe that the conferees meant to prohibit frivolous litigation based upon the disparity between face value and market value. Transactions, involving these coins will be valued at market, not face, value.

Clearly, this American gold coin will give people all over the world a chance to vote with their pocketbooks in favor of an American gold coin symbolizing liberty and freedom and against the abhorrent practice of apartheid in South Africa.

For those of my colleagues who are concerned that such a gold coin will reestablish a gold standard, let me assure you that this is not the case. We already have on the books a gold coin as part of the 1984 Olympics program, and earlier this year the Congress enacted a gold coin as part of the Statue of Liberty restoration effort. The gold coin in this legislation is no different from earlier Government coins authorized by this body. The face values of the proposed coins are nominal and unrelated to the market value of the coins. Their market value is determined by their content. Thus, the so-called $50 piece, which contains 1 troy ounce of fine gold, would be worth about $328 at the current price of gold.

Moreover, the bill expressly provides for the sale of these coins at a price equal to the market value of the gold content of the coins, plus markup for production and marketing. The dollar value of the coin, therefore, is determined by world gold market—demand and supply—conditions, not by a conversion ratio between a specified quantity of gold and paper dollars fixed by U.S. public authorities.

As I read the amendment, it is not, therefore, inconsistent with the findings of the President's Gold Commission.

Section 15 of this report prohibits loans to the South African Government or to any corporation owned or controlled by that Government. Certain loans for educational, health, and housing facilities to help the people of South Africa are exempted. These provisions were contained in both House and Senate versions of the legislation.

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, there is language in this report which instructs the Export-Import Bank to take active steps to encourage the use of its programs by Africans. While not affecting the present restrictions on Eximbank transactions for South Africa, this provision will make it possible for nonwhite businesses to get Eximbank assistance.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of this conference report. It is a timely step for this Nation to take in protest of the repugnant racial policies of South Africa.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], the chairman of the Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage of the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support the conference report, and I want to commend the gentleman from Florida, [Mr. FASCELL], Mr. BROOMFIELD, and the other members of both sides of the Foreign Affairs Committee, for the outstanding job that they have done in bringing this legislation to the floor.

As you know, this legislation contains a ban on the sale of Krugerrands. It also contains provisions for the striking of a new series of U.S. gold coins, which I predict will become the most popular gold coins in the world.

Under the compromise legislation, four gold coins will be minted; a 1-ounce gold coin having a face value of $50, ½-ounce gold coin having a face value of $25, a ¼-ounce gold coin having a face value of $10 and a ⅒-ounce gold coin having a face value of $5. These coins will be legal tender.

The other body included in its legislation provisions for the gold coins, but did not assign face values or make the coins legal tender. Without such distinctions, the coins are really not coins, but medallions; or if you will, merely pieces of jewelry. But by assigning the coins value and making them legal tender, we make them much more attractive to the numismatic and investment communities. Experts around the country have told me that without legal tender face value the new U.S. coins would not sell.

While the Krugerrand does not have a face value and is quasi-legal tender, it should be noted that in recent months the sale of Krugerrands in this country has plummeted. The most popular gold piece now is the Canadian Maple Leaf, which does have a face value and is legal tender. More than three times the number of Maple Leafs are now being sold in this country compared to Krugerrands.

Not only will the new U.S. gold coins take away sales from Krugerrands, but if and when the situation in South Africa is stabilized and that country becomes a member of the international humanitarian world, the United States' coins will still be big sellers because of their legal tender status and face value requirements.

The compromise legislation further provides that rather than limiting private distribution and sales rights to a single concern, the Secretary of the Treasury shall make bulk sales at suitable discounts to any dealers, retail outlets, financial institutions, or anyone else who wants to sell the coins. Of course, the size of the discount will be determined by the number of coins purchased.

The compromise legislation also requires that the profits from the sale of these coins be used to retire the national debt. This is an important provision because I think it is the first time in the history of our Government that we will have an ongoing program to retire the national debt. While I have sponsored legislation in the past that would call for a one-time contribution to retire the national debt, such as the proceeds from the George Washington commemorative coin, my new national debt reduction program will go on as long as gold coins are produced. And I would add, there is no such cutoff in the legislation.

The contribution to retire the national debt could be substantial. And depending on the source of the gold used for the coins, the national debt reduction could reach as high as $300 per coin—a significant amount when you consider that other gold coins are selling in the millions in this country.

Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the members of the House Banking Committee who served as conferees on the gold coin provision; particularly the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. NEAL,] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WYLIE.] It is significant that both of these gentlemen were members of the Presidential Gold Commission, and both members supported strongly the legislation before us in this conference report.

I also want to commend the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL,] who thoughout the conference was a champion of the new gold coin program, and who made one of the most eloquent speeches in that conference, on the evils of apartheid, that I have heard in my 21 years in Congress.

The issuance of these coins would have no effect on the Nation's monetary policy. The coins would be legal tender for their face value, like all U.S. coins. But since the bullion content of the coins is well above the face value of the coins, the coins will not circulate. This is the same approach taken by Canada in issuing its "Maple Leaf," a 1-ounce gold bullion coin, which has a $50 face value. That coin has been a popular bullion coin, and has had no adverse effect on Canadian monetary policy.

These coins will be handled the same way the public now treats the gold coins previously issued by the United States. Gold coins issued in the 19th and early 20th century are still legal tender and will be redeemed for their face value by the United States. None are ever presented for redemption however, since the coins' intrinsic bullion value are far in excess of their face value. The marketplace, not the face value, will determine their actual value as they are bought and sold in the public domain.

In fact, if a gold coin was presented to the United States for redemption, it would be a windfall for the Government. The coin, which would have been sold to the public for its bullion value, would be repurchased for its far lower face value. It could then be resold to the public at its bullion price.

Unlike some legal tender bullion coins issued by some other countries, the fixed legal tender value of the coins eliminates any problem of valuation. For legal tender purposes the coins are worth the value stamped on them, regardless of the value of their bullion content. This not only avoids valuation problems in the unlikely event they are used as legal tender, but solves the problem of how to account for them for measuring the amount of money in circulation. Simple multiplication of the number issued by the face value provides the answer.

The legislation would not deplete our gold reserves. The gold for the coins would be obtained in the same manner that gold used in U.S. commemorative coins is obtained. The gold could come from stocks already held by the Treasury. If the Secretary preferred, the gold could be purchased on the open market. The determination whether to use existing stocks or to purchase additional gold would be left to the Secretary, just as current law provides. There would be no change in the Secretary's authority to maintain the U.S. gold stocks at the level deemed appropriate.

The coins will be sold to the public at a price equal to the market value of the gold or silver at the time of sale, plus the cost of minting, marketing, and distribution.

In order to provide the mint with ample time to prepare to mint and issue the coins, no coins could be sold before October 1, 1986. However, the mint could begin work on the program on October 1, 1985. This will provide sufficient leadtime to develop outstanding designs for the coins, design an appropriate and effective distribution system and mint sufficient coins for an initial inventory.

The coin program will involve no net cost to the Government. Indeed, the revenues raised by the domestic and foreign sale of these coins will constitute substantial revenue to the United States that will be used solely to reduce the national debt. And the availability of U.S. gold bullion coins will surely attract precious-metals buyers formerly dependent on foreign issues.

Over $500 million can be generated each year by the sale of U.S. bullion coins. At the current gold price of $327 per ounce the United States would realize a gain of $285 per ounce since the gold is carried on the books at $42.22 per ounce. If sales of gold coins were to average only 2 million ounces annually, a figure that is very reasonable, the United States would realize a gain of $570 million. In a situation where even the smallest saving would strike a blow against the deficit, these earnings would be a major contribution.

The minting of these new American coins will aid in reducing our record trade deficits. The Commerce Department has estimated that over 1 billion dollars' worth of foreign gold bullion coins were imported into the United States in 1984.

Most Americans would prefer to purchase U.S. coins and this legislation will provide the coins they seek. Every year, countless individuals contact the Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee asking for the United States to produce gold bullion coins. Many, if not all, of these individuals will buy an American gold bullion coin rather than a foreign bullion coin. Indeed, the coins are likely to become the standard by which all other bullion coins are measured.

I urge the adoption of the conference report.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], who is a member of the Subcommittee on Africa of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, first of all I would say that there is unanimity in this Chamber and in this Congress as far as the opposition to the policy of apartheid in South Africa is concerned. Nobody likes that form of government; the racial repression that exists; we would all like to see that change.

My problem with this legislation is not that it attacks the policy of apartheid which we all abhor, but that it goes so far as to hurt the very people that it purports to help.

In addition to that, I think it bodes ill, in the long run, for the free world.

I would like to tell why on those two points.

First of all, banning the Krugerrand. If the free world all joins together in banning the Krugerrand, a lot of black people who work in the mines are going to lose their jobs. There are about 600,000 blacks who work in the gold mines of South Africa today. Each one of those people is responsible for feeding five other human beings. That is 3 million people who would be adversely affected if the mines were shut down.

If this legislation is passed here, and around the world the other free governments follow suit, many thousands of people are going to lose their jobs. They are not going to be able to put food on the table. The very people we want to help. Now, those people are going to be ripe for revolution. They are going to be grasping for existence, and the people who are Marxists over there, the revolutionaries who do exist and who are trying to undermine a number of governments in Africa, in addition to South Africa, are going to have their way with a lot of them. And those people are going to be very active in trying to change the governmental structure over there from what it is to a Marxist form of government.

What if that happens? If that happens, Mr. Speaker, in my view you would have, in just a matter of days or weeks, Soviet ships in those ports. What does that mean? Forty percent of the free world oil supplies go around the Cape of Good Hope, the southern tip of Africa. And if the Soviets controlled the southern tip of Africa in a time of crisis, they could hamstring the free world as far as energy is concerned. Our NATO allies, Britain, France, all of the NATO allies, would be in jeopardy, as well as the United States of America, because many of our oil supplies come around the Cape of Good Hope as well.

In addition to that, you will see up here a number of charts that I have brought out for argument. I would like to explain what they mean. Many of the minerals that are depicted on these charts are vital to the survival of the United States of America. Platinum is one. We get 49 percent of our platinum from South Africa. Chromium, we get 55 percent of our chromium from South Africa. Manganese, we get 39 percent of our manganese from South Africa. Cobalt, 61 percent of our cobalt comes from Zimbabwe and Zaire to the United States of America, but it comes through South Africa. And 44 percent of vanadium comes through South Africa.

These minerals are vital to the military security and economic health of this country. Now, if the Soviet Union gets control of South Africa, it is going to hurt, or if one of the U.S.S.R. surrogates gets control, it is going to hurt severely the United States of America and may threaten the very existence of the free world.

You may say, "Well, what about the Soviet Union, are they dependent upon South Africa or the African Continent for their existence?"

If you look at this chart here, the second chart, it shows that the U.S.S.R. is almost independent as far as their needs are concerned. They have these minerals within the confines of the U.S.S.R. The only exception that they really have to worry about is cobalt, and they get the majority of their supply of cobalt from Cuba, one of their satellite countries.

Mr. Speaker, I think there are a lot of problems with this legislation. One of the problems, as I stated before, is the impact on the people we want to help, the blacks. But in addition to that, Mr. Speaker, I think there is a real risk, a real long-term risk to the free world.

Many of my colleagues have stood up here and they have said, "Well, we have to show moral leadership, the free world has to get involved, and we have to do something about it."

I agree with that. But how far do we go? We went pretty far in a country called Rhodesia. We stopped buying chromium from Rhodesia. The Soviet Union became the only market we had, and we were buying chromium produced in Rhodesia from the Soviet Union after it became Zimbabwe, and we were paying three times the price. Imagine what it would do to us if we had to deal with them on the same basis with these other vital minerals. And, of course, you have seen what happened to Zimbabwe since they have gone Communist. The Government is headed back toward the dark ages and not into the future like it had been previously. They have a very repressive Government. Blacks are preying upon blacks. There is blood running in the streets. Now they have a one-party totalitarian Communist government. I submit to you if we follow the same train of thought that we followed in Zimbabwe, we are going to have the same thing in South Africa.

We stuck our nose into Iran, as did many other free world countries, talking about the repression over there. We got rid of the Shah all right, but look what we got in his place. The Ayotollah Khomeini.

We need to do something about the apartheid policies of South Africa; we need to put presssure upon this Government. But not the way we are talking about it in this piece of legislation. If we do it, I think we are sowing the seeds of massive revolution in that country. There will be no constructive change in the Government. We run the risk of a Marxist takeover, and it is going to bode very ill, in my opinion, for the entire free world.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. I thank the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, I, too, want to command the conferees for reporting out this piece of legislation, and I am glad the Congress has agreed to a package of economic sanctions against the apartheid regime in South Africa. Among the sanctions, as already has been said, is a ban on the Krugerrands, which I think is very, very important, because I do not want to see citizens of the United States of America continue to buy these gold coins that are created by near-slave labor and human suffering. But even as I applaud the actions of the Congress I cannot help but feel that more should be done to protect against the crimes in South Africa. Since the imposition of the state of emergency just 11 days ago, over 25 people have been killed and over 1,200 arrested by the South African police.

Now, to add further insult to injury, the South African Government has also today, or recently, announced that they were going to prohibit outdoor funeral services for those who happened to die of unnatural causes. This law is testimony, I believe, to the brutal policies of the South African police. If Pretoria truly wishes to defuse the tensions that often accompany such funerals, they should stop supplying the corpses for the funerals.

In light of these terrible crimes, as I said before, we need to do a great deal more. I believe that one of the things we need to do is to call for disinvestment in South Africa. Total United States disinvestment in South Africa would provide the slap in the face that I believe South Africa needs, and I certainly would urge all of us to consider that in the very near future.

But before we reach for our calculators to come up with figures and graphs such as we have just seen on the board over there on the other side of the well, we need to examine the value of a human life; one live in dignity, in freedom, and in self rule. It is my belief that the value of a human life lived in dignity, lived in freedom, lived in self rule is far more important than the possibility of lost dollars from the sale of Krugerrands or from disinvestment. I think what we ought to join France's example of imposing strong sanctions and taking a hard line against the system of apartheid; and I strongly urge the passage of this conference report and its speedy signing by the President.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LEACH], a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. LEACH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make three brief points: The first relates to strategic issues, the second to coinage, and the third to moral. Strategically, some argue that our Government shouldn't stand up for abstract moral points because moral posturing tends too frequently to undercut our strategic position. Actually, the problem in South Africa is the obverse. Failure to stand up for moral principles jeopardizes U.S. national security. After all, ending apartheid is the most important foreign policy issue to the rest of sub-Saharan Africa, and these countries are in total more important than South Africa.

In addition, can there be any doubt that sometime in the not-too-distant future there will be majority rule in South Africa? Do we want to go down as the one country in the free world which, while paying lipservice to anti-apartheid sentiments, is viewed in the region and in South Africa as conducting a policy legitimatizing the very government which established and maintained apartheid? If such a perception remains the case, can we be expected to count on maintaining access to all the strategic minerals the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] identified?

Regarding coinage, it must be stressed that banning the importation of Krugerrands and offering an American gold coin alternative is both a deficit reduction measure and good for our balance of payments. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] and the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] should be commended for their efforts to craft a new gold policy that does not imply return to the gold standard but allows the average American citizen, at his or her option, to purchase and save American gold with confidence.

Finally, and most importantly, with regard to the moral issues at stake in this bill, we should all understand that ending apartheid in this century is as great a social imperative as ending slavery in the last.

The Republican Party was born a little more than a century ago in the smoldering cradle of apartheid-like conditions. All we ask of this Republican President is that he advance a foreign policy consistent with the views of the first Republican President, Abraham Lincoln.

Apartheid is an issue that can't be ignored. Its meaning is too great; its results too important.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL], without whose efforts the conference would not have been successful.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to go on record as saying that in many years of service in this House, I will remember that conference committee as one of the finest opportunities and experiences that I have had as a member of the this legislative body.

I am not going to call the names. You know what you did. You rose to the occasion, and you did so magnificently. I am just profoundly grateful that I could be a part of that.

In every society, we have certain rules that operate. They can be called mores, folkways, laws, and customs. But in our society and in other societies, there is something that transcends all of those things. That is called a moral imperative. That is what this legislation is, it is a moral imperative.

Those who would argue about possible political consequences down the line; those who would argue against the legislation in terms of the economic factor, forget, but were reminded by my colleague, that America took the high moral imperative when it took a position against slavery despite all those who counseled against taking that position.

They forget that time and time again we have taken a high moral position even though it might have had adverse political and economic circumstances, and that is what we have got. In this legislation we have got a moral imperative and this House must rise to the occasion and support.

There will always be those who will say the legislation is too weak or the legislation is too strong. I do not care about that. I know what I care about; I care about the courage of the conferees and the courage of this House in saying this is a moral imperative from which we will not back off; this is right for this Nation and its conscience.

Let me just say we have very few issues that we deal with in this House that transcend political partisanship. This is the one. This is the one real encounter this year, and I urge your total, total support for it.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. BEREUTER].

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEREUTER. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. PURSELL. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am very proud to be in the House today. This is one of our finest hours. In the spirit of Lincoln, BILL BROOMFIELD, DANTE FASCELL, I think this is a great opportunity, and I hope and dear pray that the President of the United States signs this conference report.

Mr. BEREUTER. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, this Member was disappointed not to be able to vote for the bill to impose new sanctions against South Africa that was passed by the House of Representatives a few weeks ago. I simply felt it was not responsible to support one specific element of that bill.

Indeed, the only provision that I could not support and that compelled me to vote against the bill prohibits all investment, direct or indirect, in new or existing business enterprises in South Africa. While the case for these sanctions is persuasive to some, a compelling case can also be made against such sanctions. As the Washington

Post editorial said, "There is a serious, respectable, nonracist case against (this) sanction."

Last night, the conference committee resolved the differences between the two bills. The Houses agreed to impose a ban on the sale of Krugerrands in this country. The measure would also ban the sale of goods used in nuclear production and computers and bank loans to the South African Government. Dropped from the agreement was the House provision banning new investments in South Africa. Certainly I support the ban on the sale of Krugerrands because I believe prohibiting the sale of Krugerrands to be step of great symbolic and economic significance.

This will be one of this year's most important policy declarations by the United States of America. I urge the President to sign this legislation.

International pressure is rising against South Africa. France recently banned further investments in the country. The United Nations Security Council denounced the "barbarism" of apartheid, even though sanctions were vetoed. When White House Press Liaison Larry Speakes talked about American "repugnance," he reflected a general feeling in this country. With this resolution, the voice of the United States will be clearly heard in South Africa and in the world community. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. OWENS].

Mr. OWENS. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report. With the imposition of the state of emergency, the South African Government has escalated the barbarity of their oppression of the black majority of the country. Urgent and meaningful action is needed from all of the nations of the civilized world. The sanctions included in this conference report are far too weak, nevertheless, we welcome this report as an important first step which will send a timely message to the Government of South Africa. We hope the President will hasten to sign this measure into law.

It is still important to note, Mr. Speaker, that events in South Africa are escalating daily. More and more deaths are occurring and more and more arrests are being made. There is no reason to believe the figures being released by the South African Government. The number of deaths each day are far greater than the body count that is being officially listed. The number of arrests is also far greater. The occupation of the black townships by storm troopers is the first step toward the conversion of these isolated townships into deadly concentration camps. There is every reason to believe that millions will be slaughtered by the racist inhuman Government of South Africa unless there is more forceful action by the civilized world under the leadership of the United States.

For the second time in one century we do not want to witness the slaughter of millions of innocent human beings. Beyond the sanctions included in this report there must be more stringent sanctions including the prohibition of all new investment in South Africa. As a matter of U.S. policy our Government should also demand that South Africa immediately release Nelson Mandela and begin negotiation with Mandela who is the only recognized leader among all segments of the South African black population. The United States must also demand that South Africa immediately establish a timetable for the granting of full political rights to all South African blacks. The time for action is now. When Hitler was committing massive atrocities against the Jews most of the world pretended they didn't know it was happening. This time no nation can use that excuse. This time we know that new death camps are being prepared. This time we must all act before it is too late.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report. Dishonesty and hypocrisy has reached a level unparalleled in the history of mankind in South Africa through the Botha regime's efforts to justify accelerated atrocities against the black majority in that rich country.

For those supporters of a policy of constructive engagement and opposing economic sanctions to have the audacity to say "it's out of our concern for the economic well being of blacks in South Africa" as a reason to oppose sanctions against the apartheid government by this great citadel of democracy is ludicrous, hypocritical, and dishonest.

A position in this respect bolsters the threats by the Botha government to fire people who join and support the fight for freedom, both economic and political. Anyone who has any knowledge of the history and growth of South Africa's apartheid regime must know and acknowledge the fact that current South African economic growth did not result from concern for the well being of the black majority, most of whom had jobs that the whites would not perform because of their laborious nature and low pay. Furthermore, the jobs were too few in number.

Who's kidding who? Release those social, political, and economic hostages who outnumber their legalized captors better than 4 to 1.

With respect to support for sanctions, we can reemploy some of our laid-off workers in the automobile, steel, and coal industries who have lost their jobs as a result of plant closedowns and United States investments in South Africa.

We can not longer continue down the failed path of President Reagan's constructive engagement. I urge my colleagues to vote for the conference report on H.R. 1460 as a step toward the end of world recognized injustice in South Africa.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. EDWARDS].

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, in 1978, I think it was October 1978, I rose on this floor to speak in favor of censuring the Government of South Africa, and I voted to censure South Africa at that time.

Now, we are told that since that time there has been progress in that country. I will not deny there has been some progress, but that progress has been minimal, and that progress has been largely cosmetic.

Some of my friends seem to have a strange attachment to South Africa. South Africa for some reason in their minds rises to the status of special friend. Mr. Speaker, no nation which represses its citizens and denies basic human freedoms is a friend of mine or of the principles on which this country was founded. There must be no more rationalizations. If what is happening in South Africa does not stir moral outrage, what will?

This is not an economic issue. Communist revolutions do not come from the granting of basic human freedoms. No Member of this House should vote against this resolution.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as she may consume to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me. I rise in support of H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act, and H.R. 2068.

Under the system of apartheid millions of South Africans have been forceably removed from their homes and families to areas called homelands. Blacks earning only a fraction of what whites earn in the workplace—attempts to unionize being met with imprisonment—these are only a few examples of the uncivilized ways in which the South African Government treats the majority of its population who are blacks.

In the past several weeks the protests of blacks have been met with violence on the part of the South African Government. Thousands of blacks have been arrested including children as young as 8 years of age.

The bloodshed must stop. The South African Government is unwilling to meet with black civil rights leaders. Constructive engagement has not worked as a means of dealing with the South African Government. Institutionalized racism still exists and less than half of the U.S. corporations doing business in South Africa have voluntarily signed the Sullivan principles.

H.R. 2068 and H.R. 1460 will send a clear message to the Government of South Africa, and to the rest of the world, that the United States clearly will not tolerate their antihumanistic, racist, apartheid policies.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from the District of Columbia [Mr. FAUNTROY].

Mr. FAUNTROY. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise, first of all, to commend members of the conference on both sides of the aisle for having quizzed themselves so well, valiantly contending for the stronger measure passed by the House.

At this point, I am already looking beyond 1460, because I am confident that the Members of this House who voted for that stronger measure are going to support this as a means of sending a message to South Africa.

I am looking beyond it because when we voted on this measure back in June, no state of emergency had been established in South Africa, and 1,300 people to date have not been arrested without charge and without recourse; 25 people have not been killed as a result of that emergency.

Those who had been accustomed to at least providing those victims of racist, Nazi, Fascist oppression had not been denied the right to bury them in public funerals, nor had we the moral leadership which we sought to exert seized by France, and saying that we would do what the House proposes to do without delay.

So I am hopeful that as we pass this measure that we look to stronger indications to the South African Government that we will no longer cooperate with their blind march toward racism, violence, bloodshed, and ultimately destruction, but will reward them when they turn up the road toward true democracy, toward dialog, and toward full self-determination.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER], the ranking member on the Subcommittee on Africa.

Mr. SILJANDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, the violence in South Africa must stop. The bloodshed of innocent people, blacks against blacks, whites against blacks, it must stop. I, as one Member, feel that we, as the greatest Nation on the Earth, a great and free democracy that holds up high the symbols of truth and fairness and liberty and justice, that we should do all we can do, and we have a responsibility to do all we can do to encourage those who are under oppression in other countries to be released.

We call on the Government of South Africa to release the majority to become part of the political and economic and social system fully in that country. We call upon the apartheid racist regime to cease and desist in their pass laws, detention laws, and all the other apartheid laws that made that country an abomination of human rights and freedom.

All of the messages in Congress, be it the House bill, the Senate version, the conference committee report, several substitutes offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. ZSCHAU], myself and others, we have all called for the dismantlement of apartheid. That concept is elementary.

I hope the Government of South Africa hears this message loudly and very, very clearly: That there is not one Member, white or black, young or old, who could possibly, by any remote stretch of the imagination, support a system that stabilizes the apartheid system in that country.

I have made the arguments against sanctions on the floor, in the subcommittee, in the full committee, and last night and through the day in conference, so I will not go through those same arguments again. I believe philosophically that sanctions are the wrong approach to prompt change in that nation. The grain embargo failed against the Soviets. Sanctions against Cuba failed, and indeed, I think the sanctions against Nicaragua will also fail. I believe that banning Krugerrands is merely symbolic, a symbolic gesture that they claim is against the Government, but truly it is against the people.

But I must say there are some good things about H.R. 1460, although I intend to vote against the bill. I offered mandatory Sullivan principles as an option to sanctions. On the floor it has lost, but now, with enthusiasm, both the House and the Senate are adopting the same idea. I also proposed on the floor an amendment to make the U.S. Embassy in South Africa conform to the Sullivan principles. It passed this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SILJANDER] has expired.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. SILJANDER. So that amendment is also included in this conference report.

Scholarships for black South Africans, assistance to black businesses, are also part of the Siljander substitute, which are also part of this conference report.

I think the major issue that I have found extremely offensive in the House version that passed this body was the fact that we banned all new business to South Africa. I did not believe that that would have been an effective deterrent ot the apartheid system. That is the mainstay, the cornerstone, from my point of view, of the House bill. That was also taken out and not accepted in the conference report.

Democracy, I hope, will be the option, as we are hoping it will be in Angola with the successful repeal of the Clark amendment, and a repeal of military aid to Mozambique.

So the Africa policy in the last 6 to 8 months, from this gentleman's point of view, has been quite successful. I hope South Africa will change and will change very, very soon. This provision, in my opinion, will not fully engage change as necessary, so I intend to vote against the provision, but regardless of what happens in this House and in the Senate, and what the President finally decides ultimately to do, I hope and pray that apartheid will change and that people will be free. Let us hope and pray.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from California [Mr. DYMALLY].

Mr. DYMALLY. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the Anti-Apartheid Act.

Mr. Speaker, symbolizing justice and humanity to much of the world, America must act, and do it quickly, to bring comfort and support to South Africa's antiapartheid movement. This Government's continuing debate over the proper course of action has only encouraged the current regime in South Africa. Indeed, our collaboration is clear. President Botha's recent declaration of the state of emergency constitutes a deliberate plan to decapitate the antiapartheid movement. While the Johannsburg police detained 1,000 blacks, the Reagan administration announced that this action fails to warrant a shift in constructive engagement with the Botha government. Carel Boshoff, the chairman of the rightwing Afrikaner secret society, Broederbond, even praised the Reagan administration last week for not interferring in South African affairs. This is the same man who has claimed that only white salvation will bring peace to South Africa. The same man who predicts that in a race war, South Africa's blacks will be no match against the minority white society. The same man who claims that the black threat to South Africa reminds him of the Jewish threat to Germany.

Mr. Speaker, our association with South Africa is against our best interests. Let us welcome a new, just approach, embrace the antiapartheid movement, and support the Anti-Apartheid Act.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CROCKETT].

Mr. CROCKETT. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I have a great sense of pride on this occasion. The chairman of my committee, the Committee on Foreign Affairs, is from my native State of Florida, and he has expressed what I believe is the majority sentiment of this country with respect to what is happening in South Africa.

Both the ranking minority member on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, my colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], and the chairman of our Subcommittee on Africa, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOLPE], are colleagues of mine from the State of Michigan, so the State of Michigan itself is proud of the bipartisan contribution these two sons of Michigan have made.

I have no illusions, Mr. Speaker, that the passage of this conference report is going to immediately bring about changes in South Africa. I think by and large the conference report, on which I had the honor to serve as a conferee, is essentially symbolic, but I expect it to do two things:

First, to convince all doubters that the majority of the American people believe that the administration's policy of constructive engagement has been a dismal failure.

Second, to carry home to the new rulers of South Africa, to the Bishop Tutu's, to the Nelson Mandela's, and to the others who represent the future rulers of that great country, the clear message that the people of the United Stats are behind them in their fight for liberation.

I commend the conference report to my colleagues.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California, Mr. JERRY LEWIS.

Mr. LEWIS of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would really like, in my short time, to attempt to make a couple of points.

The first relates to the general issue itself, the conference report that is before us. Frankly, as I sat and listened earlier to my colleague, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], express his concerns, I could not help but want to recognize that, indeed, in this very delicate circumstance I can understand why a public policy maker would have concerns of that kind.

Having said that, it is my view that the House owes a deep debt of gratitude to Chairman DANTE FASCELL, and to my ranking member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD], for dealing with this very, very difficult circumstance. It has got to be clear to anybody who will but take a look that the difficulties in South Africa are difficulties that we cannot ignore.

When we have a circumstance in which at least two-thirds of the people of a country are not given even the basic vestige of what we know as civil rights in this country, indeed we know that circumstance is going to change. For once, as America attempts to take the side of that which is morally correct, let us hope our policy allows us, as that change takes place, to land on the right side of the curve, because we have a fundamental and critical interest in South Africa.

Having said that, let me say that I attended the conference for another purpose, not as a member of the conference but, rather, to deal with the issue of whether America should participate in this process by way of issuing American gold coins. I want to express my deep appreciation to my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], for his great cooperation and making possible the progress we have made in connnection with that work.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] has expired.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional one-half minute to my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of California. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding. I want every Member of this House to know the important role that the gentleman from California has played in the gold coin portion of this legislation.

Much of the gold coin provision which we are voting on today was taken from H.R. 1123, introduced on February 19 by Mr. LEWIS, along with the gentleman from California [Mr. DIXON], and 237 other Members of the House.

It was the hard work and tireless efforts of the gentleman from California [Mr. LEWIS] that provided the push for the Gold Coin Program. And while I had differences in the technical aspects of the legislation, I never for 1 minute had a difference with the gentleman from California for the laudable purposes of the legislation.

Had the conference not addressed the gold coin issue at this time, the Consumer Affairs and Coinage Subcommittee, which I chair, was scheduled to hold hearings on the gentleman's legislation in September. And I am certain that the committee would have reported the legislation and it would have passed the House floor.

So while the conference did not directly pass the Lewis bill, it did pass the Lewis principle. The gentleman from California deserves the plaudits of every Member of the House as well as everyone in this country who was interested in a Gold Coin Program.

Mr. LEWIS of California. Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO], for his comments.

Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few remarks here just before final adoption by the House of Representatives of the conference report on H.R. 1640 in regard to the coins authorized in that legislation. As the distinguished chairman of the Banking Subcommittee on Consumer Affairs and Coinage has acknowledged, the substance of the Senate amendment that was accepted by the conferees to this legislation is the same as H.R. 1123, which I introduced on February 19, so I think it is useful to explain for the RECORD what we are doing here by agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The chairman has suggested that the gold bullion coins will not become a circulating medium of exchange. In this detail, I believe history will prove him wrong. The fictional dollar values assigned in the conference will not cause the gold coins never to circulate. As the distinguished ranking member of the Banking Committee, Mr. WYLIE, a member of the conference committee, stated in his remarks a few minutes ago, the coins will circulate at their market value.

The fictional face value on the gold coins was necessary to assure the legal tender status of the gold coinage in international trade, and to assure that foreign nations will be required under the General Agreement on Tarriffs and Trade to permit the duty-free import of U.S. coins.

Nevertheless, I am proud that the conferees have accepted the Senate amendment—the U.S. gold bullion coins that we initiated here by introducing H.R. 1123. I want to congratulate my colleague from California, Mr. DIXON, for the help he has given us in bringing this legislation forward. We are proud that the bullion coin legislation has been cosponsored by every member of the Black Caucus as well as the entire Republican leadership. Without his very early support and endorsement of this positive solution to the problem of the Krugerrand, it would never have been possible to achieve this degree of success.

The idea of a U.S. bullion coin, which is before us today as the Senate amendment to H.R. 1460, has received the endorsement and cosponsorhip of over 238 of our colleagues. This overwhelming show of support for the idea of a U.S. gold coinage is a tribute to the bipartisan spirit in the Congress when the time for a new idea has truly come.

The idea for this gold coinage was first presented to Congress by the report of the Gold Commission in 1982. The Gold Commission was a special, joint commission with representatives from the Federal Reserve, the Council of Economic Advisors, the Joint Economic Committee, the Senate and House Banking Committees, and the public. The 17-member Commission was chaired by the Secretary of Treasury, who is presently the Chief of Staff at the White House. One of the Gold Commission's most active members was our former colleague, Ron Paul of Texas, who had made the reestablishment of a U.S. gold coinage his primary mission in his four terms in Congress.

The Gold Commission's duty was to sit in judgment on the controversy surrounding the role of gold. There were voices demanding a "return to the gold standard" and a mixture of opinions regarding the role of monetary policy and alternative regimes the United States might adopt to stabilize our system. The Gold Commission was mandated to study and recommend a policy to the Congress that would set the role of gold in our monetary system, with as little regard for politics or prejudice as might be possible. Its report to the Congress was transmitted on March 31, 1982.

The sole recommendation of the Gold Commission was Ron Paul's proposal for a U.S. gold coinage. That is the substance of the Senate amendment to H.R. 1460 before the House today. The Gold Commission, like the Congress today, supported the concept of a gold coinage with a common consensus that such a coinage will be an overall benefit to our monetary system.

To quote the report of the Gold Commission:

> Among those who support the proposal, two conceptions of the character of the demand for such coins are evident. Some of us expect the demand for such coins to be an investment demand, similar to the demand for Krugerrands, Maple Leafs, Mexican pesos, and other foreign coins that have found a market in this country. Others expect the demand for such coins to be (or have the potential to be) a demand for their use as money. Their value would change from day to day as the value of the gold content of the coin fluctuated in the free gold market.
> Some advocates of this proposal see such coins as facilitating development of a dual monetary system, which would impose an additional degree of discipline on discretionary operation of monetary policy.

This was the case that Congressman Paul put before the Gold Commission, and he carried the Secretary of the Treasury and the overwhelming majority of the Gold Commission with him.

The clear intent of the Commission in its recommendation to the Congress was to create competition in these two aspects of the monetary system: First, between gold coins from different issuers, to let the American public have the opportunity to satisfy a strongly revealed demand for such coins in a way that would not require them to extend a hand to a symbol of apartheid or to a foreign sovereign; and second, between forms of money, as in a dual monetary system with the parallel, concurrent circulation of gold ounces and paper dollars—with the clear implication that without an exclusive circulation for the one form or the other, there could evolve some greater implicit discipline on the monetary authorities.

In the 99th Congress, my colleague, Mr. DIXON, and I have worked to bring the Gold Commission's recommendation to this final stage. On February 19 of this year, we introduced H.R. 1123 to create a coin similar to the Gold Commission's recommendation and be positioned in the world coin market so as to reduce substantially, if not eliminate, the circulation of foreign gold coins in this country, particularly the Krugerrand from South Africa.

On March 7, the majority leader, Mr. DOLE, and Senator CRANSTON, the minority whip in the Senate and a member of both the Senate Foreign Relations Committee and Senate Banking Committee, introduced an identical bill, and that measure is before this House today as the Senate coinage amendment to H.R. 1460.

Although there have been no committee hearings and no reports in this Congress on the gold coinage, the Banking Committees of the House and Senate have thoroughly examined the merits of the proposal in the previous Congresses, and of course we have the report of the Gold Commission as part of the legislative history of this monetary reform.

I believe that history will unfold an evolution in the role of these new U.S. gold coins. From a small but auspicious beginning, millions of American will become owners of gold bullion coins. When the day comes—and it will—when the paper dollar once agains depreciates rapidly due to an irresponsible and inflationary monetary policy, our people will turn to their bullion coins and find in our action today the foundation for monetary stability.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. ADDABBO].

Mr. ADDABBO. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Florida, and I rise in strong support of this conference report.

Mr. Speaker, the events of the past several weeks have awakened us to the fact that the situation in South Africa can no longer be ignored and can no longer be swept under the rug through a policy of constructive engagement.

For years the administration has been promising us that if we just went along with a policy of friendly persuasion, things would begin to improve. We have continued to receive assurances from the White House that things were improving. The events of recent weeks have shown that this is simply not the case.

The state of emergency imposed by the government in Pretoria is vivid evidence that that the situation is not only not getting better but is in fact getting worse. Whatever few human rights the black population of South Africa had have been brutally revoked by this desperate move.

As the leader of the free world, this Nation can no longer sit quietly by and while a government that has enjoyed our support becomes increasingly oppressive. The time has come to remove our heads from the sand and recognize that our policy of constructive engagement has been a failure. The time has come to impose severe and meaningful sanctions against South Africa, ones that will forcefully demonstrate our disdain for their blatant violation of human rights.

I stand today in support of the measures this Congress is considering against South Africa. How many times can we afford to stand by and allow the Communists to exploit an intolerable situation to their own advantage while we do nothing? Haven't we learned from bitter experience what can result when people of good will and fine intentions close their eyes to brutality?

There is still time for us to act. The blood of innocent people has already begun to flow in South Africa, and unless the civilized world is prepared to stand up and demand that it be stopped, I am afraid that the results will be tragic.

I strongly urge my colleagues to take action now. Perhaps if the government in Pretoria is finally convinced that we are serious about our opposition to their actions they will begin to take respect for human rights seriously. As we voted for the original legislation, we must now support this conference report.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, I speak with honor and pride today that I am a Member of this House which is considering the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act, which I have cosponsored.

My regret is that the Congress did not adopt this legislation last year. Although the House adopted a similar bill, the Senate did not do so. If the Congress had taken a stand, perhaps lives in South Africa would have been saved. Perhaps we would not be witnessing the dire situation which exists in South Africa today.

In speaking in favor of the legislation when the House debated it in June, I said that we must realize the long-term implications of our present relationship with South Africa. I said that most people agree that the walls of apartheid will be torn down, and that most people agree that the longer the walls remain standing, the more violent will be the means to bring them down. We are now witnessing that violence. We must not delay another day in taking a stand for our Government against the evil of apartheid.

The legislation which we have before us today clearly demonstrates our distaste for apartheid. It takes important steps to end our country's financial support for the South African system. In the legislation: We end bank loans to South Africa, we prohibit the importation of South African gold coins, we prohibit the sale of computer equipment to South Africa and we seek to end new investment by American companies in South Africa unless there is significant change in the apartheid system.

Some say that this legislation is not enough. That we must end all American investment in South Africa. That is true. We can continue to work toward that goal, and if no progress occurs implement such a policy. But the legislation which we have before us today is an excellent start. It ends our country's misguided policy of "constructive engagement" and in its place makes clear that we have no tolerance for the immoral system of apartheid.

I urge my colleagues to adopt this legislation. I am honored to vote to bring freedom and justice to all of the people of South Africa.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DEWINE], who signed the conference report.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DeWINE. I yield to my friend, the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I rise in very strong support of this measure, which is long overdue, to bring justice and equal opportunity to South Africa. I commend the leadership of our Committee on Foreign Affairs and of the Subcommittee on Africa for bringing this measure to the floor before we recess and, hopefully, in time to save additional lives.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that all of my colleagues will be able to support this legislation, an important step in the increased American pressure that should be brought against the South African Government in an effort to persuade it to end its current harsh, discriminatory policies.

The recent events in South Africa emphasize the need for this legislation. Some forces in South Africa will use the present unrest as an excuse to press for the repeal of the modest reforms that have been made up to this date. We must speak to those forces, and let them know that we expect progress, not reaction, in the face of current tensions. Obviously, the system in South Africa cannot be changed overnight. But we expect measured, real change to come about.

This bill provides immediate sanctions in the form of a cutoff of loans to the South African Government, a banning of the importation of Krugerrands, and a halt to shipments of computers to that country. The bill calls for increasing sanctions in the months and years ahead if South Africa fails to heed the call of the international community and the great majority of its own people and if it fails to undertake serious reforms.

I was pleased to support the original bill when it came to the House floor, and I am happy to support this compromise version of the legislation.

Mr. DEWINE. Mr. Speaker, I voted against this bill when it came on the House floor. I voted against it in committee and subcommittee. But last night I signed the conference committee report.

Make no mistake about it, this is a much superior bill than the one we sent out of this House, and it is superior for several reasons. First of all, it does have mandatory Sullivan principles in it. It allows the United States to continue and to expand its constructive role in South Africa. It has mandatory Sullivan principles for all U.S. companies doing business in South Africa.

The second main reason that I am supporting this bill is because the House bill was all front loaded. It did everything right away. This bill is a much more reasoned, logical approach. It does a few things at first, and then it tells the Government of South Africa, "This is what we are going to do, and this is how you can avoid it if you will grant some very basic, elementary human rights."

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this conference report. I urge my President to sign the bill. It is a good bill, it is a constructive bill. No one on either side of the aisle knows, frankly, what good this bill will do. We do not honestly know. Sometimes I think both sides overestimate our ability to control events in South Africa, but it is right that we try, and this is the right bill to do it with.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, very quickly, I would like to say that from the magic moments when Randall Robinson and our colleague, the gentleman from the District of Columbia, Mr. WALTER FAUNTROY, started the demonstrations in front of the South African Embassy, to the point where so many of us demonstrated in front of that embassy, to the magic moment yesterday when in fact I was honored to be one of the conferees to sign that conference report, I have believed that peaceful and constructive and meaningful demonstrations can bring about change, and I think that was the product of yesterday's debate.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GUNDERSON].

Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I was a Member who offered one of the two substitutes considered by this Congress when this issue was before us at an earlier point in time, and I, too, am happy today to stand and urge my colleagues to support the conference report.

Let me point out what we have included in this particular package. I want to commend those Members on both sides of the aisle of the Foreign Affairs Committee and the Banking Committee for an outstanding job of bringing about a bipartisan program for justice in South Africa. That is what this is. It is the positive action that we talked about, with Sullivan proposals, the scholarships for the blacks, and the conditional investment as well.

I consider that positive because it says there are certain things we are going to do today. We are going to tell the Government of South Africa, "Clean up your act. Bring justice to all your people or a year from now we are going to take tougher actions. But you be the judge."

What we are really doing today, then, is we are going beyond the positive actions of conditional investment and the positive actions I have mentioned to include some sanctions, something many of us on our side of the aisle opposed earlier. Why should we do that today? I believe that the sanctions included in this bill are a legitimate response to the state of emergency and the actions that are occurring by the South African Government today, and I say that it would be wrong for the greatest free republic in the world to not have some kind of response for the rest of the world to know that we still are the bastion of freedom and we want to send that signal to the world, that bipartisan plan for justice.

Mr. Speaker, that is what we are doing today. I commend my colleagues for this action, and I join with them in their very positive action on this particular proposal.

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. BERMAN].

Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the principal sponsors of this bill, the gentleman from Michigan, the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York. Throughout their long and distinguished careers in this body, they have worked tireless for a just and humane policy toward South Africa. We are deeply indebted to them for dedicating so much of their enormous talent, their unbounded energy and their great wisdom to this cause.

The sanctions in this bill will not force the South African Government to immediately grant equal rights to blacks.

But those who rule in South Africa should understand the bill's full meaning.

It means that the United States has joined the peaceful protest against apartheid—we will use nonviolent pressure to hasten the end of racial domination.

And this bill means that we do not regard the oppressors in South Africa as allies. Their rigid adherence to apartheid is the best friend the Soviet Union has in Africa.

One of the bill's sanctions—the restriction on computer sales to the South African Government—directly affects the enforcement of apartheid.

As the originator of the ban on computer sales to the South African Government which the House passed in the Anti-Apartheid Act, and as the conferee who negotiated the compromise which appears in this bill, I would like to comment on the computer sanctions.

These are significant new restrictions on computer sales to the South African Government. They close huge loopholes in current regulations.

It is important to note that the sanctions apply to all future sales of computers, software or goods or technology intended to service computers—whether or not such sales may be subject to long-term contracts or leasing arrangements. Explicit language in the House bill applied the sanctions to exisiting contracts. This was dropped in conference only because it was no longer necessary. The House bill amended the Export Administration Act, which contains a contract sanctity provision exempting contracted exports from foreign policy controls. The computer sanctions in this bill are free standing. They do not fall under the Export Administration Act, and therefore need no special provision to assure that they apply to all exports, whether subject to a contract or not.

The bill imposes a total ban on computer sales to South Africa's military, police and apartheid-enforcing agencies.

The ban applies to sales of all computers of any size. Current regulations, by contrast, impose no controls on personal computer sales to South Africa's police or apartheid-enforcing agencies. Exceptions for personal computers are inappropriate in the South African context. Any personal computer can be outfitted with a hard disk with a memory of 2,000 pages, or, using a modem, can become a terminal for a mainframe and have access to its memory bank. The South African Government can use personal computers in local and regional offices, as well as central government mainframe computers, to enforce controls on blacks.

The sanctions explicitly cover software and servicing for American computers already owned by the South African Government. Current regulations exempt from controls software and servicing for goods previously licensed.

The ban on sales to the military, police and apartheid-enforcing agencies covers all computer sales for any purpose. Current regulations allow computer sales to these entities if it is somehow determined that the computer will not contribute significantly to security or apartheid functions.

Finally, all computers sold to any entity of the South African Government are subject to the end use verification requirement. The verification procedures must be adequate to assure the computers are not used for police, military or apartheid-enforcing purposes. Currently, there are no such controls over computers sold to most agencies of the South African Government.

Mr. Speaker, I was disturbed by the active lobbying which some computer companies did to minimize restrictions on computer sales to the South African Government—particularly Control Data, IBM, and Hewlett-Packard.

To be fair, these companies argued from the beginning that they did not wish to sell new computers to South Africa's military, police, or apartheid-enforcing agencies. But they did want to continue to serve and provide software for computers previously sold or leased to these agencies. They insisted on continuing to sell to other agencies of the South African Government—even those which do not in any way benefit blacks.

As far as I know, computer industry spokesmen were the only business representatives who mounted an active campaign against sanctions in this bill. Their actions are surprising, given that their product contributes so directly to apartheid, and sales to the South African Government represent such a tiny fraction of their worldwide profit.

Recall that when some American companies unknowingly contracted to sell nerve gas chemicals to Iraq, those companies appealed to the Government for sanctions to relieve them from any obligation to fulfill the nerve gas contracts. I would have thought that American computer companies would take a similar view of their business with the South African Government. A total ban on computer sales to the Government would relieve them of any obligation to sell a computer that might be used to oppress blacks.

Were it not for computer company lobbying, this bill might have contained the original House ban on all computer sales to the South African Government. It would have been much stronger. Even though this bill requires verification procedures, it is going to be very difficult to prevent the South African Government from using any computer at its disposal to maintain controls over the daily lives of blacks.

I would urge the computer companies voluntarily to halt all sales to the South African Government, following the example of American banks. Some things are more important than profits.

If the computer companies are determined to sell the South African Government, I would note that much of the burden for end use verification will fall on their shoulders. I would urge them to be thorough and conscientious to assure there is no diversion of their computers to use in enforcing apartheid.

Finally, I would note that the Statement of Managers urges computer companies not to sell computers of any size to South African Government agencies which provide no services to nonwhites. Although the law prohibits only sales above $100,000 to such agencies, I would urge the companies to sell computers only to government entities which provide valuable services to blacks in South Africa.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. ZSCHAU], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. ZSCHAU. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the conference report. I want to commend the conferees and the authors of this legislation for their leadership.

When H.R. 1460 was before the House earlier this year, I voted against it. Although I supported its objective of helping to bring an end to apartheid, I felt that it contained provisions that would be counterproductive to that objective. In particular, I opposed the ban on new investment. Many U.S. companies are playing a constructive role in bringing about fair employment practices and a better life to black South Africans. These companies, which subscribe to the Sullivan principles, should be encouraged to expand and help bring about change rather than being stifled.

I offered an amendment to the House bill that would have restricted the ban on new investment to only those companies that did not abide by the Sullivan code. My amendment was defeated. However, I'm pleased that the concept of my amendment is in this conference report. The Sullivan code is made mandatory, and there is no ban on new investment by U.S. companies.

I was also concerned about the blanket ban on computer sales to the Government of South Africa contained in the House bill. We should not be selling computers for use by the South African Government in administering apartheid. In fact, current export regulations restrict that. However, I feel that U.S. companies should be able to compete for the business of South African Government agencies that have nothing to do with the enforcement of apartheid and which provide valuable services to nonwhites as well as whites. In this conference report, the computer ban is targeted to restrict computer sales only to those agencies that enforce apartheid. That is as it should be.

This conference report, in my opinion, is a balanced and responsible action. It is important that it is balanced and responsible. However, it is essential that it is an action. The time for talk is past. The time for action is now.

Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support this conference report, and I urge the President to sign this legislation into law.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. LAGOMARSINO], a member of the Foreign Affairs Committee.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who voted against the bill when it passed the House, but I must point out to my colleagues that this is not the same bill. In my opinion, the House-passed bill would have been counterproductive, would have done more damage than good. I think the bill as drafted by the conference committee is appropriate. It makes a statement that we should all make and I think it may well help the situation in South Africa.

Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues to vote for the bill.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, to conclude the debate now on our side, I yield the remaining time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALKER].

Mr. WALKER. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I rise in support of this conference report. Over the last 2 hours, I have been circulating on the floor among Republican Members who voted against this bill when it left the House. A letter to the President, which I intend to read at this point, along with the signatures of the Members who have signed the letter, is as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

THE PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: On June 5, 1985, the House of Representatives voted by an overwhelming margin to immediately impose economic sanctions on South Africa. Subsequently, the Senate on July 11 passed its version of sanctions against the South African government by an even larger margin. We opposed the House bill believing many of its provisions to be ineffective and counterproductive.

However, we are now prepared to support the agreement reached last night by House and Senate conferees. We believe the Conference Report to be a fair and reasonable compromise between the House and Senate positions. Furthermore, the persistent and escalating violence in South Africa requires our country to respond immediately to this crisis.

We respectfully urge you not to veto this measure because it is an important statement of U.S. policy for the future. It has bipartisan support in both Houses which is almost certainly substantial enough to override a veto. Given our strong support for this measure, we would be compelled to actively work for such an override, should it become necessary. We urge you to accept the Conference Report on H.R. 1460.

Mr. Speaker, that letter is signed by myself, Messrs. BROOMFIELD, GINGRICH, HENRY, GUNDERSON, CRAIG, HILLIS, Mrs. VUCANOVICH, Messrs. STRANG, BEREUTER, DREIER, ZSCHAU, LAGOMARSINO, WHITTAKER, DEWINE, and COBEY.

We will have other signatures before this day is over. I expect to nearly double that number.

I think it is a signal to the President that those 127 people who voted against this bill when it left the House is not a base upon which to build a veto. In fact, that base is deteriorating.

The President ought to sign this bill. It is a good bill at a good time.

Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman again for yielding.

Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes for purposes of closing the debate to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLARZ].

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, today marks an historic beginning for the U.S. Congress. While we have always been able to battle the disgusting practice of apartheid with rhetoric, we have the opportunity today to put the U.S. Congress on record against the policies of the South African Government. I want to ask our colleagues in the other body at this time to approve the conference report to H.R. 1460. Let America again be looked upon as the primary defender of world rights and liberties.

Obviously, the legislation is a first, albeit important, step in the fight against apartheid. No one in the Congress should overlook the significance of today's legislation. Unless the South African Government changes its ways, more needs to be done in the future. However, I am concerned that while the measure we have before us today may soon become law, it still might lack the full support of the administration.

Mr. Speaker, we are not the only nation with an interest in this matter. The case for bringing economic sanctions against South Africa by the international community at the United Nations is a continuing one. The world body needs the backing of the United States to pass meaningful sanctions against the South Africans. I am very concerned that the administration might not support the limited sanctions we are considering today. Such a lack of support would break the back of those advocating an end to the apartheid system. Thus, I will be introducing legislation in September which would express the sense of the Congress that this institution expects the administration to uphold these sanctions should they become law. In such a highly visible world forum as the United Nations, the potential damage that might result to the anti-apartheid movement from administration inaction is enormous.

Mr. Speaker, should H.R 1460 become law, it must mark the end of the policy of constructive engagement. Let us not be the one nation standing in the way of social reform in South Africa. In the face of new regulations banning even outdoor funerals, I call upon the President to support this legislation, and to meet with members of the Congressional Black Caucus to hear our concerns on this matter.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, this is an extraordinarily significant achievement. For the first time since the establishment of apartheid in 1948, 37 years ago, the United States will be going on record as making clear our opposition to apartheid by deed, as well as by word.

The adoption of this conference report will send a message to the minority regime in South Africa that the United States will not continue to conduct business as usual with them in the absence of any meaningful progress for the elimination of apartheid.

It will send a message to the indigenous majority within South Africa that the United States is on the side of change, rather than on the side of the status quo in that country.

A little bit earlier, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] said that he was fearful of the consequences for the West if an unfriendly government should one day come to power in South Africa. Well, let me tell my friend, the gentleman from Indiana, and the other Members of this House, that sooner or later, the black majority in South Africa will inevitably be in a position to determine their own destiny and when that day comes, the United States will be in a much better position to have a truly constructive relationship with South Africa if, in the interim, we have made it clear that we are on the side of change, rather than on the side of the status quo.

Mr. Speaker, I want to use this opportunity to close the debate to make a plea to the President of the United States, who has here an opportunity to create a genuine bipartisan consensus with respect to our foreign policy toward South Africa, not only a consensus among Democrats and Republicans in the Congress, but a consensus between the Congress and the executive branch itself.

We are much more effective abroad when we are united at home. How wonderful it would be if we could all stand up in the Rose Garden of the White House, Republicans and Democrats alike, together with the President of the United States, and say to South Africa and the rest of the world that the United States, at long last, is prepared to use its influence, its resources, to help bring about the elimination of apartheid in South Africa.

I would say to the President of the United States, "Mr. President, after the murder of 500 blacks in South Africa in the last year alone, most of them by the security forces of that country, after the establishment of the state of seige, after the withdrawal of the U.S. Ambassador to South Africa from Pretoria and the withdrawal of the South African Ambassador to the United States from Washington, after the establishment of sanctions against South Africa by Canada and France and the call for sanctions against South Africa unanimously by the Security Council of the United Nations, the time has come for us to finally write the obituary for the policy of constructive engagement.

"It was tried, but it did not work, and it created the impression that the United States was somehow in sympathy with the Government of South Africa without producing any meaningful progress toward the elimination of apartheid."

We need a new policy, the policy embodied in this conference report which calls for the elimination forthwith of apartheid in South Africa.

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with many issues today, but few are more important or timely than the adoption of this conference report. The events of the last few weeks have proven—if further proof were needed—that the Government of South Africa ruthlessly represses its black citizens. Just yesterday, new restrictions were imposed on funerals, which are the only form of political expression left to South African blacks.

Many Americans have watched in horror and frustration the deteriorating situation in South Africa. And they have asked a single question: What is our Government, one that is founded on respect for human rights and human freedom, what is our Government doing to end this tragedy? The answer to that question is in this legislation. The measures it proposes are quite simply the least we can do.

There have been many speeches made about the situation in South Africa. But this bill speaks more loudly and more effectively than even the most eloquent words. It is our opportunity to demonstrate our commitment to racial justice and political liberties, not just at home but abroad.

Mr. Speaker, there should be no controversy about this conference report. The House has agreed to these provisions. The Senate has agreed. I hope the White House will come to agree as well. But now it is time for us to act. I urge my colleagues to adopt this conference report.●

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act, as reported by the conference committee. While this Member would have preferred to see the Congress pass the measure previously approved by the House, the compromise represented by the conference report imposes economic sanctions on South Africa and indicates the steps we are willing to take if conditions in that country do not improve.

At present, the situation in South Africa is deteriorating. The 500 dead and over 1,200 arrests in the past year, and the current state of emergency that accelerated these statistics, speak of a situation which the United States must not continue to ignore. Our current policy of constructive engagement is an embarrassment. The South African Government has graphically illustrated the fact that it is unimpressed by this country's quiet, and unenthusiastic, disapproval of apartheid. Our credibility as a nation concerned with civil rights and willing, as we have done most recently in the case of Nicaragua, to express this conviction in concrete terms is on the line here. We must, at a minimum, vote in favor of the Anti-Apartheid Act.●

● Mr. LEVINE of California. Mr. Speaker, we have before us the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act. It is a good bill, and I urge my colleagues to support it.

This bill imposes an immediate ban on the importation of Krugerrands, prohibits loans to the South African Government, puts limitations on exports of computers to the South African Government, and imposes limitations on the export of nuclear goods and technology.

Additional sanctions are to be imposed if, after a 12-month period, the South African Government makes no progress toward ending apartheid. The sanctions can be eased if the Government makes progress. These additional sanctions include a ban on new U.S. investment in South Africa, prohibition of the imports into the United States of coal or uranium from South Africa, and the revocation of the most-favored-nation tariff status South Africa now enjoys with the United States.

Mr. Speaker, South Africa's practice of apartheid—institutional racism—is brutal and utterly inhumane. It is contrary to any standard of civilized society, and it must be stopped.

The Reagan administration's policy of constructive engagement is a failure. It has done nothing to ease the plight of South Africa's 22 million blacks. Rather, internal repression has escalated dramatically over the last 4 years. Black South Africans cannot vote or run for public office or have a voice in their own destiny. The South African Government's homelands policy has resulted in over 9 million black South Africans being stripped of their citizenship in the land of their own birth. The South Africa Government has increased its oppression of trade unions. Its policies have resulted in the deaths of blacks fighting for their rights and freedom. Constructive engagement has aligned the United States—our country—with the repression of white rule in the eyes of South Africa's black majority. America should stand for justice in South Africa. It is right and it will best serve our national interest.

Now South African President Botha has declared a state of emergency in that country. Repeatedly we see footage of black South Africans demonstrating for their rights and freedoms. Repeatedly we hear stories of more deaths of black South Africans, killed in the pursuit of these goals.

Mr. Speaker, as citizens of the United States, where freedom and equality are held precious and inviolable, we must support these overriding principles on behalf of an oppressed people. Black South Africans have made it clear that even if sanctions create hardships for them in the short run, they are willing to bear the burden to achieve political and economic freedom in the long run. The struggle in South Africa is not about jobs or investments. it's about justice and dignity and political freedom.

South African Bishop Desmond Tutu, recipient of the 1984 Nobel Prize for Peace, has said that no amount of repression can contain the millions of black South Africans who are determined to be free. Let us join with them and help them achieve their aspirations. Support this bill.

Thank you.●

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, it is now quite evident that in the past few weeks the policy of constructive engagement with South Africa has had very negative consequences. Coupled with the recent crackdown by South African authorities and the resulting deaths and arrests of South African blacks, President Reagan appears to have no choice now but to sign this historic legislation.

In conference, members of the President's own party have clearly repudiated the Reagan administration's policy of constructive engagement by agreeing to the conference report on the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. It is now up to the whole Senate to follow the leadership of Senator LUGAR, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and put the entire Senate on record in opposition to the apartheid system.

The Senate and ultimately the President, by agreeing to and signing the bill, will usher in a new era in U.S. foreign policy. We will serve notice to the world that the United States will be willing to use economic sanctions to protect the human rights of people across the world. Clearly, the American people are making the struggle for human dignity their own struggle. Surely the President and Senate cannot ignore now the will of the American people manifesting itself in an overwhelming 380–48 repudiation of constructive engagement.

If our great Nation is committed to equality and justice, then we must honor our own standards here and abroad and immediately disassociate ourselves from the appalling system of apartheid. As Bishop Desmond Tutu, Nobel Peace Prize winner, remarked, "Economic restrictions are black South Africa's only chance. The argument that blacks would suffer most from greater economic pressure is moral humbug." Today, my collegues, we can set into motion a forceful and realistic attack on South African apartheid. A policy that will enfranchise black South Africans with dignity and respect, and the political privileges that citizens all over the free world too often take for granted.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, South Africa's policy of apartheid represents vicious, institutionalized racism. It is a practice that has not ended with the administration's policy of constructive engagement. The fact is constructive engagement is a failed policy, and the time has come to stop providing support to a nation whose practices so completely belie our own democratic traditions of fairness and equality under the law. It is time to repudiate the policy of constructive engagement.

The failure of constructive engagement is evidenced by this mornings headlines. In response to increasingly vocal opposition to apartheid the white minority government of South Africa has banned outdoor funerals with any political content. Rather than working with black leaders to ease tensions, the Government has removed the only manner in which blacks were able to demonstrate their opposition to the Government.

Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation which will impose economic sanctions against South Africa. Economic sanctions can be a legitimate tool of foreign policy, and I am convinced that this would be an appropriate and effective means to bring about change in South Africa. It would, in any case, leave no question where the United States stands on the abhorrent policy of apartheid.

The economic sanctions in the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985 are just and represent a critical first step in disassociating the United States from the cruel and racist policies of South Africa. I urge adoption of this legislation.●

● Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to once again express my deep concern that our Government recognize the brutality endemic to the apartheid regime in South Africa, and that we as a nation abandon, without further delay, our policy of constructive engagement.

Mr. Speaker, France, Canada, and other members of the world community of nations are taking firm and unequivocal stands in response to Pretoria's unprecedented crackdown against the black people of South Africa. We can no longer continue to cling to a policy which has failed so completely and so tragically. South Africa must be made to understand that if it does wish to be considered a member of the western community of nations, there are certain standards which must be met. Simply claiming to be anti-Communist is not enough. If South Africa insists on its right to reject and defy all tenents of social and political justice and decency, we must insist upon our right to disassociate completely from that tyranny.

The international community is already doing precisely what I am advocating here tody. France, Sweden, Canada have all taken a stand. European parliamentarians are protesting en masse.

My concern, Mr. Speaker, is that the United States of America not be the one country clinging tenaciously to the apartheid regime while all other nations, great and small, do their parts to hasten the dismantlement of the repulsive system.

On March 7, 1985, I introduced the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. On July 31, House and Senate conferees agreed to ban bank loans to the South African public sector, ban nuclear trade with South Africa, ban computer exports to the Government of South Africa, and end the importation of South African Krugerrands into this country.

Constructive engagement clearly reflects neither the will of the American people nor the rising international tide in opposition to apartheid. I commend House and Senate conferees on the leadership they have shown. I trust that this bipartisan, bicameral position makes clear the urgency of implementing a new and enlightened South African policy.●

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to commend the distinguished chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Florida, for his outstanding and effective effort in bringing legislation important to the national interest to the floor in a timely manner. It is my understanding that over the past 2 weeks, the foreign Affairs Committee had three bills in conference simultaneously. To complicate the situation even further, it was necessary to interrupt the foreign aid conference, to take up and pass the Micronesian compact legislation. This was all accomplished smoothly.

We all owe our thanks to Mr. FASCELL, his committee, especially the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] for demonstrating a true spirit of constructive bipartisanship.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, when the South African sanctions passed the House I voted "no." In general, I thought the motivation good, the moral statement even better, but that the results would be harmful to all parties involved, particularly the black people of South Africa.

In general, I don't like sanctions. On the record, they have not been successful. I don't like sending messages by shooting ourselves or other relatively innocent bystanders in the foot.

In general, I like the policy of constructive engagement. I believe we are more effective working with foreign governments than we are when we threaten them. I like having U.S. firms, using Sullivan principles, standing as an example and a symbol in South Africa.

But, conditions have taken us past the in general stage and the personal preference state. The situation in South Africa has worsened, and continues to do so.

The conference report has taken us past the send-a-message stage. It is a vast improvement over the previously passed House bill. Both the carrots and the 1-year stick are helpful

It is now time for the Congress to act.

For those of us who don't like sanctions, who want to keep the U.S. presence as a symbol in South Africa, it is time to acknowledge the need for action.

There is a cost to us, and to the people, black and white, of South Africa. There are times when people of good will must accept some costs in the name of principle. One speaker today said that moral question had become predominant.

I am forced to conclude he is right. I must vote for this bill.●

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I was honored to participate in the conference on the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. I urge support of this most essential piece of legislation.

The sanctions that conferees agreed on against South Africa include banning the importation of Krugerrands, halting new U.S. bank loans, banning the sale of nuclear technology, applying the Sullivan principles to U.S. firms with more than 25 employees, minting new U.S. gold coins to compete with the Krugerrand, and providing $34 million of AID funds for scholarships for black South Africans. I believe that these sanctions send a message to the South African Government that apartheid must end, that they cannot continue to oppress 23 million of its citizens. The sanctions also send a message to our Government that we don't want to be constructively engaged with a government that practices legally mandated racism.

The situation in South Africa has deteriorated drastically in the past week. Since the Government established a state of emergency 11 days ago, 25 persons have been killed and 1,259 have been arrested. In addition, a ban on outside funerals for anyone who has died of unnatural causes in any of the black townships was established today. The state of emergency grants broad powers to the South African defense force and to the South African police (including the railways police and the prisons service). Those forces are authorized to "apply * * * such force as he under the circumstances may deem necessary * * *" to prevent even a suspected danger to public order. They are authorized to arrest and detain without a warrant or charge for up to 14 days. However, that 14-day period can be extended for an indefinite period pursuant to a written notice issued by the Minister of Law and Order. Detentions under the state of emergency do not have to allow access to legal counsel or family. The names of those detained may be withheld and any unauthorized distribution of the names is punishable by up to 10 years imprisonment or a substantial fine. It is important to note that new powers are an extension of far-reaching powers authorized under preexisting statutory law. The Internal Security Act of 1982 had already given the police broad powers to curtail the civil liberties of South Africa's black citizens. The 1982 act gives a police officer of the rank of lieutenant colonel or higher the power to detain a person incommunicado for the purposes of interrogation.

The conferees agreed that President Reagan must recommend stiffer sanctions for congressional approval, if the South African Government does not take one of several steps to end its oppressive and racist system of apartheid. These sanctions include a ban on new private U.S. investment in South Africa, a denial of most-favored-nation tariff status, and a prohibition on coal, uranium, or both. The steps that would be considered progress under the conference include an end to forced relocations, negotiations for a new political system with full rights for nonwhites, a settlement of the status of South African-controlled Namibia, freedom for all political prisoners, access to jobs and joint family housing for nonwhites, and an end to denationalization practices of segregation.

I urge support for the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. The United States must take a stand against apartheid.●

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, I rise to offer my support to the conference report on H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985. While I would wish for stronger measures, such as the imposition of an immediate ban on new investments in South Africa, I can support this bill because it is the first definitive action that this Congress has taken to express its abhorrence of apartheid.

Congress hereby states that the past pressures on the South African minority rule government have failed to effect substantive changes in that country's racist policies. In fact, many in this country and in this Congress believe that the administration's policy of "constructive engagement" has been equivalent to tacit approval of apartheid and to support for Mr. Botha's white-supremacist rule.

The increasing violence and unmitigated police brutality in South Africa show us that the situation is becoming worse. The state of emergency imposed by Pretoria demonstrates that the government plans to deal with the rising level of anger in the black community by implementing more repressive policies and by arresting opposition figures. Yesterday's new ban on mass outdoor funerals, the only means for blacks in South Africa to express dissent, makes this legislation most timely.

Mr. Speaker, this bill deserves our strong support. It is a long overdue change in our policy toward South Africa. The Anti-Apartheid Act of 1985 signifies unequivocally the beginning of the end of the fruitless policy of "constructive engagement."●

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, over the past few months we have seen America's attention focused on two crises in Africa. In sub-Sahara Africa we have witnessed the starvation of hundreds of thousands of people who have had their lives devastated by the worst that nature has to offer; and America has responded.

Even as we are helping to feed starving people in Africa we have been witnessing another disaster. This disaster represents the worst that man has to offer. The present Government of South Africa survives on the basis of a repugnant system of racial servitude. Again America is responding. The frustration and anger of the American people is represented in this legislation. These economic sanctions passed by the House and Senate are the first step in using America's influence to end the system of apartheid. We realize that total change will not occur overnight. But this measure will send a clear message to South Africa and also put them on notice that the United States intends to exert whatever pressure it is capable of.

This antiapartheid legislation is a first step; it is by no means the final action. No matter what it takes—complete economic isolation, severance of diplomatic relations, and the cessation of all political contacts between our country and South Africa—apartheid must end.

This legislation is also warning to the Reagan administration. While black South Africans are being murdered and imprisoned on a daily basis, President Reagan continues to stand by his bankrupt policy of constructive engagement. The Reagan administration knows that it cannot maintain this policy.

Mr. Speaker, let there be no mistake about what we are doing here today. We are taking a largely symbolic but important action step. But this is not the end of our pressures against the racist apartheid regime in South Africa; this is the beginning of the end of apartheid.●

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, earlier today, the House overwhelming approved the conference report on the Anti-Apartheid Act. It eventually will be approved by the Senate as well. While the act, as agreed to by the House and Senate conferees, is not as strong as some of us would have liked, it represents the best legislative proposal that could be obtained at this time.

Economic sanctions, at times, are more symbolic than effective. The Anti-Apartheid Act, a highly bipartisan measure, is important in that it signals to the world community and Pretoria that the Congress and the American people are committed to severing its relationship with, and support of, the most racist government on the planet. We want South Africa to open its doors of freedom to all of its citizens.

More importantly, the overwhelming support for the Anti-Apartheid Act signals to the Reagan administration that the constructive engagement policy has not only been a failure, but it has resulted in South Africa believing that the United States, while giving lipservice to apartheid, encourages for South Africa to conduct business as usual. Why should South Africa change its racist policies when it feels it has the backing of the most powerful government in the world?

Constructive engagement has permitted the United States to become the largest trading partner and second-largest foreign investor in South Africa. It also has become a toothless euphemism disguising military, economic, and diplomatic support to Pretoria which, until recently, has gone almost totally unnoticed.

Late last year, the Free South Africa Movement began; members of the Congressional Black Caucus and other Members of Congress were arrested almost daily at the South Africa Embassy. These arrests were instrumental in bringing the apartheid issue, which has existed for well over a century, to the front burner. Since that time, hundreds of thousands of Americans have, in a variety of ways, joined in showing their disapproval of South Africa's policies, and the administration's policy of passivity.

In fact, at this very moment, a large protest march is occurring in Detroit in which its citizens, as they have in the past, are again demanding an end to the terror in South Africa and responsible action from our Government in Washington.

Constructive engagement has resulted in the loss of over 500 lives in South Africa during the past year; additionally, thousands of innocent people being arrested. It has provided the minority government in South Africa with the boldness to thumb its nose at the world community, and impose incredible restrictions on 24 million individuals because they happen to be black.

Considering the events of the past several months in South Africa, where blacks have been brutally murdered by the South African police while attending funerals of others who also have been killed by the police, the administration should have taken the initiative to declare its constructive engagement policy toward South Africa ineffective and inefficient, and a total failure. Perhaps the actions that the Congress has taken today will cause the administration to reexamine its attitude to South Africa.

This is the same administration which so eagerly provided military and CIA support to rebels committed to destroying the current government which came to power as the result of overthrowing the infamous Somoza dictatorship. In fact, many of the rebels are former members of the Somoza regime. Recently, the administration has declared the Nicaraguan government a threat to our national security, and had no problems imposing economic sanctions.

Mr. Speaker, freedom is a very precious thing, and people will do anything to get it. Time is growing short for South Africa to peacefully end its apartheid system. In fact, one might say the revolution has already begun. Our American Revolution was started over the issue of freedom, and once it started there was no way of stopping it.

The burning desire for freedom stops for no one. Nor can it be stopped. Black South Africans will be free one day; it's just a matter of time. As Bishop Desmond Tutu, South Africa's 1984 Nobel Peace Prize winner, has reminded us, no amount of repression can contain 24 million people determined to be free.

There are some who say that economic sanctions will hurt South African blacks more than it will the white minority. Yet, American firms employ less than 1 percent—66,000—of South Africa's black population. Yet, American corporations control 70 percent of the computer market, 45 percent of the oil market, and 33 percent of the automotive market. These businesses are the jugular vein of the highly sophisticated South African police state, without which Pretoria could not maintain its political and economic structure.

The House, by overwhelmingly approving the Anti-Apartheid conference report, has taken the position that it will stand on the side of freedom. I urge President Reagan to not only sign this important legislation when it reaches his desk, but to also actively support it as well, and ensure that this legislation will be enforced to the fullest extent. This is an issue which the administration can ill afford to be out of synch with the wishes of the Congress and the majority of the American people.●

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, the conference report before us today, which imposes sanctions against the apartheid Government of South Africa, embodies a moderate compromise forged from this bill from the House and Senate. Neither the Senate nor the House version, by itself, would have accomplished all that I would like to see done regarding South Africa. Neither bill would have forced the South African Government to abandoned its racist policies and grant economic and political rights to the nonwhite majority in that country.—nor does this conference report.

The report nevertheless accomplishes something very important. It backs with action the emerging consensus that we should not contribute economically or politically, to the preservation of the abhorrent apartheid system. It demonstrates the commitment of the American people to serious reform in South Africa, and it does so without equivocation. It thereby enables us to join nations around the world that have taken concrete steps in support of the oppressed majority in that troubled country. France, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Australia, and others have adopted laws or taken other actions specifically directed against apartheid. In great Britain, for example, more than 120 local authorities, in cities and towns which include over two-thirds of the country's population, have joined a nationwide campaign of disinvestment.

There can be no doubt that actions of this kind have a strong impact in South Africa. The Pretoria government hears the voices from around the globe that indicate a growing isolation of their country. Black people in South Africa hear also, and are strengthened to press on with their struggle for political equality.

The South African Government has displayed a defiant mood in recent weeks. Outbreaks of political unrest and renewed resistance to white rule in black communities were met with the imposition of a "state of emergency" for the first time in 25 years. Under the emergency, the authorities' far-reading power to detain people without charge, to carry out searches and seizures, and to control the press were expanded still further. President Botha's response to the resulting international outcry was to declare, "No self-respecting country can allow any other country, large or small, to dictate to it how it should be governed."

In spite of its tough words, Pretoria has good reason to be alarmed. This bill imposes economic sanctions for the first time in the history of United States-South African relations, to be followed by tougher U.S. sanctions a year from now if conditions do not improve. By themselves, the exact a tangible cost to the South African economy. Perhaps more important they are the beginning of a process that could lead to comprehensive multilateral sanctions and the economic and political isolation of South Africa's white supremacist government from the rest of the world.

Its defiant rhetoric to the contrary, the South African Government has always demonstrated a craving for acceptance by the other nations of the world. It has invested in public relations campaigns for foreign consumption; it has sought to capitalize on signs that the United States, or other countries, may be ready to acquiesce in the survival of institutionalized white supremacy in south Africa.

In the context, the Reagan administration's refusal to consider a change in policy toward South Africa is a moral outrage and an embarrassment to the Congress and to the American people. Its reluctance even to criticize the violent actions of the South African Government serves only to support apartheid and to encourage Pretoria in its repressive and brutal policies.

We in the House today will demonstrate our disgust both for apartheid and for "constructive engagement" by voting overwhelmingly to adopt this conference report.●

The SPEAKER pro tempore. All time of the gentleman from Florida [Mr. FASCELL] has expired.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BROOMFIELD] has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. McCANDLESS changed his vote from "yea" to "nay."

Mr. SWINDALL and Mr. LUGAN changed their votes from "nay" to "yea."

So the conference report was agreed to.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GEJDENSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report just agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. DE LA GARZA. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on House Resolution 144, adopted earlier today.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Saunders, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House that on the following date the President approved and signed a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

On July 31, 1985:

SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS ACT, 1985

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2577) making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985, and for other purposes; with a Senate amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 112 thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment to the House amendment to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment to the House amendment to Senate amendment No. 112, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate numbered 112 with an amendment as follows: After "legislation" at the end of the last sentence, insert; "except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986".

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the further amendment of the Senate to the Senate amendment No. 112 to H.R. 2477.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may require.

May I say to my colleagues that the amendment adopted yesterday, after further study, appears to create more problems than it solved. We all agree we would prefer to have legislation authorizing projects; we all recognize that we would like to have our legislative committees doing authorizations.

May I say that we agree it would be much better if we could have authorizations and not have to proceed as we did. We are in accord with the feelings of the leadership of the legislative Committee on Public Works. As I said, the amendment adopted yesterday, upon further study, creates more problems than it solves.

The Senate, in looking it over, decided to give time for authorizations until May 15, 1986.

So what they have done is amend the provision that passed the House by adding the following words: "except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986."

So on yesterday we had a prohibition against initiating public works projects that were listed in that bill until we had legislative authorizations. May I repeat that the amendment of yesterday prohibited the initiation of construction of the projects that were listed in the bill until authorized by legislation.

It also prohibited the initiation of construction of those that had already been authorized.

In order to straighten the matter out, to give the legislative committee ample time in which to pass legislation which I hope they can do, the Senate added the following words: "except that this sentence shall not apply after May 15, 1986."

We discussed this with the leadership of the legislative committee; we are in accord; and this will give ample time, hopefully, for the Congress to pass legislation.

Again, the Senate amendment will release funds for those projects that are already authorized along with those that have not been, those that have been pending for a long time upon enactment of authorizing legislation on May 15, 1986.

Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HOWARD], the chairman of the committee of legislative authorization.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding me some time.

Mr. Chairman, as I understand this as it came back from the other body, it states that the action that was taken by the House on yesterday will be in effect until May 15, 1986, unless the Congress passes other water resource legislation before that time.

Mr. WHITTEN. That is correct.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman. I would just like the Members to know that this does seem in one way like a reasonable situation. It is saying, we are going to give you close to a year to get your act together to be able to pass water resource legislation; go to conference with the other body; and have it signed into law.

However, on the other hand, it could also be a signal to the Members of the other body to say, "If you can just hang in there, and do not cooperate, and do not work, and see that no legislation is passed by May 15, then we will have our power grab back again, and that will be the law."

I would like to state for the information of the Members of the House that I have spoken with the chairman of the Committee on Environment and Public Works in the other body; we do know that their water resource bill is out of their committee and is now pending, sequentially, before the Finance Committee in the other body, and the Senator from Vermont, chairman of that committee, has just recently assured me that he will make every effort to see to it that they have their bill out and we can go to conference and have a law, not by May 15, but by the end of this year.

We certainly will have our bill on the floor here by early October. So if we can get that promised cooperation from the other body, then I believe that all of our work would have been for a good purpose and we would have straightened out this whole matter.

I wish to thank the gentleman from Mississippi for yielding me the time to make this statement.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, may I say that we appreciate the fine work the gentleman does, and we join with him in hoping that we can get cooperation on the other side of the Capitol to follow the authorization process. We will be cooperative in every way that we can.

Mr. HOWARD. I thank the gentleman. We will keep our eye on them.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may require to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROE].

Mr. ROE. I want to thank the chairman of the Appropriations Committee for yielding to me.

Let me suggest in following up Chairman HOWARD's discussion that we have been working assiduously with Chairman WHITTEN, and Chairman HOWARD, and others, and Members of the other body, to get this matter resolved.

I think it is important for the Members to understand where this is going because you will all have a stake in this decision that is being made.

Let me suggest a couple points. One, yesterday there was an issue that had arisen with a number of the Members that had to do with authorized projects. I think that matter has to be clarified.

In the amendment that we offered and was adopted yesterday, it did put an umbrella over those 21 authorized projects.

Now, I have had a discussion with Chairman BEVILL and Chairman WHITTEN, and it was not the intent of the Public Works Committee to hold back authorized projects. Now what we are planning on doing—and I would recommend to our Appropriations Committee—is in other vehicles that are coming along, to remove that particular situation that has created a slight impediment on those projects that have already been authorized.

I would appreciate a colloquy with the gentleman from Alabama so that we are in concurrence with that understanding.

Mr. BEVILL. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman is absolutely correct. This was obviously his intention, but this does clear this up. If I may, at this point, I would like to thank the gentleman for his cooperation and effort on this, because we have all spent a lot of time on this, Chairman HOWARD, and Mr. EDGAR, and many others who have participated in it. So if I may at this point, I would like to make this point here also that the gentleman is interested in about the preliminary work. And here is a statement that will cover that:

Initiation of construction as proposed in amendment 112, which is all of the Corps of Engineers projects in this supplemental, is not intended to preclude work or actions essential to construction. It is fully intended that all the planning, design engineering, land acquisition, and bridge relocations necessary to prepare for construction of any project should proceed to the point where actual project construction may proceed when authorized and funding is available.

So I just wanted to clear that up. The gentleman is interested in that also.

Mr. ROE. That is our understanding of what the legislation will do.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I am sorry, I was distracted when you explained your proposal. Where is that language going to be placed?

Mr. BEVILL. This is going to be placed in the supplemental at the appropriate point, simply to clear that up——

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. In the bill?

Mr. BEVILL. In the supplemental, so that they can go right on with the preliminary work as intended when our bill left our committee, because they did not intend to restrict that part. But no construction. But preliminary work, studies, and that sort of thing.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will continue to yield, this will have to go back to the other body then, because they have not cleared this.

Mr. ROE. No.

Mr. BEVILL. No; I see what your question is. It is in the report.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Oh, in the report?

Mr. BEVILL. Yes.

Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate the gentleman yielding. He has been very gracious in explaining the situation to several of us who have authorized projects in the conference agreement. For those projects which have done the preliminary work and are ready for construction in 1986, could the gentleman give me some assurance that those projects are going to be left on track as this legislation moves forward?

Mr. ROE. I would like to respond to the gentleman. The answer is yes on that. This morning we reviewed every one of the 21 authorized projects that are in this bill with the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. KEMP. Including Ellicott Creek?

Mr. ROE. Yes, including Ellicott Creek and including every one that everyone called to our attention. The report we have in writing back from the corps is that it will not have an effect because all of those projects will be scheduled for consideration and construction in 1986.

Mr. KEMP. That is correct.

Mr. ROE. So therefore, as far as we are concerned, we do not see where you will have a problem with those issues, provided one of 2 things: the timeframe that is covering over in the Senate languages goes to May of next year, early May 1986, some action has to take place on the authorizing legislation between both bodies. That is one controlling date.

Mr. KEMP. Will the gentleman yield on that?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KEMP. What about those projects that are authorized?

Mr. ROE. I am talking about authorized projects. And I would recommend, I say to the gentleman from New York, those projects that are authorized, if we can get additional language in another piece of legislation, such as, for example, the 1986 appropriations bill, that could help move it faster. But we see no impediment to what you are trying to achieve.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a clarification?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I do not think we should mislead the gentleman. I know the gentleman does not intend to.

Mr. ROE. I do not think I mislead him.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. His project that he is vitally concerned about, Ellicott Creek in New York, cannot start with construction—they can do anything, which has mostly already been done there—construction may not start until May 15, 1986, or until subsequent legislation is passed, such as H.R. 6, providing for cost sharing. One of the things would have to be done before construction could start.

Mr. ROE. I do not want to complicate it. I have checked out in depth with the Corps of Engineers on all 21 of those projects. If the Appropriations Committee were to deprive all the money in the world to finish it, it would not make any difference because the plans and specifications will not be ready to go to bid until early 1986.

What the gentleman is saying, and correctly so, the controlling date under the Senate language is May 1986, so it is not going to impede any of the timeframe on the Ellicott Creek project.

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the motion to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

While I would have preferred the immediate availability of construction funds for those projects such as the Ellicott Creek flood control project which are authorized and which have cost-sharing agreement, my ultimate objective is to obtain the funding and complete the project as quickly as possible.

The Ellicott Creek project was originally authorized in 1970, was reauthorized in 1981, and has been covered by a cost-sharing agreement since 1982. The only obstacle preventing completion of the project has been the inability of Congress to reach a concensus on water policy so that new start construction can be funded.

My constituents already have waited too long to see this project built. This past winter, Ellicott Creek flooded, devastating the area. The most frustrating aspect is that if the flood control project had been in place, the creek would have been contained.

My colleagues from western New York and I have worked tirelessly to obtain this construction funding. I am extremely pleased that with passage of this legislation our efforts finally will be rewarded. The real beneficiaries of our action will be the residents living near the creek who no longer will need to worry about the devastation and pain that previous flooding has caused. With completion of this project, that kind of flooding will be a thing of the past.

Mr. ROE. Let me conclude on this. I usually have a tendency to be very loquacious and I have a tendency to be very fierce in my approach. I am a lot calmer today. I find it more difficult to speak when I am calmer. I think that we are making great progress. But let me say to the other Members here, those who are not directly involved at the moment, as the situation unfolds, we have a job to do. As Chairman HOWARD pointed out, by the end of September or early October we will be in a position of coming back to the House, after going to the Rules Committee, of course, coming back to the House with H.R. 6. We would hope in H.R. 6 that we will receive the strong support from the Appropriations Committee and all the Members of the House. So we are on schedule, as rapidly as possible, in our authorizing legislation.

I talked to Senator HATFIELD, the chairman of the Appropriations Committee in the Senate, and he has assured me that he will extend all of his effort and help on the Senate side, as Chairman HOWARD has talked to other Members, to get the program going so we can get an authorizing piece of legislation through.

So it is going to behoove us, if I may, before I give up the rest of my time, it is going to behoove us, once we move after today, once we get that bill onto this floor, to put all of our efforts in with the Senate, to ask and implore of the Senate to move as rapidly as possible on an authorizing bill so that we can go ahead and get these matters straightened out.

Mr. ROEMER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROE. I yield to the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. ROEMER. Is it your belief that the May 15 date will in fact help you pressure the process to completion of H.R. 6? Is that your position?

Mr. ROE. Well, I think that the May 15 date is reasonable. In candor, somebody said to me, before we got to this agreement, what do you think the Senate will do? And I said, "If I knew that, I would be king."

So I have no idea. I think what happens with Members of the House, and, if I may say, next year we will all be seeking the suport of our constituencies, it would behoove the Members of the House who are affected to ask their fellow Senators to be cooperative in the efforts we are trying to put forth.

Mr. ROEMER. I thank my colleague.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this conference agreement, as further amended by the other body.

The Senate addition would provide that the so-called escrow language, which made the initiation of construction of new starts contingent upon the enactment of cost sharing legislation, shall not apply after May 15, 1986. This provides a 9-month period in which to enact such legislation—in my view, clearly an adequate time. I believe that as amended by the Senate, this language is consistent with the House position adopted on the floor last evening, and is worthy of all of my colleagues' support.

Mr. Speaker, there was a great deal of uncertainty on the floor last evening with regard to the operative effect of the language under consideration regarding the water projects. Because of that, I think it is important to clarify for the sake of the legislative record exactly what we have done, and propose to do, it this conference agreement is adopted. In order to do that, I would appreciate the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi, the chairman of the committee, and the gentleman from Alabama, the chairman of the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee, as well as the gentleman from Indiana, the ranking minority member of the Energy and Water Development Subcommittee.

As I understand it, upon the enactment of this supplemental, the initiation of construction of all of the 41 projects listed in amendment No. 112, whether currently authorized or not, would be suspended until after May 15, 1986, unless cost sharing legislation is enacted before that time.

If cost sharing legislation is enacted before May 15, 1986, construction on authorized projects could move forward in accordance with the conditions contained in such legislation.

In other words, if cost sharing legislation is enacted by May 15, 1986, any of these projects that are authorized, or that subsequently become authorized, can proceed upon enactment of the cost sharing legislation.

If cost sharing legislation is not enacted by May 15, the language originally contained in the conference agreement becomes operative. In other words, projects for which cost sharing agreements have been entered into with the Corps of Engineers can proceed, provided that such agreements have been entered into by June 30, 1986. That includes projects that are authorized, as well as projects in this bill that are currently unauthorized. Construction on those projects can be initiated after May 15, 1986, provided that a cost sharing agreement is signed by June 30.

Is that the understanding of my colleagues on the committee?

I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN] for his response.

Mr. WHITTEN. May I say that the language in the Howard amendment controls. The gentleman's interpretation seems to be OK.

May I repeat again that all of the projects listed there are under this same restriction, but when the restriction should die after May 15, 1986, or when the Congress passes an authorization, either one would change it. Otherwise, after May 15, they proceed.

I would like to call attention to the fact that the amendment of the House adopted yesterday says that the "initiation of construction" shall be subject to enactment of legislation. So in the meantime, they must proceed with all of the preliminary work including plannning, design, engineering, land acquisition, bridge relocation the removal of obstructions, and other things that might be necessary to expedite or carry out the project properly.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the chairman and I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL].

Mr. BEVILL. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct right down the line, and after May 15, 1986, if no further action is taken and no authorization bill is put through under the Howard-Roe Amendment, as agreed, these projects, all 41, are authorized and may proceed to construction.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman and I yield to the ranking minority Member of the Public Works Committee, Mr. MYERS of Indiana.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts has very accurately portrayed and described the exact conditions for these 41 projects which was completely, completely confused yesterday. I thank the gentleman.

One thing, I think though, that we ought to add here. As a practical matter, it seems to me that there are some projects, a number of them in the country where we have been advised by the Army Corps of Engineers that they were negotiating for local involvement. They might hold up on those negotiations until after May 15. So you have only a very narrow window from May 15 to June 30, which might reduce the number that might be able to be negotiated.

I doubt if those are going to be very seriously negotiated because they do not know what will be in H.R. 6 for sure until it becomes law. Hopefully, we can get H.R. 6 passed sooner than that so we will close that window and they can start negotiating seriously. But I do think we ought to be aware of that.

Mr. CONTE. All the more reason why they should be moving on a fast track.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, that is right. Yesterday, with what we put in the amendment, it put the emphasis and importance and the necessity upon this body to pass H.R. 6 or something similar because none of them were really going to move until we had something of substance. So this puts it really back and narrows down the time.

Mr. CONTE. I thank the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CARNEY. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, I was over at my office watching the colloquy and I have a unique situation of having a project where all the engineering, all the environmental impact statements, everything is completed. It is an authorized project; it was appropriated in the supplemental. The problem that I face is that the EIS requires the project be dredged at a certain time so as not to spoil the breeding time of fin fish and shellfish and that time is April.

Do I understand that I still am subjected to that May 15th date?

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Two things I would say to the gentleman. I am not sure the EIS can be amended. I doubt if it can. That is out of the control of the Congress to do anything about that.

What we could do, in the regular 1986 bill, which is in the process already passed here, in the other body, I think that is one of the remedies that we can make in the 1986 bill which is in the legislation now. I believe we can correct that in the 1986 bill. Hopefully, the EIS could be amended, but that is not in our power to do that.

But we can, Congress does have the authority to change yours in the 1986 bill.

Mr. CONTE. Or quickly pass H.R. 6.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. H.R. 6, sure. But he might not be able to wait until whenever that might happen.

Mr. CARNEY. If the gentleman would yield further, at any rate, the project would still be alive through passing H.R. 6, then that May 15 date no longer is in effect?

Mr. CONTE. No.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. If the gentleman would yield further, I cannot speak for the committee or the other body, but the chairman, I am sure, is here, and he will say that we will do the best we can to get it through the bill. That is the best we can do. We will take care of the gentleman; he has been very much interested in this project, and has been a supporter of the committee. We will do everything we can to help you.

Mr. CARNEY. Thank you very much.

Mr. BEVILL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONTE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BEVILL. I would say to the gentleman that whatever your problem is, we will solve it.

Mr. CARNEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, this agreement is acceptable to the administration, and provides our best opportunity in years to proceed with much needed water projects, while also effecting important cost-sharing reforms.

I urge the adoption of this amendment and this conference report.

Let me also pay special tribute to our chairman, the gentleman from Mississippi. He has worked tirelessly on this effort, and deserves all of our thanks for a job well done.

Mr. WHITTEN. I thank the gentleman; I appreciate that.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAFALCE].

Mr. LAFALCE. I thank the gentleman for yielding to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to give special praise to the distinguished chairman, JAMIE WHITTEN, and ranking minority member of the Appropriations Committee SILVIO CONTE, and the Appropriation Subcommittee on Energy and Water Development, TOM BEVILL and its ranking minority member JOHN MYERS, but also special praise to the chairman of the Public Works Committee JIM HOWARD, and the ranking minority member, GENE SNYDER, and the chairman of the Water Resources Subcommittee of Public Works, BOB ROE, and its ranking minority member ARLAN STANGELAND, for being so amenable to the concept of compromise in order to get projects that have been authorized for as long as 15 years, such as the Ellicot Creek project in my congressional district and Congressman JACK KEMP's congressional district.

Sometimes we thought that the circumstances were going to make this a permanent inevitability, but today's legislation is going to mean it is definitely a "go" concept. That all work other than construction can take place between now and May 15, and that on May 15, construction begins. Thank you very much.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SNYDER].

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to concur in what generally has been said here in regard to the acceptance of the additional language that has been added by the other body.

We all recognize the fact, of course, that if in fact they were not sincere that they could stonewall our legislative committee past that date and get the original language, but as has been well laid out here today, at my request the chairman of our full committee has talked to the chairman of the corresponding committee in the other body and has a commitment. The chairman of our subcommittee has talked to the gentleman on Appropriations over there who has had considerable concern about his project.

They have given their word that they intend to move and enact legislation yet this year, even before the May 15 deadline. Their bill has been reported out of the legislative committee, the Committee on the Environment and Public Works, and is now over in the Finance Committee.

Our bill has been reported out of the Committee on Public Works and we are working with the other committees to which we have sequential referrals.

There is no reason at all why, with the assurances of the gentlemen in the other body that they do intend to proceed, that their motives are not such as could be, that we should not be able to have this legislation enacted into law even by the end of this calendar year.

So with those assurances, I want to say I appreciate so very much the tolerance of the gentlemen who have handled this bill in the Committee on Appropriations with our efforts yesterday, and appreciate the efforts and support of the House in adopting the language that was put forward by the Committee on Public Works yesterday.

I think we have a reasonable solution here, and I support it.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STANGELAND].

Mr. STANGELAND. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to associate myself with the remarks of the distinguished chairman and ranking republican of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, as well as my good friend and colleague, the chairman of the Subcommittee on Water Resources.

I, too, would like to commend the chairman of the full Committee on Appropriations, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN], and the chairman of the subcommittee, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BEVILL], as well as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. Speaker, I, too, welcome the commitment that we are making today to enactment of a comprehensive water project authorization bill. I firmly believe that we can meet the 9-month deadline called for by the Senate amendment. What we have lacked in the past is the commitment by the Senate leadership to moving an authorization bill. In their action today, I believe that the Senate has given us that commitment and I look forward to working with them to achieve passage of the first major authorization bill in this area since 1970.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 2 minutes.

I do this to thank my colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE], and all the members of the conference: Mr. BOLAND, Mr. NATCHER, Mr. SMITH of Iowa, Mr. ADDABBO, Mr. YATES, Mr. OBEY, Mr. ROYBAL, Mr. BEVILL, Mr. LEHMAN, Mr. DIXON, Mr. FAZIO, Mr. MCDADE, Mr. MYERS, Mr. COUGHLIN, Mr. KEMP, Mr. REGULA, and Mr. O'BRIEN as managers on the part of the House and Mr. HATFIELD, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. WEICKER, Mr. MCCLURE, Mr. LAXALT, Mr. GARN, Mr. COCHRAN, Mr. ANDREWS, Mr. ABDNOR, Mr. KASTEN, Mr. D'AMATO, Mr. MATTINGLY, Mr. RUDMAN, Mr. SPECTER, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. BYRD, Mr. PROXMIRE, Mr. INOUYE, Mr. HOLLINGS, Mr. CHILES, Mr.

JOHNSTON, Mr. BURDICK, Mr. LEAHY, Mr. SASSER, Mr. DECONCINI, Mr. BUMPERS, and Mr. LAUTENBERG as managers on the part of the Senate.

I said earlier that I did not know of any time we have faced a tougher problem than to go into a conference with 27 Senate conferees and with 341 Senate amendments. Notwithstanding that, in three separate meetings over a period of 5 days, we got together and without exception agreement was reached by the conferees on every issue.

Not only do I wish to thank them for it, but I also wish to thank the leaders on the authorizing committee, the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation. It is time we pull together for the good of the country, and they can count on us being on their side.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDGAR].

Mr. EDGAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say to my colleagues in the House that I support the action of the Senate, and I would urge passage of the conference report and passage of this particular issue.

Yesterday I stood on the floor and argued against the Whitten amendment and said that the procedure was unfair and the substance was unfair.

Today I take the well of the House and say that the procedure is fairer and the substance is fairer, and I think that we can live within the 9-month pressure to get out a substantive policy bill from the authorization committee.

I want to commend my colleagues on the Committee on Appropriations, both majority and minority, and I want to commend my colleagues on the House Committee on Public Works authorizing committee.

I think we have increased, in the last 24 hours, the pressure in both bodies to come out with substantive reform in the area of water policy. I commend everyone for their action. I think everybody is a winner. Let us all declare victory and go home.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute only to say that this is a vital, far-reaching supplemental that covers the entire Government. I give just one instance of the importance of this supplemental. But to emphasize what this covers, let me say that it provides needed funds for important programs within the jurisdiction of all 13 appropriation subcommittees, 13 Cabinet-level agencies, the legislative branch, the Judiciary, the Postal Service, the District of Columbia, 10 major independent agencies such as the Veterans' Administration, and scores of other independent agencies. There is a real need to act rapidly. I have here a letter from the Acting Budget Director calling attention to the fact that the Commodity Credit Corporation will be out of money by August 5, which reads as follows:

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: As Congress prepares to adjourn for the August District Work Period, I wish to inform you that funding to support the Department of Agriculture's Commodity Credit Corporation activities will be exhausted by August 5 unless Supplemental Appropriations are approved prior to the Congressional adjournment. In addition, the Federal Crop Insurance Program will cease operations the month of August if additional funds are not made available.

If funding for these programs expires, promises that have been made by the Federal government to our farmers will have been broken and hundreds of millions of dollars in assistance will be unavailable to farm families.

Accordingly, we strongly urge the Congress to act on the 1985 Supplemental Appropriations Bill prior to adjournment.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH R. WRIGHT, JR.,
Acting Director.

We need to move ahead. I urge all my colleagues to support this measure.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to revise and extend, I am inserting a table in the RECORD at this point which compares the final conference agreement with the budget request, the House action, and the Senate action, on H.R. 2577, a bill making supplemental appropriations for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1985:

Mrs. BENTLEY. Mr. Speaker, one of the 20 authorized projects included in the water resources supplemental appropriations bill is near and dear to my heart—namely that of deepening the main ship channel leading into the Port of Baltimore which project was authorized 15 years ago in 1970.

I wish to take this time to commend the work of Chairman WHITTEN and Mr. BEVILL of the Appropriations Committee, Chairman HOWARD of the Committee on Public Works and Transportation, Chairman ROE and Mr. STANGELAND of the Subcommittee on Water Resources in their contribution to the passage of the water resources supplemental appropriations bill. Their efforts are most appreciated in resolving the difficult problem of funding both authorized and unauthorized water projects.

In my home State of Maryland, the Port of Baltimore which is an authorized water project is close to having all the preliminary work necessary completed before actual port development begins. The State of Maryland is prepared to meet the Federal Government's cost-sharing formula and proceed with dredging in the Chesapeake Bay. The State has conducted a study of its own in order to reduce the overall cost of the project by more than $110 million by narrowing the width of the 50-foot channel. Maryland has indicated it will sell its World Trade Building and issue bonds to provide the funds for its share of the costs prior to the 50-foot channel. The sum of $53 million already has been invested by Maryland to build up Hart Miller Island as a disposal site for anticipated dredging sludge.

The entire Maryland delegation has been working to bring this about and is behind it all the way. After the dredging, larger ships will be free to enter the Baltimore Port. Greater means for trade will create more jobs and a stronger economy with the importation and exportation of goods. The steel industry will greatly benefit from an increase of maritime trade.

The Baltimore ship channel is also vital to providing the measure for the United States to improve its exports—of coal and grain—and thus keep our balance of trade. It is a project also equally important to keeping a steel mill alive—by allowing deeper draft ships—more heavily laden with iron ore to call on our steel mill—and therefore providing cheaper steel.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my praise in the action by this Congress in working to bring about new water construction projects that have been in the waiting for over a decade. Our water resource infrastructure needs such as inland waterways and port development have managed to continue to contribute to this Nation's economic development over this past 10 years without necessary funding. However, today with the decision of both the House and Senate to reach an agreement on the House/Senate conference report of the supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1985 on the funding of water construction projects, we can rest assured that necessary investments will be provided to our Nation's water projects. We can expect greater economic growth resulting from today's action by this Congress.

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the motion.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

The motion was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

SENSE-OF-CONGRESS RESOLUTION ON SETTLEMENT OF SCHEDULED BASEBALL STRIKE

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Education and Labor be discharged from further consideration of the resolution (H. Res. 252) to urge negotiators for major league baseball owners and players to quickly settle their differences and avoid a scheduled players' strike, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 252

Whereas baseball is America's national pastime;

Whereas major league baseball is an important source of family-oriented entertainment for millions of Americans;

Whereas major league baseball teams are a source of local pride for fans in communities across the Nation, as well as providers of substantial revenues and employment opportunities in related businesses.

Whereas the Major League Baseball Players Association has voted to strike on Tuesday, August 6, 1985, unless they have reached a new collective-bargaining agreement with team owners by then;

Whereas a prolonged players' strike would result in the cancellation of hundreds of baseball games, the loss of millions of dollars to related businesses, and endanger the long-term interests of the sport; and

Whereas those who would suffer greatest during a baseball players' strike would be the fans: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the House that the Major League Baseball Players Association and team owners have a responsibility to the baseball fans of America to ensure that the current season is not interrupted, and that the parties and the Commissioner of Baseball should do everything in their power to avoid a strike by players.

Mr. CHAPPELL (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHAPPELL. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONTE] and myself which touches the question of the proposed strike or planned strike of August 6, 1985, by the Major League Baseball Players' Association if they have not by that time reached a collective-bargaining agreement with the team owners.

It simply provides that it is the sense of the House that the Major League Baseball Players' Association and team owners have a responsibility to the baseball fans of America to ensure that the current season is not interrupted and that all the parties, including the Commissioner of Baseball, should do everything in their power to avoid a strike by players.

Mr. Speaker, I urge its passage.

Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of this resolution introduced by my good friend BILL CHAPPELL, the Democratic baseball coach, and myself.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution urges those individuals negotiating a contract for major league baseball players and league owners to come to a speedy settlement on the differences facing them. A prompt resolution of the problems will avoid a baseball strike—which no one, I think, wants to see.

Baseball is America's pasttime. It is America's sport. The fans in this country have great pride in their State's or community's baseball teams, and they do not want to see a strike. A baseball team produces millions of dollars in revenue to local communities. They provide jobs to small businesses and, as I said, are a great source of pride to their host cities.

The Major League Baseball Players' Association has voted to strike on August 6—less than 1 week from now—unless they reach a new collective-bargaining agreement with team owners. We do not want to see this happen. It would result in the cancellation of games; a prolonged strike could postpone the World Series—and since at least some of those seven games will hopefully be played in Boston this year, where it can snow very early, I certainly don't want to see a World Series being played on Thanksgiving.

Thus, I would urge my colleagues to support this resolution, and send a message to the baseball players, management, and league owners that the Congress urges a speedy settlement to the differences separating them. The resolution doesn't take sides; it merely urges everyone involved to recognize their responsibility to the baseball fans of America and the host cities of America's major league baseball teams. We don't want a strike. We want the problems resolved as soon as possible, fairly, for all sides.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS TO FILE SUPPLEMENTAL REPORT TO ACCOMPANY HOUSE REPORT 99-230 ACCOMPANYING H.R. 1, HOUSING ACT OF 1985

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs may be permitted to file a supplemental report to accompany House Report 99-230, the report to accompany H.R. 1, the Housing Act of 1985.

The committee inadvertently excluded the explanation of title V of H.R. 1 from the committee report that was filed on July 26, 1985. This supplemental report would represent the committee's explanation of title V of the committee reported bill, H.R. 1.

Mr. Speaker, I have checked with the minority, and they are in agreement.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

MAKING IN ORDER ON THIS LEGISLATIVE DAY CONSIDERATION OF SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 32, FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that if the Committee on Rules reports a special order providing for the consideration of the conference report and any amendment in disagreement on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, it shall be in order to consider the same on this legislative day notwithstanding the provisions of clause 4(b) of rule XI.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

PROVIDING FOR CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 3008, FEDERAL EQUITABLE PAY PRACTICES ACT OF 1985

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 241 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 241

Resolved, That at any time after the adoption of this resolution the Speaker may, pursuant to clause 1(b) of rule XXIII, declare the House resolved into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H.R. 3008) to promote equitable pay practices and to eliminate discrimination within the Federal civil service, and the first reading of the bill shall be dispensed with. All points of order against the consideration of the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 2(l)(6) of rule XI and section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344) are hereby waived, and all points of order against the bill for failure to comply with the provisions of clause 5(a) of rule XXI are hereby waived. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, the bill shall be considered for amendment under the five-minute rule, and each section shall be considered as having been read. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment, the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WHEAT] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, for the purposes of debate only, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], pending which I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 241 is an open rule providing for consideraton of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. The rule provides for 1 hour of general debate to be divided equally between the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. The rule further provides that the bill shall be considered for amendment under the 5-minute rule and that each section of the legislation shall be considered as having been read.

All points of order against consideration of the legislation for failure to comply with clause 2(l)(6) of rule XI, that is the 3-day layover rule for committee reports, are waived. Although the Post Office and Civil Service Committee ordered the bill reported on July 24, 1985, the report was not actually filed until July 29th. Since the printed copy of the report has not been available to Members for the required 3 days, a waiver of clause 2(l)(6) of rule XI is necessary.

All points of order against consideration of the bill for failing to comply with secton 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act are also waived. Section 402(a) provides that it shall not be in order to consider any bill which authorizes the enactment of new budget authority for a fiscal year unless that bill has been reported on or before May 15 preceding the beginning of such fiscal year.

H.R. 3008 indirectly authorizes the enactment of new budget authority. Since the bill will become effective upon enactment, that is in fiscal year 1985, and since it was not reported on or before May 15, 1984, a waiver of section 402(a) of the Congressional Budget Act is needed.

Mr. Speaker, the rule also waives clause 5(a) of rule XXI against consideration of the bill. Clause 5(a) of rule XXI prohibits appropriations in a legislative bill.

Section 9 of H.R. 3008 provides that funds appropriated to the Office of Personnel Management for general operating expenses be made available to carry out this act. This provision allows previously appropriated funds to be used for new activities and thus, constitutes an appropriation. Since H.R. 3008 is not an appropriations measure, a waiver of clause 5(a) of rule XXI is needed.

Finally, the rule provides for one motion to recommit.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 3008 established an 11 member "Commission on Equitable Pay Practices". The commission will be responsible for hiring a consultant and overseeing its study of the Federal pay and classification systems. The study, which will last no longer than 18 months, will determine if and to what extent, a Federal employee's classification and wages are affected by sex, race and ethnicity. After the study is completed, the commission will present its findings, conclusions and recommendations regarding administrative and legislative remedies to the President and Congress.

Mr. Speaker, over the past 20 years, Congress has taken great strides to ensure that all of our citizens have equal rights under the law. The Education Amendments of 1972; the Rehabilitation Act of 1973; the Age Discrimination Act of 1975 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are all measures which Congress enacted to ensure that no citizen be denied rights because of race, ethnicity or sex.

We have accomplished a great deal in this body and the other body but when a women earns 62.8 cents for every dollar that a man earns, it is clear that inequality still exists. Mr. Speaker, this injustice must be eradicated in order that this country realize equality. H.R. 3008 will bring us one step closer to our realization.

I urge that we adopt the rule so that the House can proceed to consideration of this important measure.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, why would anyone want to oppose a simple little 1-hour, open rule providing for the consideration of an innocuous sounding bill called the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act? Surely we are all for open rules and equitable pay practices.

But in this case there's more involved than meets the eye. If there weren't, the proponents of this legislation wouldn't mind if the House followed its normal rules and took the time to at least read the report on this bill. But no, this rule waives the 3-day report availability requirement meaning that many Members will have no idea what's in the bill or what they are voting on. Ignorance may be bliss for some, but when it comes to legislative, it's inexcusable.

Why then is there such a big rush to pass this bill prior to the August recess? Is this a necessary authorization that must be enacted before the new fiscal year? No. And yet, many other must authorization bills continue to languish in our Rules Committee while we merrily put the appropriations cart before the authorization horse. And now, to add insult to injury, we inject a $2 million study commission bill.

Is this a special emergency situation that cries out for an immediate Federal response? No. This isn't a disaster relief bill. It's a big buck consultant relief bill that will take anywhere from 18 months to 2 years to complete. There's no rush to start this compared to our more urgent budgetary situation and our must authorization bills. The fact is, I heard nothing during our Rules Committee hearing on this to even hint that this involved an emergency situation that might justify waiving our 3-day rule. This is not something we should do lightly if we value our brains.

So what's the rush? One witness, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON], pointed out that there is a court decision expected in August in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals that will have an important bearing on this issue. Could it be that the proponents fear that decision could undermine this legislation? At the very least, couldn't our action on this wait until September when we can make a more informed judgment on the basis of that decision? What's the rush?

But then I began to take a closer look at this fine-sounding bill, and it slowly dawned on me why someone would want to rush this through. On the one hand we are told this is going to be a bipartisan, balanced, and objective Commission. But, when you look at this bill you find the deck is stacked: 4 employee organization representatives of labor, women, and minorities, plus 2 democratic appointees; that's 6 of the 11 members, a clear quorum and voting majority.

We are told that it is important that no member appointed to the Commission is currently employed by the Government either as a careerist or political appointee, "in order to promote objectivity and to allow the Commission to function independently of any policy or program of any administration." And yet the bill turns around and places on the Commission the "highest elected officials of the two largest Federal employee unions," and one representative each from Federal women's and minority employee organizations. Is it expected that these Commissioners will promote objectivity or will not promote the policies and programs of the organizations they represent and are paid by?

We are told that this bill only authorizes a little study by a consultant to be hired by the Commission. And yet the bill turns around and gives the Commission authority to determine which differentials in the study are discriminatory and to recommend any administrative as well as legislative actions. We are giving the Commission quasi-judicial authority to both determine which differentials are discriminatory and how they may be remedied by administrative action. This comes close to the kind of authority which currently resides in the EEOC and Civil Rights Commission. So it's more than just a little study.

We were told, however, by the chief sponsor of this bill in her testimony before the Rules Committee, that this neither establishes a national pay policy, nor prescribes any specific remedies; it only "reaffirms the principles outlined in our civil rights laws which prohibit discrimination" in setting pay for Federal workers. And yet, the bill in section 6 only says that it "shall not be construed to limit any of the rights or remedies" provided under the Civil Rights Act and other antidiscrimination laws. It says nothing about not expanding those rights and remedies. And that's because this new theory of comparable worth would do just that—establish new rights and remedies.

I would think we would give serious and second thoughts to a study which could be used in a court of law to prove that a certain pay system or job classification system is inherently discriminatory because a certain sex, ethnic group, or minority group is disproportionately represented. And yet that prospect is not farfetched. That's what the Washington case was about as I understand it.

Mr. Speaker, we made a simple little attempt in the Rules Committee to bring Congress and the judicial branch under existing law—title VII of the Civil Rights Act which prohibits everyone else from discriminating. The amendment was proposed by the gentlelady from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN]. And yet it was turned back on a party-line vote. How is it that we are so ready to tell the rest of government that it might have discriminatory job or pay systems under a new comparable worth theory, when we aren't yet willing to bring ourselves under existing civil rights laws? When you can justify that one for me I'll vote for this rule. In the meantime, I won't.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. TAYLOR], a member of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, House Resolution 241 is the rule under which the House is being asked to consider one of the most controversial issues I have seen in my 13 years of membership here in this body, whether we will have a comparable worth study of Federal civil service jobs.

I join my colleague, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT], in urging the defeat of this rule.

Mr. Speaker, this rule waives one of the primary rules of the House, the rule requiring reported bills and committee reports to be available for 3 days before the bill can be called to the floor for consideration.

This rule should be rejected because it is unfair to the Members of this House. This rule attempts to short circuit the legislative process. This rule tosses aside the rules of the House, in order to make it possible to ramrod the bill through the House as quickly as possible, without adequate time to fully explore and resolve the issues presented in this legislation.

This rule asks the House to rush to judgment, 1 day before we are scheduled to adjourn for our district work period, on a very controversial and a very complex bill, the so-called Federal equitable pay practices legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the committee report has not been available for the required 3 days. It has only been available since about 1 p.m. today. That is simply not enough time. It is simply not fair to the Members of the House to force hasty consideration on this bill.

The Members of the House deserve an opportunity to examine the legislation, to read the committee report, to prepare questions for debate and to prepare amendments.

This rule does not give them enough time to do that, so from that standpoint it is procedurally unfair.

Mr. Speaker, if the Members are upset because the Rules Committee granted this waiver, they should also be concerned about the speed with which this legislation was handled in the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service. It may not be a new legislative record, but it sure was quick.

The bill was introduced on July 16, and here we are today on the floor of the House 2 weeks later. During the time I have been privileged to serve as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Post Office and Civil Service, I cannot recall our acting that fast on any other piece of legislation.

Mr. Speaker, the issues involved in this legislation are highly controversial, and because we are on the verge of taking them up with such haste, there is a genuine concern that the House will be acting in a rash or careless manner.

My good friend and colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR], is quite sincere in her belief that this study of pay differentials called for in the bill is merely an effort to determine whether we have discrimination based upon sex or upon race or in regard to the setting of pay rates.

Mr. Speaker, I applaud the gentlewoman from Ohio for her determination and I have no reservations about her intentions. When one looks at the criteria contained in the bill, however, one sees that it is based on the notion that Federal civil service jobs have a measurable, economic worth which can be determined logically and compared objectively to other and different jobs.

This is an ill-conceived notion, because Federal civil service jobs do not have a measurable, economic worth, and they cannot be compared objectively to each other. The study is, therefore, dedicated to doing something which in my judgment, is impossible.

Mr. Speaker, the theory that underlies this bill is often referred to as the comparable worth theory, which holds that jobs have intrinsic, measurable values, and dictates that salaries be based on those determined values.

One of the most controversial aspects of the bill is that it embraces the proposition that differences in income between men and women and the concentration of women in certain occupations are proof of discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, equal opportunity is the law of this land, and one that we all embrace. Equal pay for equal work is the law. But comparable worth is not the law, at least not yet.

Mr. Speaker, I might add that every agency of the Federal Government has an equal opportunity division within it to see to it that the laws of our land are obeyed, to see to it that we do not have discrimination in pay rates based upon sex or race. I think it works quite well. The avenues for redress of grievances are open to all Federal employees and welcome and should be.

But this bill does not address those issues of equal opportunity.

Since the bill appears to define discrimination on the basis of the comparative value of different jobs, it does present a significant departure from the clear standard of the Equal Pay Act. I do not see how we can have equal pay for equal work, which is the law, and also have equal pay for unequal work.

Because the bill calls for a commission to determine the existence of discrimination on the basis of the comparative value of different jobs, the bill gives rise to substantial concern, not only in the civil service, but also in the private sector.

Mr. Speaker, these are unchartered waters. This is a whole new area. The whole area is a prescription for confusion, confrontation, dissension, and litigation, and probably a great deal of indigestion. Since there are a great number of amendments that have already been placed in the RECORD, I do not think it is time at this late hour, as we prepare to adjourn, to consider this controversial piece of legislation, and I would urge the defeat of this rule and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SENSENBRENNER].

Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to the rule and to H.R. 3008 as reported by the House Committee on Post Office and Civil Service.

H.R. 3008 has been cloaked as a mere study. However, as drafted, H.R. 3008 would radically change existing antidiscrimination laws by sanctioning a commission to conduct a study which recognizes a presumption of discrimination when job evaluations cannot explain every detail in the wage gap.

As reported, H.R. 3008 would:

First, trigger expensive litigation if wage adjustments were not made pursuant to this study. The State of Washington, for instance, may be liable for hundreds of millions of dollars as a result of its comparable worth study;

Second, set a dangerous precedent for private sector employers; and

Third, provide a congressional endorsement of the fundamentally flawed concept of comparable worth.

Although H.R. 3008 defines job evaluation techniques as objective, job evaluations are inherently subjective. For example, comparable worth job evaluators rated a nurse to be worth 150 points in Wisconsin; 124 points in Iowa; 79 points in Minnesota and 108 points in Washington.

It's interesting to note that unions are some of the strongest supporters of comparable worth to end the wage gap. These unions are the same entities who negotiated the current contracts which they now claim are low. These are the same unions that negotiated the various contracts in industries dominated by male workers that have high wages. These are the same unions that have kept and still keep women from apprenticeship in various trades and industries. They come to this issue with unclean hands.

Apart from the economic issues, the legal precedent H.R. 3008 would establish is far-reaching. With the exception of AFSCME versus State of Washington which is on appeal, the courts have unanimously refused to accept job evaluation studies. In American Nurses Association v. Illinois, 606 F. Supp. 1313 Judge Kocoras stated "because jobs do not have an intrinsic value that can be scientifically measured, the limitations inherent in job evaluation techniques prohibit the proposed extension of title VII. This conclusion would be significantly weakened.

I urge my colleagues to vote "no" on H.R. 3008 and I insert in the RECORD a document entitled "a legal analysis of H.R. 3008" and a letter to the editor.

A LEGAL ANALYSIS OF H.R. 3008 as Reported

On July 24, H.R. 3008 was reported out of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee with a committee amendment.

The amendment changes language in the bill regarding a presumption that discrimination is the cause of otherwise unexplained wage differentials in the Federal workforce between predominantly men's and women's jobs or jobs disproportionately represented in terms of race or ethnicity (defined as being of Hispanic origin). Instead of asserting that discrimination is the cause of the wage differentials left unexplained by job-content economic analyses, the amendment states that discrimination may be the cause, and assigns this determination of casualty to a commission that H.R. 3008 would establish.

The claim is made that the committee amendment renders an exceedingly bad bill relatively innocuous and, therefore, supportable by opponents of comparable worth. The argument behind this claim is that the amendment removes from the bill the conclusion that, as a matter of law, any unexplained wage differentials arrived at by the studies mandated by the bill are the result of discrimination. The Myers amendment, the argument goes, at least raises the possibility that the commission may decide that discrimination does not account for these unexplained wage differentials or that it only explains a portion of them.

The amendment does not ameliorate any of the problems that we previously objected to in this bill, however. To begin with, it makes no sense to delegate to a politicized commission the responsibility to determine what, if any, portion of the unexplained wage differentials is attributable to discrimination, particularly in view of the composition of the commission as structured under H.R. 3008, which favors proponents of comparable worth.

Second, the amendment preserves the earlier expectation that the methods the bill specifies for identifying discrimination, job-content and economic analyses, can in fact do so with any precision. It would be a complete misuse of these methods to identify discrimination with the wage differentials, or any part of them, which these methods leave unexplained. Job evaluation is inherently subjective. The results of this analysis will not be bias free, but will instead reflect the opinions of the commission and the consultants chosen to execute the study.

Moreover, economic analysis is not a precise science. It can arrive at varied results through different methodologies, the choice of different variables, or the omission of other variables, some of which are simply not measurable. If variables are chosen for study that do not explain pay differentials as fully as variables that were not used, then the unexplained differential—a differential likely to be labelled a result of discrimination—will be greater. There are legitimate differences of opinion among researchers regarding the importance of different variables, and analysts arrive at extremely different conclusions with respect to the portion of wage differentials which cannot be explained.

Finally, it must be pointed out that the Committee amendment does not change the irrebuttable presumption of discrimination under H.R. 3008. Once the commission has concluded that differentials are the result of discrimination, its determination must be accepted as final, and the government would be unable thereafter to rebut charges of discrimination by plaintiffs seeking implementation of the comparable worth study results. Such a presumption well may be extended to private employers that are contractors for the government through the auspices of the Office of Federal Contract Compliance.

The more far-reaching effect of H.R. 3008 on private sector cases is not addressed by the committee amendment. With the exception of the district court judge in AFSCME v. State of Washington, 578 F. Supp. 846 (D Wash. 1983), currently on appeal, courts have refused unanimously to accept job evaluation studies as evidence of discrimination in Title VII cases. With the passage of H.R. 3008, a bill that explicitly claims to carry out the intent of Title VII, it will be difficult for defendants in Title VII cases to rebut charges of discrimination based on job evaluation studies. The conclusion of Judge Kocoras in American Nurses' Association v. State of Illinois, 606 F. Supp. 1313 (N.D. Ill. 1985), that "[b]ecause jobs do not have an intrinsic value that can be scientifically measured, the limitations inherent in job evaluation techniques prohibit the proposed extension of Title VII" would be weakened significantly. Future plaintiffs filing Title VII suits against private employers would be able to make a strong argument that the results of job evaluation studies can suffice to prove discrimination on the basis of race, sex or ethnicity.

[From The Sounder, July 25, 1985]

COMPARABLE WORTH RAPPED

TO THE SOUNDER: The July 18th issue of The Sounder had a letter from a Madison special interest group praising the legislature and Gov. Earl for the budget passed and comparable worth.

Praise should go to those legislators that represent this area that voted no on the budget which included comparable worth.

An 18 per cent increase is a slap in the face to the residents of this state. The big spenders should be told where the door is.

Comparable worth is the most ridiculous idea to be jammed down our throats since raising the sales tax 1 per cent to relieve property taxes and then not applying it to property tax relief.

Comparable worth should not be called pay equity, but what it really is: equal pay for unequal work. This is an experiment that Wisconsin taxpayers are going to pay a lot of money for. The money will be mostly spent administering a program that directly conflicts with free enterprise and the law of supply and demand. Actually, it is perfect for creating a larger governmental bureaucracy.

The letter in The Sounder referred to business supporting pay equity. Sure business supports pay equity under a different definition. I would interpret and I'm sure the survey respondents did also assume pay based on equal would mean pay based on equal pay for equal work. Comparable worth tries to compare on a subjective basis one job with another job—and has little or no business support anywhere in the free world.

When are the people of the State of Wisconsin going to wake up and get rid of the element here that comes up with experiments like comparable worth? Are we that financially sound in this state to undertake such a project? I hardly think so and our governor should know that too!

Sincerely,

JAMES H. HEINZELMAN,

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend from Mississippi for yielding this 5 minutes. I take this time in the rule to speak for the rule and for the bill because I have been told that even though I am the ranking Republican member of the subcommittee that reported this bill that I shall not control the time today. So I take this time today on this rule to say I support the rule and I support the bill.

For my support I have received some criticism from some in this body and from some throughout the country because I am a conservative. I am not supposed to be for new ideas, I guess, or fairness. And I am sorry about some of the statements that have been made and will be made, and probably some of the distortions that may be made about what is in this bill.

I commend our chairman, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR]. I have found her to be most cooperative on some of the differences we have had on my side, the Republican side, where there were many serious disagreements. I had some disagreements with H.R. 27, but our chair was most cooperative. Not completely, this is not exactly the bill that I would like to see. There are still some questions about this bill, and there may be some amendments that I may support that come along. But in the whole, in the main, I do support the thrust of this bill.

I thank our chair for being cooperative to even changing the bill number by reintroducing the bill to satisfy the wishes and the questions that the minority raised, the Republicans on the committee. She changed the composition of the committee to make it more bipartisan, more equitable in the commission because there were serious questions, rightfully so, about the composition, being slanted. It may be slanted one way or the other right now. But at least it is much more fair than it was originally.

The authority in section 7 is where I had the most disagreement which does spell out the job to be done by the commission, and by the consultant that will be hired by the commission. There was a presumption of guilt that was written into H.R. 27, and originally into H.R. 3008, the bill we have here. But the chair and the majority, even though they had the votes to push their bill if they wanted to, they did cooperate in softening the langauge. This is language that was changed in the full committee. It is on page 12 of the bill and it is lined out. It says:

Any portion of a differential identified under paragraph (1) which cannot be accounted for by the application of job content and economic analysis is inconsistent with the general policy expressed in section 2(a) that sex, race, and ethnicity should not be among the factors considered in determining any rate of pay.

This, in the judgment of some of us, would trigger and would cause reason for some unnecessary lawsuits. That was changed and that language was struck and a softer approach was taken, through the insistence of some of us in the minority. It is not completely satisfactory in the entire section, and there are some questions in my mind. But some of these things will come up on debate, I am sure, and we will clarify what the intent is here.

But no one can disagree that we have not already, through our hearings and through the mail we have received, we know that there are reported some irregularities, some statistical differences in pay between men and women employed by the Federal Government. We do not know why this is so, and that is the purpose of this study.

But those who say we give extra judicial authority to the commission or the consultant, that is not in today's bill. I do not think they have read the bill we have today. There is a pay gap, we all recognize this.

As a parent of two children who happen to have been born female, through no fault of theirs or mine, I guess, that I know about, I think they should be paid just as much for the same work as if they had been born male. Now I cannot say that my children or yours or you wife or your sister or your aunt, mother, grandmother should be paid less because they were born female and are willing to work for less. This is a study to see if that really occurs in the Federal Government. It does not touch anybody outside the Federal Government. I do not understand the fear that some people have.

But nevertheless, this is just a study.

The cost, some will object to, there is going to be no cost to the Federal Government as far as forcing a pay increase that we know of unless they are already paying Federal employees who happen to be females less.

It is going to cost something for the study, but I think it is a fair one and I support it.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 7 minutes to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I simply want to support the rule but I especially want to thank the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, Mr. MYERS of Indiana, for the magnificent cooperation he has given me. I want to say that we have had hearings for 4 years on the spirit of the bill, which was begun by Congresswomen SCHROEDER, Ms. Ferraro, and myself as three subcommittee chairs. In this year alone we had more than 55 witnesses, both pro and con. We were very happy to accommodate the minority in letting the individuals they wished to testify.

It has been an absolute pleasure to work with the ranking minority member of the subcommittee. It is true that one of the reasons I reintroduced the bill with 102 cosponsors on both sides of the aisle is because I wanted to show that the issues that some of the witnesses brought up were considered. We could accommodate those things. Last year our bill which passed the House approved 413 to 6 in the last session, we had the study based on job content alone. This is the type of study that is being used all over the country—and there are some 45 of them.

They only require really job content. GAO and the gentleman from Indiana and a number of individuals who testified said: "Well, what about the marketplace?" In evaluating, we felt that that was fair. We do not say in any way, shape or form that this disparity between a man's wage and a woman's wage is necessarily discrimination.

What we are saying is, do a study and evaluate the job content and look at the market factors. We added the market factor issue in, in the spirit of cooperation with the gentleman from Indiana and some of his witnesses because we were attempting to be totally objective about this.

The gentleman from Indiana pointed out that he thought the composition of the commission ought to be more bipartisan. We did add that. In all honesty, I have questions about who the President might appoint or who OPM might appoint. But we added that section and it is much more in line with what the Senate is doing. What Senator EVANS, a very fine Republican, and Senator CRANSTON introduced—a similar bill.

The other question that came up time and time again was the question of race, minorities and Hispanics? It seemed as if the classification system did in fact have minorities, as well as women, at the bottom of the barrel. We added race and ethnicity to take care of them.

But the gentleman is absolutely correct when he says that we have really tried to accommodate the spirit of a bipartisan bill. I for one want to applaud the gentleman from Indiana for all of his work. He was at every single hearing. He was the first minority member I have seen while I have chaired a committee who has always been at every meeting. He is also on a very important committee, the Committee on Appropriations. Yet he always took the time to be there to hear all of the witnesses, pro and con.

So I simply want to say that I know how difficult it is when you are in a situation where many people, who are often supporters of yours, are really trying to get you to be motivated to change your mind. We all undergo those pressures. That is nothing new, that is part of the American way. I know the gentleman from Indiana has really gotten it from all sides. I appreciate that. I want him to know publicly how deeply moved I am by the fact that he would take the floor during the rule, since he apparently cannot get time as the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, in the general debate which is somewhat unusual. I would be delighted to give the gentleman time from my side if he wants it. I want to thank him for all his work irrespective of how he votes. He has been a gentleman, he has been an absolute man in terms of being the ranking member of that committee and I look forward to working with him closely in the future. I want to thank the gentleman very much.

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. For a response, would the gentlewoman yield?

Ms. OAKAR. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MYERS].

Mr. MYERS of Indiana. We have certain buzz words that have been used frequently on this bill. "Comparable worth" has been used to describe this bill. Again because some of us objected to the way comparable worth, how do you relate one job to another and say they are comparable when they are entirely different? But the chair took that out and we thank you for it.

Ms. OAKAR. As the gentleman knows, that is one of the problems with the Civil Rights Commission's definition. The Commission claimed comparable worth was the disparity between the man's wage and the woman's wage. Nobody is, not even the most ardent advocate of pay equity, agrees with that definition. We do not agree with that definition. So what we do is we take all of the language related to comparable worth because we have not examined the classification system of Federal employees, that is the GS-1 through GS-18 system, since 1923. What we are asking for is a study on how we classify our Federal employees, no more, no less. Comparable worth, that language is not in the bill.

I appreciate the gentleman's raising that because people want to use that code word and I frankly reject the definition of the Civil Rights Commission myself. So I thank the gentleman.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, first of all, my thanks to the gentleman from Louisiana for his kind words in his speech. I come here in a rather odd situation; I do not oppose the concept or idea of reexamining a system, because for many reasons the Congress to some degree is in a management position and can dictate and direct and should direct looking at how people, regardless of color or sex or age are paid; Congress must make sure that those classifications reflect not only a market, but reflect the spirit of fairness and equity that Congress should want as an example to the people.

There have been a few mistakes made in speeches when we suggest that the Congress, who has passed other laws that now wishes to take this additional step is somehow incredibly virtuous for doing so.

The reason that Congress cannot claim unsullied purity is because the Congress had not got itself under the same scrutiny that it has imposed on others.

I am here because I find it offensive to not be able to amend this bill so that the Congress of the United States would not have to be examined; would have to agree to civil rights for its employees.

This afternoon, many of us voted in favor of a stance speaking about 16 million people in South Africa who are held under a dreadful system called apartheid.

Many of us now are going to support examining the Federal pay system on the Executive level. But when it comes time to look at ourselves, it is amazing how quickly we run away.

The gentleman from Louisiana mentioned; I was there last year, and the year before. We are all, when we look at any bill, looking at a kind of Rorschach test, and we bring to it our own experience.

One of the reasons to have a broad representation in the Congress of the United States is to get that broad range of experience. Just as no white Member can become black, just as no Anglo Member can say they understand totally the Hispanic, can any of the gentlemen here understand what it is like to hear again and again that there is no discrimination against women in the overwhelmingly male Congress of the United States. Then because men say there is none, the Congress can avoid the law of the land.

I say to the gentleman Members of this Congress on both sides of the aisle, it is wrong to impose on others rules that one does not first impose on oneself, and to deny civil rights and to deny our own employees what other employees in business, State, local, every other governmental unit have, is wrong.

Therefore I oppose this rule. Not because the bill is a bad bill; not because we should not look at the Executive government; but because it is time to first look at ourselves, and it is time, indeed, for Congress to decide that it, too, should obey the law of the land.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Speaker, I, too, find myself in a very unusual situation coming to the floor today, speaking in favor of this rule, because I am normally one on my side that joins forces with my good friend from Mississippi and the gentlewoman from Illinois and certainly my good friend from Missouri.

I want the membership to know that I have another side to my personality. I am a Democrat that believes in fairness, one that believes in equity, and one that believes in justice; and that is what we are talking about today; we are talking about justice.

I would like to address briefly a couple of points that have been made. One of the speakers said, "What's the hurry? Why should we get in a hurry to study inequities in our pay practices on the Federal level?"

Well, there is a reason why we should get in a hurry: The last time we looked at this was 1923. I think 62 years is long enough without evaluating our pay and classification system; 62 years, and we have not examined how we treat our employees on the Federal level.

Also, it was mentioned that this was going to cost too much. Well, let me share with you what the real costs are today; the real costs are the numerous lawsuits that we are settling or losing in our Federal courts because we have not implemented a fair pay system.

Also, it has been said that if we have a study something bad is going to happen. I do not think anything bad is going to happen. I have heard some of my colleagues on the floor during special orders talking about all the economic theories and all of that, and I listened to all of it, but my basic problem is one from conviction and one from conscience: How can I go home and look at my three daughters—I have three daughters and three sons. I know not only in my mind, I know in my heart if they go to work for the Federal Government; the one government that is supposed to be setting the example, that my three sons will have an advantage over my three daughters, and that is not right.

I also would be remiss if I did not stand and speak out for the many constituents that I have in my district in Arkansas that are not being treated fairly.

In closing, I would just like to say this: This is not a conservative issue; this is not a liberal issue; this is a fairness issue, and I urge my colleagues, please vote for the rule.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I think the American women and minorities would like to know the names, specifically, of the businesses that endorse what the chamber is doing. Can you do that?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, I assume that is an implied threat, but we will not worry about that.

Ms. OAKAR. No, it is not an implied threat. Why don't you name the names?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, sure, I would be happy to. But I do not know if you want me to go through this whole litany, and I sure can't do it in 1 minute.

Ms. OAKAR. I think you should.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. OK. The Amercian Hotel & Motel Association; the American Iron & Steel Institute; the American Legislative Exchange Council; the American Paper Institute; the American Retail Federation; the American Society for Personnel Administration.

Ms. OAKAR. No. I mean specific businesses. Anybody can name corporate institutions.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Lennox Industries; Caterpillar Tractor; Citizens for America; Master Printers of America.

Ms. OAKAR. No, that is not what I am talking about. Can you name a specific business, corporation——

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Did I not just mention one? Are your listening? I said Caterpillar Tractor. Did you not hear me?

Ms. OAKAR. Oh, Caterpillar Tractor. OK. You named one.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, I could name you a litany of them, but I cannot do it in the time allotted to me.

Ms. OAKAR. I suggest you put that in the RECORD, because my businesses are telling me they did not take a stand on this issue, and some are for it. And they belong to the local chamber. They are thinking about the national.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] has expired.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 6 minutes to the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER].

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. Let me say two things which, at first blush, sound contradictory. First, H.R. 3008 is the most important civil rights legislation to come to the House floor this session. Second, H.R. 3008 is a rather modest bill, in that it merely requires an independent study of whether the pay gap between men and women in the Federal Government is due to discrimination.

These two statements are really not a contradiction. There is undoubtedly a large wage gap between men and women in the Federal Government. Some of this gap is surely due to entirely reasonable factors, such as hours of work, seniority, educational level, and the like. But some of this gap cannot be explained by these factors. The study will determine if, where, and how severe women's wages are held down by illegal discrimination. Once we know the location and extent of the disease, we can act deliberately to remove it.

H.R. 3008 deals with discrimination against minorities, as well as discrimination against women. This is an important addition. It will help us locate instances where wages of an occupation are held low because most of the occupants are black or Hispanic.

For the second year in a row, Members have the opportunity to cast their votes for or against economic fairness for women employed by the Federal Government. Last year, 413 of us voted to take the first step toward eliminating discrimination. Unfortunately, the other body balked. They agreed, however, to have the General Accounting Office develop the framework for a pay equity study. On March 1, 1985, GAO released its findings. H.R. 3008 is directly based on that GAO report. H.R. 3008 is, therefore, even sounder and more carefully developed than the legislation we passed last year. Indeed, the American delegation to the U.N. Conference on Women came back with a resolution supporting pay equity. The President's own daughter led that delegation. Who are we to say no to Maureen Reagan?

H.R. 3008 says that the Federal Government will not tolerate discrimination in any form. It does not change the basic law on discrimination; it merely finds out whether that law is being violated. H.R. 3008 is a natural successor to the Equal Pay Act of 1963 and the Civil Rights Act of 1964—and essential to tackle the subtle forms of discrimination that have succeeded the blatant discrimination of 20 years ago.

The Federal Government is the largest single employer in the Nation. As such, it should set an example for the private sector. Yet, in attacking pervasive, subtle forms of discrimination, the Federal Government is lagging far behind the 35 States and numerous towns and cities that have already begun studies of their wage-setting practices.

Yesterday, I received a new GAO report entitled "Description of Selected Nonfederal Job Evaluation Systems," which described how States and private companies have dealt with the issue of discrimination against women. It shows how careful implementation of corrective action can cure the problem without causing economic damage to the employer. The evidence should lay to rest concerns of some that correcting pay discrimination against women will bankrupt the Government. States such as Minnesota, and towns like Colorado Springs, CO, have identified steps to correct discriminatory pay practices without busting the budget.

H.R. 3008 requires a study of Federal classification and pay practices to determine if any elements discriminate on the basis of sex, race, or ethnicity. It acknowledges that women and minorities are clustered in the lowest grades in the Federal Government and asks why.

We took a first look at the wage gap in our 1982 hearings on pay equity. In joint hearings that Gerry Ferraro, MARY ROSE OAKAR and I held, we found that women are concentrated in a few, low-paying occupational categories. The largest occupational category in the Federal Government is secretary; 99 percent of secretaries are women and the average pay is $15,800. The second largest is clerk-typist. It is 96 percent women and the average pay is $11,600.

The General Accounting Office [GAO] released a study on November 27, 1984, of occupational segregation in the Federal Government and found that women are concentrated in grades 7 and below, while men are concentrated in grades 10 and above. GAO reported that at grade GS-6, women hold 75 percent of the jobs, while men hold 25 percent. Employees at grade 6 earn between $16,000 and $20,000. At grade GS-13, women hold only 12.4 percent of the jobs, while men fill 87.6 percent of the positions. Employees in grade 13 earn between $36,000 and $47,000.

Is this because the Federal Government intentionally discriminates against women? No. Rather, it's because the Federal Government sets its wages based on what the private sector does. Private sector wages show the effects of years of sex based discrimination. Remember, 25 years ago it was perfectly legal to advertise for male-only or female-only, or white-only jobs, and to pay the female-only and black-only jobs considerable less than would be paid to the white-male jobs. The civil rights legislation of the early 1960's made that type of discrimination illegal, but the pay systems in place now carry the baggage of those earlier years.

Is the market going to take care of this? It hasn't so far. In fact, the pay gap between men and women has increased in the past 20 years. This is because the number of women entering the labor force has burgeoned during this period.

Should the Office of Personnel Management do this study? OPM did what it claimed was a pay equity study. In a letter to me yesterday, however, the GAO said, "in our opinion, the OPM draft report does not achieve the objectives of a pay equity study." We need an outside study, free of partisan politics. We need a study beyond reproach, done by an independent consultant under the guidance of a blue ribbon panel. And, that is what H.R. 3008 contains.

Is the pay gap between men and women due to different levels of experience, education, and hours of work? Some, but not all. The National Academy of Sciences concluded that these factors explained only a part of the pay differential. No study has shown that these factors explain more than half the wage differential. Does discrimination explain the other half? We don't know. That's why we need H.R. 3008.

The bill does not prejudge the question of how much of the existing wage gap is due to discrimination. A study may determine that much of the gap is caused by other factors. But it's a little like having chest pains. You should find out if it's indigestion or a heart attack.

Some of our colleagues have become pamphleteers against this legislation. One missive states "comparable worth, in the short run, would bring about a decline in productivity * * * in the long run, * * * certain economic stagnation." Certainly, Robert Isaacs, the mayor of Colorado Springs, CO, doesn't buy this. Over the past 5 years, Colorado Springs has implemented a plan to eliminate sex-based wage discrimination for its city employees. As Mayor Isaacs put it:

> We did something fair and just, and in return we got ourselves great employee morale, lower turnover, and higher productivity. Isn't that what the private sector's always looking for?

The pamphleteers say that under comparable worth "pay scales would be subject to the whims of wage boards, instructed to ignore market factors * * *." This statement betrays ignorance of the Federal pay system. Federal employees wages are already set administratively. Right now, today, an administrative wage board, known as OPM, compares the worth of electricians and nurses, plumbers, and teachers. H.R. 3008 aims at finding out whether illegal discrimination enters into these wage determinations. Moreover, Federal wages are capped by legislation—many Federal employees think wages now are set or frozen at whim. Federal employees, especially senior managers and engineers are now paid under a wage system that ignores market factors, since the Government simply can't compete with IBM. It's been reported that back in 1964, Robert McNamara took a pay cut of $575,000 to come to work for the Federal Government. His wage, and those of his successors, have been set in ignorance of market factors.

Another pamphlet says "A comparable worth study * * * could * * * [lead to] implementing this disastrous system of wage setting within the Federal Government, and eventually extending this practice to private businesses. This is exactly what has happened in Washington State * * *." My, my. I did not know that Washington State private firms had their wages set by the State government. I sit on the Armed Services Committee and I haven't heard any complaints from Boeing about Washington State trying to adjust Boeing's pay scales.

The facts are that H.R. 3008 is only a study of the Federal Government and its employees. The bill does not make a pay policy for the Federal Government. It does not automatically increase anyone's wages. It does not give Congress, or anyone else, the power to set wages for private sector employees. Yet, by identifying wage discrimination, it serves as the most important civil rights legislation to come before this House. I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. As I understand it, the gentlewoman indicated there has not been a study on this issue in the past.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. There has not been a study on the Federal classification system since 1923.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, I have before me a list of studies, 22 studies of Federal pay and classification, since 1949. Twenty-two.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. We are talking about looking for discrimination. The issue is, as you understand, the bill that took discrimination out was in 1964, which was clearly after 1923. Pre-1964 you could advertise jobs as women's jobs, as black jobs, and you could not afterward.

But I think what we want to make perfectly clear is, yes, indeed, there have been those kinds of studies. But the law changed drastically in 1964.

What the Washington case and what other cases have been about is going back to look at the classification system to find if the pre-1964 jobs that were advertised as black or Hispanic or white or women have got discrimination cranked into the classification system along with the other things. That is all the study is looking at. That is what is going on in cities, that is what is going on in States, that is what we would like to see go on in the Federal Government, because we are now 22 years behind complying with the 1964 law.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Well, I yielded to the gentleman, and you cannot tell me of a Federal study to come forward to show that we are complying with the 1964 law.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Well, I have one right here that was done in 1984, "Equal Worth, Comparable Worth and Market Worth, a Federal Job Study of the Federal Government's Pay Classification and Qualification System for Employment" by the U.S. Office of Personnel Management. It is right here. Would you like to see a copy of it?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Yes, but in our opinion, that OPM draft did not achieve those objectives.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Oh, in your opinion.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If I can yield to the chairwoman, we know exactly about that study, and she has been an expert on this. Let me yield to the chairwoman, and tell him about that study.

Ms. OAKAR. If I could just quote from the letter from GAO, whose appointed Director is appointed by the President, he says: "In our opinion, the OPM draft report does not achieve the objectives of pay equity study as you have defined them."

We also have another letter from Mrs. Cornelius, who is the Acting Director of OPM right now, in which she implies that they are going to discard that study. As you know, that was held by——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado [Mrs. SCHROEDER] has expired.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. I was just going to say that I think the study, if they want to bring it up during the course of debate, I would love to bring up that study. And Dr. Devine, who is no longer with us, thanks to the Republican controlled Senate, has confirmed it.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. We would be very happy to discuss that study, which was not a study at all, according to objective agencies and people of both parties. But we are right back to where we were. I think this is a very simple request. It is long overdue. It is just, it is fair. And all of the other things that are being thrown up I honestly think are smokescreens. So let us proceed and let us get on with it. Really, I do think over 200 years is long enough.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. RUDD].

Mr. RUDD. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in opposition to H.R. 3008, the so-called Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act. This legislation is not about equal pay for equal work. That policy has already been the law of the land for more than 20 years. This legislation proposes to implement the concept of equal pay for unequal work through the subjective setting of wages by some Government-appointed board of "experts" without regard to market factors. It is one step closer to a government-controlled and planned economy.

Just last week, a letter was hand-delivered to my office by the Concerned Women for America [CWA], the largest women's organization in the country with over 500,000 members, in strong opposition to this legislation.

CWA's president, Beverly Lahaye, accurately pointed out that this legislation "paves the way for transforming our society from a free enterprise system, in which the marketplace and the laws of supply and demand operate to set wages, to a socialistic or planned economy in which Government officials, judges or consultants determine wages according to an arbitrary and subjective point system * * * a study opens the door for court-ordered imposition of pay equity or comparable worth as occurred in a case involving the State of Washington * * * pay equity may cost the Federal Government over $6 billion."

If put into place nationwide for all employment, the cost could skyrocket to as much as $320 billion.

Let's be clear what we're voting on in this legislation. It is not simply a study of Federal pay practices. If a study is conducted and inequities are discovered—a near certainty given the biased makeup of the proposed board—the Government would be required to implement the recommendations or stand a good chance of a lawsuit as happened in Washington State in the case of American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees [AFSCME] Versus the State of Washington. In that case, the court ordered the State to immediately raise the wages of 15,500 State employees in predominantly female job classifications, and awarded back pay to the employees retroactive to September 1979.

Pay equity, or comparable worth, completely redefines discrimination. It is based on the erroneous assumption that every job has a measureable economic worth that can be judged free of bias and that dissimilar jobs can be objectively compared. It would prohibit an evaluation of other vital wage determinants such as the marketplace, unions, benefit packages, seniority and individual merit. It ignores the economic forces of supply and demand in the labor market.

To demonstrate the folly of this concept, in the Washington case, a clerical supervisor got higher ratings than a chemist; an electrician was given the same number of points for knowledge, skill and mental demands as a beginning secretary; and truck drivers ranked at the bottom, below telephone operators or retail clerks. Comparing dissimilar jobs, compensating for different working conditions, motivations, merit and changing demands of the marketplace cannot be done objectively or accurately by any Government entity. Only the dynamics of the marketplace can fairly and accurately determine their value.

This legislation is not concerned with equity. It is a clear and dangerous step toward Government control of our economy, and I urge its defeat.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the debate on the rule and I have heard a debate on the bill, and I think therein is my basis for objecting to this rule at this time. If nothing else, we have seen in this last 45 or 50 minutes what a tremendously important, complex, and complicated issue we are dealing with here. One that has not only fascinating and complex substantive dimensions to it, but also methodological dimensions to it that are just incredibly fascinating.

The idea that a regression model with 27 variables may have been considered an inadequate study fascinates me when one with 4 variables was considered quite adequate and acceptable.

So we have here then a rule that says let us talk about all of these very intriguing, complicated, difficult issues on a subject that everybody must concede is critically important in 1 hour. I object to the rule.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I have been watching with some puzzlement some of this debate here. First of all, how anybody could suggest with a straight face that this is anything more than a study in its present form is amazing to me because I think that there ought to be a requirement for better reading comprehension skills as a condition precedent to sitting in this body.

Second, for those of you who are concerned that this commission is likely to do anything, the only thing they can do is write a report which they will send to the President of the United States. And if the President acts crazy and radical, he will send us outrageously expensive legislation which GENE TAYLOR and I will promptly begin studying for the next 10 years.

You do not have to worry about the process suddenly being substituted. There is nobody who is going to get a bill out of our committee that is going to put us out of the business of being the committee that will ultimately decide what pay is.

What is the alternative to this study? The alternative is the legislation already pending in this Congress that would, without a study, impose some form of comparable worth measure in our Federal payroll system, and I am unwilling at this point to move with a bill like that because I do not know what the consequences of that would be. I really do not know whether we know enough about it to know how to apply it. I think that this is a responsible way to go about getting to the nub of the whole problem that is raised by people who accurately give us on the committee examples of whole areas of the Government where, because of the nature of the people who populate the jobs, they seem to get left out when adjustments are made.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I yield to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD] has expired.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I continue to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I share your concern about this, that is why I have a substitute, which I will propose later, because I think it should be looked into.

One of the questions I have——

Mr. FORD of Michigan. If the gentleman will let me reclaim part of my time. If the gentleman had a serious substitute, I would be willing to sit down and talk to him about it. But when I see him notify us that he is going to offer 80-some amendments to this bill, ranging in everything from the kitchen sink to the back door, I do not think that the gentleman is demonstrating the kind of sincerity about wanting to improve this bill or improve the study that would warrant serious consideration of his substitute. So I probably will have to oppose that along with the other 80 amendments that you have.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. If the gentleman will yield, I understand. Let me just ask if it is a big concern as it appears to be to all the people in the Chamber today, why is it that we get a committee report at 1 o'clock today and we are asked to move this thing forward immediately? Why not give the Members of this body a little time to study that report so they can be conversant with the subject matter?

Mr. FORD of Michigan. I certainly do not want to offend the gentleman or anyone else. He was the one who insisted that GENE TAYLOR insist on the full period of time for the minority members of the committee to write a minority report on the bill, and to accommodate that, we ran up against this adjournment date. That is not a problem we thought was going to happen.

We did not anticipate the gentleman's, at least I did not, enthusiastic opposition to the bill which materialized to my knowledge rather late. When I saw the ranking minority member on the committee changing the bill in a form that made it acceptable to him, I said, "My God, if you can satisfy JOHN MYERS, certainly nobody is going to complain." I was shocked to find that the other gentleman from Indiana does not quite agree with JOHN MYERS.

Mr. WHEAT. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, we have used almost all the allotted time for this debate. Not only of the rule, but it appears, of the bill. There seem to be two major objections as to why this rule should not pass today.

One of those being that the rule is not completely open and specifically in regard to allowing the amendment of the gentlewoman from Illinois to be included. There are those of us who indicated in the Rules Committee that we were empathetic to the kinds of concerns that the gentlewoman was raising.

But specifically in regard to the question of why her particular amendment should be put on this bill, she replied that she would be willing to try anything. Mr. Speaker, it is not necessarily appropriate that that particular amendment be put on this rule and in fact, since that was a change, call it a change in the Civil Rights Law of 1964, and this bill is merely calling for a study, the Rules Committee quite rightfully did not allow a waiver of germaneness to allow that particular amendment to be discussed.

In light of the fact that it is very clear that the provisions of this piece of legislation are well known to both sides of the aisle, that it has been through 4 years of testimony in the House of Representatives; that some 80 to 100 amendments are now waiting on the floor for consideration of this particular rule, there does not appear to be any question but that we are not proceeding in undue haste. In fact, the question would better be put, is there any reason to delay? Since there is no obvious reason to delay, I would move the previous question and urge that the resolution be adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the resolution.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the resolution.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I object to the vote on the ground that a quorum is not present and make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Sergeant at Arms will notify absent Members.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 292, nays 133, not voting 8, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

CONDEMNING PASSAGE OF RESOLUTION 3379 IN THE U.N. GENERAL ASSEMBLY

Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Affairs be discharged from further consideration of the Senate joint resolution (S.J. Res. 98) condemning the passage of Resolution 3379, in the U.N. General Assembly on November 10, 1975, and urging the U.S. Ambassador and U.S. delegation to take all appropriate actions necessary to erase this shameful resolution from the record of the United Nations, and ask for its immediate consideration in the House.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

S.J. RES. 98

Whereas, on November 10, 1975, the thirtieth session of the United Nations General Assembly adopted Resolution 3379 which sought to legitimize the lie, first perpetrated at the United Nations General Assembly by representatives of the Union of Socialist Soviet Republics in 1963, that Zionism is a form of racism; and

Whereas Resolution 3379 of the thirtieth United Nations General Assembly directly contravenes the most basic principles and purposes of the United Nations Charter and undermines universal human rights values and principles; and

Whereas that infamous resolution threatens directly the integrity and legitimacy of a member state by singling out for slanderous attack the national movement which gave birth to the State of Israel; and

Whereas the adoption of Resolution 3379 by the thirtieth United Nations General Assembly constituted one of that organization's darkest moments and may fuel the flames of antisemitism and anti-Zionism; and

Whereas the United States Congress sharply condemned the passage of Resolution 3379 ten years ago "in that said resolution encourages antisemitism by wrongly associating and equating Zionism with racism": Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Congress—

(1) soundly denounces and condemns any linkage between Zionism and racism;

(2) considers UNGA Resolution 3379 to be a permanent smear upon the reputation of the United Nations and to be totally inconsistent with that organization's declared purposes and principles;

(3) unequivocally states that the premise of UNGA Resolution 3379 which equates Zionism with racism is itself clearly a form of bigotry; and

(4) formally repudiates UNGA Resolution 3379, and calls upon the Parliaments of all countries which value freedom and democracy to do the same.

● Mr. YATRON. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of Senate Joint Resolution 98. This resolution condemns the passage of U.N. Resolution 3379, which was adopted by the General Assembly in November of 1975 and calls on the U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations to erase this shameful resolution from the record of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, U.N. Resolution 3379 seeks to legitimize the vicious lie that Zionism is a form of racism. Originally sponsored by the Soviet Union, this initiative is an insult to the American people and reflects poorly on the nations which voted for it. The adoption of this resolution represents the nadir of the United Nations. It is an affront to the American people and is an outright form of bigotry.

Mr. Speaker, it is not suprising that this U.N. initiative was first put forth by the Soviet Union. After all, the Soviet Union symbolizes anti-Semitism in its lowest form. U.N. resolution 3379 is a blatant lie and an exercise in double speak. It is an attack on a democratic nation which respects human rights, Israel.

Mr. Speaker, U.N. Resolution 3379 makes a mockery of the United Nations. To make matters worse, similar resolutions are regularly sponsored in various U.N. agencies and conferences, and the United States must do all it can, power to prevent their adoption. As a supporter of the United Nations, it seems to me that if we must continue to expend our resources to defeat initiatives designed to attack the Jewish people and Israel, the United States should reconsider its policy toward the entire U.N. system.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, by calling on the parliaments of all countries to repudiate U.N. Resolution 3379, Senate Joint Resolution 98 sends a clear signal to our friends in the international community that resolutions attacking Zionism and Israel will be viewed as an attack on the United States and will not be tolerated. I urge my colleagues to adopt this resolution.●

● Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Joint Resolution 98, condemning the passage of Resolution 3379, in the U.N. General Assembly on November 10, 1975, and urging the U.S. Ambassador and U.S. delegation to take all appropriate actions necessary to erase the resolution from the record of the United Nations.

Senate Joint Resolution 98 was passed by the Senate on July 9. A companion measure, House Joint Resolution 3379, was introduced in the House by the Honorable JOSEPH J. DIOGUARDI. At the outset, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the chairman of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, the Honorable GUS YATRON, as well as my other colleagues on the committee, in particular the ranking minority member, the Honorable WILLIAM S. BROOMFIELD, and the Honorable BENJAMIN A. GILMAN for their continuing interest and efforts on behalf of this and related issues.

Passage of U.N. Resolution 3379, a decade ago, served no useful function then, nor does it now. It should be repudiated. It made an inaccurate and unfair linkage equating Zionism with racism. That resolution not only had no beneficial results, but instead has proved detrimental by provoking feelings of anti-Semitism, and attacks on the State of Israel and its people. As the Helsinki accords, with precepts embracing universal human rights principles, now celebrate their 10-year anniversary, it is timely to underscore those principles here.

Over the years, there have been resolutions and actions in the United Nations too numerous to cite here which have repeatedly singled out and targeted Israel for abuse and/or exclusion from various U.N. bodies or conferences. Such activities, which tend to politicize the organization and divert attention away from the true purposes and goals of the United Nations, are not in the best interests of the United Nations or the world community.

The resolution now before us denounces UNGA Resolution 3379, and urges other freedom-loving nations to also repudiate that resolution. Mr. Speaker, I urge the adoption of Senate Joint Resolution 98.●

● Mr. BROOMFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I offer my support of the resolution before us.

As my colleagues well remember, the United Nations passed Resolution 3379 in 1975. That resolution claimed that Zionism was a form of racism. It is interesting to note that it was the Soviet Union that first presented that lie at the United Nations in 1963. Given the human rights record of that police state, their criticism is somewhat like the pot calling the kettle black.

That unfortunate resolution contravenes the basic principles of the U.N. Charter. It undermines human rights values and principles. It already threatens the legitimacy of a member state by slandering it with untruths.

Over the years, much criticism has been directed at the United Nations. Many Members of this body have defended that organization. A resolution of this nature, however, only fuels the fires of anti-United Nations sentiments in the Congress and in America. That resolution undermines the credibility, the balance, and the integrity of the United Nations. It makes Israel appear to be a whipping boy for the many bigoted countries around the world which oppose the existence of that country.

It is incumbent upon all of us here today to make a statement about this injustice. The passage of that unfortunate resolution has stained the good reputation which the United Nations deserves. I call upon my colleagues to join me in condemning any linkage between Zionism and racism.●

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong support of the resolution (S.J. Res. 98) condemning the passage of Resolution 3329, in the General Assemby on November 10, 1975, and urging the U.S. Ambassador and U.S. delegation to take all necessary actions to expunge the resolution from the record.

Mr. Speaker, the equation of Zionism with racism is one of the worst libels ever to be spoken; it is the most odious statement ever made by the General Assembly of the United Nations.

Mr. Speaker, the General Assembly resolution of which we speak today has come to have a life of its own. It was bad enough that the General Assembly passed it. But the slander it contains has been repeated and debated time and time again in forums associated with the United Nations, injecting unwanted division and tensions into what should be useful and productive meetings on international affairs.

As a former member of the U.S. delegation to the United Nations General Assembly, I know that the statements of that body can and often do result in much good; but the character of the United Nations itself has been degraded by this racism resolution, casting doubt on all the good work that is done there. This I regret very much.

I would like to thank the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. YATRON] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. SOLOMON], the distinguished chairman and ranking member of the Subcommittee on Human Rights and International Organizations, and the leadership of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, for bringing this matter to the House floor for our consideration today. I would like to thank all those who have worked on this issue, in the other body and in the general public, for keeping this issue before us. The Equation of Zionism with racism is slander which we can and must erase from the records of the international community.●

● Mr. SOLOMON. Mr. Speaker, I strongly support this resolution. Ten years ago this autumn, the United Nations adopted a resolution that condemned Zionism as a "form of racism," a "racialist and imperialist ideology," and a "threat to world peace." On the 10th anniversary of the adoption of that resolution by the United Nations, it is important for our country to again go on record in opposition to it.

When the U.N. Social, Humanitarian, and Cultural Committee first considered the anti-Zionism resolution, our representative, Leonard Garment, called the resolution "a supreme act of deceit * * * and a massive attack on the moral realities of the world." He went on to describe the resolution as an official U.N. endorsement of anti-Semitism. And concerning passage of the resolution, he said, "I choose my words carefully when I say that this is an obscene act."

Later on, in the General Assembly, our Ambassador, DANIEL PATRICK MOYNIHAN, who now serves as senior Senator from my home State of New York, made many of the same points Mr. Garment expressed in committee and went on to discuss the serious repercussions the anti-Zionism resolution was likely to have throughout the world. Despite the fact that we were defeated, our men at the United Nations, Leonard Garment and PAT MOYNIHAN, put forth a sterling effort and made our country's revulsion at this resolution crystal clear to every delegate from every country at the United Nations.

Without taking much more of the committee's time, Mr. Chairman, let me just conclude with two observations based on what Leonard Garment and PAT MOYNIHAN told the United Nations a decade ago.

First, they made very clear that the passage of a resolution intended to discredit the State of Israel would have the ironic effect of discrediting the United Nations itself. And that has certainly proven to be true. I can think of no better example than the anti-Zionism resolution to illustrate the radical departure of the United Nations from the ideals and principles that led to its own founding back in 1945.

Perhaps no single event in the U.N.'s entire history has held up the United Nations to more disrepute than the passage of the anti-Zionism, anti-Israel resolution in 1975.

Secondly, our Ambassador and his associates emphasized that the American people would never forget the anti-Zionism resolution. Indeed, PAT MOYNIHAN rose in the General Assembly to declare a day of infamy when the resolution passed. He recognized then, as all of us have, that the anti-Zionism resolution was a frontal assault on the legitimacy of the State of Israel, as well as an attack on Jewish people in the United States.

And so, it is very important that we, as representatives of the American people, pass a resolution once again calling public attention to the monstrous lies that were propagated by the U.N. General Assembly. I hope that passage of the resolution before us can contribute to a more constructive atmosphere at the United Nations itself by making clear that all people of all countries who value freedom and democracy reject the blatant anti-Semitism and the perverted sociology that led to U.N. Resolution 3379.●

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed, and a motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Under the rule, the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] will be recognized for 30 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, today the House is considering a bill, H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. H.R. 3008 is quite direct and quite straightforward.

As many of you know, I chair a subcommittee related to how we pay and what benefits classified Federal employees receive.

H.R. 3008 is quite direct and forthright. The bill simply requires a study to determine whether the Federal pay and classification systems are effective in terms of gender, race, and Hispanic origin. It establishes an 11-member bipartisan commission to select and oversee an independent consultant who performs the study. The commission reviews the consultant's findings, issues a report with its views and recommendations to the President and to the Congress.

The commission then disbands within 90 days after the reports are submitted.

We have not studied this type of information since 1923 when the classification system for Federal employees existed.

My bill passed the House, which was slightly different, but the same thrust of the bill passed the House last year 413 to 6. There were no Democrats who voted against it and very few Republicans who did not support the bill.

I know that apparently this year there has been some kind of misrepresentation of the bill. That is why I would like to clarify what the bill does.

The Senate has introduced a bill that is very, very similar. It is a bipartisan bill, introduced by Senator EVANS of the State of Washington, along with the distinguished Senator from California, Senator CRANSTON. They have had extensive hearings, just as we have, from people who agreed with the substance of the bill and people who disagreed and wanted to make recommendations. That is why when I reintroduced the bill with 102 cosponsors on the first day of introduction in a bipartisan fashion, we added the qualification related to the study of an economic analysis. That was the recommendation of the minority. We added that.

The other thing we added was a different makeup of the Commission at the recommendation of the minority, a bipartisan commission to select members of it.

The other thing we added after we had countless hearings and after we saw what indeed a number of States and local governments are doing, we added that we felt not only women should be looked at in terms of the perspective of the classification system, we felt minorities—and I want to emphasize this to my colleagues because this is not only a women's issue, it is a family issue and it is an issue that relates to minorities as well—we added minorities and we added Hispanics, because in various studies that have been done in the classification system, we know that Hispanics, blacks, and women are clustered on the bottom rungs of the classification system, so we added those.

It is interesting to me that we have such a cross-section of individuals who support the bill. There is the Congressional Black Caucus, the Congressional Women's Issue Caucus, our Hispanic Caucus, the Federation of Business and Professional Women, nurses, teachers, Latin American citizens, their league, the National Political Congress of Black Women, the League of Women Voters, hardly a radical group, and various industrial unions, unions whether they are blue-collar representatives or white-collar representatives, all the AFL-CIO representatives, and we could go on and on about who really is for the bill.

What we are talking about basically is the fact that the Federal Government really should take a look at how it treats its classified employees, something that I have, as the Chair of the subcommittee, jurisdiction over.

When GAO, at the request of people like Senator STEVENS and others, and myself, did a preliminary study in terms of the Federal work force, for example, they found that the disparity between white-collar workers who were male and female was $11,000 annually.

Now, we are not saying necessarily that the disparity is due solely to discrimination, but we are saying that it is interesting that we have not taken a look at that system and what contributes to that disparity.

We also know that this is a national phenomenon. I want to make this very, very clear. Every study should be made internally and on an individual entity. One study for one State does not relate to a study that another State does.

We believe very strongly that our study only applies to federally classified employees. It does not apply to any corporations, although a number of very fine corporations, like AT&T, United States Steel, J. Byron and Sons department store chain in the South, have done their own internal studies, made recommendations, and ultimately it is my understanding, made changes. But we do not believe that this study should apply to any other group, only classified Federal employees.

So all of the fear tactics that relate to this issue are for naught. We know that 45 States, 45 States have either completed their study or are in the process of completing a study. My own State of Ohio, I am proud to say, is about to complete its study on how it treats its own employees, its own State employees.

It is interesting that many States have implemented their studies and they have found that, in fact, that it did not bankroll their payroll. As a matter of fact, what happened was that they increased their productivity and the morale of their workers. They also in some cases, they testified, increased the economy of their State when they made the necessary changes, and I know we have very fine authorities who can speak to that.

Mr. Chairman, I simply want to take these few minutes to say that I for one, think, and this is very important to me, that I am privileged to be a Member of this body. This is the same body that passed the Civil Rights Act in the 1960's. This is the same body that passed the Equal Pay Act in the 1960's. This is the same body that passed the Fair Credit Act in the 1970's that gave women an opportunity for access to fairness issues in terms of credit. This is the same body that introduced the 19th amendment that gave women the right to vote, which they ultimately received in 1920.

Mr. Chairman, I have been somewhat dismayed by the tone of the rhetoric used with repect to this issue. I consider myself a red-blooded American woman, proud of her roots as an American, proud of the contributions of her parents, and brothers, and sisters. I really must say I have been somewhat dismayed by the rhetoric in various speeches, when most of us are not here.

But nonetheless, let us today, at long last, lift this Chamber to the loftiness that it can have in terms of dialog. We are the Chamber that passed the Civil Rights Act. I think it is about time we deal not with personalities, and not in issues that will somehow alienate people. I think it is about time we deal with issues that relate to fairness.

We can do it. We have done it before and shown that the Congress can show off its best qualities. Let us do it today. It is about time. And it is about time we treated our minorities, and women who have served the Federal Government for many years with justice.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maine [Ms. SNOWE].

Ms. SNOWE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3008, the Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. This legislation calls for a study of the Federal wage and classification systems to make sure that we are paying fairly the men and women who work for the Federal Government. And I would like at the outset to remind my colleagues that essentially the same legislation passed this body last year by a vote of 413 to 6.

I want, however, to express my disappointment that the legislation we are considering today only addresses the problem of wage discrimination in the executive branch. This problem is not confined to those in the executive branch, and a number of us have worked for some time to address the problem of employment discrimination among our own employees: The men and women who work for the Congress.

In fact, this issue was raised on June 22 last year during debate on the rule for the legislation of the gentlewoman from Ohio. At that time, the Rules Committee had refused to waive the germaneness requirement against an amendment to incorporate the legislative branch into the study. During debate on the rule, a commitment was made to bring my legislation to the floor before the end of the session.

Well, another year has passed. Today we are considering legislation for a study of the executive branch for the second time, and I regret to say that neither my legislation nor other legislation to address the problem of employment discrimination in the legislative branch has been considered by the House.

I would like to acknowledge the concerted efforts of those who have worked hard to see that our commitment to fair employment practices and compensation extends to the legislative branch as well. The gentleman from California, Mr. HAWKINS, the former chairman of the House Administration Committee, held hearings on my legislation last year, and was as sincere in his effort to eliminate discrimination in the legislative branch as he is in his commitment to eliminate discrimination against all workers. I am also pleased that the gentleman from California, Mr. PANETTA, held hearings just last week on my legislation, as well as several other proposals before his subcommittee.

Hearings on this problem, however, are not sufficient. As we move to consider this bill today I only wish we could coordinate our efforts on this issue so that Federal employees in both the executive and legislative branches would receive the protections due them.

These concerns aside, Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3008 because it is a fair and straightforward approach to addressing an important problem. The Federal wage system established in 1923 has never been reviewed in its entire 62 year history. I don't think there is anything left we haven't studied, let alone ignored, for 62 years.

H.R. 3008 would simply provide for this long overdue study of compensation in those occupations which are held predominantly by one sex, or by one racial or ethnic group. The purpose of this study is to ensure that the Federal Government—the Nation's largest employer—is complying with the laws which prohibit employment discrimination.

Let me reassure my colleagues on a couple of counts, since you have been subjected to an onslaught of misdirection and disinformation in recent days. This bill calls for a study, and only a study.

It applies to the Federal Government's civil service.

It does not affect State and local Government nor does it affect the private sector.

It will not create any sort of national wage scale or pay policy. Following completion of the study, a bipartisan commission will recommend remedies in the event that discriminatory practices are found. Implementation of the many possible remedies will require adoption of legislation by the Congress. In short, this is a very deliberate process being proposed here, not a headlong rush into uncharted territory.

Why then, Mr. Chairman, is the House nervous about acting? Why is there trepidation and concern about taking a step already taken by 22 different States? Twenty-two States, Mr. Chairman, have already completed or are in the process of completing similar studies. Six States have actually moved ahead to implement their findings. Only 5 States in the Nation have not examined the issue of sex-based wage discrimination through pay equity studies, legislation or collective bargaining.

Five States, Mr. Chairman, and the Congress of the United States. Not only have most of the States proceeded apace, but local governments, city governments have acted where the Congress has faltered.

Colorado Springs, CO hasn't been afraid to act.

Virginia Beach, VA hasn't been afraid to act.

Bellevue, WA hasn't been afraid to act.

Los Angeles and Long Beach CA haven't been afraid to act.

Each of these cities, and others, have moved ahead to study and to take action to eliminate discrimination, while the Congress argues about reviewing the Federal Government's own wage system for the first time in 62 years.

We have the ability to perform this review. Job evaluations, rather than being purely subjective, have been used in this country for over 50 years. Two-thirds of all employees in the U.S. companies that use some form of job evaluation to compare dissimilar jobs. I find it most ironic that the only time job evaluation techniques are called into question is when they are used to identify illegal wage discrimination. Since we are able to identify wage discrimination, we have a responsibility to use that ability.

A pay equity study of the Federal Government will do us no harm, Mr. Chairman. Those who point to the lawsuit in Washington State do so with fine intentions but with muddled facts. Washington State was sued not because its wage-setting practices were inequitable, but because the State continued the discriminatory practices for 10 years after they were identified. I, for one, have enough faith in my colleagues to know that if any discriminatory practices were exposed, that they would not hesitate nor delay to act to rectify them promptly.

Mr. Chairman, we have before us today a simple question of fairness under the law of the land.

We are talking about the fact that 80 percent of the women working for the Federal Government are concentrated in grades 1 through 7, while 85 percent of the men can be found in grades 10 through 15.

We are talking about the $9,000 earnings gap between what the Government pays women and what it pays men.

We are saying today that the Congress has a responsibility to find out why these women are concentrated in lower grades, and why they earn substantially less than men.

We are saying that the Congress passed this legislation by a vote of 413 to 6 last year, and that the situation demands just as strong a vote again this year.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I would ask how much time has been consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] has consumed 9 minutes and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] has consumed 4 minutes.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. JOHNSON].

Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Indiana for yielding to me and I rise in support, strong support of the bill.

I want to address the reality of Connecticut's experience in this regard, because I think it is important for the Members to try to get a grasp of what this study means to people in their lives and to our society.

Connecticut passed exactly this kind of legislation. We did this study. Let us look at the result.

First of all, it did not create economic crisis nor class war. What did happen is that the hand of underpaid employees was strengthened at the bargaining table. Data led, research led to information, information led to the power to redress historic inequities. So instead of a 5-percent wage increase being adopted for everyone, a 2-percent wage increase was adopted for everyone, and the rest of the money was set aside in an equity fund.

What was done with the equity fund? It was used to increase the salaries of those that the study had shown were relatively underpaid, considering their responsibilities and the qualifications that they had for the job.

What we are doing here is to adopt a bill that will do the study to provide information, then the next step as to what we shall do, as a consequence of that information, how we shall act, how we shall implement its findings, is indeed up to us and nothing will happen automatically, nothing will happen without our support.

But we will have the data through which we can understand and address inequities that are not malicious. They are not there because someone does not care about women, they are there because there historic presumptions many decades ago when those salaries were set.

I call your attention to the fact that clerical jobs right now in which woman dominate have salaries ranging from $238 down $146. Similar jobs, clerical jobs in which men dominate, have salaries that start at $288; and remember the top of the other category was $238—and if I have more time later one I will tell you the other categories in detail—but these go all the way up to $441.

Now that is not because anyone wanted to disadvantage women, but because many, many years ago when there were very few opportunities for women in the work force, obviously supply was great and demand was small, and supply and demand did establish a low wage base. From that base we have been providing the same increments to women that we have provided to men from a higher wage base.

So, Mr. Chairman, I look forward to the debate that follows and urge my colleagues in supporting what is a good and sound piece of legislation.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1½ minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. BARNES].

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Chairman, there has been a great deal of criticism of this bill. Those who misunderstand this legislation most have charged that it will cause every kind of mischief except clog kitchen sinks. I'd like to quote a warning from another member, a criticism that my colleagues by now will find familiar:

> Although this bill may have motives in the finest tradition of gallantry, it actually is about as ungallant as a kick in the shins.
> Testimony before the subcommittee suggests that its enactment would worsen rather than improve job opportunities for women . . . under compulsion of this bill, employers who contend that the employment costs for women are higher than for men will tend to cut back on female employment . . . this legislation has the laudible objective of equal pay for women. If, in practice, it leads to fewer jobs for women, the victory will be Pyrrhic.

The Member of this body responsible for that dire prediction was Representative Paul Findley of Illinois, a member of the House Education and Labor Committee in 1963. He was addressing the House on H.R. 6060, which we know today as the Equal Pay Act of 1963.

Twenty-two years later, we are here again, rebutting the same arguments applied to H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act. Democrats and Republicans recognized the demagoguery in the Findlay argument, and rejected it overwhelmingly—just as today, we are not going to be deterred by similar rhetoric.

H.R. 3008 does not expand the law, it does not threaten the private market place or labor markets with Government intervention, it will not lower anyone's pay, and it will not bust the budget.

If you believe these claims you have not studied H.R. 3008. You have not reviewed the General Accounting Office report upon which this bill is based, and you have not reviewed the legislative history that underlies Federal nondiscriminatory pay setting practices.

This legislation follows existing law: The Equal Pay Act of 1963 was developed by the Department of Labor by then Secretary Willard Wirtz. In Secretary Wirtz's letter to the President of the Senate, Lyndon Johnson, he explained that the legislation:

> . . . has as its purpose the elimination of discrimination in wage rates based on sex where men and women performing comparable work for the same employer . . . those employers would be prohibited from paying a lower wage to one employee than they pay to an employee of the opposite sex in the same place of work for work of equal character requiring equal skill.

The debate today over the use of the concept of comparability closely parallels the debate of over 20 years ago. In the House, the language "equal work" was substituted for "comparable work" in an early version of the equal pay bill that the House and Senate considered but did not enact. In 1963, both the House and Senate made it clear that the legislation's use of equal pay for equal work would not be limited. The Senate openly struggled with the application of comparable worth:

> With reference to the application of the equal pay concept, it was made plain in our hearings that for a number of years knowledge has been accumulating on means to test the relationship between jobs. Knowledge of this kind will be useful in determining "equal work" and "equal skills" for the purpose of administering S. 1409.
> The National War Labor Board during World War II and the Wage Stabilization Board during the Korean war were required to make comparisons of jobs for "equal pay" purposes. Their experience as well as the experience of arbitrators under contract provisions for equal pay, proves comparisons can be made successfully and put to the practical end of administering a Federal equal pay policy as contained in S. 1409.

H.R. 3008 does not subscribe to any "comparable worth" theory: critics charge that H.R. 3008 would lock the Government into a particular theory of comparable worth. Nothing in this legislation endorses such a theory. What we want to do is conduct a study along the lines the Senate charged us to follow 22 years ago.

We want to "use the experience we have in making pay comparisons," which goes back to World War II, to determine whether the Federal Government is following the Equal Pay Act of 1963, and section 2000e of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

As the distinguished chairwomen of the Compensation and Benefits Subcommittee, my good friend, Ms. OAKAR has stated, the Federal Government has never run such a check on itself, and it's high time.

We are not, as has been charged, prejudging the results, stacking the Commission, or trying to fabricate a basis for changing Federal pay. What we want to know is: (a) what factors that make up Federal jobs appear to be gender related, and (b) what other economic and nondiscriminatory factors contribute to the yawning gap in the wages paid to men and women who work for the Federal Government.

I, personally will not rest until I know why women on average in Federal service make $12,000 a year less than men; and why most women are clustered at the very low end of the Federal pay scale and men dominate the highest paying jobs. If there is discrimination in the Federal pay system, there should not be a Member in this body who shrinks from having the facts laid out before us.

Our Federal Government Service Task Force ran a study on the consequences of low-paying Federal jobs on single women. We found that in Montgomery County, MD, my district, a single mother earns less than she needs to provide basic necessities to her family if she's a GS-7 secretary. Yet GS-level 7 and below are where women in Government are clustered. So this study goes beyond the equities, because we are talking about both fairness and need.

We do have the tools to do the study: Some Members still insist that after 22 years we still do not have the tools to complete the study H.R. 3008 proposes. The National Academy of Sciences disagrees, and reports that "job evaluations do provide a systematic method of comparing jobs to determine whether they are fairly compensated." The Academy also confirms that pay studies have served to reduce discriminatory differences in pay. Well, it's no surprise, we had the tools in World War II, and we have them now.

A number of my colleagues have already addressed the question of the cost of a pay equity study to Government. I agree with the gentlelady from Ohio, if we do this right, it's going to save the Government money. It's going to be a boom for Federal workers and for the taxpayer. I'm convinced of that because we have always strengthened ourselves when we have gone after the facts about discrimination and laid them open to the publics conscience.

I am sure my colleagues will agree that after 22 years, the time has come for the Federal Government, as an employer, to accept its responsibility to study this important problem.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARMEY].

Mr. ARMEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I suppose it might be observed that I have been as visible with respect to this bill as any Member of the House, and I have even heard it said that I have been very tough on the bill. I suppose that is true, but if I am tough there is another side of my character as well. I am a Republican who believes in fairness, in equity, in equal rights and the Government's responsibility to guarantee and protect rights. I am also a father of a daughter for whom I want the very best and the husband of a very intelligent and bright professional woman emerging in her profession, and I am very concerned about all of these issues.

Mr. Chairman, I have a commitment that is deep and abiding to equal pay for equal work. But I also have several problems with this bill.

It is said that it is only a study. Now one of the things that distinguishes us as intelligent beings is that not only do we study but we study our studying. I have tried to do that in this case.

I found that the procedures and personnel by which we would establish this study lead me to grave concern. The study that is going to be productive must be objective. I have a concern about the commission and its composition.

Can it be objective when it is comprised of a balance of members who have already been on record as endorsing comparable worth? Will it lead to foregone conclusions regarding comparable worth? Would it set the stage for judicial implementation without congressional approval, as has been the unfortunate experience in other cases when only a study was authorized?

It is also argued that there has not been a study. I would suggest there have been studies that have been ignored.

The Office of Personnel Management has recently completed a study with a very good model. Multiple regression models are very fascinating instruments and one with 27 variables is a very good model, especially when others that have been cited have as little as four variables.

The OPM study was professional and a well done job.

Mr. Chairman, that study concluded:

The effects of a society-wide imposition of such a scheme by the government are not difficult to predict. There would be class war. Contrary to comparable worth assumptions, it would not even be a sex based conflict. Rather, it would set blue collar men and women against white collar men and women.

That would be indeed unfortunate and quite likely an unfair outcome.

The U.S. Commission on Civil Rights did a study. They came to a similar conclusion.

These studies have been discounted, if not ignored. Is it possible that the sponsors of this bill want a study that can trump those studies?

I know what it is like to want things. I know how sincere the Members who support this bill are in what they want. But it is also absolutely imperative that, if you are going to study, you remain objective and scientific.

Comparable worth would be, in my estimation—and I have studied this several years—discriminatory. It would penalize blue-collar men and blue-collar women. It would penalize union jobs. It would penalize, and this I think is one of the most tragic things of all, women who have already made that step to nontraditional occupations. These are fears that I have.

Women in America do not even want comparable worth. Recent polls show that 80 percent of the women want to use enforcement of existing laws to end discrimination rather than passing new laws.

This is extremely important.

I am gravely concerned with the failure of U.S. Government agencies to enforce civil rights and equal rights legislation. I would be the first to be in the forefront to compel the enforcement of these laws.

Mr. Chairman, I have seen things such as sexual harassment go unpunished in universities, and I have seen Government agents for this Government encourage young women to let the case drop rather than to take up their case for them.

I would like to see this body consider the need and the alternative productiveness of taking those existing laws and those existing agencies, putting their feet in the fire and bringing justice to American men and women through the implementation and enforcement of those laws.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. MITCHELL].

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, of course I am in strong support of this legislation. We have been reading recently about the mounting hysteria and fear concerning the disease AIDS, and I do not think there is a single Member of this House that would not be on record saying we have got to take exhaustive studies to look at what is causing this disease.

I respectfully suggest to you that discrimination based on race or on sex, on ethnic origin is a disease, and for the life of me I cannot understand why there is this godawful fear about a study.

Maybe I do think I can understand it. I think there are some who are afraid of what we might find out; some who have deluded themselves into thinking that there is no longer a problem in terms of sex discrimination; well, that is not the way to operate. Let us find out what the problem is and do something about it.

Ladies and gentlemen of this House, the Social Security Administration employs more than 80,000 people across the country. Of that 80,000, 3 percent are black males. That is all.

Walk into any agency, and as you move up toward the higher floors of the agency, it gets whiter and whiter and maler and maler. That is because the lower level jobs are consigned to those of us who are minority and those who are women.

You know, you almost got an opportunity to avoid me in this House. I worked as a clerk for the Social Security Administration at night, and I was a file clerk; I worked from 4 to 12, and I could see myself working my way up the ladder; one day becoming the Administrator for Social Security; and it dawned on me that that would never happen.

It would never happen. And so, when I realized the fruitlessness of that pursuit because I was black and male, I decided to join the Membership, and I know all are delighted that I made that decision.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BARTON].

Mr. BARTON of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, and I do so for three reasons.

First of all, the bill is a bad management bill. Second, it is very costly, and its effect on the budget is something that we cannot afford today; and third, I strongly believe that we have current laws to prevent any inequities that are in our pay practices.

Let us talk about the bad management aspects of this bill. First of all, it is supposed to determine pay equity, and if one is going to determine pay equity in the U.S. economy, one is going to have to consider market forces. Nowhere in this bill are market forces mentioned one time. The closest we get is a mention of "other forces" in one of the subparagraphs.

If there is only one person in this country, whether he be male, female, white, black, whatever; who has a skill that is in great demand, we are going to pay that individual more than if there are 10,000 people.

So I think that this bill is not being honest when it talks about pay equity, without mentioning market forces.

Second, I would like to point out is that the study has no flexibility at all. In fact, the study is precluded from coming up—the Commission is precluded from coming up with any recommendation that prevents a lowering of a grade or the lowering of a rate of pay.

Now, I do not believe that there is not one pay grade, one grade in the Federal system that is not rated too highly, and I do not believe that there is not one Federal worker somewhere in this country that is not being paid too much money.

So we have got a commission that, the only thing they can do is recommend that everybody's pay be raised, or everybody's grade be raised. That is like an automobile mechanic, if you took your car in and he says there is something wrong—he says, well the only thing to do is buy you a new car; let us go out and buy you a Cadillac. I do not think that is right.

Lastly, in order to enforce this study's commission, we would have to set up, in my opinion, a vast Federal bureaucracy to go in and look at all the multiple pay rates and pay grades and make sure that they are exactly as they should be.

As a second item, I would like to point out that the cost in the budget immediately is estimated to be anywhere from $5 billion to $8 billion. Now, those are conservative estimates.

If we get into the entire economy and not just in the Federal part of the pay system, it is estimated that it could cost as much as $320 billion. Now in these times of budget restraints, I think we need to be concerned about that.

The last point is that we have an existing Equal Pay Act that has been in existence I believe since 1963, and so I really do not feel that we need to be even considering the study at this point in time.

So for those reasons; I think it is bad management; I think the effect on the budget is too costly; and I think we have current law today that will solve the problem.

I do not feel that we need to enact this legislation at this time.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the Chair the time I have used and the time the minority has used.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] has 17½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] has 14 minutes remaining.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SIKORSKI], a distinguished member of the committee who, by the way, introduced the study in Minnesota.

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Speaker, while the way of life that flourished at Tara has gone with the wind, the plantation mentality of inequality still lingers in 1985. Some private sector organizations with a stake in this discrimination oppose a study of discrimination against women in the public sector.

Look at the fact. While women comprise 46 percent of the Federal work force, about half; 85.5 percent of them are concentrated in just the lower 8 of all civil service job classes, and make 63 percent of what their male counterparts earn. Some in this body would have us believe that this occurs because, and I quote: "Women have different motivational needs than men" And I quote: "Men work longer hours than women."

Well, Senator Fulbright once said, "We are handicapped by policies based on old myths rather than current realities." Let us look at the myths and the realities.

Myth 1: Implementing Federal pay equity will bankrupt the Government.

Fact: In Minnesota, we successfully implemented full pay equity for State employees at a cost equivalent to just 1 percent of the State's annual payroll over 4 years. Others have done it for less.

Myth 2: Pay equity discriminates against men.

Fact: Minnesota implemented pay equity with no reductions, no freezes in salaries for male-dominated jobs, and so have others.

Myth 3: Pay equity undermines collective bargaining in seniority.

Fact: Minnesota made all of the salary adjustments within the framework of collective bargaining, and so have others.

I was one of the chief authors of the landmark law in Minnesota, and I assure you that the myths swirling around like gooey slop are wholly refuted by the real life experience in Minnesota.

In fact, the pay equity system was so successful for the State work force that the Minnesota Legislature, in 1984, extended pay equity to local governments as well.

The Minnesota Commissioner of Employee Relations testified before the subcommittee:

Our experience demonstrates that all the terrible things that might happen do not happen when, in fact, you institute a pay equity program.

And we are just talking about a study.

□ 1810

If you want the truth about pay equity, look to Minnesota and over 100 other governments around America where the system is working. Don't be deceived by fabricated, biased rhetoric from those who pay lip service to equality, those who say, "I'm for equal pay for equal work, but * * *." They simply want to preserve the economic stake in the current system of discrimination.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentlewoman from Nevada [Mrs. VUCANOVICH].

Mrs. VUCANOVICH. I would like to thank the gentleman from Indiana for yielding this time, and I rise in opposition to this bill.

I would like to talk about what comparable worth means and does not mean. Comparable worth means paying women and men the same, even though they are doing different work. It does not mean paying women and men the same for doing the same or substantially the same work or work of equal effort, skill and responsibility, because that is already required by the Federal law, the Equal Pay Act of 1973, which covers all employment.

It does not mean paying women and men the same for doing different work if women are denied employment in better paying jobs, because title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 prohibits any discrimination in employment because of sex.

There are no women's jobs or men's jobs.

It does mean paying women more than they now earn in certain jobs which comparable worth advocates claim are not paid as much as employers should pay because they are jobs done mostly by women.

It does mean that women who work should earn more, because it is not fair that, on average, women who work are paid less than men who work. How much less depends upon who is talking. The League of Women Voters, in a recent bulletin, said women are paid only 63 cents for every dollar earned by men. It also reports that black women are paid even less, 58 cents, and Hispanic women less again, 53 cents for every dollar paid to men.

I draw the conclusion from that study that means black and Hispanic women earn less than white women.

Perhaps the best way for each of us to evaluate comparable worth is to look at the work force with which we are now most familiar and see how we think it would work. If you are an employer, including Members of Congress, with a staff and committee responsibilities, how do you think the average earnings of all women and men employees compare? If they are not about equal, would that mean sex discrimination? What jobs would you compare with what? What intrinsic value would you assign the individual jobs or classes of jobs, and how would you translate that intrinsic value into money? What would be fair?

I urge a vote against any comparable worth or pay equity legislation proposed in the name of protecting women against sex discrimination in Federal employment. Unless you plan or intend to pass a law requiring that half of all Federal employees in all grades be women, there is nothing more to legislate about.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. COLLINS].

Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of this legislation.

A few minutes ago, someone made mention of it as H.R. 3008, and we could not help but smile at that when we were sitting on the other side of the smile, saying that it sounded almost like some kind of a spy number. Actually, there is no spying going on here. All we are talking about is a study. Everybody knows what we mean by a study. A study is something that we are going to look into a matter to see what actually does exist. That is something that I think is very much needed. There is no question in my mind, for example, that there are some very definite pay inequities within the Federal Government system, its overall system.

For example, I have never worked for the Federal Government but I have worked for governments in my life, except for working for the Federal Government now, and even at that time I found that very often people who are doing the same identical jobs, let alone those that are very comparable, but the same identical jobs, were being paid all kinds of different salaries. One person might be a GS-5, who had the same amount of longevity on the job, who was in an identical position, but because that person was black or because that person was a woman, another person would be paid only as a GS-4. Promotions are not given on an equal and same sound basis. So there is no question about there being inequities.

It seems to me that this Government, which is in fact a most democratic system of government in the world, ought to be applauding legislation such as this. We should not just now, as a matter of fact, in 1985, be talking about this legislation. We should have done it a long time ago. We should have had a study and this Government should be operating on a very fair, equitable basis for all of its employees.

It is my belief that a government such as ours owes it to itself, owes it to the citizens of this country to feel proud of itself, to say that yes, indeed, we are equitable in our pay system for our entire Government and all the jobs that we have to do.

A final point: I was very happy that a Member on the other side of the aisle mentioned about black women getting less money than perhaps some of the men. Now, black people period get less pay when it comes down to equity in Federal Government than all the rest of those employees who happen to be working for our Government.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to my colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COBEY].

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to relate a North Carolina experience. Recently our distinguished Governor, Jim Martin, and a former very respected Member of this body, testified before the Civil Service Subcommittee and shared what happened in North Carolina. In North Carolina, in 1984, the general assembly passed legislation directing a pay equity study be conducted and authorized $650,000 for the effort. Once they realized the broad implications of the comparable worth doctrine, they came back this year and, after careful deliberation, in April, our Legislature overwhelmingly, with a bipartisan vote, terminated this comparative worth study. I think this body should know that.

I include this letter in the RECORD at this point:

STATE OF NORTH CAROLINA,
OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Raleigh, NC, July 25, 1985.

Hon. WILLIAM COBEY,
House of Representatives,
Washington, DC.

DEAR BILL: As you know, I recently had the opportunity to testify before the Civil Service Subcommittee of the United States Senate on North Carolina's experience with respect to the controversial subject of comparable worth, or pay equity as proponents call it. Since the House of Representatives may soon consider a comparable worth bill on the floor, I thought it might be worthwhile for me to share with you the reasons why North Carolina rejected a similar type of pay equity "study" of its own State employees.

In June 1984, the North Carolina General Assembly passed legislation directing that a pay equity study be conducted, and authorizing $650,000 for this effort. Although named a "pay equity" study, the impetus for ratifying this provision came from a Report by a State Task Force on Comparable Worth. This report recommended the development of an equitable job evaluation and pay system that would establish the comparable worth of State jobs on the basis of a point factor system.

Similar to the pending House bill pertaining to the federal workforce, our legislation directed, among other things, the creation of a "Pay Equity Advisory Committee"; that the Study encompass all of the State's classified employees' that a consultant be hired to conduct the Study; and that the consultant examine certain dissimilar State jobs based on a point factor comparison. In December 1984 the State hired a consultant to conduct the Study.

From the beginning, it was apparent that it would be difficult to successfully complete the Study. Problems evolved into two categories: problems with the logistics of Study itself, and more importantly, problems and concerns from a broad range of citizens on the basic comparable worth doctrine.

It was these broader concerns on the comparable worth doctrine and its implications that ultimately proved the most convincing. Foremost was the concern that there was no way of accurately estimating what the cost of salary adjustments, if any, might be. And, if the completed study recommended adjustments beyond the ability of the State to pay, then we might have directed ourselves into a situation similar to the State of Washington, where a study was commissioned, but the results not acted upon, after which a federal court somehow concluded that the study itself was invested with the power to compel its advice to be implemented. Second was the concern that comparable worth introduces an artificiality into wages and salaries, at odds with market rates. Finally, there was significant concern expressed that the move by the State toward comparable worth signalled an eventual requirement that the doctrine be forced upon private enterprise, in lieu of our traditional supply and demand approach to setting wages.

When the State legislature reconvened in February of this year, it began a careful reevaluation of the Study requirement. After careful deliberation, in April the legislature, by an overwhelming bipartisan vote, terminated the comparable worth Study.

We are now making what we believe to be better efforts to pay our employees fairly and equitably to trying to improve our existing classification system, and developing an improved way of providing pay incentives to those employees who are better performers. We believe this is the way to provide the opportunities our employees are looking for.

Best personal wishes.

Sincerely,

JAMES G. MARTIN.

Mr. COBEY. Mr. Chairman, in closing, I want to say that I am for fairness, I am for strongly enforcing existing laws. When I was the athletic director at the University of North Carolina, before I left the job I made sure that there were 13 women's sports and 13 men's sports.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes and 20 seconds to the gentlewoman from Tennessee [Mrs. LLOYD].

Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3008, and I urge my colleagues to also support this bill. Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I come from an entirely different perspective.

On November 15, 1984, I was one of only 2 women Members who spoke and voted against the equal rights amendment. It wasn't easy—it was one of the most difficult positions I've had to take as a Member of this body. But it was my stong conviction then, and it is now, that an equal rights amendment should be abortion neutral as well as neutral on other vital social values. I feel that I represent the overall sentiment of my district and the majority of women in this country who want equal rights legislation that corrects discrimination but does not destroy the protections which this Nation has developed to preserve the institution of the family.

Now, by and large, most people who oppose the equal rights amendment express the classic view—"I want women to have equal pay for equal work. I want women to have equal advantages. I just don't want this ERA."

This philosophy is real, alive, justified and thriving. Nevertheless, discrimination against women in the workplace does exist. It is often overlooked and as yet unaddressed.

To underline this, I'd like to read a portion of a letter I recently received from one of my constituents who typifies so many women in our society. "I am an educated, professional employment counselor with 20 years experience in the work force. I am presently managing a temporary employment agency. I have full responsibility for marketing, interviewing, job placements, plus general office duties such as typing, filing, telephone, payroll, billing and computer operations. My salary is the same amount that my 19-year-old son earns as a gas station attendant.

So it seems very strange indeed to me that no Member of this body would advocate unequal pay for equal work, yet would oppose this legislation. This bill authorizes a study of Federal (not private or public sector) but a Federal study of pay equity that includes all compensation including job content and market factors to determine if Federal pay practices are fair and commensurate.

This study is long overdue. The standards used for the present Federal classification—were developed 62 years ago and have never since been reviewed for discrimination.

I applaud the dedicated women who choose to stay at home and do without money for the extras we now deem essentials, a new color TV, a VCR or an extra vacation. The sacrifices of these homemakers is rewarded in nonmonetary ways. But the cold grim fact is that more and more women must work for their families to survive. Statistics show that over 50 percent of all women work outside the home—not just for the pleasure of it. Many women work to provide shoes for their children's feet, to pay for ever rising house and energy payments, medical bills and feed their families.

On behalf of these women, I urge my colleagues to think with their heart as well as their intellect and support this legislation that merely calls for a study of the equity of Federal pay practices. For just a second, put yourself in the place of the millions of women who are the breadwinners for their families—and are coming home with half a loaf.

If you said you don't support ERA—but you support equal opportunity for women, this is an opportunity to prove it.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SHUMWAY].

Mr. SHUMWAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, during the years that it has been my privilege to serve in this body, I have seen us time and again take an idea that may be unpopular, may be unable to stand on its own merits, and package that idea in a very attractive setting, give it a very appealing title, and bring it to this floor and run it through this legislative process, and I think we are doing just that here today.

We have a bill that has some very insidious aspects to it. It has been put in a very attractive package. We have been told that it is only a study; that it only applies to Federal employees; that it is not comparable worth, that it is something more nicely called "Pay Equity." Something which has been given a very high-sounding title, "The Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985."

No doubt there will be many Members in this Chamber who will come in and vote for this bill because it sounds good, it looks good. But if it were more appropriately packaged and titled, perhaps the title being something like "The Anti-Free Enterprise Act of 1985," I wonder how many Members would be inclined to vote for it, and I wonder how many Members would feel like they had done their duty to their country when they go home tonight after a long day.

Mr. Chairman, this bill represents bad policy for America; it represents bad law if it is enacted. It represents a step backward for the women of this country. Frankly, I resent those inferences that have been made by prior speakers that those of us who very much believe and sincerely want to see equality for men and women in this country, somehow are not telling the truth when we say we oppose this bill because we do not see this as the means for bringing about that kind of equality.

Mr. Chairman, we have laws on the books that are designed to get at the very discrimination that so many speakers have spoken about this afternoon, and certainly those laws need to be enforced. They need to be applied. I, as one Member of this body, would very much support that kind of application. There is nothing wrong with the Equal Pay Act of 1963 as a vehicle for reaching this kind of discrimination. There is nothing wrong with title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 as a vehicle for addressing discrimination, and certainly we need to enforce those laws.

For us to adopt this bill today, we are going to make a gross departure from the free enterprise system which has always been the hallmark of the economy of this great country, a radical intrusion on that system, and one which I think is going to penalize those women of this country who have worked so hard within their job setting and now have made it as corporate officers, as responsible job holders throughout the marketplace.

We are also going to give a slap in the face to the thousands of women who are working hard to achieve equality of opportunity in that marketplace and in the job sector.

Mr. Chairman, I suggest that this bill does not represent free enterprise, and it does not represent the American way. I hope it is defeated.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GARCIA].

Mr. GARCIA. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, first, I would like to congratulate my colleague from the State of Ohio who has chaired this through committee and to the floor. I would just like to say to my colleagues who are here, and I listened to the debate very carefully, and in the 45 seconds that I have left, this is 1985. It is not 1930 or 1940; it is 1985. Some of you may sit back and say, "You remember the good old days when it was just the one breadwinner who used to bring the bacon home and deliver the food for the house and pay the rent?"

In 1985 we are living in such a society where in most cases you have two breadwinners. Where you need that extra paycheck, and all my colleague from Ohio is asking for is a study. I cannot understand why this matter is so complex. Let us do it; let us study, and then let us come back. But remember: This is 1985.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Utah [Mr. MONSON].

Mr. MONSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it is unfortunate that we try and paint people into corners and make them appear less than what they really are.

If we are only talking about equal pay or pay equity we don't need a study. It doesn't take a study to determine if someone is being paid less than someone else for doing the same work. You just have to look at the numbers. A wage gap does not mean that women or minorities receive less for doing the same job. In fact, existing law already prohibits employers from doing that. It also ignores seniority, merit, or other legitimate factors that may contribute to a gap. Besides the Bureau of Labor Statistics already show wage gaps are narrowing.

Jobs do not have an intrinsic or absolute value. Therefore you cannot assign a measurable economic worth on a scientific and pragmatically determined basis between different jobs. Market value principles is the only valid means of making these judgments.

The alternatives are to ensure that women and minorities have equal access to all jobs. This also must include equal access to education, training programs, and other elements that lead to higher paying jobs. This access is already assured by existing laws.

Let's not start trying to apply unjustifiable methods of comparing different jobs in the name of protecting rights. The costs are too high, the results only divisive. If someone is not being paid equally to another there are simple administrative solutions. A new study will not improve on that at all. Let's defeat H.R. 3008.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS].

Mrs. BOGGS. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3008, and I am in such good company when I do so. This bill passed out of committee 18 to 4. A similar bill passed this House last year, with only six nay votes against it. Forty-five States, including my own of Louisiana, have undertaken similar studies. Those who should know the most intimately about the need for its passage, the federally employed women, and international, bipartisan membership organization that represents the concerns of over 800,000 women employed by the Federal Government have this to say about urging its passage:

"A wage differential between male and female workers exists in the Federal work force." Federally employed women can expect to earn 63 percent of wages of all men. A large portion of this wage gap can be directly attributed to the occupational segregation within the Federal workplace.

Although women comprise nearly half of the workers of the general schedule classification system, 73 percent of all women are in GS grades 1 through 8. This occupational segregation directly results in lower wages for women. The average salary for Federal women workers in the GS system is $18,864 per year as compared to $30,229 per year for men.

The General Accounting Office [GAO] recently released a report entitled, "Options for Conducting a Pay Equity Study by the Federal Pay and Classification System." This report illustrates how the Federal classification system can be studied for sex-biased wage discrimination. The Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, H.R. 3008, would utilize the suggestions contained in the GAO study by providing for a study of the Federal wage and classification systems to determine if they are affected by discrimination based on sex, race, and hispanic origin. "The study would evaluate civil service jobs using both job content and economic analyses and would be conducted by a private consultant hired by a bipartisan commission.

This simple, straigh' 'orward—and just—legislation aims to accomplish a study to ensure that our civil service wage and classification systems are free of bias.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentlewoman from Maryland [Mrs. BENTLEY].

Mrs. BENTLEY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Chairman, I am very concerned about the cost of government, and I find this bill singularly silent on the potential cost of implementing the so-called study required in the bill. I am sure that this study is not undertaken with any expectation other than that it will justify a massive increase in the payroll cost in these classified positions.

Why then is there nothing about these potential costs in the bill? There is a great deal of rhetoric about protecting civil rights and precluding discrimination. There seems to be no consideration of the civil rights of the class which never gets a break. Who sees to the civil rights of the taxpaying citizen? Who protects the woman who must pay for social experiments in wage and price controls with taxes which could better be used to take care of her needs and those of her family?

Just this week two Members of this body sent out a letter on this bill and the experience in their home State of Washington with this suit resulting from a study mandated by their legislature. One of them says that the cost of conforming to that decision would be only a few million. The other claimed the cost as more than a half billion dollars. That allegation included some chilling numbers. The cost was estimated as one-eighth of the State's annual general fund budget. The effect would be that, in order to pay for that one judgment, every tax in the State's arsenal would have to be raised 12.5 percent a year. We simply cannot be so indifferent to the damage we do to the taxpayers as to ignore such a massive potential cost to them. If the State of Washington is in jeopardy for a half billion dollars, what might the Federal cost add up to.

I urge you to strip the mask of secrecy from this move to change our economic system and at least find out the immediate dollar cost.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the chairman of the Congressional Black Caucus, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LELAND].

Mr. LELAND. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I am here on behalf of myself and the members of the Congressional Black Caucus, in support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act. Our colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio, is to be commended for once again coming forward with legislation to examine wage discrimination against women in the Federal sector. With H.R. 3008, she has gone a bold step further, showing the foresight and intestinal fortitude—to also include a study of wage discrimination based on race. This is a valiant step and certainly one that needs to be taken.

Contrary to what some of our colleagues and others are saying about this legislation, it would provide for a study to determine if, and to what extent, job classification and wages are affected by sex, race, or ethnicity. It is curious to me that so many people are concerned about the future threat of lawsuits that might result if racial or sexual discrimination is found. It seems to me that they fear the study will find such discrimination, and they just don't want their fears confirmed in black and white. You see, they're aware of the statistics: While accounting for nearly 50 percent of the Federal work force, approximately 78 percent of female employees are in grades 1–6, while 85 percent of men are in grades 10–15. Likewise, they are aware of the results of these statistics: Black and white women in the Federal work force earn only 62 cents and 63 cents, respectively, for every dollar earned by their white, male counterparts. It is clear from this that at the very least, the Federal Government is not the role model it should be. I want to know if this disparity is based on race or sex. If it is, not only is it morally wrong, but it is illegal and must be changed.

It is sad that 20 years after passage of the Civil Rights Act, which mandated equality for all Americans regardless of race or sex, we are still concerned with economic racism and bigotry that continue to keep women and racial minorities at the bottom of the socio-economic ladder. However, with H.R. 3008, this body has a chance to take a giant step in furtherance of the ideal of equality for all Americans, regardless of race or sex. Earlier today, this body showed compassion, intelligence and a firm belief in the principles upon which this Nation was founded and voted favorably on anti-apartheid legislation. I am asking my colleagues, on both sides of the aisle, to call upon those same qualities once more today and support H.R. 3008.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to my colleague, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. COBLE].

Mr. COBLE. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, my colleague from North Carolina previously reviewed with Members what occurred in the North Carolina Legislature in 1983. I was a member of that body. I voted against the appropriation of $650,000 to conduct a study on this very issue.

Something did not ring true, it seemed to me, at that time that that was the proper vehicle. As my colleague told members, this past session of our legislature repealed that appropriation because they concluded, as well, that it was not the proper vehicle.

It is my belief, Mr. Chairman, that this is the inappropriate forum to address this problem. It needs to be addressed, but it needs to be addressed and resolved in the marketplace.

I urge my colleagues to vote accordingly when it comes time.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman. I rise in strong support of the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. The Federal Compensation System, which sets the wages for the largest employer in the country, was established in 1923. Since 1923, employment patterns and family structures in this country have changed dramatically. The Federal Compensation System has not. As a matter of fact, there has never been a thorough study of the Federal civil service to determine if the changes in employment have been reflected in the Federal Compensation System. A comprehensive wage study is long overdue.

I want to commend the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] for her extensive examination of our Nation's pay system conducted as Chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits. It is through her diligence and persistence that we are able to consider this good, sound piece of legislation today. This initiative, The Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, which would establish a temporary study commission, has over 100 cosponsors from both sides of the aisle, and has been endorsed by numerous labor unions and organizations representing millions of this country's working population.

Pay equity is not a new concept. On the contrary, all but five States have initiated activity to study their pay systems. Sixteen States are conducting or have completed pay equity studies. And in some instances on both the State and local levels, employee contracts have been renegotiated with an eye toward eliminating discriminatory factors.

In my home State of New York, an extensive study negotiated by the Civil Service Employees Association, AFSCME, and the State's Office of Employee Relations, is near completion. This 2 year project has focused on the practices of three bargaining units covering approximately 100,000 State employees.

There are a number of reasons why a valid comparision is possible between New York's initiative and the one we are considering today. New York State, as the third largest public employer in the country, is the largest jurisdiction to conduct such a job evaluation. The New York study, like the Federal proposal, has not focused strictly on instances of sex discrimination, but racial discrimination as well. Additionally, New York State hiring practices had also never been assessed to determine whether assumptions about jobs and the assignment of job titles to salary grade had been distorted by the sex or race of the typical job incumbent.

It is clear from the preliminary results of New York's job content survey that a pay equity study can be successfully carried out in a large public jurisdiction with a diverse work force. And, it is worth noting that many of the recommendations offered by those conducting the New York State study have been included in this bill.

From the amount of serious debate and activity pay equity has received in recent years, it is evident that discrimination has managed to creep into numerous pay systems. A recent General Accounting Office study reported that women, while comprising nearly half of the Federal work force, are clustered at the lower end of the pay scale. Approximately 78 percent of women are clustered in grades 1 to 6, earning an average of $9,000 a year less than their male counterparts. Conversely, 85 percent of the male employees in the Federal Government occupy jobs in grades 10 to 15. According to Census Bureau data, women employed by the Federal Government earn an average of 62.8 percent of the wages of their male counterparts.

Many argue that the setting of wages can only be fairly determined in the marketplace. While wage setting cannot be divorced from the forces of supply and demand. It is also true that patterns exist in which certain jobs have historically been closed or open to particular persons on the basis of race and sex. The National Academy of Sciences estimates that at least 50 percent of wage discrepancy is due to discrimination. Job discrimination is a historic reality.

Opponents of pay equity also argue that the pay gap will close with the entrance of more women into less traditional, higher paying jobs. It is estimated, however, that this will not happen before the end of this century. Obviously this does not provide a solution for those who are in the workforce today.

Women have taken jobs that were available to them, but did not choose to earn lower pay. There is no justification to continue to pay women less for the work that they do or to expect them to change careers. More importantly, society cannot afford to sacrifice the work that women are now doing.

Changes in the structure of the American family have greatly altered the roles that women play in our society. The number of female-headed families grew by 1 million between 1979 and 1983. It is expected that by 1990 one child in four will live in a single parent household.

Hearings held recently by the Subcommittee on International Relations and Human Resources, which I chair, detailed the dramatic rise in the numbers of women and children in poverty. Today about half of female-headed families live below the federally determined poverty level.

In light of the startling and increasing rate of poverty among single parent families, nonenforcement of existing sex discrimination laws by the Federal Government is inexcusable. And it is truly distressing for the chairman of the U.S. Civil Rights Commission to pronounce that married male breadwinners are entitled to higher wages on the ground that "you have to give some kind of respect to traditional family values."

It is the job of the Federal Government to set an example for the country by properly following and enforcing existing labor laws. Today's bill will not change the existing laws or add new ones. Rather, the Commission will study Federal pay and classification systems with regard to title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

As the laws have already been determined, voluntary study and compliance at the Federal level will save the Government costly and time consuming law suits. Instead of ignoring or restructuring the procedure for handling the tremendous backlog of law suits which have already been filed, the Government will have the opportunity to operate as a fair and unbiased employer. The only affect this study hopes to have on State and local entities and the private sector will be to show that the Federal Government, too, is concerned with discrepancies in the existing wage system and is willing to make necessary corrections.

Last year, this body voted overwhelmingly in favor of pay equity legislation. That proposal, which was in fact stronger than the one we are considering today, passed by a vote of 413 to 6. It is my hope that, with the swift passage of H.R. 3008, we can get on with the effort to secure equality in the workplace.

A thorough examination of the Federal pay and classification system is long overdue. I believe that the legislation we are considering today outlines an objective and reasonable approach for reviewing this system, and for making recommendations where necessary. I urge that the House approve H.R. 3008 without substantive and weakening amendment.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will advise the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BURTON] that he has 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of my time.

Mr. Chairman, my colleagues have time and again said, "Why do you object to a study?" We certainly do not object to a study. There have been 22 studies of Federal pay and classifications since 1949.

There was a study completed just this last year, the equal worth, comparable work and market worth of Federal jobs, a study of the Federal Government's pay classification and qualification systems for employment, by the United States Office of Personnel Management.

It depends on whether or not one likes the study. The gentlewoman from Ohio, as I understand it, asked the GAO to make a comparison of this with what it was intended to do, to find out if it was a competent study, and based upon the guidelines, as I understand it, of her request, they said it did not qualify as a competent study.

It depends on one's point of view. I think it is a good study. It is a very comprehensive study. But let us look at the reasons why we are concerned about the study that the gentlewoman is talking about in this piece of legislation.

A similar study was taken in the State of Washington which resulted in a $1.1-billion judgment. We have 30 times as many employees as the State of Washington. If we have a judgment rendered of the magnitude that was rendered in the State of Washington, we are going to be looking at a $30-billion judgment, $30 billion.

There have been a number of States that have had studies of this type that have pending litigation—the State of Alaska, the State of California, the State of Connecticut, the State of Hawaii, the State of Illinois, the State of Michigan, the States of Missouri, New York, Oregon, Rhode Island, and Washington. I want to tell my colleagues that according to the Justice Department, if this legislation is passed, they are absolutely certain that there will be a similar suit filed against the Federal Government which could amount to as much as $30 billion or more.

My colleague, the gentleman from Minnesota, a few moments ago, indicated that in his State it only cost them 4 percent of the State budget in order to come up with a pay equity agreement. Four percent of the Federal payroll——

Mr. SIKORSKI. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. I do not have time. I am very sorry.

Mr. SIKORSKI. I did not say 4 percent of the State budget, and I resent the gentleman saying that.

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. Four percent of the State payroll.

Mr. SIKORSKI. Will the gentleman yield so I can set the record straight?

Mr. BURTON of Indiana. It was 4 percent of the State payroll. But 4 percent of the Federal payroll, if we use that percentage, is $2.4 billion. We are in a budget crunch right now. We have been arguing for the past few days over whether or not we are going to get a budget.

If we follow his train of thought and we come up with a 4-percent solution, we are looking at at least $2.4 billion added to the Federal deficit, which is something I do not think we can tolerate right now.

Mr. Chairman, I think that this legislation is misguided and I am very hopeful that I am able to convince my colleagues on the other side of the aisle to consider the substitute which I will offer later in the debate on this legislation, which will really study this issue in depth, and if they want another study, I think this study will accomplish the goals that they are seeking.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. HOYER].

Mr. HOYER. I thank the gentlewoman from Ohio, the chair of the committee, for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in very strong support of this legislation. I am interested to hear that this legislation may undermine the economic system of our Nation, may undermine the free enterprise system of our Nation, and may subject us to litigation.

First of all, if it does that, it seems to imply that there is something very much amiss, and the arguments that were used were clearly arguments used in almost every instance where progress was made in fairness to employees. Whether it was labor legislation, equal opportunity legislation, whatever it was, the arguments that we hear on this floor today have historically been used to keep people in their place. In this case, it is women to be kept in their place.

If we are not doing anything wrong in Federal personnel policy, we have nothing to fear from a study which will give us the facts.

So I urge my colleagues to strongly support this legislation when it comes to a vote.

Currently, 47 million women are employed in the United States. Of these, a record 19.5 million are working mothers. That translates into 6 out of 10 women with children under 18 years old that are working. Fourteen years ago, 6 out of 10 stayed home. These working mothers are not part-time workers—a full 71 percent work full time.

Yet the Bureau of Labor Statistics reported in May that the median weekly earnings of women were 66 percent those of men. Women earned $268 at the median while men earned $404.

More importantly—among major occupational groups, women are separated from men by an unexplainable chasm in earned wages.

Men employed in executive, administrative, and managerial occupations had median earnings at $601 compared with $363 for women. Among professional specialty workers, men earned $554 while women earned $400.

These statistics go on and on. They reflect a strong likelihood of a structural inequity in our Nation's wage system. Unfortunately, our Federal wage system is not immune from this potentiality. Similar gaps in wages exist for Federal workers. Average male salary—$30,229; average salary for women was $18,864 in October 1983.

We cannot merely assume away the possibility that such wage gaps are the result of discrimination in violation of the Civil Rights Act. We owe it to ourselves and our employees to be certain of the reasons for such wage differentials. There has never been a full and complete study of the Federal Pay and Classification Systems since its inception in 1983.

It is time we had one. H.R. 3008 meets this need by mandating a study of the Federal Pay and Classification Systems to determine whether they are affected by discrimination based on sex, race, or Hispanic origin.

Only Federal jobs will be studied and recommendations are limited solely to Federal Civil Service. This bill does not put into place a national employment-pay equity policy for the country or even the Federal Government. Nor, does this bill presume that any existing wage gap is due to discriminatory practices. It only requires a complete study of our pay and classification system.

Congresswoman OAKAR deserves to be commended for her efforts to secure a fair and reasoned approach to this study. Her bill establishes an 11 member bipartisan commission to oversee this study which will guarantee representation by both Houses of Congress, the President and the Office of Personnel Management. This commission will hire a consultant to perform an 18-month study, comment on the study and disband.

In this way, we will be provided with a complete and accurate review of the wage gap which exists between sexes in Federal employment and whether that gap is attributable to such factors as responsibility, effort, qualifications, seniority, education or other factors exclusive of sex, race, and ethnicity. We can then move forward based on data and not heresay.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate Congresswoman OAKAR for her continued leadership in this field of pay equity. We should know if our Federal Civil Service is stained with discrimination and should quickly move to be certain that we are in full compliance with our civil rights laws. Equality and fair treatment must continue to be our goals to ensure a fair employment system supported by the high morale and productivity of all employees.

I urge all Members to support H.R. 3008.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to a very distinguished Member of Congress, the gentlewoman from Connecticut [Mrs. KENNELLY] who has been supportive of this legislation in every instance.

Mrs. KENNELLY. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that a little knowledge is a dangerous thing—and certainly that would be one's impression listening to the opponents of the Federal Equitable Pay Practice Act.

To hear them talk, you would think that a little knowledge about Federal wage differentials and pay practices would whip up the winds of universal economic disaster, if not cause the immediate collapse of Western civilization. It just isn't so.

Rarely have we seen so much exaggeration and misinformation generated about one piece of legislation particularly one that was adopted in committee by a lopsided vote of 18 to 4, and which passed the House in a somewhat different form only a year ago with just six votes in opposition.

We don't often have to spend so much time saying what a bill does not do, but let me reiterate just two of the things this one does not do.

First, it does not send out an army of Federal bureaucrats to impose a standardized wage scale or mandatory pay increases on private American businesses. In fact, the bill applies only to the Federal work force, and it does not even impose any sort of pay system on them.

The bill provides for a study, a simple study, which would investigate whether sex, race, or Hispanic origin are factors used in setting pay. H.R. 3008 specifically requires that the study not assume that discrimination exists on those grounds. It requires that there be an investigation of all the ingredients which are used in setting pay, including seniority, merit, job content, and market forces.

Second, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act does not set up an irresponsible or biased Commission to oversee this study. If the Commission is stacked, it is in favor of the Office of Personnel Management: 5 of the 11 members on the Commission are either the Director of OPM or OPM appointees. The other six members are the Comptroller General of the United States and individuals appointed by the President and the majority and minority leaders of the House and Senate.

The Federal pay and employment classification system now in place has not been reviewed in a comprehensive manner since it was first established over 60 years ago. Yet preliminary information indicates that the average earnings gap between men and women working in the Federal Government is $9,000 a year. Eighty percent of the women are concentrated in grade 7 and below, while 85 percent of the men in the Federal work force are concentrated in grades 10 through 15. Maybe sex discrimination plays absolutely no part in these enormous discrepancies, but it is high time we found out what does play a role.

It has been said that what you don't know won't hurt you. Perhaps Members of Congress won't be hurt by self-imposed ignorance on the subject of equitable pay practices. But the women and minorities and people of Hispanic origin who work for the Federal Government might be hurt with every paycheck if we refuse to accept our responsibility to know why inequities exist in Federal pay practices. I urge my colleagues to vote in favor of the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act rule.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES].

Mr. HAYES. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman from Ohio.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of H.R. 3008. As a former trade unionist, in that capacity before being elected to this great body, I negotiated and fought and picketed for pay equity in the private sector of our society. I can do no less as a Member of this Congress as a matter of conviction and commitment.

Usually it is a situation where people readily accept the appointment of commissions and designations of studies for these kinds of issues as a method of depth for this kind of action which is being requested. This is a mild resolution, a mild bill, and certainly I believe this bill, H.R. 3008, outlines a thoroughly objective and reasonable approach to review our pay classifications for our employees.

Mr. Chairman, as Members of Congress we have an obligation to fight discrimination wherever it may exist. We need not fear or should not fear a study of the Federal Government pay and classification system. I certainly support this bill.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. I commend my distinguished colleague, MARY ROSE OAKAR, Secretary of the House Democratic Caucus, for presevering on this issue and reintroducing this excellent bill. There has been a lot of discussion of this measure, and a lot of claims concerning its intent and consequences. Let's understand what this bill does and does not do.

First, let's look at what it does not do.

This bill does not propose any new law whatever, or any new standards for equitable pay. It simply proposes a study to determine whether the Federal pay and classification systems are consistent with current law—with title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and section 6(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

It does not affect State or local government or private employers in any way. The bill proposes a study of the Federal Government only. It seeks to ensure that the Federal Government's own house is in order, that its own pay and classification systems are designed and enforced in accordance with current law and are not discriminatory.

The bill does not impose, directly or indirectly, any new Federal regulations on the private sector. Yet even job evaluations in the private sector do not require or lead to regulation of the market. Pay scales can reflect the market and be nondiscriminatory. Many large companies already have job evaluation systems to ensure that their job and wage systems do not violate Federal antidiscrimination laws. They obviously don't consider themselves to be tampering with the market.

Even though perfect objectivity obviously is impossible, the study proposed by the bill is not impossible to achieve. it is possible to identify and correct discriminatory pay practices. Forty-five States have already examined the issue, through studies, legislation, or collective bargaining. The GAO has conducted a study of the methodologies the proposed Commission would use, and concluded that such a study is indeed feasible and that the study "would provide Congress with a comprehensive analysis of the pay equity issue."

The bill does not presume, nor will the Commission presume, that wage differentials are discriminatory. After the study, wage differentials unexplained by economic and job content analysis may be deemed discriminatory. This would be left to the judgment of the bipartisan, representative commission.

The bill does not provide for or mandate implementation of the Commission's recommendations, although I would hope that, if wage discrimination in the Federal Government were found, it would be eliminated.

The bill does not open the way for extensive, costly litigation. Should discriminatory practices exist in the Federal pay or classification systems, this study would enable the Government to take steps to end them promptly, thus avoiding possible litigation.

Finally, this bill does not threaten our way of life with extinction. Opponents of the bill predict that it will cause the "destruction of our economic strength," the "death of our free enterprise system," "loss of individual liberty," and "social chaos." Similar dire predictions were made when the Equal Pay Act, the minimum wage, and the child labor laws were enacted. Our free market system is strong and is only strengthened by laws embodying the American ideal of equality, such as H.R. 3008.

Now, let's take a look at what this bill does.

H.R. 3008 does demonstrate the Federal Government's commitment to our civil rights laws and to the elimination of wage discrimination.

It is crucial that American women and minorities have economic equity and an equal chance for economic self-sufficiency. Greater economic opportunity for all means greater long-term economic growth. From the standpoints of both productivity and simple justice, women and minorities must not be second class economic citizens. Our economy and our integrity cannot afford it.

The Federal Government is the Nation's largest employer, and probably its most visible employer. It also represents the beliefs and values of the American people. Surely it is encumbent upon us to see that our employment practices are scrupulously legal, and nondiscriminatory.

The bill does represent a broad, nonpartisan consensus that the time has come to look at the employment practices of the Federal Government. Last Congress, a similar bill passed the House with 413 votes. This year's bill has broad, bipartisan cosponsorship.

Opponents of this bill say that the rectification of discriminatory job and wage practices will be too expensive. Mr. Speaker, discrimination isn't a cost to be factored into a cost-benefit analysis, nor is its eradication. Discrimination is a moral outrage and a violation of the law, and its eradication is a moral obligation and a legal necessity.

I really believe that we all agree, proponents and opponents of the bill alike, that our goal in this area is a "gender-blind," "race-blind" society in which all individuals have equal opportunity to compete in our economic system. And I think we all agree that we have made a great deal of progress in eliminating barriers to equal economic opportunity. But we have not reached our goal yet, and we disagree on how to reach it. Opponents of the bill tell us that if we resolve to stop discriminating in the future, the market will take care of inequities. I agree with my friend Congresswoman OAKAR, and my colleagues who joined me in cosponsoring H.R. 3008, that this is not enough. Yes, we must look to the future, but we cannot ignore the past. While this bill only calls for a study, we cannot just ignore remaining, present discrimination created by past economic, social, and legal conditions and hope that it will go away. If people have been wrongfully placed at a disadvantage in our competitive economic system, we must seek out these inequities and remedy them. Only then will we have an economic system we can be proud of as Americans. H.R. 3008 recognizes our obligation, as Federal legislators, to look to our Federal wage and classification systems, to ensure that no Federal employee is at a wrongful economic disadvantage.

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the remainder of my time.

Mr. Chairman, I have heard much misinformation on the floor today by those who oppose the bill. They would have us believe that there are going to be all kinds of lawsuits because of this study on how we treat our classified Federal employees.

They mentioned the State of Washington. The reason the people succeeded in that case was because the Federal judge ruled they were discriminated against under the Civil Rights Act, title 7. It was not because of a study that that was done.

Forty-five States have either implemented a study or are in the process of implementing a study, and somehow the Sun is still shining and the rivers in this country are still flowing. That kind of fear tactic should not dissuade the Members.

This is a simple study. We have not done one since 1923. No one is trying to set up a national pay scale. I would be opposed to that. I believe very strongly in the free enterprise system.

But we do have jurisdiction over how we treat classified Federal employees, and we know we have not looked at how we classify them in a fair manner and an equitable manner since 1923. We also know we have not looked at how we classify not only women but minorities, and this is why we added minorities to this study.

Mr. Chairman, anyone who really believes that more than half of the population ought to be treated fairly in this country will support this legislation. Anyone who believes that Hispanic men and black men ought to be treated fairly will support this legislation. I ask my colleagues not to be swayed by the fears that people will give them. It is very interesting to me that those fears exist and have existed when we have addressed practically every piece of civil rights legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR] has expired.

Mr. NIELSON of Utah. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise today in opposition to equal pay for equal work, and I do not rise in opposition to efforts to eliminate sex-based wage discrimination, wherever it may exist; I do rise in strong opposition to H.R. 3008, a bill proponents suggest will merely require a study of Federal employment practices, and particularly to the hasty manner in which it has been—is being—rushed to the floor for consideration by the full House.

Now much has been said about this bill and the confusing and controversial theory of comparable worth it pretends not to advocate. At the risk of repeating some of the valid concerns that have already been raised by many of my distinguished colleagues, I would like to share one of my own.

H.R. 3008 represents an "end run" effort by its proponents to pass legislation that would set the stage for converting the theory of comparable worth into public policy. Now they aren't exactly calling it comparable worth. They realize that there is some resistance in Congress to what at present is nothing more than a theory that has no agreed upon meaning or definition. Instead, they call it pay equity, and who could be against equal pay for equal work? After all, isn't that the law? Isn't that what pay equity means? Well, at one time it did, but apparently not any more. Now we hear it defined as "equal pay for work of equal value"—or in other words, comparable worth. Sound confusing? It sure does.

Proponents will argue: Now wait a minute. H.R. 3008 only calls for a study. We're only suggesting that someone should take a look at the Federal pay and classification system, to see if any sex-based wage discrimination is taking place. That's all.

Again, it sounds innocent enough: just a study. In reality, the advocates of comparable worth are trying to accomplish through the courts what they have not been able to accomplish through the legislative process: the implementation of comparable worth as public policy. They are fully aware of the recent experience of the State of Washington. It, too, commissioned "only a study," but what it got was a court decision sustaining a lawsuit which accused the State of practicing sex-based wage discrimination, based on the comparable worth theory. Proponents know full well that if the so-called pay equity study mandated by H.R. 3008 finds any discrepancies in wage compensation between male and female Government employees working at similar jobs—which would be, according to this bill, evidence of discrimination—it would lay the legal groundwork for filing the same type of lawsuits against the Federal Government.

Mr. Chairman, let's be up front about it. H.R. 3008 is a comparable worth bill. It is based on the comparable worth theory. Therefore, passage of H.R. 3008 would be interpreted as a congressional endorsement of comparable worth. I urge my colleagues to reject comparable worth. Vote "no" on H.R. 3008.

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in stong support of H.R. 3008, the pay equity bill introduced by my colleague, Congresswoman MARY ROSE OAKAR.

There is no denying that this has become a controversial issue—even more surprising because of last year's support for a similar measure in this House. Can it be that we have turned our backs on wage discrimination and equality for woman and men?

Those of you who say no, and yet do not plan to vote for H.R. 3008, how can you deny a Federal study to resolve the most pressing questions about this issue?

Despite all the controversy, over 100 States and cities have undertaken studies of their wage scales, and in some cases have made changes in response to the discovered imbalance in pay. Nor has this been limited to the public sector. In 1984, the Rand Corp. found that, on average, women in the national work force are paid 64 cents for every $1 paid to men—an appalling discrepancy. In my own State of Wisconsin, we have conducted a study of the salary structure of State employee to determine whether wage inequities exist between comparable jobs, and our neighboring State of Minnesota is successfully implementing a pay equity plan approved for the State in 1982.

As representatives to our Federal Government, we should be leading the way on this issue. The controversy surrounding it affects all of us as workers as employers who must deal with wage structures and job evaluation, and as taxpayers and consumers who must feed our families.

I urge your support for this important study—we have nothing to fear from the facts if our intentions are workable.●

● Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Chairman, equal pay for equal work. No one can argue with that concept, and in fact, it has been the law of the land in America for many years.

We Americans are firmly on record as being against discrimination of all kinds. We have passed laws, and our courts have ruled on numerous occasions that discrimination of any kind will not be tolerated.

Now, many of you may have heard of comparable worth, a theory of job evaluation being touted in Congress as a cure-all for sex-based wage discrimination. It sounds good, but it could very well cause far more problems that it seeks to resolve.

Comparable worth would allow the Government, the courts, and boards of "experts" to mandate wage adjustments to equalize the pay of men and women in different occupations that are judged to be comparable in skill and responsibility.

If you're wondering how the Government—or anybody else—can determine the worth of a job better than the free marketplace, the answer is it can't. Comparable worth prevents economic freedom; it flies in the face of the laws of supply and demand. In sum, comparable worth ignores the role of competition, individual experience, and merit when determining the "worth" of a job.

Most comparable worth advocates prefer a white-collar evaluation system like the Factor Evaluation System, which the Federal Government used in a recent comparable worth study of Federal employees. In short, the study completely refutes the validity of using comparable worth theories for eliminating discrimination.

Indeed, the study showed that imposing such a pay system could cause a class war. It could set blue collar people against white collar people, rich against poor, employees against employers, men against women.

Consider these conclusions of the Government's study:

Custodial worker men and laundry worker women would be cut from $16,000 to about a $10,000 clerical worth.

Food service worker women and laborer men would get a $5,000 pay cut relative to clerk-typist women.

Storeworker women and forklift operator men would received at least $4,000 less relative to nursing assistant women.

Sewing machine operator women and warehouse worker men would receive about $3,000 less compared to women secretaries.

Comparable worth would not only fail to eliminate sex-based wage discrimination, but it would probably worsen the problem. By offering higher wages for what feminists call dead end jobs, comparable worth would diminish the incentive for a worker in a female-dominated occupation to vault the barriers into a previously male-dominated job. After all, why push to be a chemist when you can remain a clerical supervisor and make just as much or more money?

As a result, our society would be riddled with more sex-segregated jobs than ever before—and the bureaucracy necessary to cope with this maze of regulation would become incredibly huge.

Women, the very people that comparable worth advocates purport to help, seem to recognize the folly of this job evaluation method. In a nationwide survey of 2,704 adult Americans conducted late last year, only 18 percent of all female respondents favored the passage of new laws as a means of combatting sex-based wage discrimination.

Certainly we should continue to work to eliminate discrimination of all kinds, and particularly wage discrimination against women.

What women truly want, and what they should rightfully receive, is better enforcement of the two equal pay laws that are already on the books. Proper enforcement of two statutes—the Equal Pay Act and title VII—guarantees equal pay for equal work to all workers, and that's as it should be.

Equal pay for equal work is the American way. But a federally arbitrated comparable worth board is not the way to go.●

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, sponsored by my distinguished colleague from Ohio, Congresswoman MARY ROSE OAKAR, chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits.

I am proud to be an original cosponsor of this important, fair, and long overdue legislation which authorizes an 18-month study of the Federal pay and job classification systems to determine whether they are administered and operated in a manner consistent with current law, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, race, and ethnicity.

The Federal Government, the Nation's largest employer, lags far behind the rest of the country in addressing the issue of pay equity. While the majority of States have already begun to examine their own pay systems and many are implementing corrective changes, it is incumbent upon us in the Congress to enact legislation that will examine the relationship between antidiscrimination laws and Government pay practices.

It is past time for the Federal Government to begin to address the issue of pay equity. To those who argue that we will be endorsing comparable worth, I say you are wrong. Mandating this study will not be an endorsement of any policy other than fair pay practices in the Federal Government, a goal upon which we already agree. In passing H.R. 3008, the Congress would be upholding its responsibility to exercise public policy oversight.

H.R. 3008 is a well-crafted bill, seeking simply to provide us with an evaluation of our Federal pay practices. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to support the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985.●

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Chairman, today, the House of Representatives will take up H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, and I am in wholehearted support of this measure to study the Federal Government's job classification and pay systems.

H.R. 3008 was reported out of the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, with bipartisan support, on July 24, and since that time a barrage of information has flooded our offices opposing the intent of this legislation and the study. These red flags of caution and warning I contend are unwarranted. Are those in opposition to a study of the Federal work force afraid of what may be discovered?

Pay equity concept is evolving into an important issue of the 1980's. As an issue of this decade, pay equity is not a new or innovative idea of our times. At an International Labor Organization Conference held in Rome in 1951, 80 nations passed a resolution supporting comparable worth. Additionally, more than 100 comparable worth/pay equity initiatives now exist at various governmental levels around the country. Six States have implemented comparable worth/pay equity policies, and other States are in the process of studying their State's pay classification and compensation systems. I contend now is the appropriate time for the Federal Government to review its classification and wage systems to determine if ethnic origin, gender, or race are elements used in setting pay scales in the Federal work force.

H.R. 3008 establishes a bipartisan Commission on Equitable Pay Practices to oversee a study conducted by an independent, private consultant on the Federal classification and wages. The study will take into consideration positions of classified employees of the Federal Government, it will not affect local or State public sector employees or the private sector work force.

H.R. 3008 offers important technical revisions that were not included in H.R. 5680, which was passed by the House last year. The revisions include a March 1985 GAO recommendation on how to conduct a pay equity study by expanding the study to determine if economic variables such as education, locality, merit, productivity, senority, veterans status, and work experience are associated with occupational pay differentials. Economic analysis joined with job content analysis will provide for a well-rounded approach to the study.

The questions asked by this legislation, and determined by a careful study are legitimate. An undertaking of this nature will essentially provide the administration and Congress with information and recommendations to determine if Federal pay practices are consistent with section 6(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 and title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

The Federal classification and pay systems were established by the Classification Act of 1923, and since that time there has not been a general review of the system. I believe now is an appropriate time to address this matter. It would be rather naive to think that some Federal positions have not become institutionalized, over the years, by a particular gender or race. Let's not push aside a factfinding study of the classification and wage systems and an opportunity to improve the Federal Government as a responsible and fair employer.

The Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985 is a laudable piece of legislation to assist the administration and Congress in identifying, and if need be address, any forms of discrimination that may exist within the Federal pay system. I strongly urge my colleagues to seriously consider favorably H.R. 3008.●

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Chairman, I was a cosponsor of the predecessor bill to H.R. 3008, H.R. 27. I signed on to that early bill not as an ardant supporter of the concept of comparable worth, but as one who is concerned about some of the allegations of inequities in our Federal pay scales. I felt that the sponsor's suggestion that a study be made of the Federal pay and classification system to determine whether there are inequities was a good idea.

Unfortunately, opponents of the comparable worth idea have unfairly represented this bill as something far more extensive than it is. The study will examine the Federal Government only—it will not translate to the private sector in any way. The bill does not implement the findings of the study.

There have been many comments by some of our colleagues in the past few weeks which have attempted to explain why there may be disparities that are perfectly normal which account for the fact that 78 percent of federally employed women are concentrated in the low end of the pay scale. They raise some good points, but, if true, I believe the points will be confirmed in the study as well.

Other opposition to the bill centers around the fact that a costly court case could arise from any failure of the Federal Government to implement recommendations included in the pay study. Or that the court would determine that the study's recommendations must be implemented by the Federal Government. The bill, H.R. 3008, does say that. I guess I have more faith in the courts than that.

I have many questions about the feasibility of developing a rating system or another method to determine a fair system of comparable worth. In general, I want most decision to be made in the market place. However, I do not have any objection to a bill which appears only to study the Federal pay system for possible inequities. In my opinion, the issue has been blown way out of proportion.●

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to speak in favor in H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, which calls for a study of the Federal pay and classification systems to determine whether they are marred by sex-based wage discrimination.

As the largest single employer in the nation the Federal Government should be a model of legal compliance for all. But we are behind in this area. To date all but five States have examined the issue of sex-based wage discrimination.

We can not ignore the evidence that the Federal pay and classification systems may be biased. A GAO report showed a pay differential of almost $12,000 between male and female Federal Government employees. The study pointed out that women are clustered into relatively few occupations near the lower end of the pay scale while men are predominantly found in jobs with higher grades.

This legislation before us today is not revolutionary. It is not a nationwide comparable worth program. This bill was reported out of the Post Office and Civil Service Committee by a vote of 18–4. A similar bill passed the House of Representatives last year by a vote of 413–6. This legislation merely reaffirms the law of the land, which states that sex, race and ethnicity are not factors that may be used to determine the rate of pay for any person or any position.

We can eliminate discrimination in our time, but we can not do so if we deny that it exists or if we refuse to join in the effort to determine the extent of the problem.

Support of H.R. 3008 is support for a fair, objective study of discrimination in the pay practices of the Federal civil service. The public has a right to know if the wage practices of its Government are within the law.●

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to commend my colleague from Ohio, chair of the Subcommittee on Compensation and Employee Benefits, and a fellow member of the Congressional Caucus for Women's Issues, for her work on the issue of pay equity.

The legislation before us today, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, mandates a study on the Federal pay and classification systems to determine whether they are affected by discrimination based on sex, race or ethnicity. The current system for so-called white collar workers, the General Schedule, appears to evaluate positions in a fashion that comports with the principles of gender equity and pay equivalance. Variations in pay and class/grade determination are based on differences in the difficulty, responsibility and qualification requirements for the work performed. In addition, determining factors include the amount of supervision required and the amount of independent judgment which is necessary. These criteria would appear to discount discriminatory factors. However, I believe it is important to look at the system to ensure that, in fact, they do.

The prevailing rate system, which covers what are traditionally referred to as "blue collar" positions, applies to those in trades or crafts, or in skilled, semiskilled, or skilled manual labor occupations. Clearly, these are fields where there traditionally has been little female participation. In addition, the prevailing rate system provides that wages must be maintained in line with prevailing wages for comparable work in the private sector within a local wage area. The question will be how to deal with disparities in the two systems while accounting for factors unique to each.

The issue of pay equity, or "comparable worth," is complex. Women's roles in society have changed dramatically, particularly in the last two decades. I think it is important to note that achieving full equality for women is a multi-faceted process. Those of us who have taken a lead in this effort are attempting to address all aspects of the issue through studies and proposed reforms in pension and tax laws, education, child care and civil rights. All of these subjects contribute to the complexity of the pay equity issue, and how they are dealt with at present and in the coming years will have a lot to do with progress toward per equity.

This legislation takes an appropriate first step in addressing comparable worth questions. It is only a study, which will allow us to determine from its results what our next step should be. It takes into account the recommendations of the General Accounting Office [GAO] for conducting such a study. It will include job content analysis, based on factors such as skill, effort, responsibility and qualifications. Further, it will also contain an economic analysis, to show the extent to which differences in pay may be attributed to factors such as merit, seniority, work experience and locality.

Eliminating discrimination is a complex and difficult task. It is slow and tedious. It required acceptance of the fact that most problems in society are not the subject of a simple cause and effect relationship. But it must continue to remain high on our agenda. Indeed, "comparable worth" is an issue worth looking at.●

● Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak in support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985. I commend my distinguished colleague, MARY ROSE OAKAR, Secretary of the House Democratic caucus, for persevering on this issue and reintroducing this excellent bill. There has been a lot of discussion of this measure, and a lot of claims concerning its intent and consequences. Let's understand what this bill does and does not do.

First, let's look at what it does.

H.R. 3008 does demonstrate the Federal Government's commitment to our civil rights laws and to the elimination of wage discrimination.

It is crucial that American women and minorities have economic equity and an equal chance for economic self-sufficiency. From the standpoints of both productivity and simple justice, women and minorities must not be second-class economic citizens.

Greater economic opportunity for all means greater long-term economic growth. As an economy, as a society, we cannot afford the tragic waste of human potential, human skill and knowledge, that occurs when we deprive women and minorities parity in the work force.

But just as important, as a nation great in both economic and moral strength, we cannot afford to deprive American citizens of an equal opportunity to develop their potential and contribute to their society to the full extent of their ability, without artificial and discriminatory economic disadvantages.

Mr. Chairman, I have two young daughters—two energetic and talented daughters. I am concerned for their future, as any father would be. I want my daughters to be able to go where their talents and their determination lead them. As a father proud of his daughters, as an American proud of his country, I do not want my daughters to have to struggle against discrimination. I want no woman, no member of a minority group, no American citizen, to have to struggle against discrimination.

We must not place women or minorities at an unfair and illegal economic disadvantage. Our economy and our integrity cannot afford it.

The Federal Government is the Nation's largest employer, and probably its most visible employer. It also represents the beliefs and values of the American people. Surely it is encumbent upon us to see that our employment practices are scrupulously legal, and nondiscriminatory.

The bill does represent a broad, nonpartisan consensus that the time has come to look at the employment practices of the Federal Government. Last Congress, a similar bill passed the House with 413 votes. This year's bill has broad, bipartisan cosponsorship.

Opponents of this bill say that the rectification of discriminatory job and wage practices will be too expensive. Mr. Chairman, discrimination isn't a cost to be factored into a cost-benefit analysis, nor is its eradication. Discrimination is a moral outrage and a violation of the law, and its eradication is a moral obligation and a legal necessity.

I really believe that we all agree, proponents and opponents of the bill alike, that our goal in this area is a "gender-blind," "race-blind" society in which all individuals have equal opportunity to compete in our economic system. And I think we all agree that we have made a great deal of progress in eliminating barriers to equal economic opportunity. But we have not reached our goal yet, and we disagree on how to reach it. Opponents of the bill tell us that if we resolve to stop discriminating in the future, the market will take care of inequities. I agree with my friend Congresswoman OAKAR, and my colleagues who joined me in cosponsoring H.R. 3008, that this is not enough. Yes, we must look to the future, but we cannot ignore the past. We cannot just ignore remaining, present discrimination created by past economic, social, and legal conditions and hope that it will go away. If people have been wrongfully placed at a disadvantage in our competitive economic system, we must seek out these inequities and remedy them. Only then will we have an economic system we can be proud of as Americans.

H.R. 3008 recognizes our obligation, as Federal legislators, to look to our federal wage and classification systems, to ensure that no Federal employee is at a wrongful economic disadvantage.

Now, let's look at what this bill does not do.

This bill does not propose any new law whatever, or any new standards for equitable pay. It simply proposes a study to determine whether the Federal pay and classification systems are consistent with current law—with title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and section 6(d) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938.

It does not affect State or local government or private employers in any way. The bill proposes a study of the Federal Government only. It seeks to ensure that the Federal Government's own house is in order, that its own pay and classification systems are designed and enforced in accordance with current law and are not discriminatory.

The bill does not impose, directly or indirectly, any new Federal regulations on the private sector. Yet even job evaluations in the private sector do not require or lead to regulation of the market. Pay scales can reflect the market and be non-discriminatory. Many large companies already have job evaluation systems to ensure that their job and wage systems do not violate Federal antidiscrimination laws. They obviously don't consider themselves to be tampering with the market.

Even though perfect objectivity obviously is impossible, the study proposed by the bill is not impossible to achieve. It is possible to identify and correct discriminatory pay practices. Forty-five States have already examined the issue, through studies, legislation, or collective bargaining. The GAO has conducted a study of the methodologies the proposed Commission would use, and concluded that such a study is indeed feasible and that the study "would provide Congress with a comprehensive analysis of the pay equity issue."

The bill does not presume, nor will the Commission presume, that wage differentials are discriminatory. After the study, wage differentials unexplained by economic and job content analysis may be deemed discriminatory. This would be left to the judgment of the bipartisan, representative Commission.

The bill does not provide for or mandate implementation of the Commission's recommendations, although I would hope that, if wage discrimination in the Federal Government were found, it would be eliminated.

The bill does not open the way for extensive, costly litigation. Should discriminatory practices exist in the Federal pay or classification systems, this study would enable the Government to take steps to end them promptly, thus avoiding possible litigation.

Finally, contrary to some claims, this bill does not threaten our way of life with extinction. Opponents of the bill predict that it will cause the "destruction of our economic strength," the "death of our free enterprise system," "loss of individual liberty," and "social chaos." Similar dire predictions were made when the Equal Pay Act, the minimum wage, and the child labor laws were enacted.

Our free market system is strong and is only strengthened by measures embodying the American ideal of equality, such as H.R. 3008.●

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise today in support of H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985.

H.R. 3008 mandates a study of the Federal pay and classifications systems for discrimination based on sex, race, and ethnicity.

As the Federal wage and classifications system has never been studied for evidence of discrimination, I believe that the study mandated by H.R. 3008 is clearly warranted. Indeed, as our labor market has certainly changed dramatically over the past several generations, it is important to clarify whether or not this vital system is organized in the most equitable and fair manner possible.

Pay equity simply means that wages and classifications are based on skill, effort, responsibility, and the working conditions of an occupation. It requires that jobs not be evaluated on the basis of sex or race.

The Government Accounting Office has issued a report that makes recommendations as to how a pay equity study might best be conducted. H.R. 3008 will take these into consideration in providing Congress with a comprehensive analysis of the situation.

This is an important study, indeed, an important step toward a better understanding of where discrimination might exist in our Federal wage and classification system, and what we might do to correct it.●

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support H.R. 3008, the Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985, a proposed 18-month study to determine whether our Federal pay and classification systems are affected by discrimination based upon sex, race or ethnicity.

As a government, we pride ourselves on being part of a nation which places great importance on fairness and equity. As a nation we have come a long way to correct unfairness in our society, however, we still have a long way to go.

I want to commend our colleague, the gentlewoman from Ohio, Representative MARY OAKAR, who has championed this bill which seeks to identify the problems of chronic pay inequities in the Federal Government, the Nation's largest employer, and thereby, move us closer to our goals of social and economic justice for all our citizens. It is my pleasure to be a cosponsor of this important legislation.

According to studies by the U.S. Census Bureau, and the General Accounting Office [GAO], the disparity between income of Federal employees who are male and female is an average of $9,000.

A study prepared by the GAO revealed that federally employed women earn an average of 62.8 cents for every dollar earned by males employed by the Federal Government. That data also demonstrated that black women working for the Federal Government earn an average of 62.2 cents for every dollar earned by a male. When we compare all sectors—Federal, State and local government, and private—white females earn 59.2 cents for every dollar paid to a male, black women earn 54.7, and Hispanic women earn 51.2 cents.

The GAO also examined the extent to which federally employed women are clustered into relatively few occupations at the lower end of the pay scale. They found that even though women comprise 44 percent of the Federal work force, approximately 78 percent of the female employees were clustered in grades 1 to 6. On the other hand, 85 percent of the male employees occupied jobs in grades 10 to 15.

The wage gap is a persistent problem, one which has remained fairly static since the mid-1950's, and will remain so unless corrections are made. Neither the free market nor antidiscrimination laws—as currently enforced—have made a dent in the gap. This situation has persisted in spite of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Equal Pay Act of 1963.

Mr. Chairman, there are some who ask: Why do we need such a study in 1985? The reason is clear: no study has ever examined this Federal concern since 1923 when the wage plan for paying the Nation's Federal civil servants was implemented. H.R. 3008 merely seeks to identify the cause of the problem. There are others who have expressed skeptism, arguing that the study is politically motivated. However, there is no need to fear the study because it is a bipartisan effort which had passed the House last year by a vote of 413 to 6.

This study focuses exclusively on the Federal Government. In addition, the 11-member bipartisan Commission which will oversee the study has only 18 months to make its final report, and 90 days after fulfilling its responsibilities, the Commission's authority will end.

All but five States have already addressed this issue. Some 39 have done research, while 22 are currently conducting evaluations of the pay classifications of State employees. In addition, seven States are implementing pay equity adjustments as a result of such studies. Many of these States, as well as some cities, have taken the lead in implementing pay equity policies to eliminate wage discrimination in their governments. Should not the Federal Government examine its own wage system, and follow the example being set by such States?

The mechanics of this legislation reflect national concern through a bipartisan team which will oversee the use of two types of research methods to be applied in this study as recommended by the GAO in its March 1984 study. One research method to be used, job content analysis, rates entry-level positions so that jobs are value based on factors such as skill, effort, responsibility, qualifications, and working conditions. To complement that technique, another method, economic analysis, will measure the extent to which pay differentials can be attributed to factors such as seniority, merit, productivity, education, work experience, veterans' status, locality, or other factors exclusive of sex, race, or ethnic origin.

The Congressional Budget Office [CBO] estimates that H.R. 3008, if enacted by September 1986, will cost between $1.5 and $2 million over the fiscal years 1986 and 1987. This bill specifies that the study is to be paid for with the regularly appropriated funds of the Office of Personnel Management. The GAO concluded that a pay equity study is feasible, and a study using both economic and job-content analyses would provide Congress with a comprehensive analysis of the pay equity issue.

This bill is not a back-door attempt to override market forces in determining wages for women and minorities. Rather, it is merely a means to determine if the Federal Government is adhering to existing antidiscrimination laws. Criticisms that this bill will severely disrupt the economy are only a repeat of false alarms sounded by those who announced a similar fate if the Equal Pay Act, minimum wage, and child labor laws were enacted.

In all those cases, the predicted economic chaos never came to pass. I believe that adoption of this legislation will be another important step in continuing the longstanding, bipartisan opposition to discrimination in this country.

After 60 years of experience with the Federal wage structure it is time for a comprehensive study which will give us the clarity to move the Nation forward. The Federal Government has the responsibility of developing, implementing, and enforcing legislation that will eliminate pay inequities based on race, sex, or ethnicity. Certainly it has a responsibility to make sure it is not discriminating as well. We can only bring honor to ourselves and the Nation by passing H.R. 3008 without further reservation, and I encourage my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired.

Pursuant to the rule, the bill will be considerd by sections, and each section shall be considered as having been read.

The Clerk will designate section 1.

The text of section 1 of the bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of American in Congress assembled,

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Federal Equitable Pay Practices Act of 1985".

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. KILDEE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 3008) to promote equitable pay practices and to eliminate discrimination within the Federal civil service, had come to no resolution thereon.

REPORT ON RESOLUTION WAIVING POINTS OF ORDER AGAINST AND PROVIDING PROCEDURES FOR CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 32, FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. DERRICK, from the Committee on Rules, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 99-248) on the resolution (H. Res. 253) waiving points of order against and providing procedures for the consideration of the conference report (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal year 1985, or any amendment in disagreement thereto, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

CONFERENCE REPORT ON SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 32, FIRST CONCURRENT RESOLUTION ON THE BUDGET—FISCAL YEAR 1986

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules, I call up House Resolution 253 and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

H. RES. 253

Resolved, That all points of order against the conference report on the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32) setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal year 1985, or against the consideration of the conference report or of any amendment reported from conference in disagreement, are hereby waived. The conference report or any amendment reported from conference in disagreement shall be considered as having been read when called up for consideration. If the conferees report in disagreement and the House acts first, it shall be in order to consider, without intervening motion, a motion, if offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, that the House recede from its amendment and concur with an amendment or amendments, such motion shall not be subject to a demand for a division of the question, such motion shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled as provided by clause 2(b) of rule XXVIII, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on such motion. If the Senate acts first and further amends the House amendment, it shall be in order in the House to consider, without intervening motion, a motion, if offered by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget, that the House either concur in or disagree to the Senate amendment, such motion shall be debatable for not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided and controlled as provided by clause 2(b) of rule XXVIII, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on such motion.

SEC. 2. The Chairman of the Committee on the Budget shall have unitl September 6, 1985 to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD allocations of budget outlays, new budget authority, and new entitlement authority to committees, and said allocations shall be considered to be the allocations required to be printed in the joint statement of managers on Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 pursuant to section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 (Public Law 93-344).

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK] is recognized for 1 hour.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield the customary 30 minutes for purposes of debate only to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA]. Pending that, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this rule waives points of order against and provides procedures for the consideration of the conference report to accompany Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986, or any amendments reported in disagreement thereto. Before I discuss the provisions of this rule, Mr. Speaker, I would like to note that this rule was drafted in order to provide the House with a number of options, or contingencies, so that the Members of the House would be able to respond to action on this legislation in the other body.

As our colleagues may be aware, the conference committee on the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 agreed to a budget resolution several hours ago. Upon conclusion of the conference, however, there remained some question as to the order and the form in which this agreement would be considered in each Chamber of Congress.

The Committee on Rules, therefore, was faced with the question of how best to ensure timely consideration of the agreement while not knowing at the time we were meeting precisely in what form the budget resolution would be considered. This rule, therefore, covers all potential contingencies as to which Chamber would consider the matter first, as well as the form in which the agreement might be considered in the House.

Subsequent to this rule being ordered reported, we have been advised that the House will consider this budget agreement before it is taken up in the other body, and that we will act amendments in disagreement rather than on a conference report. Therefore, I will discuss only those provisions of this rule which are applicable to our current situation.

Quite simply, this rule waives all points of order against the conference report and against consideration of the conference report, and the amendment in disagreement will be considered as having been read.

This rule also makes in order a motion, without intervening motion, that the House recede and concur with an amendment or amendments. The motion would not be subject to a demand for a division of the question and would be debatable for 1 hour to be equally divided and controlled by majority party and minority party as provided by clause 2(b) of rule XXVIII. The previous question on the motion would be considered as ordered.

Section 2 of this rule provides that the Chairman of the Budget Committee, Mr. GRAY, has until September 6, 1985 to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD spending allocations which are deemed to be allocations required by section 302(a) of the Budget Act. This section of the Budget Act requires that committee spending allocations be included in the joint statement accompanying a conference report on any budget resolution. Because the budget agreement was reached only hours ago, the Budget Committee will need some time to provide accurate allocations. By providing that these allocations be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when we return in September, this provision will allow the Budget Committee sufficient time to accurately allocate the spending totals among the House committees.

Mr. Speaker, it is necessary for the House to waive points of order against this conference report if we are to have an opportunity to complete action on the first budget resolution prior to the start of the August district work period. As is often the case, conference committees have concluded action on very important legislature of pressing national interest within hours of a scheduled adjournment. The rule before the House at present is necessary to facilitate the consideration of the budget resolution before adjournment. Moreover, this rule is similar to the rule adopted by the House earlier today, by voice vote, to provide for consideration of the conference report to accompany H.R. 1460, the Anti-Apartheid Act.

As our colleagues will recall, the House passed House Concurrent Resolution 152, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986, on May 23. Diligent efforts have been underway since that time to produce a conference agreement on the first budget resolution. The House conferees on the first budget resolution, led by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and chairman of the House Budget Committee, Mr. GRAY, have worked tirelessly over the last several weeks to produce a conference agreement.

While we have worked consistently toward a conference agreement on the first budget resolution, Mr. Speaker, I believe the Members of the House have also made some very pragmatic and appropriate decisions about imposing the discipline of the Budget Act on this Chamber even without final adoption of a budget resolution, as well as providing for the orderly handling of the appropriations measures for the coming fiscal year.

With the start of this recess, Mr. Speaker, the House will have concluded action and adopted 8 of 13 general appropriation bills for fiscal year 1986. The consideration of these appropriation measures was greatly facilitated by House adoption of a measure reported from the Committee on Rules, House Resolution 231, a resolution providing special budget procedures for the fiscal year 1986 budget process.

House Resolution 231, which the House adopted on July 24th, had the very important effect of providing that the House-passed budget resolution would be considered final adoption of a budget resolution for fiscal year 1986, for purposes of the Budget Act provisions triggered by such action, until final adoption by the House and the Senate of a concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986. Not only did this action facilitate the business of providing funds for the Government, but it also activated the provisions of the Budget Act which served to keep the spending provided in these appropriation measures within the limits that the House agreed to in its budget resolution.

Under the provisions of House Resolution 231, Mr. Speaker, upon adoption of the conference report to accompany Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 by the House and the Senate, the provisions of House Resolution 231 will cease to apply. Specifically, the House-passed budget will be replaced by the provisions of the conference report, once it is adopted in both Chambers, as final adoption of the budget resolution for fiscal year 1986.

Mr. Speaker, I realize that some of our colleagues may be hesitant about supporting a rule that expedites consideration of this conference report. I would respond, however, that if this rule is not adopted, we will not have an opportunity to finalize the budget for fiscal year 1986 before adjournment. With the start of fiscal year 1986 on October 1, 1985, this is simply not a measure which we can delay.

As a member of both the Committee on Rules and the Budget Committee, as well as serving as a conferee on the budget resolution, I am acutely aware of the concerns of Members on both sides of the aisle that the Congress cannot continue to work on budgetary legislation for the next fiscal year without a budget resolution in place. I have shared these concerns. I believe we have reached a satisfactory conference agreement, and we must put it in force.

Mr. Speaker, I urge adoption of the rule, and subsequently, the conference report to accompany Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from South Carolina, in my opinion, has more than adequately described this rule. I agree with his description.

Mr. Speaker, I have no requests for time and reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that I am very disappointed that a separate vote was not allowed on function 050. It denies the House an opportunity which it has not had this year to determine whether or not they want a freeze in the budget. If this resolution replaces the House resolution that we adopted 2 weeks ago, it says we do not want to freeze the budget. It is disappointing to me that we were not given an opportunity for a separate vote, but I will make my arguments on the bill.

I just think it is a tragedy when this House is not having an opportunity to voice its will on function 050 when that is the only function that is going to be exceeded with regard to the freeze.

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

I would respond to the gentleman that the Speaker of the House this morning has stated that he will request of the Rules Committee a rule on the authorization bill that will allow the House to exercise its will on that particular matter.

□ 1900

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, having said that, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania submitted the followed conference report and statement on the Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), setting forth the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988, and revising the congressional budget for the U.S. Government for fiscal year 1985:

CONFERENCE REPORT (H. REPT. No. 249)

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal year 1985, having met, after full and free conference, been unable to agree on a conference report because the conference decisions have changed certain budget figures outside the scope of the conference. As set forth in the accompanying Joint Explanatory Statement, the conferees do propose a congressional budget incorporated in a further amendment for the consideration of the two Houses.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 32), setting forth the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988 and revising the congressional budget for the United States Government for the fiscal year 1985, report that the conferees have been unable to agree. This is a technical disagreement, necessitated by the fact that in some instances the conference decisions include figures which (for purely technical reasons) would fall outside the range between the corresponding House and Senate provisions.

It is the intention of the conferees that the following amendment will be considered in the House and in the Senate.

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate submit the following joint statement in explanation of the action agreed upon by the managers:

The substitute language which is to be offered (and which should be considered the language of the concurrent resolution as recommended in the conference report for purposes of section 302(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974)—hereinafter in this statement referred to as the "conference substitute"—is as follows:

That the Congress hereby determines and declares that the concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1985 is hereby revised and replaced, the first concurrent resolution on the budget for fiscal year 1986 is hereby established, and the appropriate budgetary levels for fiscal years 1987 and 1988 are hereby set forth.

(a) The following budgetary levels are appropriate for the fiscal years beginning on October 1, 1984, October 1, 1985, October 1, 1986, and October 1, 1987:

(1) The recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $736,500,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $795,700,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $869,400,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $960,100,000,000.

and the amounts by which the aggregate levels of Federal revenues should be increased are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $0.
Fiscal year 1986: $3,000,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $5,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $7,600,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for hospital insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

Fiscal year 1985: $44,800,000,000.
Fiscal year 1986: $50,900,000,000.
Fiscal year 1987: $56,100,000,000.
Fiscal year 1988: $61,200,000,000.

and the amounts for Federal Insurance Contributions Act revenues for old-age, survivors, and disability insurance within the recommended levels of Federal revenues are as follows:

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Congress that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentives to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

CBO SCOREKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 5. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

FARM LOSS DEDUCTION

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Senate that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that tax legislation will be enacted to limit to the national median family income the amount of farm loss which may be deducted against nonfarm income, and it is further assumed that revenues derived from enactment of such legislation be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to assure that full-time, family-size farm operators will not be disadvantaged by unfair competition from high-income taxpayers with substantial nonform income.

ENHANCED TAX LAW ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 7. It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that the Committees on Finance and Ways and Means will develop legislation to reduce the tax enforcement gap, estimated by the Internal Revenue Service at $92,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1986. It is further assumed that such legislation should provide for increased and improved enforcement and collection, through audits, examinations, and other steps designed to identify and eliminate tax cheating and increase revenue collections from individuals and corporations currently evading Federal taxes, and that the legislation should include steps designed to increase voluntary compliance with tax laws and that such steps may include increased staff for taxpayer assistance, speedier processing of returns and provision of public information designed to build public trust and understanding of Internal Revenue Service enforcement efforts and that such legislation should also provide that the resources of the Internal Revenue Service shall be increased to accomplish full enforcement of United States tax laws, increasing voluntary compliance.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should consider convening a high level meeting of the major industrial countries for the express purpose of exploring options to improve the functioning of the international monetary system, including measures to stabilize currency exchange rates, reduce interest rates, promote maximum domestic and world economic growth, and help assure domestic price stability.

COMMITTEE REVIEW OF THE PRESIDENT'S PRIVATE SECTOR SURVEY ON COST CONTROL

SEC. 9. It is the sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) each of its standing committees should review and study, on a continuing basis, those portions of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control affecting subjects within its jurisdiction;

(2) each of its standing committees should, in its consideration of any bill or joint resolution of a public character within its jurisdiction, review those portions of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution; and

(3) each report of any such committee on a bill or joint resolution of a public character should contain—

(A) an identification of each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control implemented in such bill or resolution and the estimated dollar amount of program cost savings or revenue enhancement as a result of the implementation of each such recommendation; and

(B) a statement setting forth each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution, the disposition of each such recommendation, and the reasons for such disposition.

LIMITATION ON BENEFITS TO ALIENS

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Congress that functional totals should be reduced to reflect a limitation on the amount of social security benefits paid to illegal and nonresident aliens. It is assumed that the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee will report legislation to accomplish the required changes in law. Such legislation may limit benefits to the amount of wage-earner's contribution plus interest, unless the wage-earner is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization ageement and that this provision would apply to individuals becoming eligible on or after January 1, 1986.

EXPLANATION OF CONFERENCE SUBSTITUTE

The following tables show the functional allocations and budget aggregates included in the conference substitute. The numbers in the fiscal year 1985 columns reflect revisions of the second budget resolution for fiscal year 1985. The fiscal year 1986 columns show the budget aggregates and functional allocations for the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1986. The columns for fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988 show budget aggregates and functional allocations which the conferees consider appropriate for those years.

Economic Assumptions

The conferees accepted the economic assumptions shown in the table below as the basis for the revenue, spending did credit estimates in the conference substitute. These economic assumptions are the same as those used by the President in his FY 1986 budget submission in February. Both the House- and Senate-passed budget resolutions were based on these economic assumptions.

Revenues

The House resolution provided a revenue floor of $736.05 billion in FY 1985, $794.10 billion in FY 1986, $866.00 billion in FY 1987, and $955.60 billion in FY 1988. It provided that revenues be decreased by $0.15 billion in FY 1985, and increased by $1.45 billion in FY 1986, $1.70 billion in FY 1987, and $3.10 billion in FY 1988.

The Senate resolution set a revenue floor of $736.20 billion in FY 1985, $793.6 billion in FY 1986, $866.30 billion in FY 1987, and $955.90 billion in FY 1988. It provided that revenues be increased by $0.9 billion in FY 1986, $2.0 billion in FY 1987, and $3.4 billion in FY 1988.

The conference substitute sets a revenue floor of $736.5 billion in FY 1985, $795.7 billion in FY 1986, $869.4 billion in FY 1987, and $960.1 billion in FY 1988. It provides that revenues should be increased by $3.0 billion in FY 1986, $5.1 billion in FY 1987, and $7.6 billion in FY 1988.

Function 150: Export-Import Bank

It is the intention of the conferees that up to $1.8 billion may be made available for the Export-Import Bank loan programs. The allocation made pursuant to section 302 of the Congressional Budget Act to the Senate Committee on Appropriations contained in this Statement of the Managers assumes a funding level of $1.2 billion for this program. In the event that the relevant appropriations measure provides a higher level of funding, an additional allocation equal to the amount in the measure, but in any event no higher than $600 million in budget authority and $50 million in outlays for fiscal year 1986 will be made to the Senate Committee on Appropriations at the time such measure is reported.

When an allocation is made to the House Committee on Appropriations pursuant to section 302, such allocation will be accorded identical treatment.

Function 300: Superfund

The conference agreement assumes that the revenues associated with the reauthorization of the Superfund program will be sufficient to cover Superfund outlays. In developing the funding levels assumed for the Superfund program, the conferees do not intend to prejudice the final outcome of reauthorization legislation.

Function 400: Transportation Trust Funds

As in the past, the conferees have followed the general policy of assigning reconciliation instructions to authorizing committees of jurisdiction. No instructions have been given to the Appropriations Committees. However, the conferees recognize that in the instances of certain transportation trust funds, jurisdiction over spending decisions has historically been shared, and the imposition of obligation limitations has been a desirable budget control device, permitting all accounts to be considered in setting spending priorities within certain budget functions. In making reconciliation instructions, therefore, the conferees do not intend to alter existing jurisdictional relationships, and expect that such relationships will continue as in the past.

Function 400: Panama Canal Commission

The Conferees assume that any undistributed discretionary program reductions in Function 400: Transportation will not affect any treaty requirements related to the Panama Canal Commission.

Function 450: Housing Development Action Grants

The conference agreement assumes continued funding for the Housing Development Actions Grants (HoDAG) program from funds allocated to the assisted hosing program.

Function 550: Health

Medicaid report language

The Conference agreement assumes $450 million in medicaid savings over three years from enhanced State efforts to collect payments from third party insurers. It is the intention of the conferees that collection efforts not adversely affect beneficiaries or States which make a reasonable effort to obtain payments. The conferees believe that there are cost effective techniques available to States to meet this goal without resulting in a loss of Federal funding or disruption of the medicaid program. Furthermore, the conferees intend that there will be no loss to States of Federal medicaid funds if collection efforts do not result in initially projected savings.

It is also the intent of the conferees that legislation which requires States to collect payments would be sufficient to meet the reconciliation assumptions.

Function 600: Scoring of Debt Forgiveness for Public Housing

The Managers agree that scorekeeping for reconciliation savings from assumed debt forgiveness for public housing notes should not be done in such a way as to require program reductions in place of the intended financing changes.

Function 650: Social Security

The conferees have assumed some savings for administrative support in the Social Security Administration. It is not intended that these savings should result in staff reductions, office closings or otherwise have an adverse impact upon services to social security beneficiaries.

Reconciliation Instructions

The Senate resolution contained instructions regarding increased spending directed to 13 Senate committees and 14 House committees. The House amendment contained instructions of this nature directed to 10 House committees. The conference substitute contains instructions directed to 11 Senate committees and 14 House committees.

The Senate resolution provided that instructed committees would respond by June 30, 1985. The House amendment provided that instructed committees would respond within 30 calendar days of final action on this budget resolution. The conference substitute provides that committees must respond by September 27, 1985.

Neither the Senate resolution nor the House amendment contained instructions to change revenues. The conference substitute contains instructions to the Senate Finance Committee and the House Ways and Means Committee to increase revenues.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

APPROPRIATIONS CAPS

The Senate resolution provided a point of order against the consideration of an appropriations bill in the House or Senate if the enactment of that bill would cause total aggregate budget authority to exceed the amounts stated for function 050, National Defense, or the amounts stated for nondefense discretionary activities.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate receded to the House.

AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

The Senate resolution provide that this resolution shall be deemed to be the second concurrent resolution on the budget for FY 1986 for the purposes of section 311 of the Budget Act if Congress has not completed action on a second resolution by October 1, 1985.

The House amendment provided language virtually identical to that of the Senate resolution which achieved the same result. The House amendment further provided that committees would be held harmless against a point of order under section 311 of the Budget Act for violation of spending ceilings if those committees remain within their section 302(a) allocation for FY 1986. In addition, the House amendment provided that if any off-budget programs contained in a list in the House report are brought into the unified budget, the budget authority and outlays for those programs shall not be included in determining violations of section 311 of the Budget Act. The House amendment also provided that if Congress subsequently adopts a second budget resolution for FY 1986, all of the provisions of this section will cease to apply.

The House conferees receded to the Senate with an amendment making the provision holding committees harmless applicable only to the House.

TAX REFORM

The Senate resolution contained language regarding the need for tax reform. The provision presented certain findings of the Senate regarding the inequities and disadvantages of the current tax structure. It also expressed the sense of the Senate that tax reform legislation should be adopted as soon as possible, incorporating specified objectives and principals.

The House amendment contained language identical to the Senate provision, except that it expressed the findings and sense of the House.

The Senate conferees receded to the House with an amendment to express the sense of the Congress.

CBO SCOREKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of the Senate that CBO should make weekly reports when the Senate is in session regarding the current status of congressional action with respect to the limitations on spending, revenues and the public debt established by the most recent budget resolution.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The House conferees receded to the Senate.

FARM LOSS DEDUCTIONS

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of the Senate that legislation should be enacted to limit to the national median family income the amount of farm-related losses which can be deducted against nonfarm income, and that the resulting additional revenues should be used to reduce individual income tax rates, and to assure that family-operated farms do not suffer a disadvantaged as against farm operations with substantial nonfarm income.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The House conferees receded to the Senate.

ENHANCED TAX LAW ENFORCEMENT

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of the Congress that legislation should be reported by the Senate Finance Committee and enacted to increase compliance with the tax code. Such legislation should concern improved enforcement and collection, increased staff, and efforts to improve taxpayer assistance. The resulting increased revenue could be used to reduce income tax rates, reduce the deficit, or other unspecified purposes.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The House conferees receded to the Senate with an amendment referencing the House Ways and Means Committee and deleting the language regarding use of the increased revenue.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

The House amendment contained a provision expressing the sense of the Congress that the Administration should call for the convening of an international conference to discuss the stabilization of currency exchange rates, the reduction of interest rates, the promotion of maximum economic growth, and the assurance of domestic stability.

The Senate resolution contained no such provision.

The Senate receded to the House with an amendment.

GRACE COMMISSION REVIEW

The House amendment contained a provision expressing the sense of the House that all House committees should review the findings of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control relating to programs within their jurisdiction and consider those findings during their review of legislation. Each report accompanying legislation should identify those recommendations implemented in that legislation, their budgetary impact, and an explanation of every recommendation which relates to the legislation and a discussion of its disposition.

The Senate resolution contained no such provision.

The Senate conferees receded to the House.

LIMITATION ON BENEFITS TO ALIENS

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of the Congress that social security benefits paid to illegal and nonresident aliens should be limited to the amount of the wage-earner's contribution plus interest and states the assumption that the Senate Finance Committee will report legislation to accomplish this. This limitation would apply to individuals becoming eligible after January 1, 1986.

The House amendment contained a provision identical to the Senate provision except that it referenced the House Ways and Means Committee instead of the Senate Finance Committee.

The House conferees receded to the Senate with an amendment referencing the House Committee on Ways and Means.

ANNUAL DETERMINATION OF CREDIT ACTIVITY THROUGH THE APPOROPRIATIONS PROCESS

The Senate resolution provided that it shall not be in order to consider legislation authorizing new direct loan obligations of loan guarantee commitments which does not limit such activity to amounts appropriated in advance. Legislation reported in response to the reconciliation instructions contained in this resolution is exempted. Legislation regarding Commodity Credit Corporation price support and related programs in operation on January 1, 1985 is also exempted.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate conferees receded to the House.

ELIMINATION OF DISTINCTION BETWEEN "UNIFIED BUDGET" AND "OFF-BUDGET" SPENDING

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of Congress that the distinction between "unified budget" and "off-budget" spending should be terminated, and that the budget authority and outlays for so-called "off-budget" agencies should be included in the budget totals.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate conferees receded to the House.

The conferees intend that the functional and aggregate totals included in this resolution, reflecting both "on-budget" and "off-budget" spending, will govern for the purposes of the congressional budget process, scorekeeping, and enforcement. It is not the intent of the conferees to prejudice the action of committees of jurisdiction in their legislative oversight of program not presently included in the unified budget of the federal government.

WIC FUNDING

The Senate resolution contained language expressing the sense of the Senate that the full amount of appropriations for FY 1985, currently being withheld from obligations by OMB, should be apportioned among the states, pursuant to public law.

The House amendment contained language indentical to the Senate provision, except that it expresses the sense of the Congress.

The conference substitute does not contain this language.

CONFORMING OVERTIME REQUIREMENTS

The Senate resolution contained language expressing the sense of the Congress that the overtime requirements contained in the Walsh-Healey Act and the Contract Work Hours and Safety Standards Act should be conformed to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate conferees receded to the House.

MINIMUM TAX

The Senate resolution contained a provision expressing the sense of Congress that a minimum tax should be enacted so that all corporations and individuals with economic income will pay tax, and that the resulting revenue should be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to increase threshold amounts for tax payments by individuals when tax reform legislation is considered.

The House amendment contained no such provision.

The Senate conferees receded to the House.

ALLOCATION OF BUDGET AUTHORITY AND OUTLAYS TO SENATE COMMITTEES

Pursuant to section 302 of the Congressional Budget Act, the conference substitute makes the following allocation of budget authority and outlays among the committees of the Senate.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS AUTOMATIC SECOND BUDGET RESOLUTION

SEC. 3. (a) If the Congress has not completed action by October 1, 1985, on the concurrent resolution on the budget required to be reported under section 310(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 for fiscal year 1986, then, for purposes of section 311 of such Act, this concurrent resolution shall be deemed to be the concurrent resolution required to be reported under section 310 of such Act.

(b) In the House of Representatives, section 311(a) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974, as made applicable by subsection (a) of this section, shall not apply to bills, resolutions, or amendments within the jurisdiction of a committee, or any conference report on any such bill or resolution, if—

(1) the enactment of such bill or resolution as reported

(2) the adoption and enactment of such amendment; of

(3) the enactment of such bill or resolution in the form recommended in such conference report; would not cause the appropriate allocation for such committee of new discretionary budget authority or new spending authority as described in section 401(c)(2)(C) of the Congressional Budget Act of 1974 made pursuant to section 302(a) of such Act for fiscal year 1986 to be exceeded.

TAX REFORM

SEC. 4. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) the existing tax structure of the United States distorts economic activity, leading to an inefficient use of national resources and a weakening of our domestic economic vitality and competitive posture in international markets.

(2) the relating tax burdens among various taxpayer categories are manifestly unfair insofar as they arise from differences in the capabilities of taxpayers to take advantage of complicated tax laws.

(3) the ability of the Federal Government to plan and conduct rational fiscal policy is frustrated by elaborate schemes to avoid taxation and the unintended effects of tax incentives and penalties;

(4) progressive erosion of voluntary compliance threatens the fiscal integrity of our public finances and the confidence of our citizens in the Federal Government's capacity to govern; and

(5) a number of plans, each designed to simplify and reform the Tax Code, have been before the Congress for a time sufficient to allow for extensive analysis and evaluation.

(b) It is therefore the sense of the Congress that tax reform should be adopted as soon as possible, and that it should incorporate the following principles and objectives:

(1) efficiency and responsiveness to market conditions in the economic activities of American businesses and consumers;

(2) simplicity of structure and lower marginal tax rates;

(3) a fair and equitable distribution of the tax burden among all taxpayers, with relief for those below the poverty level, and incentives to bring them into the work force;

(4) a broader tax base, with deductions essential to avoid genuine hardship or to protect the economic security of the American people; and

(5) increased incentives for work, saving, and investment.

CBO SCOREKEEPING REQUIREMENTS

SEC. 5. It is the sense of the Senate that because the Senate requires timely reporting of legislative action on spending bills, and because the Senate requires continual control over the budget, the Director of the Congressional Budget Office shall issue a weekly report during periods when the Senate is in session detailing and tabulating the progress of congressional action on bills and resolutions providing new budget authority and changing revenues and the public debt for a fiscal year, including, but not limited to the requirements set forth in Public Law 93-344, section 308(b).

FARM LOSS DEDUCTION

SEC. 6. It is the sense of the Senate that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that tax legislation will be enacted to limit to the national median family income the amount of farm loss which may be deducted against nonfarm income, and it is further assumed that revenues derived from enactment of such legislation be used to reduce individual income tax rates and to assure that full-time, family-size farm operators will not be disadvantaged by unfair competition from high-income taxpayers with substantial nonform income.

ENHANCED TAX LAW ENFORCEMENT

SEC. 7. It is the sense of the Congress that revenues should be increased and it is assumed that the Committees on Finance and Ways and Means will develop legislation to reduce the tax enforcement gap, estimated by the Internal Revenue Service at $92,000,000,000 in fiscal year 1986. It is further assumed that such legislation should provide for increased and improved enforcement and collection, through audits, examinations, and other steps designed to identify and eliminate tax cheating and increase revenue collections from individuals and corporations currently evading Federal taxes, and that the legislation should include steps designed to increase voluntary compliance with tax laws and that such steps may include increased staff for taxpayer assistance, speedier processing of returns and provision of public information designed to build public trust and understanding of Internal Revenue Service enforcement efforts and that such legislation should also provide that the resources of the Internal Revenue Service shall be increased to accomplish full enforcement of United States tax laws, increasing voluntary compliance.

INTERNATIONAL MONETARY CONFERENCE

SEC. 8. It is the sense of the Congress that the Administration should consider convening a high level meeting of the major industrial countries for the express purpose of exploring options to improve the functioning of the international monetary system, including measures to stabilize currency exchange rates, reduce interest rates, promote maximum domestic and world economic growth, and help assure domestic price stability.

COMMITTEE REVIEW OF THE PRESIDENT'S PRIVATE SECTOR SURVEY ON COST CONTROL

SEC. 9. It is the sense of the House of Representatives that—

(1) each of its standing committees should review and study, on a continuing basis, those portions of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control affecting subjects within its jurisdiction;

(2) each of its standing committees should, in its consideration of any bill or joint resolution of a public character within its jurisdiction, review those portions of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution; and

(3) each report of any such committee on a bill or joint resolution of a public character should contain—

(A) an identification of each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control implemented in such bill or resolution and the estimated dollar amount of program cost savings or revenue enhancement as a result of the implementation of each such recommendation; and

(B) a statement setting forth each recommendation of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control pertaining to such bill or resolution, the disposition of each such recommendation, and the reasons for such disposition.

LIMITATION ON BENEFITS TO ALIENS

SEC. 10. It is the sense of the Congress that functional totals should be reduced to reflect a limitation on the amount of social security benefits paid to illegal and nonresident aliens. It is assumed that the Finance Committee and the Ways and Means Committee will report legislation to accomplish the required changes in law. Such legislation may limit benefits to the amount of wage-earner's contribution plus interest, unless the wage-earner is a citizen of a country with which the United States has a treaty or totalization ageement and that this provision would apply to individuals becoming eligible on or after January 1, 1986.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the motion be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] will be recognized for 30 minutes, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] will be recognized for 30 minutes.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] opposed to the bill?

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I am not opposed to the bill.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I believe then that under rule XXVIII, a Member in opposition to the bill is entitled to 20 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. Under the rule, the gentleman is entitled to one-third of the time.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] will be recognized for 20 minutes, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY].

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, we have before us the budget for 1986. What you will find, if you look at this document, is that we left the House with a budget resolution that reduced spending by $56.2 billion in 1986, and a total deficit reduction in fiscal years 1986 to 1988 of $259.1 billion.

Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to inform my colleagues that after a very lengthy and a very long conference, we have come forward with a conference agreement that has a deficit reduction in fiscal year 1986 of $57.45 billion, a total reduction of the deficit in fiscal years 1986 to 1988 of $279.56 billion, and a remaining deficit in fiscal year 1988 of $112.9 billion.

Let me stress to the Members of this body the components of the conference agreement.

First of all, I would like to point out that this conference agreement maintains the bipartisan approach of the House on the COLA units. Social Security and other retirement programs have been fully funded, as was the case in most of the major proposals before the House.

Second, I would also point out to my colleagues that the low-income and high-priority programs that we had in the House-passed budget resolution were maintained. This includes full inflation adjustments for these low-income programs, and increases above inflation for selected health programs, accommodating House committee action on nutrition programs.

With regard to reductions in the domestic section, the conference agreement includes $22 billion in domestic program reduction beyond those assumed in the House-passed resolution. However, the House was able to resist efforts by the other body to terminate many programs, including UDAG, CDBG, EDA, Tennessee Valley Authority, and Appalachian Regional Commission. Important programs such as assisted housing, rural housing, and Superfund are funded near levels assumed in the House resolution or House appropriation bills.

All veteran programs are funded at the House-passed levels in 1986.

In the area of Medicare and Medicaid, the savings of $11 billion in Medicare and $450 million in Medicaid are assumed over 3 years. This represents a slight increase above the House position. In Medicare, it represents an increase of about $1.2 billion, and in Medicaid, it assumes a reduction of $450 million with regard to the third-party reimbursements, which will not be scored against Federal contribution to States or to the States themselves, thus preserving the intention of the House to provide full inflation for this low-income health program.

The conference agreement includes language stating that it is the intention of the conference that the collection efforts not adversely affect any of the beneficiaries or States which make a reasonable effort to make reductions.

Let me also add that the distinguished Ways and Means Committee chairman and his members have been given responsibilities which they have historically met with regard to revenues, and there is not in this budget a proposal with regard to inclusion of State employees.

Let me conclude, Mr. Speaker, by pointing out that we had a long and difficult conference. However, given the political reality with regard to the administration's position on revenues, given the reality of the House's bipartisan position with regard to the COLA unit, I believe, Mr. Speaker, when we look at this reality, that we have come forth with a deficit reduction package, and a budget that moves us in the right direction with strong deficit reduction over 3 years of $279.65 billion, and at the same time we have returned with a greater deficit reduction in fiscal year 1986 than when we left the House.

Let me also point out in the area of function 050, military spending, what we have done is in that area we have adopted the same position of the House/Senate conferees of $302 billion in budget authority, and the outlays for 1986 as well as any outyears, or the outlay interpretations of the House of Representatives.

Let me just say in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, this document, like all budget documents that reflect a process is not a perfect one. I am sure that Members will find fault with one area or another, things that they would have liked to have seen done differently.

However, I believe when we look at the whole, when we look at the entire document and understand that it represents ceilings, it represents ceilings which allow our appropriations and authorizations committees to work under, I believe that this body will agree with this chairman and the House conferees that this is a good budget, considering those realities.

I would urge my colleagues to adopt it with an "aye" vote.

□ 1910

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

First, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that as has been indicated here before, when you vote "yes" on this resolution, you are voting that you prefer this resolution to the one the House overwhelmingly adopted 2 weeks ago.

This resolution becomes a substitute for the budget resolution we passed just 2 weeks ago, which confirmed that we would use the House budget resolution passed earlier in the year.

Now what does adopting a new resolution mean? It means that we are already, after 2 weeks, abandoning the principle of freeze. The Committee on Appropriations was told to proceed with the idea that we are going to freeze all these budgets this year, and to adopt budgets that, under these various functions, would be at freeze level or below.

Eight appropriations bills have been acted upon in the House so far. They are a total of $8 billion below the 1985 appropriations level.

This resolution in one fell swoop adds $10 billion, that is $10,000 million to function 050, more than the amount that has been cut out in these eight appropriation bills and it reverses the instructions we were given 2 weeks ago.

Now how can you expect the Appropriations Committee in these bills to stand by the idea of the freeze if the House now abandons the freeze in this bill? That would give us new instructions. "Forget about the freeze." That is the way it will be interpreted.

Now, do not kid yourselves, we are going to have a continuing resolution. There are only about 20 days left in this Congress before the new fiscal year. We are going to be over there October 1st working on a continuing resolution and at that time, you will have a limit on the amount of budget authority within which to work. An additional $10 billion will have been absorbed in this resolution; it instructs us that $302 billion is the goal instead of the $292 billion for function 050, the military. That means that there will be a bigger squeeze than ever on other functions.

How are they going to make that up? Look at what you are voting for here if you vote "yes."

One way they do in this resolution is to reconcile part of that by taking $2.454 billion out of Medicare. That is this year. Next year $3.452 billion and the year after that $4.949 billion.

On the other hand, defense will go from $292 billion in 1985 to $302 billion in 1986 to $323 billion in 1987 to $346 billion in 1988.

That is $54 billion by 1988. That is the goal that you are setting when you say "yes" to this resolution. On the other hand the agriculture function is cut 40 percent in that period.

Each Member has a right to believe that that is the way we ought to proceed with this budget, but anyone who is serious about cutting budgets, should know there is no way that you can vote "yes" for this as a preference over the budget we adopted 2 weeks ago and say that you are voting for freezes across the board in this fiscal year.

The past 3 weeks, we have had about 25 votes on the floor to cut a few thousand dollars out of a number of programs. Some Members who voted for all of those will now vote for this resolution and they will say then "I voted 25 times to cut the budget," but this one time will more than offset all that they did if they voted for all of those cuts.

We are just putting a squeeze on the wrong people, it is the wrong message to send; an "aye" vote for this resolution tonight is a vote to abandon the freeze, the freeze principle that we have had so far this Congress. It is a vote for reconciliation to take more out of Medicare, to take more out of SBA, take more out of programs that the President wanted to cut far below freeze level.

I urge you to vote "no" on the resolution.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, let me say to my good friend from Iowa who was just in the well that he has been in a lot of conferences and in every conference there is give and take. No one, no one ever expects to come back from conference, certainly on a bill of this magnitude, with the same exact bill that went over there. There is another body that we have to be concerned with. If the gentleman had sat in on some of the conferences that we had and had seen the difficult time that we had getting the figures that he wanted, and we know that he is interested in more than just one function of this budget, I do not think he would be down there protesting quite as loudly as he is now.

Also let me point out that we came to the outlay figure, that low outlay figure on 050 that was passed by the House. Do not overlook that fact.

Let me say when we came down to that figure, we gave a lot. We also have to think about the appropriations process.

You know, the gentleman serves on the Committee on Appropriations. We merely set the parameters. The Committee on Appropriations is going to say how much money we are going to vote for 050 or any other function. So let us not make a mountain out of a molehill.

I think this conference committee under the able leadership of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has done an admirable job, an admirable job. Let us not tear him and his work down.

I said early on I am going to support this because we got $55 billion in savings. We have taken out that contracting in or contracting out, whatever you want to call it. We have come up with some savings to reduce the debt.

You can vote against those savings if you like and go home and try to answer to the people that you represent, who have been clamoring for lower interest rates in this country. Listening to Mr. Volcker, he says "Give me $50 billion in reductions and it will bring interest rates down."

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH] represents a very good agricultural area. Who is hurting from high interest rates any more than the farmer? He can answer that. We want to bring those interest rates down so we are going to put the ball in Mr. Volcker's court when we pass this piece of legislation and say "Bring the interest rates down."

For those people who are interested in bringing the interest rates down, to vote and go back home and say "I voted to bring interest rates down by voting a $55 billion savings in expenditures," I do not know whether you could put that line across. They will not follow that in Ohio. They might follow it in Iowa, but not in Ohio.

Let me say further that we have done something in this budget that is extremely important, especially to the Members on our side. One of the reasons I am supporting this conference report is that we put teeth, teeth into this conference report. We have increased those reconciliation numbers to $68 billion. We have come up from 37, as this resolution passed the House. We are doing something about reducing expenditures.

Let me say further that everybody watches what the National Federation of Independent Businesses think about legislation, as to how it affects their businesses across this country.

I have in my hand a letter dated today from that association, commending the conference committee report on its piece of work and saying "Once again, FIB commends you for your reference and are pleased to support the conference report as a key small business vote."

That is dated today, August 1, 1985.

The business people of this Nation know what they want and they know that tonight they want an affirmative vote from this House in support of this conference report.

Oh, I could get up here and start to pick it apart. I could get up here and go down the line on those things that happened in the conference committee that I did not support. I could have said to BILL GRAY, "I am not going to support the conference report if you don't give me this, that, or the other thing."

I realize that we have a conference report, over $900 billion. To pick it apart by some little function, even though we are talking about $10 billion out of almost a $1 trillion budget, we have got to consider the ramifications of what you are attempting to do.

So let us not torpedo a $55 billion savings in 1 year, $277 billion in savings over 3 years to bring that whopping deficit down by saying "I did not get exactly as I wanted. So I am going to vote against it."

That will not sell in Ohio, I do not think it will sell in America.

□ 1920

We ought to support this conference report, and the work of BILL GRAY and his committee.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DERRICK].

Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, we have a budget resolution before us tonight, a resolution that many of us thought would not be here just 3 or 4 days ago, a resolution that the American people want, need, and deserve.

It is like everything else that happens in this House, in this town. It is not an absolute; it is a compromise. There is a lot in there I do not like, and I am sure that applies to everyone here.

The fact of the matter is, it gives some order to our fiscal spending, and we should pass it tonight. Now, there are those who suggest that because we have the $302 billion Pentagon budget authority that they are not going to support it.

Well, our Speaker told us this morning that he was going to request of the Rules Committee that the Rules Committee give a rule on the DOD authorization bill, that would allow the House to exercise its will; 302 versus 292.

I am going to vote for the 292, then, but I am going to also vote for this budget resolution because the country needs it, and do not forget, we need it for our credibility when we go back home.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WHITTEN].

Mr. WHITTEN. Mr. Speaker, I am going to vote for this resolution but it is important to understand that this resolution increases military carryover $10 billion more than we agreed to a few weeks ago.

I said earlier that I was chairman of the committee that set up and promoted the Budget Committee. I served on it the first time. Why? 42 percent of our spending was avoiding annual review through our committee.

We agreed to the House passed budget resolution, we do not need the Senate to agree. We just need to make them follow our budget, which we passed a few weeks ago.

Our committee has reduced spending in appropriation bills about $9 billion.

So I just want to say I am going to vote for this resolution. So I am going to vote for it, but I hope you will help me hold the House budget.

I hope our Appropriations Committee can hold the line as we are doing, and I hope we have the help of our friends on the Budget Committee.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from California [Ms. FIEDLER].

Ms. FIEDLER. Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to simply make a couple of comments about the process that it took to bring us to this point, and I would like to offer my personal commendations to the chairman, Chairman GRAY, and to our ranking member, DEL LATTA, and to PETE DOMENICI, who did such an outstanding job of sticking with it.

I have served on conference committees ever since I came to the conference, I have never been involved in a more difficult conference. There were tremendous political issues which had to be resolved on both sides; both the House and the Senate as well as on both sides of the aisle in each respective body, and the stick-to-itiveness that was shown on the part of our leadership is something that each and every Member of this House ought to applaud.

Because very frankly, had they not stuck to their effort, we would not have a budget before us today, and it did take a good deal of compromise and conciliation on everyone's part.

I do not think that there is a Member on the floor that believes that this is the best of all possible worlds when it comes to a budget. But it was the budget that we were able to negotiate, doing the very best job that we could, to take into consideration the variety of competing interests, and frankly we sweated blood over many of those competing interests, all of which will be reflected in the debate this afternoon, and that will be felt here on the floor.

So I just simply want to offer my strongest commendations to our leadership, to those who served on the committee, and to ask the strong support of the Members who will vote today, for one basic reason; and that is, that when you take a look at what the alternative is to voting for this budget resolution, higher and higher Federal spending: On the House version alone we will spend $20 billion less in the next 3 years if this budget resolution is passed.

That in itself is significant reason for us to vote aye when the time comes on this budget, because the alternative is putting us deeper and deeper into debt; something that I do not think there is anyone on this floor wants to see take place.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI].

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREES ON H.R. 2475, SIMPLIFICATION OF IMPUTED INTEREST RULES

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H.R. 2475) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to simplify the imputed interest rules of sections 1274 and 483, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment thereto, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. HOWARD). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object, this is the report on imputed interest, which all the Members of the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman withhold? This is the appointment of conferees, the Chair would state to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. Speaker, this issue deals with imputed interest, which all the Members of the House are anxious to dispatch.

I had very strong objections to the procedures. The distinguished chairman has persuaded me that the way in which he is handling it is the most expeditious way to satisfy all of the Members of the body.

Mr. Speaker, I therefore withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none, and without objection, appoints the following conferees: Messrs. ROSTENKOWSKI, GIBBONS, PICKLE, RANGEL, STARK, DUNCAN, ARCHER, and VANDER JAGT.

There was no objection.

MAKING IN ORDER ON TODAY OR ANY DAY THEREAFTER, CONSIDERATION OF CONFERENCE REPORT ON H.R. 2475, SIMPLIFICATION OF IMPUTED INTEREST RULES

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order at any time today or any day thereafter to consider the conference report on the bill, H.R. 2475, that all points of order against the conference report be waived, and that the conference report be considered as read when called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentlewoman from California [Mrs. BOXER].

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, if it is in order, I would yield my friend an additional 30 seconds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentlewoman from California is recognized for 1 minute.

Mrs. BOXER. I thank the gentlemen for yielding.

My colleagues, I think that our country is waiting for us to act on this deficit, and thanks to the persistence and the patience of our chairman, BILL GRAY, we have a budget, and it was not easy.

Many options were taken off the table right at the start; but we have a budget and we have a deficit reduction of $56 billion.

Do I think the defense number is too high; I say to my friend from Massachusetts? Yes, I do.

□ 1930

But this House will have the opportunity to work its will on that number when we come back from recess and vote on the defense authorization conference. In this budget I think it is important for my colleagues to understand that we save programs for the very poor, we save transit, we save nutrition, we save Superfund, and we got a big deficit reduction. I urge support.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I am appreciative genuinely of the very good work done by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who chairs the Budget Committee. I am delighted I voted for him. He was presented with a very difficult situation, given the extremism that existed at the White House, given the rigidity that existed elsewhere, in places the rules prohibit me from mentioning. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania did an excellent job, and I have no criticism to make of that. But I cannot vote for a final product which substantially increases not just this year but in the year after and the year after that, what we call the out years, but which normal people call next year and the year after, provides for a 3-percent increase in the military over and above inflation.

The people who have insisted on this, the President and a group to whom I cannot refer still have not gotten the message that we do not want to go along with increase after increase after increase in the military while the poorest of the poor are imposed upon.

This House turned down last week any significant vote of funds to house people who were desperately poor. We have a homelessness crisis, and we lament that homelessness crisis, and then we vote to cut funds for the desperately poor in public housing. Do Members think that the poor come periodically from Mars? Do they not understand where the poor come from? They come from people who do not have enough places to live. And we are denying them places to live because we have got a fund in next year and the year after, real growth in the tens of billions of dollars over and above what the Pentagon now has.

I want to make one little aside and allude to an earlier debate, because sometimes Members are sincere, but not always. We heard a great deal of lamentation and weeping before, over a bill that deals with potential sex discrimination in pay because the report was not ready in time. And Members on the other side were distraught that the report had only come out at 1 o'clock and here we are voting. We just had an explanation that the report on this bill will be ready in September. And the extent to which that has disarranged my friends on the other side is not visible to the naked eye or even to long-term software contact lenses. In other words, people who are prepared to vote for this whambam and thank you, under these circumstances, people who are prepared to vote without a report in this quickest of the quick, who then will allude again to the terrible problem about how rushed they are in pay equity, will have to search long and far before they will find anyone who will believe them.

So, please, spare us, having greased the skids, any lamentation about the lack of time on pay equity. You cannot vote after hours of debate, we are going to be told, on a commission to study the subject of sex discrimination, but you can pass a resolution covering the entire budget for the entire United States of America for 2 years to come, with a report that will be published in September, in about an hour and a half. So let us keep clear who is talking about what.

Now, let us go back to this budget question. The question is, as the gentleman from Ohio said to my friend from Iowa, don't you want to reduce the deficit? We do. If the only change—I would like an awful lot of changes, I say to my friends here—but if the only change were to be to cut that military number I would enthusiastically support this budget, as much as I dislike it. But in its current form, you are asking us to give an increase to the military so we can cut community development block grants and take a little bit more out of Medicare. And I understand that it was a sense of responsibility on the part of my friends on the Budget Committee who said, "Well, we cannot allow there to be no budget at all." I would not want there to be no budget at all. But continuing to feed the notion at the Pentagon that they can spend without regard for the drain they levy on our resources is a mistake. And that is what this budget does.

So I would hope that we would reject this and ask that a conference reconvene and simply come back with a smaller military number. I would be satisfied with that. So let us isolate the question to the continued increase. We are told, "Well, wait a minute, this is just the authorization. The appropriation will be coming. The House will later work its will." Well, when the authorization came out on the military, the military authorization, people said, "Well, it is the budget that will control it." The budget people said, "It is the military authorization." And now they both say it is the appropriation. We are going from Winken to Blinken to Nod here, and I am afraid that there is not anywhere that we ever catch up with it. Each one is pointing to the other, and by the time we are through we are going to have $300 billion voted for defense unnecessarily, and it is not going to be anybody's fault, it is going to be 6 other committees. By the time we are through, the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries is going to be blamed for continuing to bust the budget for the Pentagon.

Maybe we will get some clarification from people. I was glad to hear the chairman of the Appropriations Committee say he does not intend to be bulldogged on this. But we have a budget, with the best efforts of our negotiators, because of the people with whom they had to negotiate, because they apparently said, "If you do not continue to fuel the Pentagon," and we got this from the President and we got it from his colleagues elsewhere, and we are told, apparently, by others, "If you do not continue to feed the Pentagon and give them far more than anybody else in percentage terms, in real terms, in the out years, in the in years, everywhere you can, then there will be no budget."

I do not think we should give in to that kind of extortion by the Pentagon.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2½ minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SCHUMER].

Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, I have heard the remarks of my friend and colleague, a gentleman greatly respected in this House, the gentleman from Massachusetts. And I would say to him and to my colleagues who have been with me on so many battles in the past that if someone had come to you in January and said to you that we will have a budget that does not touch entitlements, that actually raises every poor person's program by inflation, that does not touch Social Security, that does cut some domestic programs but in a way that all of our constituencies out there have said they can live with, because they have to bear some of the pain, and that came much closer to a freeze on defense—and I would remind the gentleman from Massachusetts that even the House-passed resolution was not to freeze, but much closer to a freeze than to the President's proposal—could we of this persuasion get that kind of budget? You would have said to me, "You're crazy. Take it if you can get it."

Well, the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has endeavored and labored and worked hard, and he has gotten there. I say to my friend from Massachusetts he ordered his hamburger medium rare. The hamburger came back medium. And instead of eating the hamburger, he sent it back to the kitchen. And that is going to leave a lot of people hungry, because the next hamburger is going to be well done.

The fact of the matter is, as all of us know, we do not have a majority in the Senate that are of our political thinking; we do not have a person in the White House who is of our thinking; we do not even have a majority in this House that is of our thinking. And given all of that, we have done very, very well.

It is easy to vote "no" and walk away. But I can assure my colleagues, particularly my colleagues who believe in the programs that I believe in, that this is the best we can do with having a budget. And if we do not have a budget, we will do considerably worse for the things we believe in.

I wish to engage in a brief colloquy with the chairman.

Mr. Chairman, is it true that reconciliation savings from public housing will cover financing only for those units which are currently in the pipeline?

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. That is correct.

Mr. SCHUMER. And as I understand it, this change in financing was insisted upon by the Senate conferees and that the conferees agreed that if the contemplated savings are not achieved by this change, the Banking Committee will not be forced to make reductions in other programs.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. That is also correct.

Mr. SCHUMER. In other words, the reconciliation procedures will not under any circumstances require further reductions to be made in housing programs by the House Banking Committee.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SCHUMER. I thank the chairman.

□ 1940

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BOULTER].

Mr. BOULTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, as a conferee, I just want to thank my chairman and my ranking minority member for not giving up. I strongly support this budget resolution.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. FRENZEL].

Mr. FRENZEL. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the heroic efforts of the gentleman from Massachusetts in opposition to the conference report.

Mr. Speaker, here we are again. The House is considering a budget resolution after it has passed most of its appropriations bills. It is, regrettably, our custom to vote heroically for a budget resolution after we have spent most of the money.

The resolution does no bad. Neither did any of its predecessors. It is supposed to make great savings from the deficit baseline. So did its predecessors.

The resolution calls for a deficit reduction of $55 billion. That's a bigger claim for savings than some previous budgets, but the Republic's path to outrageous deficits and debt has been paved with the same kinds of claims.

The resolution still contains unreal revenues. Not only is the growth assumption egregiously overstated at 4 percent, but the multibillion-dollar offshore oil revenue which everyone agrees cannot be achieved is still included. The administration has revalued its growth prediction to 3 percent, and the consensus of leading economist is even lower. I can't tell how much the revenue is inflated but surely the figure exceeds $10 billion.

Expenses on the other hand are understated, often just as egregiously as revenues are overstated. Interest assumptions are even harder to pin down than growth rates. My judgment tells me our scenario is unreasonably optimistic.

Only once in the history has the Budget Act actually worked. The year was 1981. The fiscal year was 1982. The secret was reconciliation. One of the allegedly strong points of this resolution is that it has more reconciled savings than our original bill. But, only $18 billion of the claimed spending reductions of over $50 billion are reconciled.

But, worse than the small amount of reconciliation, I fear that committees of jurisdictions will not carry out their reconciliation instructions. The House has no way to enforce reconciliation, and the precedent is that it has tolerated, or even encouraged, noncompliance. My own committee has plenty of room to maneuver without expense reductions, and is unlikely to reduce one dime of the costs within its jurisdiction. Other committees may be worse. They usually are.

And let us consider the defense function. Our brave managers have raised the House's budget authority by a mere $10 billion. They have cleverly kept the outlay figure down, but that is pure illusion. Once budget authority is appropriated, it is always spent, and usually sooner than later.

I believe the defense figure is too high to encourage sound management. The public's lack of confidence in the Department of Defense did not occur out of thin air. Another increase this year will simply be a disincentive for the Pentagon to improve its procedures. The defense number is simply too high. It, like all the spending, is simply too much.

The dead giveaway that there is no intention to realize any actual saving is that committee allocations will not even be published until late in September. By then the House will have passed the rest of its appropriations bills. It is no act of rashness to predict another $220 billion deficit for fiscal year 1986.

The other dead giveaway is the fact that the House has already appropriated $19 billion more than its 1985 budget called for. History verifies the House's fiscal inclination. History also verifies the House's attempt to cover up its profligacy with unreal budgets.

I acknowledge the hard work of our managers. I admit the resolution is better than the House's first resolution. But I charge that it is inadequate, that it is a continuation of the old shell game. I wish I could take it seriously, but I cannot.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BROWN].

Mr. BROWN of Colorado. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, this budget calls for higher spending, not lower spending. It proposes a $21.3 billion increase in fiscal year 1986. Adjusting for inaccurate assumptions, the measure will result in a $40 to $50 billion increase. Tax revenues in the resolution are overestimated by $10 to $30 billion. In reality this budget resolution does not make significant reductions in our deficit. It ignores the problems rather than solving them.

Some have said that it is all we can pass. I don't accept that. Our Nation and our freedoms are too important to be allowed to be drowned in a sea of red ink.

Who here can honestly say that we cannot go 1 year without increasing spending? We can and we must do better than condemn our country and our people to economic stagnation brought on by ever-rising Federal deficits.

The bottom line is that Congress needs to reduce the deficit. This budget plan assumes savings that are not there, revenue that will not materialize and deficit reduction that is imaginary.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from New Hampshire [Mr. GREGG].

Mr. GREGG. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I do want to rise with others and congratulate the Budget Committee on their hard work. But I must take some exception to the final product. Although we have not had a great deal of time to study this issue, it does seem to me that the only substantive and hard cut in this budget, not the only one, but one of the few, is defense.

In fact, if you look at the economic assumptions, it looks like, as the gentleman from Colorado just mentioned, that there is at least a $20 billion overestimate in taxes. There is about an $8 billion estimate of savings and income security, and one has to wonder how that can occur when you are already adding within the categories of income security $400 million for the nutrition program, and there are no other cuts in the income security area.

There is also an assumption that agriculture will be reduced by approximately $8 billion. Now, I think that anybody who has been on this floor over the last few months and watched what has happened when agricultural bills have come to this floor has to conclude that that assumption is hopeful at best.

It appears to me that as I look at this, that what this budget does is basically maintain the deficit at $200 or $200-plus billion. It is, unfortunately, illusory. At best it is a Band-Aid over an open wound in an artery, and we need a tourniquet on that artery.

We simply cannot afford to put off and thus amplify what will definitely be a day of reckoning if we do not act affirmatively on the budget at this time, and make some substantial cuts, not only in the defense area, but also in the social spending areas.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Members that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has 9 minutes remaining; the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] has 10 minutes remaining; and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has 5½ minutes remaining.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the distinguished gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY].

Mr. MACKAY. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I speak for a group and I speak to a group who supported the Leath amendment, who may themselves think that this has not gone far enough. Certainly, that has been expressed by Mr. BROWN and Mr. GREGG.

I would say to them only this: That this issue is moving very rapidly. The issue we have to face tonight is whether our conferees got all that we could get this time. I believe that we are not at the end; we are at the beginning of this issue. I believe we will be back and I urge an affirmative vote on this. Our choice is this or nothing. I think nothing is not acceptable.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 3 minutes to the gentlewoman from Illinois [Mrs. MARTIN].

Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, the conference is finally over. Most of us were under 25 years old when it started, and we are quite grateful to be here tonight. The leadership in this conference deserve the credit they are getting.

May I point how varied the conferees were. There are the redneck radicals from the right, such as myself. Liberals. The other body, for whom it was often distasteful to sit with any of us, I suspect. People with strong ties to unions; people who believe that America should be run like a business, and yet somehow a majority of these people unwillingly have come together to say we believe you should vote for this conference.

Parents always love their children; it is one of the great miracles, because sometimes a person's babies are not terribly attractive. As a politician, you cannot tell a parent, "Good grief, that kid has got your uncle's nose and it looks dreadful." Or, "For heaven's sake, the child looks as if it is already 80 years old; send it back." In fact, one learns to look at this child that the parents adore and say, "My, what an interesting-looking baby."

I would suggest to you that this is a very interesting-looking budget. That it is not beautiful, that it is not one that through the years will be held up as an ideal, but it is still produced, a baby, that should have its life, and should be supported.

It does not have what I want in it. It does not have nearly enough. Its parameters were too narrow. The egos were often too great, and it is still the best we could do and, frankly, better than I thought we would ever get 4 months ago.

It is not a great "yes" vote, but a "no" vote is totally irresponsible for the future.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. FAZIO].

Mr. FAZIO. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman from Massachusetts yield me an additional minute?

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from California.

Mr. FAZIO. I thank both gentlemen for yielding me this time.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to lend my voice to those who were saying that the responsible vote is an "aye" vote for this budget conference report. I would like to direct my colleagues who have some doubt, some question about whether or not we have stood behind the domestic spending programs that I know are so essential to the economic recovery and the personal health and safety of so many areas and individuals.

There is no question that when this budget was introduced this year, it was a blueprint for the demolition of the domestic state of this country. We have not gone along with that blueprint. There were 22 programs proposed for elimination; we have only eliminated 6. UDAG grants, Community Development Block Grants, EDA. Tennessee Valley, Appalachian Regional Commission still exist, agreed, at lower levels, to help the people of those areas who need it desperately.

Veterans programs have been maintained. Mr. FORD would indicate his support for this bill because we have not interfered with his committee's oversight responsibilities in Federal retirement. We have, I think, acted responsibly in the context of continuing, I am afraid, the process of dismantling domestic programs. We had cut some $176 billion prior to this year under the Reagan administration in domestic programs; we continue that.

We had added $112 billion in defense, and I am afraid we continue that, but we do it in the most modest way. In addition, we have kept the Appropriations Committee's ability to make the changes that it understands to be basic and fundamental.

I ask with all that in consideration for an "aye" vote.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. OBERSTAR].

□ 1950

Mr. OBERSTAR. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I want to join in the litany of praise for Chairman GRAY and the work that he has done in bringing this budget through the maze that it has followed over many months and for preserving a number of programs that are important to the fabric of our society and to the structure of our economy.

The issue is not whether BILL GRAY has done a good job or not. The basic issue is whether or not this House should agree to a budget resolution that treats defense spending far more favorably than nondefense spending.

The conference agreement makes no cuts whatsoever in defense spending when we measure that item on the same scale as cuts in nondefense spending. All of the deficit reduction contained in the conference agreement comes from making further cuts in domestic programs, $10 billion more in defense, and nothing in this budget resolution says where we are going to pay for it. How are we going to cover that?

Instead, we are told that this issue will be put off when we consider the conference agreement on the military budget or when we take up the appropriation bill on military spending. That is the wrong forum in which to make this decision. That issue should be decided here in the context of this conference report on this budget where that issue ought to be debated.

The purpose of a budget is to resolve the matter of priorities, of national priorities that we want for this country. The House should not capitulate now on the theory that we can fight this issue out later in the appropriations process. That pushes it off to the wrong forum at the wrong time in the wrong decisionmaking process. Now is the time to say "no" to the largest increase in military spending we have had in the history of this country. This is the wrong budget at the wrong time.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PORTER].

Mr. PORTER. I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, tonight, having lost the war, we are declaring victory and going home.

The conference report presented is too little and far too late. The budget agreement that has emerged from the conference is 2½ months after deadline. And it claims to include savings which are hollow, meaningless, and not backed by binding reconciliation.

About 2 weeks ago, Mr. Speaker, eyeball to eyeball, both sides of the conference committee blinked and approved spending increases for both defense and Social Security. This tentative agreement, confirmed tonight, tightens and screws on our children who will have to pay these further deficits this Congress is about to pile on them.

In January of this year, as part of a comprehensive plan to drastically reduce the Federal deficit, I called for an across-the-board budget freeze as a first step. The reponse from my constituents was overwhelmingly favorable. Many Social Security recipients wrote me saying that they would willingly accept a COLA freeze if Congress also froze defense spending and all other Federal functions.

Unfortunately, the conference did not have the guts to truly tackle the monster on runaway Federal spending. Instead, what they have placed before the House is only a few bricks in the rubble of the budget process. That process has actually worked only once since it was established 11 years ago; 1981 was the only year this body had the courage to adopt full binding reconciliation. Unfortunately, this budget, like almost all the others, fails to include significant binding reconciliation, and the savings shown will evaporate as they have so often before.

Furthermore, the lateness of this budget make it largely irrelevant. Waiting and waiting for budget courage, the Appropriations Committee finally went ahead with the appropriations process without a budget and has already completed action on the majority of its bills. What are we supposed to do, go back and rewrite them with only 20 working days before the end of the fiscal year? The only purpose a vote in favor of this resolution will serve is to falsely justify the last 6 months of wasted time spent on a measure rammed through the House at the last possible moment after all the signficant cuts had been compromised and stripped away.

Mr. Speaker, many, however, have worked hard on the package and do deserve praise and I commend the House Republicans, particularly, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] for their hard work. My greatest praise, however, I must reserve for my Republican colleagues in the other body and especially its exemplary majority leader, for their truly courageous efforts to solve America's deficit crisis. If we are ever to save our children's economic future, we will need to make the kind of hard choices they were willing to make.

The bottom line, Mr. Speaker, is this: The "compromise" agreed to in this resolution was "I get mine and you get yours" and the kids get the bill.

The two largest items, defense and Social Security, each get substantial increases over the 3-year period and the remaining functions supposedly will carry the burden of the deficit reduction claimed, but there is little reconciliation to force them to do so.

When the appropriation process finally ends, little actual savings will have been achieved and huge deficits will remain which will be passed on to our children to bear, their legacy from a Congress, like so many others which preceded it, unable to show the courage, unwilling to make the hard choices needed to protect them.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 1 minute.

Mr. Speaker, just to keep the record straight, let us not confuse the figures. Defense is taking more out of these cuts in this proposal than any other function. It represents one-third of the budget, taking half of the cuts.

Actually, there is $27.5 billion being taken out of 050. Did the gentleman understand that—$27.5 billion? How much is coming out of nondefense, discretionaries? The figure happens to be $22.3 billion.

So let us not confuse the figures. Let us have them straight.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself 20 seconds.

Mr. Speaker, I just want to respond to the gentleman from Ohio that $27 billion is not coming out of anything except Caspar Weinberger's fantasy. The reason they can talk about how much they are reducing it is that they pumped it up so incredibly that it looks like six incredible hulks.

If you measure it in a rational way from what has been spent, in fact it is going to get great increases and great increases and great increases.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania yields 30 seconds to the gentleman from California [Mr. MILLER], a member of the committee.

Mr. MILLER of California. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, and Members, first of all I, too, would like to commend the chairman of this committee because it is very clear under the circumstances in which we had to operate, with the intervention of the White House, the missteps in the Senate, I do not believe there is another chairman in this House who could have pulled this budget together in the fair and equitable fashion that Chairman GRAY did. I think we all owe him a great deal of indebtedness, whether or not we are going to vote for this budget. I think he has made the House proud and I think he has provided the kind of leadership that has allowed the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] and others to work with this in a fashion that we have never seen before.

Mr. Speaker, I would hope my colleagues would vote for this budget. It provides for protection and for increases for poor people's programs. If you do not like the defense figure, the first week in September you will get to come back and vote on the authorization bill and the amendment to cut it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] has 7 minutes remaining, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] has 7½ minutes remaining, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has 2 minutes and 40 seconds remaining.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP].

Mr. KEMP. I thank the gentleman for yielding this time to me.

Mr. Speaker, it has been said before but it needs to be said again that there is no more controversial, no more comprehensive economic statement that we are going to make in this body than that which we make tonight.

It is impossible to get a compromise in which we can have people on both sides of the aisle and both sides of Capitol Hill all agreeing on everything. I want to say, as the previous speaker, a partisan Democrat, said in paying tribute to Chairman GRAY, let me say to my colleagues on the conservative side of the aisle that it would have been absolutely impossible to reach a compromise, to reach a budget that can bring down the deficit to 2½ percent of GNP by 1988, to bring down the deficit by $57.5 billion in 1986, or almost $280 billion over 3 years had it not been for the efforts of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA] and the efforts of the gentleman from New Mexico, the chairman PETE DOMENICI.

But the Congress is not run by DEL LATTA or PETE DOMENICI; it is run by those of us on both sides of the aisle who have very strong feelings about defense, as this Member does, as does Mr. LATTA and the members of our committee.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania deserves credit and I want to stand up here publicly and tell my colleagues, as one who has been working with him over a number of weeks and months, he has kept his word, he has worked hard, he has been fair, he has been straight, he has protecterd programs that were important to the poor, to the handicapped, to the indigent, to the cities, while at the same time recognizing that there were things on our side of the aisle that were incredibly important not just to the Republicans but to the White House.

This has been an incredible experience. This is the first budget where I have stood up in the well of the House and felt emotionally or subjectively that I wanted to support it, and I want to say to my colleagues, if you are not for raising taxes or cutting Social Security, you have no reason to oppose this compromise. If you want to cut Social Security, if you want to cut the COLA's, if you want to raise taxes, if you want to balance the budget off the backs of the working men and women of America or the poor, then vote against it.

But if you believe responsibly in bringing about a budget compromise that unites the center right and the center left of the political spectrum, then it seems to me you owe it to yourself and your community and your country and the economy, the people you represent, to join those of us on both sides of the aisle from different political parties, at different ends of the Capitol, to support it.

I want to emphasize one thing once again. There is $57 billion of deficit savings, with strong efforts made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and other leaders of the Democratic Party to give us on the Republican side what we think is important, enforcement procedures and reconciliation—not everything that we wanted, nor did we give everything that they wanted to the other side.

This is a very important statement to the financial markets that we are serious about bringing down the deficit, which is about 4½ to 5 percent of GNP today, down to about 2½ percent of GNP over the next 3 years, with any luck at all from the Central Bank of the United States which could be and should be lowering its interest rates in the short term and midrange right now.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I would be glad to yield to my friend from Michigan, who has had such an important contribution to make by being one of the leaders of the 92 Group.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the gentleman from New York [Mr. KEMP] for his statement tonight. No budget could be a disaster tonight. We need this budget. I do not think there are $55 billion of real savings here; I think it is more like 38 or 39, but that is a step in the right direction. I want to credit the Group 92 for putting a budget here with hard numbers approved by CBO, delivered and introduced on time. And to my task force, I want to congratulate them for being constructive and trying to build that coalition to achieve our national goals, addressing the deficit.

Mr. KEMP. I want to say to my friend from Michigan that I totally agree with his statement about the responsibility of the 92 Group for helping fashion the final product, but I want to assure him, from this gentleman's standpoint and that of other Members of the Republican Party who served with him on his budget, all of us are convinced there is a lot more than $38 billion here, and with any luck at all, with a little more growth and lower interest rates, we are going to have a much better budget picture in 1986, much better than has been predicted by those who say the sky is falling and we are going to hell in a handbasket. We are not unless we let it happen, and what Chairman GRAY and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. DEL LATTA, have helped us to do is to make sure that we pass a policy choice here tonight that can help us move in the right direction.

Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, it is evident that much agonizing and many hours of work have gone into the budget conference report. I would like to commend the conferees for their effort and the production of a conference report prior to the recess.

In closely following the budget process this year as chairman of the 92 Group's Task Force on the Budget, in which we developed a budget of our own, it also is evident that in the House-passed budget resolution and in this conference report there are contained many of the proposals that the 92 Group Budget Task Force worked out over 4 months of lengthy deliberations and that were contained in the 92 Group's budget plan, "A Blueprint for Balance." That plan, an early historic document in that it was the only budget, I might add, that was introduced into the House in compliance with the time parameters of the Budget Act, was—in the opinion of the 92 Group—the most fair and equitable way to accomplish what should be our No. 1 priority, reducing the Federal deficit. I would like to commend the 92 Group Budget Task Force for its tireless work and the hard political decisions its members made in adopting the document, a document which represents a spirit of open-mindedness and constructive compromise.

I would also like to commend the House Budget Committee and the budget conferees for recognizing the value of and real and attainable savings contained in the 92 Group budget resolution and for incorporating its proposals into their documents.

Personally, and somewhat reluctantly, I rise in support of the budget conference report. My reluctance stems from reservations which the 92 Group of House Republicans and which I have concerning the report: First, its high defense budget authority figure and the lack of linkage between defense budget authority and outlay numbers. The conference report takes the other body's budget authority figure of $302.5 billion and the House outlay figure of $293.5 billion. Even if you take into account an apparent slowing in spend-out rates at the Pentagon, outlays still are a function of not only past years' budget authority figures but current year's as well. I'm not sure that the relationship contained in the conference report is valid. As for the higher defense budget authority number—some $10 billion higher than what this body approved in the House-passed defense authorization—we plan to fight that out on the floor when the defense authorization conference report and defense appropriations bills are considered, to try to keep defense spending at, or as close as possible to a freeze level; second, we are concerned about the lack of specifics Members have in their hands in terms of the policy guidelines that achieve the projected outlay savings contained in the conference report. It is unfortunate that this is the case. Because of that, we are considering a budget for its own sake. But, certainly, it does contain some savings. It does contain some guidelines. But how real those savings are, at this point, we don't know. That is unfortunate.

We in the 92 Group were conscientious about having the Congressional Budget Office analyze all our outlay savings proposals. We have real, attainable, and credible savings in the 92 Group budget proposal. For credibility is of the utmost importance if guidelines are to be followed. But, in the interest of providing at least some guidelines and of showing the American people we are concerned about deficit reduction, at this late hour, and despite the reservations I've expressed, I ask the support of the Members of this House for the budget conference report and urge its approval.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KEMP. I am glad to yield to my friend, the gentleman from California.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for yielding, and I want to join him in his commendations of Chairman GRAY and DEL LATTA and also Senator DOMENICI on the the other side. But I also want to say to colleagues that the gentleman in the well deserves a great deal of credit for what is happening right now.

Mr. KEMP. I do not want to lose any votes on the left side of the aisle.

Mr. LAGOMARSINO. I think without the work of the gentleman, we might not have been here tonight.

Mr. KEMP. I appreciate the words of my friend, the gentleman from California.

Let me just conclude, Mr. Speaker, by saying that BILL GRAY deserves not only the thanks but the admiration of every Member on both sides of the aisle, as does DEL LATTA, and I thank them both for the pleasure of working with them.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has 2 minutes and 40 seconds remaining.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself just 10 seconds to say that I now understand what the word, "reconciliation" means in the budget process, because we have just seen the reconciliation of the gentleman from New York and the senior Senator from Kansas.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MORRISON].

Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding time to me.

Before saying anything further, I would like to join my colleagues in commending Chairman GRAY for a good job and a hard job. But I regretfully rise in opposition to this budget.

If there is going to be $57 billion in savings in outlays, they are only going to be achieved with a lower budget authority figure in defense. Otherwise the figure that is being used is a promise that cannot be kept.

A yes vote tonight, while it may seem responsible, will open the door for losing this opportunity for saving the money we have to save this year and in the years to come. The plain fact is that this budget resolution, by giving in completely to the Senate on budget authority, makes the only real decision with respect to the defense spending. It is a decision that we are going to regret in the future if we do not make a strong statement against it tonight.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. FROST], a member of the committee.

Mr. FROST. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the budget, a product that I believe this House can be proud of. It gives us the opportunity to demonstrate tonight that this House can govern, that it can pass a budget, and that it can answer the pleas of the country that we get on with the country's business.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 30 seconds to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY].

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise not only to pay tribute to the chairman of my Budget Committee, but also to indicate my desire to vote with him.

I do so for three principal reasons, and I think this is one point that has not been made this evening. That is that the conference committee report recommends a spending level for next year of $6 billion less than what the President asked the Congress to spend. Not only that, there is about $30 billion less than what the President requested over the next 3 years.

The next point that I think has not been emphasized is the fact that this conference committee report recommends a deficit of $50 billion less than what the President wanted when he offered his budget to the Congress.

Those points need to be made and made clear to the American public because the Congress is making an effort to get spending under control, and I believe this conference committee report is a great step in the right direction.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY] has expired.

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, I ask the gentleman for 30 additional seconds.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield an additional 15 seconds to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SLATTERY].

Mr. SLATTERY. Mr. Speaker, the last point I would like to make to my colleagues on the left who are concerned about the level of defense spending is this: let me just remind them that we are talking about spending ceilings, not spending floors. We will have an opportunity to come back here and vote on that defense level and determine whether we are going to spend $292.5 billion or whether we are going to spend $303 billion. Let us keep that in mind. We are talking about spending ceilings, not spending floors.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FRANK] has a minute and a half remaining.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield 45 seconds to the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS].

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, if the question here were on the capacity and integrity of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BILL GRAY, whom we all respect and admire, this budget would pass unanimously; but it is not on him that we will be voting. It is on the issue itself. It is on the budget.

I voted for the budget the first time around. But as it has re-emerged from conference budget it is really a betrayal of everything we have been talking about. We are talking about a budget which, because of the $10 billion defense increase, is going to be driving the domestic programs for the poor and for the middle class to be cut this year and next year and the year after. Before long, we will be asked to take that $10 billion out of the hides of the American people.

We do not have to play Ronald Reagan's game of destroying essential programs enacted for the benefit of the people of this country. We should not be doing it. We ought to vote no on this budget. Let's defeat it. Then let the Budget Committee come back with one that does service to the American people. In that way we will be doing our job properly.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MONTGOMERY].

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this conference report, and I would like also to compliment the very able chairman of the Budget Committee, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY], and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA], the ranking minority member, and especially the gentleman from Texas, Mr. MARVIN LEATH, who is a former member of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs for his work. I commend the other members of the conference committee as well.

The Nation's veterans have been treated fairly, in my opinion, in this budget report. Let me say as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs that we will have to find $1.1 billion in savings over 3 years, and this is not smoke and mirrors. But I think we can find these savings without really hurting the basic benefits for veterans and their dependents.

The numbers that have come back in function 700 for veterans are close to the numbers that passed in the House, and I again want to commend the conferees for that. The veterans have been protected in this conference report, and I stand here fully in support of this report.

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. WEAVER].

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I rise in strong opposition to the budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, the budget resolution before the House is a charade, a farce; it would be comic if it were not tragic. I do not blame the House Budget Committee and its chairman. Only three areas exist in which the staggering, gruesome, obscene deficits can be dealt with. They are the military, Social Security, and taxes. The House has refused to touch Social Security, the other body and the President refused to deal with the military, and the President refuses to deal with taxes. So the Budget Committee never had a chance.

We are heading for disaster, for a collapse in our economy, a depression that will make the 1930's look like a garage sale. Our pathetic attempts to deal with the gross idiocy of the deficits only illuminate the tragic scene about to occur in our great Nation.

The real culprit in the budget debacle is the President. He refuses to deal with reality and is living in economic fantasy. His refusal to pay for the military spending he has exploded into the atmosphere of this country is the single most devastating policy to come from the White House in our era.

When the Republican leadership of the other body brought forth an oil import fee and other aspects which in their small way attempted to deal with reality, the President torpedoed those leaders of his own party.

I vote against this budget resolution because I refuse to endorse the charade, the falseness, the unreality inside it, wrapped in a ribbon of rhetoric though it be.

□ 2010

Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, I yield my remaining 30 seconds to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, we are operating under a budget now, we adopted it 2 weeks ago. The question tonight is, Should we substitute the budget before you for the budget we are now operating under? Both budget resolutions call for practically the same amount of cuts, $56 billion or $57 billion in 1986.

The question is, Which one do you prefer? This one increases the military function $10 billion, takes it out of other programs, including Medicare, agriculture, small business, and several other programs. It also means abandoning the concept of a freeze at no more than the 1985 level.

I say that we would be better off under the resolution we are now operating under. The Appropriations Committee has been operating under it now for 3 weeks. We have done a pretty good job and let us not change in the middle of the stream here and go to a budget resolution that I think is inferior to what we now have.

Mr. LATTA. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LOTT].

Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, I would like to start off by commending the distinguished chairman of the Budget Committee. The fact of the matter is whether you agree with what he has done in this product here tonight, he has handled this whole process masterfully and I admire the work he had done.

I also want to commend our ranking member, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LATTA], for the work he has done and the conferees for the work they have done in the last 3 days.

The truth of the matter is the conference on this budget resolution did not even begin until 3 days ago. If our friends in the other body had gotten down to serious negotiations in the trenches, where they should have been, giving and taking a little bit a month ago, we could have done this before now and we might have gotten a much better budget resolution; but in spite of that, I think a good job has been done. Oh, it is not everything I would like to have. From my viewpoint, I think it cuts too much out of defense and it does not cut enough out of domestic spending programs, but we have got a pretty good budget here tonight and I urge my colleagues on this side of the aisle, on both sides of the aisle, to vote for it.

Have you noticed tonight across the aisle on both sides we have people that agree and disagree, Republicans and Democrats. Do you know what that indicates to me? It is probably a pretty good budget. We have a got a chance here for the first time in a long time, maybe the first time, to have a genuinely bipartisan budget resolution. Let us not miss that opportunity.

Now, what are the options? What if we defeat this here tonight? How silly are we going to seem if we walk away from this, throw our hands up in the air and go home and say, "Well, what the heck, it wasn't all I wanted, so I said, no, thanks."

I will tell you what some of the options are—no budget resolution, the collapse of the budget process and when we come back some of you that think that it does not cut enough out of defense, well, it may go the other way from what you think.

One of the options will be that some of our friends around the city might say, "Well, wait a minute. Maybe we ought to do something with Social Security."

Again, how many times are we going to hear that? How many times is that going to be back on the table?

So to my friends on this side of the aisle, you think tax increases are gone for the rest of the year or forever? Forget it. If we do not pass the budget resolution here tonight, let me tell you, tax increases are going to be back on the table.

It is time to get serious about this. It does do some good things. There are $68 billion in reconciliation here. That is more than we had in the House resolution when it originally passed. It only had $37 billion. That is more than the gentleman from Ohio had in his original bill; so there are real reconciliation savings here.

There are other features that are good. It terminates four programs. It ought to terminate a lot more, but it terminates four. It reduces outlays for Medicare. It eliminates some of the phony savings; so there are real important things here, but the important thing, in my opinion, is if we walk away from this, what is the perception? The perception will be very negative, that we could not do it.

Some people say, well, it is not $55 billion or $56 billion in savings, it is only $39 billion. The last time I checked buckets on the Mississippi, $39 billion was not chicken feed. I would rather have $39 billion in savings than no savings; so think about the perception, what it does to the financial markets.

Also, most importantly, think about the economy and if you are thinking about the economy, adopt this budget resolution.

Mr. Speaker, I commend the people that have worked to get us this far tonight.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GEPHARDT].

Mr. GEPHARDT. Mr. Speaker, let me add my voice to those who have praised the gentleman from Pennsylvania, BILL GRAY, for a job well done. He has done this job as well as it can be done.

Mr. Speaker, if you are thinking of voting against this budget, just think of two things that this vote means. First, if you vote against the conference report, you are saying that you are in favor of a deficit for 1986 of $229 billion, rather than one of $171 billion; and by 1988 you are willing to have a deficit of $244 billion, instead of a deficit of $112 billion. That is what the vote is about.

Second, it is about faith. If we do not pass this budget tonight, people all over the world and all over this country are going to lose faith in where our economy is going. We have a $150 billion trade deficit. The Third World countries that are in debt to the United States hang in the balance on whether or not we pass this budget. The American people and others are lending their support to this.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from California [Mr. PANETTA], a former member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. PANETTA. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the budget resolution and obviously join in commending both sides for the work that was done here, particularly Chairman GRAY for the work that he did.

No one questions that we face a major crisis in the deficit. We are bleeding. It is a cancer that is bleeding and bleeding badly and if it is allowed to continue, frankly, it is going to destroy all our priorities.

This resolution is not a cure for that cancer, no one is saying that it is; but when you are bleeding badly, you need first aid. You need a tourniquet and this resolution is a step in that direction to try to protect some of the priorities we care about and to try to achieve some of the savings.

I wish the White House had joined with the Congress in developing a common package to deal with this problem that faces taxes, faces entitlements, and faces defense. That did not happen; so we tried to work with the resolution that the leadership in the Congress was able to put together.

It is precisely because this is a crisis that we cannot afford to walk away from this resolution, because if we walk away from this resolution, we walk away from that crisis.

Support the budget resolution.

Mr. GRAY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, to close out the debate on this issue, I yield the balance of the time to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. WRIGHT], the majority leader, the ranking member of the Budget Committee.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for one point?

Mr. WRIGHT. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HORTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I want to point out that this budget resolution does include full funding for 1986 for revenue sharing. I want to commend the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the other members of the committee for arranging that. That is very important.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from New York.

This is not a perfect resolution, Mr. Speaker. In an imperfect world, by imperfect creatures, we deal with imperfect works. Just so, we have an imperfect resolution in the sense that it does not satisfy anyone completely, and yet it happens to be the very best that we could achieve under the circumstances.

Let us just ask ourselves if it is not a lot better than inaction. This budget resolution, achieved through the bipartisan cooperation to a degree that I have never seen before on a budget resolution in the entire history of this process, reduces the deficit projected by President Reagan by $57 billion for the coming fiscal year and by some $279 billion in the next 3 fiscal years.

Now, those reductions in deficits are worth securing, if you believe as I believe that it is just fundamentally dishonest and wrong to continue to live on a credit card economy, piling upon the backs of our children and grandchildren the responsibility of paying for things that we will have used up and worn out before they came of age.

Yes, it would have been nice, highly desirable, if we had been able to achieve greater deficit reductions. Bear in mind, however, that we have achieved these by the historic process of consensus. We have achieved them without breaking our promise to the Social Security recipients or any of the other retirees of this country.

We have achieved them without increasing taxes or adding any new taxes.

We have done so without yielding to some of the demands on the part of the other body that we should impose such things as user fees upon first-term purchasers of homes, or that we would make it more difficult for young Americans of modest economic circumstances to get a college education.

We have done it by freezing domestic spending, by very nearly freezing military spending, allowing a modest $15 billion increase next year over this year's expenditure level.

I know there are some who feel that $302 billion is too much. But let me suggest this: These figures are ceilings. There is no requirement that the ceilings be reached. The requirement simply is that they may not be breached, and it is altogether possible that in that level of spending, and in other levels of spending we may be able to achieve still greater reductions.

If we do so while still maintaining our compassion and our responsibility to those less fortunate in our society, as the chairman and the ranking minority member and the members of our committee have insisted they do, then we will have performed a service worthy to be remembered. And we will have performed a service to our particular time and our particular moment of history.

For those reasons I urge that we vote resoundingly for this resolution.

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, I rise in reluctant opposition to this conference report on the budget resolution for fiscal 1986. I realize the heroic efforts made by the conferees, and I commend Chairman GRAY for his attempts to achieve a budget that slows the growth of our budget deficits without hurting many vitally important programs.

We all know what the problem is—the deficit. We all know there are no easy answers and no perfect answers. I believe the issue that we must vote on today is whether this conference report is an acceptable answer to our budget problems. Many Members have said that, although this budget is not perfect, the responsible thing to do is to vote for the budget that the conference has reported. On the contrary, I believe that the responsible vote is to reject this conference report and its $10 billion increase for defense.

Since the beginning of this year, a bipartisan group of Members concerned about the deficit has advocated an across-the-board freeze as the first step toward dealing with the deficit problem. A freeze would only slow the growth of the deficit, but it seems the only practical answer to our problems. I have voted on more than dozen occasions this year to freeze budget authority and appropriations in fiscal 1986 at the 1985 level. These have been hard choices, votes cast against programs I believe in.

The House has also voted on numerous occasions to freeze spending at this year's level. On May 23, 1985, I joined the majority of my colleagues in supporting the first budget resolution, House Concurrent Resolution 152. This House budget resolution would freeze fiscal 1986 defense spending at the fiscal 1985 level of $292.6 billion. The House upheld this position when it voted 301 to 115 to reduce the defense authorization bill by $10 billion in order to bring it into line with the House budget resolution.

Recently, when it seemed that conflicts between the Senate and the President might prevent passage of a legally binding budget, we in the House took the extraordinary step of voting to make the budget resolution we passed in May binding upon all of our appropriations bills. This vote reaffirmed yet again our commitment to freezing spending.

Despite these demonstrations of House intent, this budget conference report permits budget authority for defense spending to increase to $302 billion in fiscal 1986. There is no way of getting around the fact that this money will eventually be spent, and that the defense budget will continue to increase faster than inflation in the outyears.

This increase in defense spending runs counter to several House-passed amendments in the defense authorization bill including: funding cuts of $3.2 billion for 22 weapons systems, an additional $1.2 billion in funding cuts for 12 MX missiles that the House decided were not needed to keep our country secure, and restrictions on funding for R&D activities relating to the strategic defense initiative.

Iowans of all political beliefs have told me that they support an across-the-board budget freeze which includes the military. I therefore reluctantly oppose this budget.●

● Mr. DIOGUARDI. Mr. Speaker, I rise today reluctantly, to vote for passage of the budget resolution. I voted against every other budget package brought before the House because some of those budgets contained inflated savings. As a certified public accountant, I did not feel that I could support such budgets. Today's budget contains similarily inflated savings. However, as an American, I could not return to my constituents and tell them that we in Congress had failed in our primary duty.

This budget contains no cuts in the Social Security Program, other retirement programs, or tax increases. If it did, I would vote against it.

This is the first step on a long road toward fiscal sanity. It is a hesitant step but one that must be taken. I do not support the cuts in mass transit embodied in this budget and the cuts in many programs vital to the people of my district, such as community development block grants. I am sure, however, that many other Congressmen will vote for this package in spite of the cuts that it contains which injure their constituents. This is not the best program, but it is much better than no program at all. The Nation stands at a precipice and must take a step back. I commend my colleagues on both sides of the aisle for the long hours they put in to produce this document. Thank you Mr. Speaker.●

● Mr. GROTBERG. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of Senate Concurrent Resolution 32, the conference report on the first concurrent budget resolution for fiscal year 1986. A dark cloud that has been hanging over the Capitol for the last few months is lifting now, as we pass this budget resolution. This is certainly probably the toughest budget compromise any Congress has ever had to hammer out since the inception of the Budget Act more than a decade ago. I congratulate the conferees, all of them, from both sides of the aisle and both Chambers in the Congress for their hard work and perseverence. The conference agreement is a fair one—no one is too unfairly gouged.

Specifically, I am pleased that $55 billion in hard budget cuts for fiscal year 1986 is achieved in this agreement. Second, the conferees have agreed to the Senate numbers for the defense function, allowing for 0-3-3 percent real growth during fiscal years 1986-87-88. Third, no changes have been made in the conference report dealing with cost-of-living adjustments for retirement programs. Fourth, as far as domestic cuts are concerned, I am pleased that the following has been accomplished by the conferees: Small Business Administration: $2.5 billion in savings—similar to the savings contained in the House Small Business Committee's reauthorization of the Small Business Administration; Amtrak: 15 percent cut in fiscal year 1986 as opposed to a 40-percent cut in the Senate-passed resolution achieved by fiscal year 1988; civilian pay: a 1-year pay freeze for Federal employees, saving $5 billion in fiscal year 1986; general revenue sharing: full funding for fiscal year 1986; termination of the program in fiscal year 1987; postal subsidies: 14 percent cut, instead of elimination as contained in the original Senate-passed version; and farm programs: $7.9 billion in cuts, versus $14.5 billion in Senate resolution.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the conferees have not approved any further taxes. We are not at the "last resort" yet, more spending cuts are needed. The conference report has teeth in it—the reconciliation process is alive and strong. I urge my colleagues to vote with me in support of this concurrent resolution. The voters in my district did not send me to Congress to do anything but reduce the $200 billion Federal budget deficits. This is a good start.●

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Subcommittee on Hospitals and Health Care of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I would like to commend the conferees on their successful completion of the conference on the first concurrent budget resolution. We all know the hard work and difficult choices involved in that endeavor. I am particularly pleased that the conferees have achieved for our Nation's veterans a budget that is very close to that passed by the House of Representatives. This restatement of our commitment to these brave men and women will be appreciated throughout our country.●

The SPEAKER. All time has expired.

Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAY] that the House recede from its amendment to Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 and concur with an amendment.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, I have a parliamentary inquiry. Is this the motion to recommit?

The SPEAKER. This is on the adoption of the motion to recede and concur.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 309, nays 119, not voting 5, as follows:

(1) IN GENERAL.—The amendments made by section 201 shall apply with respect to loans made after the date of enactment of this Act.

(2) SECTION 7872 NOT TO APPLY TO CERTAIN LOANS.—Section 7872 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall not apply to loans made on or before the date of the enactment of this Act to any qualified continuing care facility pursuant to a continuing care contract. For purposes of this paragraph, the terms "qualified continuing care facility" and "continuing care contract" have the meanings given such terms by section 7872(g) of such Code (as added by section 201).

(b) SECTION 202.—The amendment made by section 202 shall apply to contracts entered into after June 30, 1985, in taxable years ending after such date.

(c) SECTION 203.—The provisions of section 203 shall apply as if included in section 172(a) of the Tax Reform Act of 1984.

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOINT EXPLANATORY STATEMENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF CONFERENCE

The managers on the part of the House and the Senate at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 2475) to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to simplify the imputed interest rules of sections 1274 and 483, and for other purposes, submit the following joint statement to the House and the Senate in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the managers and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

The Senate amendment struck out all of the House bill after the enacting clause and inserted a substitute text.

The House recedes from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate with an amendment which is a substitute for the House bill and Senate amendment. The differences between the House bill, the Senate amendment, and the substitute agreed to in conference are noted below, except for clerical corrections, conforming changes made necessary by agreements reached by the conferees, and minor drafting and clarifying changes.

I. SIMPLIFICATION OF GENERAL IMPUTED INTEREST RULES

A. THE IMPUTED INTEREST RULES

Present laws

The imputed interest rate

Overview

Under the imputed interest rules, whether there is adequate stated interest in a debt instrument issued for nonpublicly-traded property is determined by reference to an appropriate "test rate." Where adequate interest is not stated, the imputed interest rules recharacterize a portion of the principal amount of the debt instrument for income tax purposes using a somewhat higher "imputation rate." The amounts of principal and interest as recharacterized will generally determine the seller's "amount realized" the buyer's basis in the property, and the amount of interest deductions and interest income for the buyer and the seller, respectively. The test rate for a debt instrument subject to the imputed interest rules is the rate in effect on the first day there is a binding contract for the sale or exchange of the property. All test and imputation rates are applied using semiannual compounding.

"Test rates" and "imputation rates"

General rule.—For sales or exchanges after December 31, 1984, of new property eligible for the investment credit, and for all sales or exchanges after June 30, 1985, the test rate is 110 percent of the "applicable Federal rate," and the imputation rate is 120 percent of the "applicable Federal rate."

Special rule for certain transactions before July 1, 1985.—For sales or exchanges after December 31, 1984, and before July 1, 1985, of property other than new property eligible for the investment credit, the test rate for "borrowed amounts" not exceeding $2 million is 9 percent. The test rate for borrowed amounts exceeding $2 million is a "blend" of 9 percent on the first $2 million and 110 percent of the applicable Federal rate (the "AFR") on the excess. In applying the $2 million limitation, all sales or exchanges that are part of the same transaction (or a series of related transactions) are treated as one transaction, and all debt instruments arising from the same transaction (or a series of related transactions) are treated as one debt instrument. The imputation rate for transactions during this same period is 10 percent for borrowed amounts up to $2 million and a blend of 10 percent and 120 percent of the AFR for borrowed amounts exceeding $2 million.

Other lower test and imputation rates.—The test rate for certain sales of homes and farm property after June 30, 1985, may not exceed 9 percent. This exception generally is limited to $250,000 for sales of homes and $1 million for sales of farms.

Applicable Federal rate.—The applicable Federal rate ("AFR") for a debt instrument is the lower of two published rates, one specified by the Tax Reform Act of 1984 (the "1984 Act") and one specified in temporary Treasury regulations. The statutory rate is based on the weighted average of yields over a period of six months for marketable obligations of the United States Government with a comparable maturity. Such rates are redetermined at six-month intervals for three categories of debt instruments: short-term maturity (three years or less), mid-term maturity (more that three years but not in excess of nine years), and long-term maturity (more than nine years).[1]

The rates determined under the temporary Treasury regulations are intended to reflect more accurately the current marketplace.[2] These rates are computed monthly

[1] Appropriate adjustments to the rates are to be made for application to debt instruments, the interest on which is wholly or partly exempt from tax (sec. 1288).

[2] The mechanism provided by the temporary regulations is intended to respond to a problem that may exist where interest rates decline after the period in which the Federal rates were determined.

using the same methodology described above, except that the rates reflect the average yields for one-month periods. In any month, the lower of the six-month rate or the monthly rate is the AFR. However, in cases where the monthly rate for either of the two preceding months is lower than the AFR for a particular month, the test rate for that month is the lower of the two such rates.

Exceptions.—The imputed interest rules do not apply to the obligor on a debt instrument incurred in the acquisition of personal use property, to the sale of certain patents, to certain annuities, and to transactions involving a sale of property with a sales price of not more than $3,000.

Method of accounting

Interest income and expense on debt instruments that are issued for property and that do not require the current payment of interest generally must be accounted for on the accrual method of accounting unless one of the following exceptions apply.

The accrual accounting requirement does not apply to (1) debt instruments issued for nonpublicly-traded property in transactions that are excepted from the imputed interest rules, (2) debt created in the sale of certain small businesses and farms, (3) debt created in the sale of a principal residence, and (4) debt created where the total payments are less than $250,000.

Assumptions

The assumption of the following debt obligations in connection with the sale or exchange of property, or the taking of property subject to such debt obligations, does not result in the application of the imputed interest rules, provided that the terms and conditions of the obligation are not modified in connection with the sale: (1) loans that were made before October 16, 1984, and assumed after December 31, 1984, in connection with the sale of property the purchase price of which does not exceed $100 million and (2) all loans assumed in connection with the sale of a residence, certain farms, and certain trades or businesses.

House Bill

The imputed interest rules

Overview

The House bill makes four basic changes to the imputed interest rates. First, the House bill generally reduces the test rate from 110 percent of the AFR to 100 percent of the AFR. Second, the House bill provides for lower imputed interest rates for certain smaller transactions. Third, the House bill provides that the imputation rate would be the same as the test rate (i.e., there would be no higher "penalty rate" where inadequate interest is stated). Finally, the House bill revises the computation of the AFR from a semiannual rate to a monthly rate.

Lower overall imputed interest rate

Under the House bill, the imputed interest rate (i.e., the test rate and the imputation rate) is reduced to 100 percent of the AFR.

Lower imputed interest rates for certain smaller transactions

The House bill places a limit on the imputed interest rates in smaller transactions that do not involve new property eligible for the investment tax credit. Under these rules, where the amount of seller financing [3] does not exceed $2 million, the House bill provides that the imputed interest rate cannot exceed 9 percent.[4] Where the amount of seller financing exceeds $2 million but is less than $4 million, the imputed interest rate cannot exceed a "blend" of 9 percent on a specified portion of the seller financing and the 100 percent of the AFR on the remainder. The portion of the seller-financing eligible for the 9 percent rate is equal to $2 million reduced dollar-for-dollar by the amount of seller financng over $2 million. Where the amount of seller financing is $4 million or more, the imputed interest rate is equal to 100 percent of the AFR. The $2 million and $4 million thresholds amounts will be indexed for inflation beginning after 1988.

For sales of new property eligible for the investment credit, the imputed interest rate for a seller-financed debt instrument is equal to 100 percent of the AFR regardless of the amount of seller financing.

Elimination of the penalty rate

Under the House bill, the imputation rate for a debt instrument that fails to state adequate interest will be the same as the test rate for that instrument. Accordingly, there is only one "imputed interest rate" for a transaction and there is no separate "penalty rate" where a debt instrument does not state adequate interest for any reason.

Determination of the applicable Federal rate

Under the House bill, the sole mechanism for determining the AFR will be the one currently prescribed by the temporary Treasury regulations. The alternative mechanism under present law for determining the six-month rate prescribed by the 1984 Act will be eliminated.

Under these revised rules, the AFR will be computed using the same methodology as under present law, except that the rates will be determined on a monthly basis and the rate will reflect the average yields for one-month periods. In addition, the AFR for a particular month may be used as the imputed interest rate for contracts for sales or exchanges entered into in that month and the next two succeeding months.

Regulatory authority

The House bill authorizes the Treasury Department to issue regulations specifying the circumstances in which transactions will be treated as "part of the same transaction or related transactions" for the purpose of applying the $2 million and $4 million limitations. The House bill also provides that the Treasury Department is authorized to issue regulations under which taxpayers would be permitted to demonstrate that, in appropriate circumstances, a rate lower than AFR provided by the statute, but calculated according to the same principles as the AFR,[5] is a more appropriate imputed interest rate for a particular debt instrument. Finally, the House bill authorizes the Treasury Department to issue regulations regarding the relationship of the imputed interest provisions to other Code provisions.

Method of accounting

The House bill provides that, in the case of certain debt instruments that otherwise would be subject to the accrual accounting requirement, interest income and expense arising from such debt instruments may be accounted for on the cash receipts and disbursements method of accounting. To be eligible for such treatment, (1) the stated principal amount of the debt instrument cannot exceed $2 million, (2) the debt instrument must arise from the sale of property by a cash-basis taxpayer who is not a dealer in the type of property sold, and (3) the lender and the borrower must jointly elect such treatment. A debt instrument meeting these requirements is to be known as a "cash-method debt instrument."

Special rules are provided relating to the treatment of taxpayers who are the successors to either the issuer or holder of a cash-method debt instrument. The Treasury Department is authorized to issue regulations prescribing rules to prevent abuses of the special treatment afforded to cash-method debt instruments.

Assumptions

Under the House bill, if an existing debt instrument is assumed in connection with the sale or exchange of property (or if the property is acquired subject to an existing debt instrument), the imputed interest rules will not apply to such existing debt instrument by reason of such assumption (or aquisition) unless either the terms of the existing debt instrument are modified in connection with the transaction or the nature of the transaction is changed.

Effective date

The provisions of the House bill relating to the amendment of the imputed interest rules are effective for sales or exchanges occurring after June 30, 1985.

Senate amendment

The imputed interest rules

The Senate amendment generally follows the House bill with certain modifications. Under the Senate amendment, in general, the amount of seller financing that would be eligible for the 9 percent rate is $2 million for all transactions where the amount of seller financing does not exceed $4 million. In transactions involving the sale of farm property or real property used in certain closely held trades or businesses, $2 million of seller financing would be eligible for the 9 percent rate, provided the total amount of seller financing did not exceed $9 million. Also under the Senate amendment, an imputed interest rate of 110 percent of the AFR would apply to any sale-leaseback transaction or any transaction involving a sales price in excess of $25 million. In addition, where the AFR exceeded 12 percent, the imputed interest rate for certain transactions would be limited to the sum of 12 percent and one-third of the excess of the AFR over 12 percent.

The authority granted to the Treasury Department to provide regulations that would permit taxpayers to prove that a lower imputed interest rate is appropriate would be effective as if it were contained in the 1984 Act.

Method of accounting

The Senate amendment is the same as the House bill.

Assumptions

The Senate amendment is the same as the House bill.

Conference agreement

The imputed interest rules

The conference agreement generally follows the House bill with the following modifications. Under the conference agreement, where the amount of seller financing does not exceed $2,800,000, the imputed interest rate generally may not exceed 9 percent. Where the amount of seller financing is greater than $2,800,000, the imputed interest rate is generally 100 percent of the AFR. An imputed interest rate of 110 percent of the AFR, however, applies to sale-leaseback transactions. Indexing of the $2,800,000 threshold for the 9 percent rate (and the $2 million threshold for cash-method debt instruments) begins after 1989.

[3] The amount of seller financing is measured by the stated principal amount of the seller-financed debt instrument.

[4] As under present law, all rates will be compounded semiannually.

[5] That is, rate that is calculated by reference to Treasury obligations with similar maturity.

The effective date of the regulatory authority relating to the use of a lower imputed interest rate is the same as in the Senate amendment. In this regard, the conferees intend that the regulatory authority be exercised in a manner so that the lower rate would be permitted only in circumstances where it can be demonstrated that both the rate recalculated based on the same principles as the AFR and the rate at which the borrower can borrow funds on an arm's length basis is lower than the AFR that otherwise would be applicable to the borrower's debt instrument. Further, it is intended that the rate permitted under the regulations would be not less than the borrower's arm's length borrowing rate.

The conferees understand that where a sale or exchange takes place after June 30, 1985, pursuant to a binding contract entered into on or before that date, the imputed interest rates for such a transaction are to be determined pursuant to the provisions of the conference agreement using the applicable Federal rates in effect on the date the binding contract was entered into. For example, if a seller executes a binding contract on March 15, 1985, with a buyer to purchase nonpublicly-traded property with seller financing of $3 million and the transaction is closed on July 15, 1985, the test rate is 100 percent of the AFR for March 15, 1985.

Under the conference agreement, the imputed interest rules will not be applied to the issuance or modification of certain specified debt instruments held by the New York State Mortgage Loan Enforcement and Administration Corporation provided such issuance or modification is in connection with the workout of such debt instruments and the principal amount of indebtedness resulting from such workout does not exceed the sum (as of the time of the workout) of the outstanding principal amount of the specified debt instrument and any arrearages thereon. The conferees understand that the rate of interest charged with respect to the arrearages shall be not less than the rate on the related loan. The conferees intend no inference in adopting this provision regarding the appropriate income tax treatment of such debt instruments or of other debt instruments in similar circumstances. Specifically, the conferees intend that no inferences be taken from the adoption of this provision that any arrangements existing prior to or resulting from these workout agreements is properly considered as debt for tax purposes.

Method of accounting

The conference agreement is the same as the House bill and the Senate amendment.

Assumptions

The conference agreement is the same as the House bill and the Senate amendment. The conferees are concerned about the extent to which the assumption rules apply when the terms of the debt are modified. The conferees expect that the Treasury Department will issue regulations, consistent with the purposes of these provisions, regarding the proper tax treatment of all parties in transactions where the terms and conditions of the obligation are modified or changed in connection with the transfer of property.

B. ACCELERATED COST RECOVERY SYSTEM

Present law

In general, domestic real property placed in service after March 15, 1984, and qualifying as recovery property, may be depreciated on an accelerated basis under ACRS over an 18-year period, under tables of recovery percentages prescribed by the Treasury Department. These tables reflect a "mid-month" convention for property placed in service after June 22, 1984. Taxpayers may also elect to depreciate such property on a straight-line basis over 18, 35, or 45 years. The recovery period under ACRS for low-income housing described in sections 1250(a)(1)(B) (i), (ii), (iii) or (iv) is 15 years and no mid-month convention is used.

Under transitional rules provided by the 1984 Act, property placed in service after March 15, 1984, pursuant to binding contracts entered into, or where construction was commenced by or for the taxpayer, prior to March 16, 1984, may be eligible for a 15-year recovery period. Special rules under the 1984 Act are also provided relating to components of real property placed in service prior to March 16, 1984, that are placed in service on or after that date.[6]

Under the House bill, the minimum recovery period for domestic real property qualifying as recovery property generally is increased from 18 years to 19 years. However, this change in the recovery period does not affect the ACRS provisions relating to low-income housing (the recovery period of which remains at 15 years).

The provision of the House bill relating to the ACRS recovery period for real property is generally effective for property placed in service after May 8, 1985. Transitional rules similar to those under the 1984 Act are provided for property that is placed in service after May 8, 1985, and before January 1, 1987, where there was a binding contract to construct or acquire the property, or where construction was begun by or for the taxpayer before May 9, 1985. Special rules apply to components placed in service after May 8, 1985.[7]

Senate amendment

The Senate amendment is the same as the House bill with the exception that a conforming amendment relating to the eligibility of lessee-incurred costs for the rehabilitation tax credit (secs. 46 and 48(g)) is not effective for leases executed prior to May 22, 1985, if the lessee signed the lease before May 17, 1985.

Conference agreement

The conference agreement is the same as the Senate amendment. The conferees intent that the recovery percentages to be computed by the Treasury Department be done on a more exact basis than is current practice. Specifically, if the Treasury Department provides that depreciation may be calculated by applying specified percentages to the basis of the property, the conferees intend that the percentage be expressed to at least the nearest tenth of a pecentage point. Similarly, separate percentage rates should be provided for each month during a taxable year during which the property may be placed in service.

II. BELOW-MARKET LOAN PROVISIONS

Present law

Section 7872 of the Code, added by the 1984 Act, generally provides that certain loans that bear interest at a below-market rate, are to be treated as loans bearing interest at the market rate accompanied by a payment or payments from the lender to the borrower which are characterized in accordance with the substance of the particular transaction (e.g., gift, compensation, dividend, etc.). The market rate of interest for purposes of section 7872 is assumed to be 100 percent of the AFR at the time the loan is made in the case of a term loan or, in the case of a demand loan, 100 percent of the AFR in effect over the time that the loan is outstanding. The monthly rate provided by the temporary Treasury regulations under the imputed interest rules does not apply for this purpose.

Section 7872 applies to (1) loans where the foregone (i.e., below-market) interest is in the nature of a gift, (2) loans to an employee from an employer or to an independent contractor from one for whom the independent contractor provides services, (3) loans between a corporation and a shareholder of the corporation, (4) loans of which one of the principal purposes of the interest arrangement is the avoidance of any Federal tax, and (5) to the extent provided in Treasury regulations, any below-market loan if the interest arrangement of such loan has a significant effect on any Federal tax liability of either the lender or borrower. The provisions of section 7872 generally apply to term loans made after June 6, 1984, and to demand loans made after that date (or demand loans outstanding after June 6, 1984, which are not repaid before September 17, 1984). However, the below-market loan rules do not apply to loans made to elderly care facilities before June 6, 1984, that are contingent on the continued residence of the lender at the facility. The application of section 7872 is limited by certain de minimis exceptions and, for certain gift loans, by the net investment income of the borrower. In addition, transactions covered by the last category above (i.e., number 5) would not be effective prior to the issuance of such Treasury regulations.

Below-market loans made by individuals pursuant to arrangements providing for the satisfaction of personal needs in retirement may be considered to come within either of the last two categories.

House bill

No provision.

Senate amendment

Loans to continuing care facilities

Overview

Under the Senate amendment, certain below-market loans to a "continuing care facility," made pursuant to a "continuing care contract" are excepted from the below-market loan provisions of the Code. Thus, under the Senate amendment, such loans will not be treated as bearing an interest rate equal to the applicable Federal rate and no additional payments will be treated as made from the lender to the borrower. Loans to continuing care facilities pursuant to continuing care contracts would be subject to the below-market loan provisions to the extent that the criteria for the exception are not met.

Continuing care contract

A continuing care contract is an arrangement between an individual or a married couple and a continuing care facility that meets five requirements. Under the first requirement, a retired individual or couple must be entitled to the use of the continuing care facility for the remainder of the individual's life or both married spouses' lives. Under the second requirement, such use must commence with residence in a separate, independent living unit provided by the continuing care facility.

Under the third requirement, during the period in which the individuals reside in the independent living units, the continuing care facility must be obliged to provide such individuals with various "personal care" services. Under the fourth requirement, the continuing care facility must also undertake to provide long-term nursing care for those individuals who are no longer capable of living independently, even with the aid of personal care services. Under the fifth requirement, the continuing care contract must require the continuing care facility to provide the personal care and long-term nursing services without substantial additional cost to the individual (i.e., there must be a significant insurance-like element for the individual).

Continuing care facility

A continuing care facility is one or more facilities that are designed to provide services under continuing care contracts and substantially all of the residents of which have entered into continuing care contracts.

Limitations

The exception is available for a loan only as of the calendar year in which the lender has attained age 65. A loan from either or both members of a married couple where only one spouse has attained age 65 will be treated as qualifying for the exception if both of the spouses are to reside in the continuing care facility. The exception applies only to the extent that the principal amount of a loan, when added to the aggregate outstanding amount of all other previous loans between the lender (or if the lender is married, the lender and the lender's spouse) to any continuing care facility, does not exceed $90,000. This amount is indexed for inflation.

Special rule for certain payments

Payment arrangements meeting specified requirements, between an individual and an elderly care facility meeting specified requirements are not treated as loans for purposes of the below-market loan rules. In general, the payment arrangement is one where an initial payment and a portion thereof that is refundable is based on the fair market value of residential accommodations supplied to the individual by the elderly care facility.

Effective date

The provisions of the Senate amendment relating to below-market loans to continuing care facilities pursuant to continuing care contracts are generally effective with respect to such loans that are made after the date of enactment. All such loans made on or before the date of enactment are expected from the below-market loan rules. In addition, any Treasury regulations relating to the application of the below-market loan rules to loans made to any elderly care facilities are prohibited from taking effect prior to January 1, 1986.

Employee relocation loans

The Senate amendment modifies the below-market loan rules with respect to so-called "employee relocation loans." An employee relocation loan is a loan from an employer to an employee, the proceeds of which are used by the employee toward the purchase of a principal residence in connection with commencement of work by the employee at a new principal place of work. The purchase of the principal residence must occur in a situation where any moving expenses incurred by the employee would be deductible under section 217 of the Code.

In the case of such employee relocation loans, the rate used for determining whether the loan is a below-market loan to which additional interest will be imputed, in the AFR for the month in which the employee enters into a written contract for the purchase of the principal residence, rather than the month in which the loan is made.

The provisions of the Senate amendment relating to employee relocation loans are effective for loans made pursuant to purchase contracts entered into after June 30, 1985.

Conference agreement

Loans to continuing care facilities

The conference agreement generally follows the Senate amendment with certain modifications. First, the requirement that the continuing care facility own or operate substantially all the facilities used to provide services under a continuing care contract is effective without regard to when a facility began operating (or a contract for the construction of the facility was entered into). Second, no restrictions are placed on the effective date of any Treasury regulations relating to the application of the below-market loan rules to loans made to elderly care facilities.

The provision in the Senate amendment relating to whether specified payment arrangements are to be treated as loans for purposes of the below-market loan rules is limited to three specified elderly care facilities that would not qualify as continuing care facilities under the Senate amendment. In this regard, the conferees confirm that the below-market loan rules of the 1984 Act and the changes made to those rules by this bill only apply to transactions that are loans for Federal income tax purposes. The conferees specifically intend that the provisions of the bill do not define, and do not alter, the prior law rules relating to what transactions are, or are not, to be treated as loans. In addition, the conferees understand that a payment to a continuing care facility pursuant to a continuing care contract frequently is wholly or partially refundable for a relatively brief period (e.g., six months) essentially for consumer protection purposes pursuant to State law or regulations. The conferees also understand that payments to a continuing care facility are often refundable on a declining pro rata basis over a somewhat longer period (often up to eight years). The conferees understand that such payments ordinarily would be treated as the advance payment of fees and not as loans under present law.

In addition, certain technical modifications have been made to the language contained in the Senate amendment.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the conference report presently under consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, H.R. 2475 provides a permanent solution to the controversy surrounding the imputed interest rules enacted in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984. Last fall, Congress passed temporary legislation modifying the original imputed interest rules. This stopgap legislation expired on July 1, 1985. On May 21, 1985, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 2475 by a unanimous vote of 425 to 0. The bill was passed by the Senate with amendments on June 26, 1985. Under my unanimous-consent request, the differences between the two bills would be reconciled, and the imputed interest problem will be resolved at long last.

Under the compromise, transactions with seller financing of $2.8 million or less would require an imputed interest rate of the lesser of 9 percent, or 100 percent of the Federal rate. The 9 percent rate is not available for new property eligible for the investment tax credit. For seller financing in excess of $2.8 million, the imputed interest rate is 100 percent of the Federal rate. Both parties in transactions under $2 million may elect to use the cash method of accounting. The $2 million and $2.8 million thresholds will be indexed for inflation beginning after 1989. This structure closely resembles the structure passed by the House. A Senate amendment is included to provide that seller financing for sale-leaseback transactions must use an imputed interest rate equal to 110 percent of the Federal rate.

My unanimous-consent request provides that certain "workout agreements" of "specified MLC loans" will be exempted from the imputed interest rules. However, the bill does not contain any inference regarding whether any indebtedness existing prior to or resulting from these workout agreements are properly considered debt for tax purposes. My request also includes a technical Senate amendment relating to the treatment of employee relocation loans for the purchase of a principal residence in connection with a job-related move. In the case of such a loan, the rate in effect on the date that the purchase contract becomes binding.

Finally, my request includes a Senate amendment dealing with life care facilities. Specifically, loans of $90,000 or less made by a taxpayer age 65 or older to a "continuing care facility" pursuant to a "continuing care contract" would be exempt from the below-market loan rules enacted in the 1984 act. A continuing care facility is one which is owned or operated by one entity providing services under a continuing care contract where substantially all of the residents entered the facility pursuant to a continuing care contract. Furthermore, as stated in the Senate Finance Committee report, payments to a continuing care facility are often refundable for a relatively brief period—that is, 6 months)—or on a declining, pro rata basis over a somewhat longer period, often up to 8 years. It is intended that these payments will be treated as advance payments of fees, and not as loans. This provision would also exempt certain elderly care centers run by certain charitable and religious organizations in the St. Louis, MO, area.

Consistent with both the House and Senate bill, my request includes a 1-year increase from 18 to 19 years, in the depreciation recovery period for real estate—other than low-income housing—in order to ensure that the bill is revenue neutral. My request includes a minor change in the effective date of this provision to accommodate certain leasing transactions caught in the pipeline by the effective date in the original House bill. To avoid any unintended revenue loss, the Treasury Department is directed to precisely determine the new depreciation rates.

Except for the provisions lengthening the depreciation period for real property, the bill will apply to sales or exchanges after June 30, 1985. However, the Treasury regulatory authority to establish lower rates in certain circumstances will apply as if included in the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984.

Mr. Speaker, we are presenting to the House a bipartisan compromise that addresses legitimate concerns raised by last year's imputed interest rules. I urge the House to again give unanimous approval to H.R. 2475 as it did last May.

□ 2050

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support the gentleman from Illinois, the distinguished chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in requesting the House to approve the conference report on H.R. 2475.

The issues raised by H.R. 2475 are not new to this body. The original House version of the bill represented an excellent compromise of the various concerns affecting seller financing transactions. The other body made only minor amendments to the substantive thrust of the original House bill but did add certain unrelated amendments. The conference report accepts some of those amendments while rejecting others. On balance, in view of the importance of achieving enactment of permanent seller financing rules, I urge the House to expeditiously approve this agreement.

Some urgency is appropriate because the stop-gap provisions enacted last fall expired on June 30, 1985. Were it not for this deadline, I might prefer to spend more time examining some of the other body's amendments to determine whether further modification of them would be helpful. We can, of course, do this through an oversight process in the future. In any event, I think it is important that we resolve this matter as expeditiously as possible, because many taxpayers are potentially affected adversely by the expiration of the stop-gap rules. Further delay in resolving this matter will only serve to create uncertainty which is both disruptive and unfair to taxpayers. I urge the House to approve the conference report.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DUNCAN. I yield to the gentleman from Nebraska.

Mr. DAUB. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the work of the conferees, particularly, and point out to my colleagues that this is going to be not only helpful to the realty industry, which has had some degree of uncertainty, but to the farm agricultural sales, which have had a real tough time deciding what the rules are going to be, and it is going to be very helpful to us in agriculture. I want to thank the committee.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. ARCHER], a member of the Committee on Ways and Means.

Mr. ARCHER. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I took a very, very strong role in opposing the imputed interest rules from its inception in the conference committee when it was adopted. I have played, hopefully, an active role in designing this effort to lift the onerous restrictions place by those imputed interest rules.

I have signed this conference report. It is not everything that I would have liked. But it certainly does go a long, long way in eliminating the very, very dire consequences of the imputed interest rules on most transactions. I am not satisfied with the life care provisions that the Senate put in, but that was a quid pro quo to get this conference report passed and to lift the restrictions that would otherwise apply.

So I urge adoption of the conference report.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Minnesotta [Mr. FRENZEL], a member of the committee.

Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, this conference report should be adopted. I have serious objections to two extraneous amendments, both of which were described by the chairman. I have reservations about the procedures. However, the need to restore certainty in the marketplace exceeds the reservations which I have.

Also, our need to get out of here is important, as well. We have all been recorded on this matter before. I think it is unnecessary to have another recorded vote. I hope the bill will be promptly adopted.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MCGRATH], a member of the committee.

Mr. MCGRATH. I thank the ranking minority member for yielding time to me.

Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of the conference report. I congratulate the chairman and the ranking minority member for their efforts during this conference.

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 1 minute to the gentlewoman from Ohio [Ms. OAKAR].

Ms. OAKAR. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the gentleman for yielding, and I support what he is trying to do.

Mr. Speaker, a number of Members have asked if we are going to bring up H.R. 3008. The minority leader of the subcommittee and I, out of deference and respect to the Members, have decided to win the bill in September.

Mr. LOWERY of California. Mr. Speaker, the Federal debt, now more than $1.3 trillion, has quadrupled during the past 8 years. In the past 22 years, while our population has grown 27.5 percent, prices have grown 246 percent, and the Federal budget has grown 1,000 percent. While I will support this budget resolution it is unfortunately nothing more than a heavy fog in the face of a budgetary forest fire. Year in and year out, we have spent more than we have taken in, creating a series of increasing deficits which have placed this nation in economic danger. There is no place left to hide, no one left to whom we can pass the buck. Congress must now face some tough decisions.

Not only do deficits indicate improper management of our Federal funds, but they also create serious difficulties for our economy. High interest rates and low economic growth interact to create an uneven field upon which our industry and workers must play. In this vicious cycle, the more the Federal Government spends, which many Democrats would have us believe to be beneficial, the less money there is for our economy. In short, there is no way to have full employment and balanced growth in our present budget environment.

Earlier today, the budget conferees approved a resolution that will, according to the Congressional Budget Office, cut some $39 billion from Federal deficit in fiscal year 1986—some $17 billion less than the $56 plus billion originally discussed. While I will support final passage of this measure, I have some serious reservations concerning its long-term effectiveness in reducing the chronic Federal deficit. Gentlemen, this measure is simply milk toast. Bargaining has given the House its COLA money and the Senate its defense money. This resolution is nothing more than another in a series of big-spender you-get-yours-and-I'll-get-mine deals that have driven our Federal deficit up to the $200 billion level.

Mr. Speaker, in my estimation, this resolution amounts to a surrender of our budget process to the deficit and partisan posturing. There is no way we can reduce our deficit below $100 billion by 1988 without making some of the tough decisions facing Congress, such as the cost of across-the-board COLA's and runaway domestic spending and getting cost-effective defense spending. Although, Senate Concurrent Resolution 32 is our last chance before recess to make a dent in our deficit, I want to remind my colleagues that this legislation is only a beginning. We must acquire the intestinal fortitude to make the tough decisions facing our children's and their children's future.

I want to conclude, Mr. Speaker, by urging all my colleagues not to let this chance for some deficit progress slip away and support Senate Concurrent Resolution 32. Let us not settle for another budgetless year.

● Mr. ROTH. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this legislation. Final enactment of this bill will eliminate a great deal of confusion and uncertainty as to the future of seller-financing of real estate.

With this bill common sense will prevail as public policy. The imputed interest rules we approved last year as part of the Tax Reform Act were properly motivated toward eliminating abuses in seller-financed real estate transactions. But, properly motivated or not, they were unfair and caused havoc in the real estate industry.

In closing a tax loophole we tightened a noose around the necks of honest homeowners, farmers, and small businesspeople who wished to engage in routine real estate transactions.

For a number of months, many people have been uncertain as to whether Congress would finally act to rectify last year's injustice. Many people have been hesitant to negotiate the sale of their homes, farms, and businesses, and I am certain our economy has suffered as a result. But today we were restoring some uniformity and certainty to the marketplace.

This compromise represents a good faith effort to restore some sense and sensibility to the Tax Code. Our colleague, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and others who have worked so hard on this legislation deserve credit for responding to the concerns of the Congress and the American people. As a realtor I know the impact of seller financing issue on real estate transactions. The House action is the appropriate action.●

Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the previous question is ordered on the conference report.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the conference report.

The conference report was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to make a personal explanation on certain missed votes and to have the statement appear in the appropriate place in the permanent RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, because of obligations in my congressional district, I was not present for part of the session on July 16, 1985, and I consequently missed three rollcall votes, those numbered 226, 227, and 228. Had I been present, I would have voted "yes" on all three of those votes.

AUTHORIZING SPEAKER TO DECLARE RECESSES TODAY

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it may be in order for the Speaker to declare recesses at any time today, subject to the call of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. STRANG. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I ask the gentleman why?

Mr. FOLEY. If the gentleman will yield, it is anticipated, Mr. Speaker, that following the action of the House in adopting the conference report on the budget that the House would be awaiting Senate action on the budget and the adoption of the adjournment resolution by the other body. Since we have not programmed legislation during this late part of the evening, pending the action of the Senate, it was the intention to declare a recess until the Senate reports its action to the House.

Mr. STRANG. I thank the gentleman for his explanation, and I withdraw my reservation of objection, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

AUTHORIZING THE SPEAKER TO ACCEPT RESIGNATIONS, AND TO APPOINT COMMISSIONS, BOARDS, AND COMMITTEES, NOTWITHSTANDING ADJOURNMENT

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that, notwithstanding any adjournment of the House until Wednesday, September 4, 1985, the Speaker be authorized to accept resignations, and to appoint commissions, boards, and committees authorized by law or by the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

DISPENSING WITH CALENDAR WEDNESDAY BUSINESS ON WEDNESDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 1985

Mr. FOLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the business in order on Calendar Wednesday, September 4, 1985, may be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Washington?

There was no objection.

APPOINTMENT AS CHAIRMAN OF COMMISSION ON U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES BICENTENARY

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of section 3 of House Resolution 249, 99th Congress, the Chair, without objection, appoints the gentlewoman from Louisiana [Mrs. BOGGS], as Chairman of the Commission on the U.S. House of Representatives Bicentenary.

There was no objection.

DESIGNATION OF THE HONORABLE JIM WRIGHT TO ACT AS SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE TO SIGN ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS UNTIL SEPTEMBER 4, 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Speaker:

WASHINGTON, DC, August 1, 1985.

I hereby designate the Honorable Jim Wright to act as Speaker pro tempore to sign enrolled bills and joint resolutions until September 4, 1985.

THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members be permitted to extend their remarks and to include therein extraneous material on the subject of the special order speech today by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MAVROULES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

POSTAL SERVICE HARDSHIP DELIVERY POLICY

(Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. ROWLAND of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and the distinguished gentleman from California, the Honorable EDWARD R. ROYBAL, chairman of the House Subcommittee on Treasury and Postal Service Appropriations and the Select Committee on Aging, I introduced yesterday legislation that will require the U.S. Postal Service to prescribe regulations relating to the delivery of mail to physically handicapped individuals.

On December 20, 1984, Mrs. Lois Martin, an elderly resident of Baxley, GA was fatally struck by a passing motorist as she attempted to cross a frequently traveled highway to retrieve her mail. Mrs. Martin was 79 years of age, wore hearing aids in both ears and had impaired vision. It is quite possible, had an alternative method of mail delivery been available to Mrs. Martin, this tragic situation could have been avoided.

Although the Postal Service has a policy that provided door delivery for individual customers for whom regular delivery would place an extreme hardship, it is ambiguous at best, and provides no written criteria for determining eligibility. The current hardship delivery policy consists of a one-sentence paragraph in the Postal Operations Manual and the Domestic Mail Manual. I find it disturbing that written guidelines exist nowhere within the Postal Service to provide guidance for postal officials who are charged with making a decision on who qualifies.

Thus, this legislation will require the Postal Service to develop written criteria and guidelines for the granting of a hardship delivery exception to the regular mail delivery and publish such information in the Federal Register for public comment. The bill is designed to codify the current Postal Service policy and directs them to identify to the best of their ability those individuals for whom the policy was originally designed.

It is extremely unfortunate that such a tragic situation had to occur prior to this matter receiving some attention. However, the offering of this bill today may very well prevent such a situation from reoccurring in my district or some other congressional district with similar circumstances. While the measure does not mandate any particular individual as being eligible for an alternative method of mail delivery, it provides the mechanism for making a determination.

CHRISTMAS TRAGEDY REMEMBERED

Dear Mr. Gardner, Christmas has just passed, but our families' was not a Christmas to remember. We lost our grandmother Christmas day in a tragedy that was unnecessary and one that, we feel, could have been prevented.

On Dec. 20 I left work and drove the eight miles home to find my husband's grandmother, Lois Martin, lying on the highway. She was struck by a car as she was coming back from her mailbox, which is across the highway from her house. I won't go into the gory details of what I saw as she lay unconscious on Highway 15 S. She was rushed to Appling General Hospital and then transferred to Ware Memorial Hospital in Waycross, where she lay semiconscious for five days. She died on Christmas Day.

As my husband, Keith, and I sat in the hospital watching and waiting to see what would happen, we wondered what could be done to prevent a tragedy like this from happening again.

Grannie Martin's mailbox has been on her side of the highway for at least 30 years, that we know of. Two years ago she was told, as we were, that our mailboxes would have to be put across the highway. Keith's family contacted the post office to see what could be done to get Grannie's mailbox moved back to her side of the highway. They were told that the mailbox could not be moved and that if it was moved, she would no longer be served.

Please keep in mind that we are talking about a 79 year old woman who had had cataract surgery on both eyes, and hearing aides in both ears. The post office is asking her to cross a busy highway to get her mail.

On Dec. 27, the day of the funeral, someone asked Mrs. Dyal (Keith's mother) if the post office had informed us of a "hardship case delivery". We had not been told anything about this. We have since found out more about it. A simple letter from her doctor would have taken care of the matter IF we had known about it. The post office had told us nothing could be done, and we took them at their word.

Two days before Mother's Day in 1984 Grannie was almost hit by a car. The car went in the ditch to avoid running into her. Again the post office was contacted to see if we could move the mailbox. We received the same reply . . . no.

We found out since this accident that Grannie, herself went to the post office in December to ask again about getting the mailbox moved from across the highway and again the same reply . . . no.

I realize that there are laws and regulations that have to be observed by the postal service, but NO ONE, especially not a 79 year old lady should have to cross a busy highway to get their mail! What happened to helping senior citizens or just plain old common courtesy?

Since Grannie's death we have found out about many people that have to walk across a highway to get their mail and of the many "close calls" they have had.

Mr. Gardner, there are many people throughout the area where we live that have small children, including myself, and many elderly people that have to walk across the highway to get their mail. We as a family and we the community out on Hwy. 15 S. want to see that something is done to prevent a tragedy like this from happening again. We realize that it is too late to save Lois Martin's life but through our effort and yours we would like to see that something is done about getting the citizens' mailboxes moved to their own side of the highway.

The day after the accident someone moved our mailbox, Grannie Martin's mailbox, and the mailbox of another elderly couple down the road from us back to our side of the highway in an effort to help save us from the tragedy that Grannie suffered. We have yet to receive any mail in our box, Grannies' box, or the couple down the road's box.

I am issuing a plea to the people of Appling County that are interested in avoiding further tragedies. Please join us in our effort to get mailboxes moved from across highways all over the county. If you will help, please feel free to contact us at any time.

Thank you,

KEITH AND JOAN DYAL.

DIALOG ON NICARAGUA

(Mr. ALEXANDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous material.)

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, many of our Members have addressed the subject of violence this morning in South Africa, Afghanistan, and the Soviet Union, and I would like to talk about violence in Central America.

I have here a summary of a recent dialog between Dr. Wayne Smith, former head of the U.S. interest section in Cuba and Sandinista officials, reporting on the fact that Nicaraguans remain ready to negotiate political concerns of Americans in Central America, which include prohibition of foreign bases, the withdrawal of foreign military personnel, the halting of military buildup, and the halting of cross-border support for guerrillas.

What remains, Mr. Speaker, is a U.S. policy that seeks a political rather than a military solution. Knowing of Members' interest in the recent developments in Central America, I am including a copy of this summary in the RECORD and forwarding the same to Members of Congress so that they will have this report available during the recess.

JULY 30, 1985.

Hon. BILL ALEXANDER,
Cannon House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ALEXANDER: I returned last week from a trip to Managua during which I had the opportunity to talk with President Daniel Ortega, to Acting Foreign Minister Tinoco, and to various other Nicaraguan leaders. On the basis of these conversations, I would say it is quite clear that the Nicaraguans remain ready to address our security concerns in the area. As part of a regional settlement, they would be prepared to do the following.

To prohibit foreign bases. The Nicaraguans would agree not to permit any Soviet or Cuban bases on their territory. This would of course be subject to on-site verification. In return, they would expect the other Central American countries also to prohibit foreign bases. This would mean that U.S. advance bases in Honduras would have to be dismantled.

To withdraw foreign military personnel. The Nicaraguans are also prepared to negotiate a formula for the drastic reduction of foreign military personnel in the area. Since the formula presented to the draft Contadora treaties was unacceptable to El Salvador and Honduras, it would probably be better to concentrate on a numerical limitation. That is perfectly acceptable to the Nicaraguans, provided the limit is balanced and reciprocal.

To halt any military buildup. The Nicaraguans are prepared to sit down with their neighbors at any time to work out a formula for the imposition of ceilings on the size of armies and restrictions on the number and nature of their armaments.

To halt cross-border support for guerrillas. The Sandinistas are prepared to commit themselves not to engage in the provision of material support to the guerrillas in El Salvador or to any other groups in Central America. They would submit to on-site verification procedures. The other side of the coin would be that the United States, Honduras, and Costa Rica would have to halt their support for the contras.

The Sandinistas are prepared to negotiate not only these security-related issues but also a series of commitments related to human rights, political pluralism, and national reconciliation. They are not going to accept the conditions for an internal dialogue put forward by the so-called Declaration of San Jose, but they do not reject a dialogue with some elements of the opposition. Certainly we are likely to encourage more progress in these internal matters through diplomacy than through military action.

It seems quite clear to me that we could achieve most of our objectives, especially those which are security-related (and they are the most important ones to us) through negotiations leading to verifiable international agreements. It is equally clear, however that the Administration has no real interest in the negotiating option. This was illustrated anew a few days ago. On July 22 the foreign ministers of the Contadora countries called on the United States and Nicaragua to resume their bilateral talks. Nicaragua almost immediately reiterated its wilingness to do so. As you know, however, the United States has refused the Contadora request. Given that the Nicaraguans are prepared to negotiate and to co-operate with the Contadora process, while we refuse, it is difficult to understand how the Administration can seriously argue that we must continue funding the Contras so as to pressure the Sandinistas to negotiate. If we wanted to negotiate, the Sandinistas would be ready to sit down with us right now. Further, we cannot say we are cooperating with the Contadora process and at the same time press ahead with our so-called "secret" war against Nicaragua. The two things are mutually exclusive.

Having studied our present policy toward Nicaragua in some detail, I have concluded that it is essentially counter-productive; certainly it does not achieve our objectives. I am further persuaded that the Contadora process cannot succeed under present conditions. If it is to work, the United States itself must become directly involved. I have prepared a paper which outlines these conclusions in greater detail. For your convenience, the summary of that paper is reproduced below. I hope you find it useful:

AN ALTERNATIVE POLICY FOR NICARAGUA

I. Summary

The Reagan administration's policy toward Nicaragua is one of weakness and ineffective bluster. Rather than preventing a second Cuba, it leads inexorably toward one. Rather than making the use of American troops unnecessary, it will, if followed to its logical conclusion, almost certainly culminate with U.S. military involvement. Rather than "containing" a Marxist regime, the Reagan policy leaves it unfettered and enhances its international standing. Far from being the tough, resolute approach portrayed by the President, present policy is one of confusion and ineffective measures which detract from, rather than enhance, our image as a great, self-confident power that knows how to protect its interests with a minimum of force.

The United States has legitimate concerns in Nicaragua and is right to be suspicious of Sandinista intentions. Present policy, however, does not effectively address those concerns or advance sensible U.S. objectives. The most urgent U.S. aims should be: 1) to prohibit the establishment of any Soviet or Cuban bases; 2) to bring about the withdrawal of foreign military personnel; 3) to halt all cross-border support for guerrillas and other subversive groups; and 4) to place a ceiling on military establishments so that no one country, Nicaragua or any other, be in a position to threaten its neighbors. Beyond these security-related objectives, the United States should also want to promote pluralism, human rights and economic well-being in the area.

None of the objectives outlined above is served by present policy. The Administration speaks in cliches of "supporting democracy" and "stopping communism", but it has not been able to explain in over three years time how funding the contras accomplishes those purposes. In fact, of course, it does not. Funding the contras is more a public relations gimmick than a policy. The contras do not have the capability to overthrow the Sandinistas, nor has their war against the latter advanced any of the U.S. objectives outlined above. Quite the contrary, thanks to present U.S. policy and the activities of the contras, there are more Cuban advisers in Nicaragua now than four years ago, a closer military relationship between Managua, Havana and Moscow, and greater tensions.

In addition to being ineffective, moreover, present U.S. policy toward Nicaragua violates international norms, is inconsistent with our traditional values, divides rather than unites the U.S. body politic and is not supported by our allies. No major government in the world supports our clandestine war against the Sandinistas. No government outside Central America supports our economic embargo against Nicaragua. Rather than upholding rule of law, present policy undermines it.

What the U.S. should be doing is to so bind and restrain the Sandinistas through verifiable, international agreements as to achieve all our security-related objectives and most of the others as well. This could be done. The Sandinistas have recently reiterated that as part of a regional accommodation inspired by the Contadora process, they would commit themselves not to permit any foreign bases on their soil, to send home Soviet and Cuban military personnel, to halt any support for guerrillas operating in other countries and to place restrictions on the force levels and weapons of their armed forces. The United States would not simply trust the Sandinistas to abide by these agreements. Of course not; rather, there would be means of verification and if the Sandinistas violated the agreements, the United States and other OAS countries would be in a position to take measures against Nicaragua under the provisions of multilateral agreement and in full accordance with international law. By working through international conventions, the United States would be upholding international law and at the same time achieving our objectives in the area. That would be a tremendous improvement over present policy which neither upholds rule of law nor achieves U.S. objectives.

A change of policy is urgently needed. However it has from time to time attempted to disguise it, the Administration's present approach is one of trying to bring about the ouster or capitulation of the Sandinistas by force. This will not succeed unless the United States uses its own armed forces, with all the risks and consequences that implies. Yet, we do not have to oust the Sandinistas to secure our objectives; they can be achieved through multilateral diplomacy resulting in the sort of verifiable agreements outlined above. So far, however, while rhetorically supporting the Contadora process and other diplomatic openings, the Administration has in fact done everything it could to undermine them. As its objective has been to get rid of the Sandinistas, it has had no interest in any regional settlement which would have left them in power. Quite the contrary, it has sought to prevent any such accommodation. If the Administration holds to its present positions, the Contadora process cannot succeed—which is just what the Administration wants. It would thus be free to pursue its confrontational policies unencumbered by the compromises implied by negotiations, and since it is not a direct party to the Contadora process, it would avoid responsibility for the failure of that process.

The key to reversing that equation and opening the way to effective diplomacy, and the point on which opponents of the present policy could usefully concentrate their efforts, is to bring about the direct engagement of the United States in the process of multilateral negotiations. The logic of this is unassailable. If the United States feels such a strong responsibility for the outcome of the situation in Central America that it is willing to use force, then it stands to reason that it should also feel, and take, some responsibility for the outcome of the negotiating process. It makes no sense at all for the Administration constantly to emphasize how deeply interested we are in Central America, and how important are our security interests there, but at the same time to stand aside from diplomatic efforts to produce a peaceful solution. The United States should actively join the Contadora nations, the Central American states, and other interested parties, in a concerted effort to produce a regional accommodation satisfactory to all. If it does not, U.S. policy in Nicaragua will either fail or will lead to full-scale U.S. military involvement.

Sincerely,

WAYNE S. SMITH,
Scholar in Residence.

A VETO-PROOF PRESIDENT

(Mr. DORNAN of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today is day 503 in terrorist captivity for William Buckley, our Lebanon American Embassy political officer. It is day 450 in terrorist captivity for Rev. Benjamin Weir, who has now been held 6 days longer than the longest held of the 52 U.S. Embassy hostages in Tehran during the Presidency of Jimmy Carter. President Ronald Reagan does indeed have another serious hostage crisis on his hands. Instead of 52 Americans there are 7, equally as important to all of us, equally as precious to their families. We will not forsake then.

Mr. Speaker, the other reason I have asked to address my colleagues today is that I have in my hand a historical letter that makes the 40th President of our United States, Ronald Reagan, veto-proof in this House of Representatives, therefore veto-proof in this 99th Congress. A letter similar to this is being circulated on the Senate side to reinforce the statement to the liberal big spenders in this Congress that the President can and should veto any spending bill he chooses with no fear of override. Here are the signatures of 145 Members, plus 2.

They promise with their signature that they will sustain the veto of our President on any spending bill in this Congress that is a budget-buster.

I will read two paragraphs from the letter, and then insert the letter in the RECORD. The White House has asked me to hold this letter until the Congress comes back from the August district work period. This is an insurance policy under the President's pillow that this Congress will now have to be serious about spending cuts.

The letter starts "Mr. President, the overwhelming majority of the American people spoke loud and clear last November," 49 States' worth of overwhelming votes. "They want the deficit reduced through spending reductions, not tax increases. That is our goal, and we believe, as you do, that such an approach is necessary to achieve sustained economic prosperity.

The concluding paragraph, "Therefore, Mr. President, we, the undersigned Members of Congress will support your veto of any spending bill that fails to achieve serious deficit reduction * * *" The dynamics of power have changed. The President's veto mechanism is now fail safe.

Ronald Reagan is now a veto-proof President for the rest of this 99th Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the full body of my letter follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, July 24, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: The American people spoke loud and clear last November. They want the deficit reduced through spending reductions, not tax increases. That is our goal, and we believe, as you do, that such an approach is necessary to achieve sustained economic prosperity.

As Members of Congress who believe that serious efforts are needed to bring spending under control, we are concerned about, indeed downright frustrated by, the intransigence of some Members to permit real spending reductions to be achieved.

The deadlocked House-Senate negotiations and the tendency of Congress to submit to special interest pressure have many of us questioning whether we will have a budget at all this year. In the event that the current deficit reduction effort fails, we believe it is important that you have a "failsafe" mechanism available so that progress on the deficit can still be made.

The more the budget negotiations drag on, the more apparent it becomes that a veto strategy may be the only way to get spending under control.

Therefore, Mr. President, we, the undersigned Members of Congress, will support your veto of any spending bill that fails to achieve serious deficit reductions, consistent with FY 1986 savings of some $56 billion.

Again, Mr. President, we stand with you all the way.

Best regards,

ROBERT K. DORNAN.
DELBERT L. LATTA.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before declaring a recess the Chair will entertain special orders.

CATARACT SURGERY FRAUD, WASTE AND ABUSE: A LEGISLATIVE RESPONSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced a package of reform legislation which I believe will correct a number of very serious problems brought to light by a recent investigation of the Subcommittee on Health and Long-Term Care of the House Select Committee on Aging and result in a savings to the Medicare Program of over $4 billion during the next 3 years.

Results of the subcommittee's 2 year investigation, released at a hearing July 19, 1985, revealed massive amounts of fraud, waste, and abuse surrounding cataract surgery, the most common major surgical procedure paid for by the Medicare Program. We found that roughly half of the Nation's $3.5 billion annual bill for cataract surgery is lost to fraud, waste, and abuse. Losses to the Medicare Program alone will total over $1.5 billion this year.

Cataract surgery, which in 1981 required a 3-day stay in a hospital, now requires a 3-hour visit to a hospital on an outpatient basis. Improved surgical techniques and hospital cost containment have contributed largely to a shift from the hospital to an outpatient setting (either in the hospital or a free standing surgical clinic). Today 8 of 10 cataract operations are performed on an outpatient basis. Intuitively, one would think that savings would accrue to the Medicare Program by eliminating hospital stays and the attendant services which accompany the stay. This has not been the case.

Medicare pays no less than $2,400 for cataract surgery performed on an inpatient in the hospital basis where costs are controlled by the new prospective payment system [PPS]. When the same surgery is performed in the same hospital, even by the same doctor, but on an outpatient basis, Medicare is paying up to several times this amount—as much as $5,700—for using only 3 hours of hospital resources. While PPS was intended to reduce Medicare costs by putting a limit on the amount paid for services provided in a hospital, the same rules don't apply to outpatient services. Medicare seems to be giving providers a "carte blanche" for what should be less expensive services.

Another factor fueling fraud, waste and abuse in cataract surgery relates directly to the price of the artificial lense or [IOL] implanted in the eye during the procedure and Medicare reimbursement practices associated with the IOL. In 1984, Medicare paid from $300 to $750 apiece for these lenses. The manufacturing cost for an average quality IOL is from $35 to $50. Under PPS, many hospitals have gone to competitive bidding for their IOL's and have reduced costs by over 50 percent to under $100 per lense.

The first bill of my reform package, H.R. 3061, will end Medicare's senseless overpayment for cataract surgery performed on an outpatient basis by capping what it will pay for this surgery (including the cost of the IOL implanted) to some percentage less than the rate established under PPS for inpatient cataract surgery. This bill would save the Medicare Program over $1 billion this year and at least $4 billion over the next 3 years.

The second bill of the package calls for an annual review to be performed by the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment of changes in technology and skill associated with artificial devices and organs and their implantation. The bill requires OTA to report to Congress how Medicare payments should be altered to reflect these changes. This would keep Medicare payments in line with rapidly changing technology and skills. Having no formal mechanism to do this has resulted in unreasonable and wasteful reimbursement. For example, the fee paid to physicians for cataract surgery is now around $1,200. This rate was established prior to 1981 when the procedure took 3 hours. Now a surgeon can perform the same surgery in 20 to 30 minutes, but Medicare has not altered its payments.

It is obvious that with vast differences between the manufacturing cost and the final price Medicare pays for these IOL's—as much as $715—profit margins are high. We found that some manufacturers of these lenses are trying to stave off true competitive bidding by taking $50 to $150 out of their profits to buy off some physicians and gain a competitive edge. The subcommittee uncovered evidence of improper inducements, kickbacks, bribes, and other illegal marketing practices throughout the IOL industry. Inducements ranged from outright payments of cash to physicians, in the form of $50 to $100 deposits in foreign bank accounts, for each lense purchased, to free stock in the manufacturer, free lasers and other cataract surgery equipment, keys to resort condominiums, second homes, and medical skiing seminars.

Over 1 million IOL's will be implanted in the eyes of Americans in 1985, costing on the average of almost $400 apiece. Medicare will pay for approximately 816,000 of these lenses at a cost of about $325 million. Evidence gathered by the subcommittee suggests that half the price of each lense is lost to fraud and improper inducements resulting in a loss to the Medicare Program of about $160 million this year. I believe that by including the IOL in a capped payment for outpatient surgery, as H.R. 3061 would do, much of this fraud will be eliminated.

We were distressed to learn that another type of improper inducement offered by IOL manufacturers to doctors performing cataract surgery, payments per lense for "phony" consultant work, has de facto approval from the Federal Government. The Food and Drug Administration [FDA] oversees the approval process for new IOL's. Manufacturers can pay doctors to serve as "investigators" implanting their as yet unapproved lenses and reporting any adverse consequences. The FDA has no controls over what is being paid to doctors and admits that they do not use the data provided by these "investigators." The subcommittee found that this has led to widespread use of "legalized kickbacks" to doctors simply for using a certain manufacturer's IOL.

The third and final bill of my reform package would limit what manufacturers could reimburse physician "investigators" to no more than what it reasonably costs the doctors in time over that required for normal patient care to serve as investigators (such as the filling out of forms or reporting of adverse consequences.) This will establish Government oversight which should effectively squeeze out what are now "legalized kickbacks" in the investigation of nonapproved medical devices.

At a moment in time when the Congress is struggling to find ways to reduce the soaring Federal deficit, often by making difficult and painful program reductions, I cannot in good conscience ignore this grand scale squandering surrounding cataract surgery. I believe that with the changes called for in my package of legislation, we could continue to provide necessary and effective cataract surgery, enjoy its rich benefits, while saving the American taxpayer and the Medicare program over $4 billion over the next 3 years.

I strongly urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this timely and important reform legislation.●

RACKETEER WEAPONS AND VIOLENT CRIME CONTROL ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. RODINO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. RODINO. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the Racketeer Weapons and Violent Crime Control Act of 1985, a crime fighting bill that will significantly strengthen our Nation's gun laws. Joining me in sponsoring this bill are Representatives WILLIAM HUGHES, BILL GREEN, and G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST.

This legislation will close a major loophole in the Gun Control Act of 1968 by providing a reasonable waiting period before a handgun can be purchased to ensure that criminals, drug addicts, mental incompetents, and other undesirables cannot get their hands on a gun. This is a critical crime control provision. It allows law enforcement agencies 15 days to check the records of a prospective purchaser of a handgun, and it provides time for an impassioned potential killer to "cool off."

This bill also bans the transfer and possession of machine guns and silencers, which are weapons of assassins and terrorists and have no sporting use at all. At the same time, it attempts to meet some of the concerns of sportsmen and gun dealers by lessening penalties for technical violations of gun regulations and eliminating paperwork that has no law-enforcement purpose.

As such, this is a balanced measure. It strengthens the gun laws with the goal of reducing crime, and it provides sportsmen and gun dealers relief from regulations not needed for crime control.

There is good reason why a waiting period is not only desirable but essential. The Gun Control Act of 1968 lists various classes of individuals that are not eligible to buy firearms. But Federal law currently offers no way to enforce this provision, except for an honor system in which the purchaser assures the gun dealer that he is not a drug addict or a felon. This enforcement loophole is best dramatized by the history of the handgun used in the attempt to kill President Reagan. As the 1981 Attorney General's Task Force on Violent Crime states:

> Since drug addicts, felons, mental defectives, and the like are not the best risk for the "honor system", a waiting period * * * is sensible and necessary to effect the purposes of the Act.

In other words, handguns must be kept out of the hands of the wrong people. This is a view strongly held by major law enforcement organizations, who have urged me to submit waiting period legislation and hold hearings on it. In letters to Members of Congress, these organizations—which include the Fraternal Order of the Police, the International Association of Chiefs of Police, the National Troopers Coalition, the Police Foundation, the National Organization of Black Law Enforcement Executives, and the Police Executive Research Forum—state that "there is an urgent need for stronger, not weaker, Federal handgun laws," and call for the adoption of a national waiting period.

They have good reason for their position: Two-thirds of all police who died in the line of duty last year were killed by handguns.

The waiting period is also popular with the American people. A 1981 Gallup Poll showed that 91 percent of Americans favor it. Newspapers around the country have endorsed it. And many sportsmen—tired of seeing reasonable law enforcement measures destroyed in their name—think it is a good idea.

Recent research bears out the need for a waiting period. Studies by the Rand Corp., indicate that a small number of repeat offenders commit a high proportion of the violent crimes—it is estimated that 6 percent of the offenders are responsible for 50 to 70 percent of the violent crimes. A reasonable waiting period, therefore, will enable the FBI and the local police to screen out these repeat offenders when they come to buy a handgun. The result can only be fewer crimes and better public safety.

Indeed, where waiting periods have been in effect, they have been highly effective. In the first 6 months the law was on the books in Broward County, FL, 37 prospective purchasers were prevented from buying a handgun. California's attorney general said that 1,200 felons were rejected in 1981.

Even the National Rifle Association has acknowledged the utility of a waiting period. In a pamphlet, "On Firearms Control," the NRA stated that "a waiting period could help in reducing crimes of passion and in preventing people with criminal records or dangerous mental illness from acquiring guns." The NRA notes that "a waiting period should be clearly specified, fixed, and reasonable in time, after which the firearm should be delivered unless the purchaser is disqualified by the police." This is exactly the intent of my bill.

The handgun murder rate in America is 100 times greater than England's and 200 times greater than Japan's. Twenty-thousand Americans die from handguns each year, an average of over 50 handgun deaths per day. There are now over 60 million handguns in this country. One is sold every 12 seconds. America is being armed with handguns at an alarming rate. Handgun death has become a ghastly, depersonalized statistic. How many more violent crimes and deaths are necessary before we begin to put the brakes on this national tragedy? The waiting period is an idea whose time has come.

I do not claim this legislation will stop crime. But it could help curb the criminal violence that takes innocent lives and causes frightened citizens to arm themselves in a spiraling search for a balance of force against terror.

As a nation, we must do something about the fact that our staggering rate of handgun crime and death is a direct result of the ease with which any criminal can obtain a handgun. At stake, in the end, is the confidence of the people in the Government's ability to maintain the safety of its citizens. This bill will aid hunters and sportsmen and at the same time keep handguns—and machine guns—away from dangerous individuals. This is an approach that makes sense.

The Judiciary Committee will be holding hearings this fall on this bill and other legislation to amend the Gun Control Act of 1968.●

"Nay" on roll No. 263, House Joint Resolution 236, waiving certain points of order against the consideration of H.R. 3036, Treasury-Postal Services appropriations for fiscal year 1986;

"Yea" on roll No. 264, the Nelson Substitute to the Jacobs Amendment to Treasury-Postal Services appropriations for fiscal year 1986; and

"Yea" on roll No. 265, the Jacobs amendment as amended by the Nelson substitute to reduce the appropriation for allowances and office staff for former Presidents by $219,400.●

HOUSE CREDIT UNION—A LEADER IN CUTTING CONSUMER LOAN COSTS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. ANNUNZIO] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, many Members of this body have complained that at a time when interest rates are falling rapidly in the business sector, there is no corresponding decrease in rates charged on consumer loans.

While the rates charged to consumers on loans have not decreased, there has been a severe decrease in the amount of interest paid to consumers on their savings accounts. Thus, consumers are facing a double load—lower rates on their savings and higher rates on their loans.

This trend has occurred throughout the country, but I am happy to report to the Members of this body that the Wright Patman Congressional Federal Credit Union, which serves the House of Representatives, is taking every opportunity to cut rates charged on consumer loans.

This year alone, the credit union has made across-the-board cuts in its consumer loan fees. And this week, the credit union took another bold step to cut loan costs. The credit union charges 18 percent a year on its outstanding loan balances for credit card accounts, a figure which already is among the lowest in the country; particularly when you consider that the credit union does not charge an annual fee for its card. On Tuesday, the credit union cut the credit card rate from 18 to 16.8 percent, and made the new rate available not just to new purchases, but on all existing credit card balances. This is an extra break for members who have outstanding balances. And, it is one of the first times that I have heard of a financial institution making a credit card reduction retroactive.

Mr. Speaker, at a time when financial institutions are being criticized by not cutting consumer loan rates, it is good to know that the House's very own financial institution is a leader in cutting consumer costs.●

PIVOTAL DAYS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida [Mr. MACKAY] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MACKAY. Mr. Speaker, each year, after the session has concluded, and the dust has cleared, it becomes obvious that 1—or maybe 2 days were pivotal for the course of the entire year. Tuesday was such a day, and it would be wrong to continue business as usual, without at least a token recognition of the importance of Tuesday's events.

Tuesday, the leadership of both Houses of Congress formally gave up on the effort to deal significantly with our country's staggering budget deficits. They had been moving toward an across-the-board spending freeze, including defense and entitlements. Coupled with a modest tax on imported oil, this would have balanced the Federal budget in 3½ years.

That leaves our budget conferees trying to appear serious about deficit reduction, with defense, entitlements, and revenues off the table. The result will be marginal at best. In fact, the odds are that by next January this year's so-called $50 billion deficit reduction package will be totally irrelevant. By that time, it will be clear that next year's budget deficit will still be $200 billion, and that within a year, the international trade deficit, which is a direct result of our reckless fiscal policy, will make America the biggest debtor nation in the history of the world.

For those who think the trade deficit is a kind of esoteric economic term, I invite you to look closely at the agonizing decisions now facing the Governments of Mexico and Brazil, our fellow debtors. Those governments are being required to restrict imports and maximize exports in order to pay their debts.

Clearly, the people of Mexico and Brazil are having to reduce their living standards in 1985, to pay the bills run up by the reckless spending of their governments in the seventies.

Just as clearly, the time is short until America's citizens are going to have to reduce their living standards to pay the bills for this government's reckless spending.

Already the political columnists are analyzing last Tuesday decision, to see which party won, and which lost. When the full impact of America's new status as the world's leading debtor is felt, the answer will be clear: Nobody won last Tuesday. All of us lost, and particularly our young people whose living standards will have to be reduced, to pay the bills for our reckless spending.●

TRIBUTE TO HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MAVROULES] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, a brilliant and caring man passed away earlier this week. Herbert Scoville, Jr.—known to most everyone as "Pete"—died on Tuesday, July 30, at the age of 70. Those of us who had the privilege to know Pete will never forget his uniquely compassionate and inspiring manner. Above all, though, I am certain the world will remember him as a man with a rare sense of social responsibility and a restless mind ever searching for better ways to lessen global tensions and conflict—a true champion of peace.

Among the many well-deserved tributes that may be paid to Pete Scoville, I should like to say that he especially deserves recognition for his valuable contributions to the cause of nuclear arms control. Throughout his professional life, Pete maintained a tremendous vision and hope for a world free from the specter of nuclear war. He very ably combined and applied his unusual talent, drive, scientific expertise and government experience to this pursuit.

Regretfully, I cannot possibly do justice to the full breadth and depth of his professional life, but I will take the time to point out some of the highlights of Pete's outstanding record of service to this country within the Federal Government, a prominent phase within a long and illustrious career of public service. To name a few of the many positions he held from the mid-1940's through the 1960's, he served as: Director for Science and Technology in the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency; Assistant Director for Scientific Intelligence and Deputy Director for Research in the Central Intelligence Agency; technical director of the Armed Forces special weapons project in the Department of Defense; senior scientist on the Los Alamos contract in the Atomic Energy Commission; a member of the National Defense Research Committee; and a consultant to the President's Science Advisory Committee.

I should like to focus on a particular aspect of Pete Scoville's role in the field of nuclear arms control during his time in the Government—his critical and lasting contributions to both the concept and the design of independent treaty verification procedures. Pete Scoville earned his Ph.D. in physical chemistry during World War II—as the first nuclear weapons made their terrifying debut before the world. Shortly thereafter, he joined an effort shared by American scientists and policymakers searching to find the safest ways to deal with birth of these weapons into a world rife with conflict. Through these early experiences, Pete Scoville became a strong believer and a committed exponent of the need for bilateral arms control agreements. From the start, it was clear to arms control advocates that perhaps the greatest difficulty that would obstruct successful negotiations was the lack of independent means of verifying agreements. Under the direction of Pete Scoville, U.S. intelligence programs successfully produced crucial independent technical means of treaty verification, which significantly lessened the need to rely on onsite inspection. The existence of countless arms control agreements in force today—the Hotline agreement, Limited Test Ban Treaty, Outer Space Treaty, Nonproliferation Treaty, ABM Treaty—to name a few—all depend in large measure on this crucial verification technology. Putting this in perspective, we begin to appreciate the tremendous contributions made by scientific experts who are genuinely and innovatively committed to arms control, as Pete Scoville was.

In closing I would like to call upon my colleagues today to join me in remembering and honoring Pete Scoville, with great respect and gratitude, for his outstanding service to his country, his ideals and the pursuit of peace.●

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, it is with great sorrow that I rise today in commemoration of the beloved Herbert Scoville, Jr., whom many of us had the privilege to work with in his untiring efforts to promote international cooperation and world peace. Specifically, I would like to highlight the later years of Pete's life—to recognize the immeasurable contribution he made to the public movement to bring the arms race under control.

Following an outstanding scientific career in the U.S. Government, Pete Scoville devoted the last 15 years of his life working with numerous public interest organizations and campaigns committed to arms control and the prevention of nuclear war. For example, Pete Scoville was one of the principal founders and served as president of the Arms Control Association, a wing of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace; he was an active board member of the Center for Defense Information, the Council for a Livable World and the Union of Concerned Scientists among others; and he was a key initiator of many important public campaigns such as the National Campaign to Stop the MX and the National Campaign to Save the ABM Treaty.

Through all these ties, Pete devoted much of his time and energy to educating the public on the nuclear threat and on ways that citizens can work together to reduce it. Pete was able to teach us to treat this most profound issue seriously, but not to despair. He inspired people to join him in a struggle for change.

"Patience," "clarity," "dedication," and "strength" are just some of the words that come to mind when we think of how Pete Scoville presented his message to the American public. In spite of his two illnesses, arthritis and cancer, he never stopped encouraging and teaching others to use their minds and their political powers effectively. Health permitting—he maintained a busy schedule of speaking tours across the country. Without question, Pete was a "mover" in the arms control community at large.

Pete Scoville made us understand that global peace—or rather the constant and growing struggle to achieve global peace—is inescapably linked with the most important and fundamental institutions of humanity. To explain his deep and driving personal commitment to this struggle, let me repeat some words of his own on the subject. The following is a brief statement he made in 1981 when accepting the prestigious Rockefeller Public Service Award. On that occasion, he said:

Without peace we will never achieve the goals that my fellow award recipients have worked so effectively for—goals of a better life for the children of this world, more satisfying family relationships, more stimulating and more secure employment opportunities, and for improved health for all. Yet this simple truism is largely ignored as the world concentrates its energies, its resources, its manpower and its wealth on more devastating ways to wage war, on more efficient means of causing death. Just to show that I can be optimistic, there really is a strong, public ferment against this nuclear madness at last brewing across the country and across the world. It must be nurtured, it must be fertilized, and propagated across the lands. This award, in my view, is a recognition of its vital importance. Let us fervently hope that the public outcry will be in time.

Pete Scoville was indeed a man of great humility, wisdom and foresight. We will miss him very dearly. Mr. Speaker, I hope we shall do justice to the legacy of this very special man by remembering him and his message of peace—and most importantly, by heeding his message through our actions.

At this point I would also like to submit for the RECORD the following statement presented on Herbert Scoville's behalf, for his nomination as the recipient of the 1981 Rockefeller Public Service Award.

NOMINATION OF HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR.

Dr. Herbert Scoville, Jr., is especially deserving of the 1981 Rockefeller Public Service Award, not only because he embodies in full measure the "courage, sensitivity, and vision" which John D. Rockefeller sought to find and promote in establishing the awards, but also because he has contributed significantly to the international search for cooperation and peace through distinguished careers in both public and private service.

Earning his doctorate in physical chemistry during World War II, Dr. Scoville was one of many scientists who helped earn that conflict the appellation of "Wizard War"—a label that might as well be applied, with less approving connotations, to the potential nuclear conflict that has hung like a dark cloud over mankind ever since 1945. In the middle 1950s—when the advent of thermonuclear weapons and intercontinental missiles made it clear beyond doubt that warfare had entered a decisively new era of sudden destructiveness—Herbert Scoville turned his considerable scientific ability and talent for persuasion to the task of achieving controls over and reductions in these new weapons of mass destruction. Up to that time, the United States, the Soviet Union and other states had sought through disarmament talks in the United Nations to put back in the bottle the awful genie released by nuclear fission and fusion. Part sincere, part rhetorical, and always conducted in a corrosive atmosphere of fear, these talks had proved increasingly fruitless. The marriage of hydrogen weapons to long-range missiles started a new tremor of concern, of fear that the weapons could end civilization as we have known it and that man could find no means to avoid such a fate.

Dr. Scoville, or Pete, as he is known to thousands who have heard and been touched by him, attended the East-West Surprise Attack Conference of 1958 and has spoken of the oppressive weight felt by many of the participants as they realized fully the difficult but unavoidable responsibility they shared for finding a means of resolving the existential dilemma of nuclear weapons in a world of acute hostility and tension. Out of such experiences was born the concept of arms control and Pete Scoville was one of its midwives. His contribution was of two kinds. He was a persistent advocate of arms control within the government. Moreover, and at least equally important, he was a director of and major contributor to efforts to find ways of independently verifying arms control agreements, that is, without the necessity of onsite inspection which had proved one of the most impenetrable obstacles to agreements to limit or reduce nuclear and thermonuclear weapons.

It is not often appreciated, even today, that the advances arms limitation was able to achieve in the 1960s and 1970s—the Hot-Line Agreement, the Limited Test Ban Treaty, the Outer Space Treaty, the Non-Proliferation Treaty, the Seabed Treaty, the Interim Offensive Weapons Agreement, the ABM Treaty, the Biological Weapons Convention, the Threshold Test Ban the Peaceful Nuclear Explosions Treaty, the Environmental Modification Convention, and SALT II—depend in some measure on independent means of verification, for which the technology was larely pioneered by the United States. The development of this technology was not an accident and was in large measure in the hands of Dr. Scoville. He worked on this problem for eight years as Director of Research and Assistant Director for Scientific Intelligence at the Central Intelligence Agency (1955-1963). Not longer after the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency was established late in 1961, he was appointed Assistant Director for Science and Technology and continued to build the all-important technical base on which all successful arms limitation to date has rested. While others, especially those outside of government disputed the merits of arms reduction and limitation, Dr. Scoville was an increasingly important figure among that small band of men and women who were doing something positive to achieve it in a quite but practical way. His work earned him no accolades, or recognition as statesman or peacemaker; outside of the small group seriously persuing arms control his name was scarcely known. Yet his scientific acumen and judgment and his perseverance made it possible for others to gain public applause as the promoters of arms limitation, especially nuclear arms limitation. These are the hallmarks of courage, vision, and sensitivity in confronting possibly the most dire collective threat that mankind has ever faced.

Though it is difficult to judge such different things, perhaps the more courageous part of Pete Scoville's lifelong career of science in the public service began when he left ACDA in 1969. Since that time, he has been a tireless and articulate advocate of arms control, a knowledgeable originator of arms limitation concepts and proposals, and an inestimable source of inspiration and support to all others who see the essential rationality of negotiated security. He has put all this scientific knowledge and political wisdom in the service of arms control and reduction. Withal, he has been during this time crippled by arthritis and must walk with two canes. Refusing any special treatment, Pete Scoville has made of his canes symbols of courageous pursuit of a vision of a more cooperative and less fearful world.

His reputation is both national and international. He has served on numerous official arms control delegations and advisory panels. He has conducted many private conferences on the entire range of arms limitation issues. He has actively participated in nearly all Washington-based organizations seeking to create public awareness of the contribution of arms control to American and international security; he has advised countless other organizations, universities, and research institutes in this country and abroad. He originated the Arms Control Program of the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace and was a founder of the Arms Control Association, of which he is now President.

In addition to his work with private and official organizations, Dr. Scoville has been a tireless writer on arms limitation. His articles appear not only in specialized journals but also, and more frequently, in newspapers and periodicals where they are available to the broader public. He has written two books—one an explanation of strategic weapons and the other on the MX missile system—and has contributed to several others. Dr. Scoville's public speaking schedule has been at least as full as his writing program; he has addressed audiences throughout the United States, as well as in Europe and Asia, again making no distinction between attentive and mass audiences. At the same time, he has also remained available to discuss the issues of arms control at length with the press or with students and other researchers. Each year he is called upon to testify before Congress on some aspect of arms limitation, usually not once but several times.

It would be difficult indeed to find an exponent of the limitation of weapons of mass destruction who has been more prolific and persevering than Pete Scoville or who has been at such pains to explain this seemingly complex subject to the layman. He has dedicated his experience, his scientific insight, and his considerable energy not just to a safer and more cooperative world but to explaining to people in comprehensible terms how such a world can be achieved. He has given hope and inspiration to the many who labor under the fear of wholesale destruction or the end of the kind of society and values that man has sought with such constant difficulty.

In all this, Pete Scoville has retained two essential characteristics: his humanity and his scientific standards. He remains a warm, humorous, and congenial individual equally at ease in any situation and equally respected by advocates and skeptics of arms control. Pete has also been at considerable pains to ensure that, in his writing and speaking, his discussion of technical matters is scientifically correct; he will not compromise his scientific training and standards to facilitate his arguments, which continue to be based on a deep and certain knowledge of the science and technology that are involved.

He continues to read deeply and widely in the field and increases his own knowledge as he increases that of others. Pete does not merely clamor for an end to the burden of the secret of nuclear weapons, he provides practical answers to this problem that are consistent with both technology and politics. He was, for example, the most persistent advocate in the late 1960s and early 1970s for flight test and deployment limitations on the multiple, independently targetable re-entry vehicle, an innovation which nearly all now concede has severely prejudiced U.S. and international security and fueled the qualitative strategic competition.

The progress that has been achieved to date in arms limitation and that must be achieved in the future if man is to avoid the destruction of modern society owe a large debt to the efforts of this one man. While others have contributed as specialists to this achievement, Pete Scoville has contributed as both specialist and explicator. It can be said with considerable confidence that no American has done more to carry the message of arms limitation to the broadest possible audience; in a democracy, this is essential.

Alfred North Whitehead wrote that "Duty arises out of our potential control over events." Perhaps no duty today is more significant than our potential control over the events we call collectively the arms race. Without effective effort in this area, other human activity to improve our condition would become largely irrelevant. Few indeed have seen this duty more clearly, pursued it more vigorously or with more vision, or shown more humility and humanity in their dedication to a peaceful world free of the threat of nuclear destruction than Herbert Scoville, Jr.●

PEANUT PRICE SUPPORT AMENDMENTS OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. LUNDINE] is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, today, I am introducing the Peanut Price Support Amendments of 1985. This bill will eliminate the current system of poundage quotas for peanuts and substitute a straightforward loan support program parallel to those for corn, wheat, soybeans, rice, and other crops.

The Lundine amendment to the Food and Agriculture Act of 1981 passed the House by a 91-vote margin, essentially with similar provisions to those proposed this year. Unfortunately, a similar amendment offered in the Senate by Senator LUGAR failed by four votes. Since the problems with the peanut program which existed in 1981 continue to exist today, I hope my colleagues will reaffirm their support of these reforms again this year.

The current program of Government controls for peanuts designates two classes of peanuts—quota peanuts for domestic use and additionals for export. This complicated program results in artificially high peanut product prices for U.S. consumers and an injustice to thousands of farmers denied the right to grow peanuts for the U.S. edible market.

The Government's two-tier price system establishes a higher support price—$550 a ton—for domestic edible peanuts—quota peanuts—and a lower support price ($185 per ton) for export, feed, meal, and oil peanuts—additionals.

This program allows only those farmers who hold poundage quotas the legal right to grow edible peanuts for U.S. consumption. Since these poundage quotas are set by the Federal Government well below U.S. demand for edible peanuts, the price paid for raw peanuts in this country is about two times greater than the price paid for U.S. peanuts exported to other countries.

American farmers are prohibited from growing peanuts for the domestic edible market unless they were enfranchised with that right when the peanut program began in the 1930's, or have purchased the right from the original quota holder at significant cost.

This bill will eliminate the artificial distinction between quota and additional peanuts. The Secretary of Agriculture would be required to establish one level price support that would apply to all peanuts. In establishing this level, the Secretary would be required to take into consideration such factors as the cost of production and world market prices, as well as supply and demand for peanuts.

Current law gives peanut growers who hold poundage quotas a far better deal than other farmers receive. An American Peanut Product Manufacturers Institute study estimated that peanut price supports "have been set 80 percent above USDA defined production costs * * * when land costs are excluded, and 60 percent above when the inflated costs of land are included."

It is the American consumer who must bear the cost of this feudal program. Agricultural economist Merrill J. Bateman, Ph.D., testifed earlier this year before the House Agriculture Committee's Subcommittee on Tobacco and Peanuts, on the adverse effect of the peanut program on the U.S. consumer. Bateman said:

> The constricted supply of raw peanuts, coupled with a high price-support level, has ensured that the American consumer is paying more than necessary for peanut products. While the current program is not a substantial drain on the Treasury, it does add some $250 million each year to the nation's food bill through a consumer subsidy or "hidden tax" on peanut products.

We now have further evidence that because the 1985 crop of peanuts is larger than usual, due to good growing conditions, the cost to the Treasury will be significantly higher this year.

The price for peanut butter, which is an important source of protein and a dietary staple for many low-income families, is inflated because of the current program. USDA data indicates that 12 peanut quota holders earn an additional $250,000 each year as a result of the consumer subsidy on peanut products, which adds 13.5 percent to the cost of every jar of peanut butter sold in America. In fact, American consumers would save between $250 to $300 million annually if the current peanut price support program were eliminated. Clearly, American consumers are underwriting the low cost of peanuts enjoyed by foreign consumers by paying higher domestic prices for the same quality U.S. product.

While supporters of peanut subsidies may argue that the cost of peanut products is more significantly influenced by the cost of ingredients other than peanuts, prices of finished peanut products have closely reflected raw peanut prices, both up and down. For example, as a result of the 1980 drought, raw peanut prices increased due to reduced supply and the price of peanut products at the consumer level increased accordingly. Conversely, when the weather improved in 1981, supplies increased and consumer product prices declined.

If the present system of Government controls is eliminated in favor of the plan I have proposed, domestic consumption of peanuts could increase by about 200 million pounds annually. This translates into nearly 1 pound of additional roasted or salted peanuts, peanut butter, and other highly nutritious peanut products per U.S. consumer.

It is no wonder that peanut growers who can produce peanuts for 15 cents per pound and are guaranteed more than 28 cents per pound by the Government would work to keep the current program. However, Government interference in peanut production is not in the best interest of consumers, nor those farmers who wish to grow peanuts for the domestic market and who are currently prohibited from doing so. The abolition of Government controls on the supply and marketing of peanuts would ensure consumers of an adequate supply at reasonable prices, increase efficiency within the peanut industry and keep U.S. peanut producers competitive with foreign growers.

I believe that this bill offers a fair and equitable arrangement for both peanut producers and consumers and I urge my colleagues to support it.●

THE NATIONAL PLANNING FOR PEACE COMMISSION ACT OF 1985

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, after the travail we have just gone through over the budget resolution, I hardly need to belabor the point when I say that the Congress is today faced with extraordinarily difficult choices about how to reduce the huge Federal deficits which we have run up over the past few years. The magnitude of the problem is so great that we often lose track of the impact of spending cutbacks on the American public. This is the case not just with reductions in various human services programs, but with the impact of cutbacks for Government procurement on Americans whose jobs are intertwined with Federal spending.

Defense spending is clearly out of control, with a self-generating momentum that defies efforts to make significant reductions. One reason making cuts in defense is so difficult is that, whether we like to acknowledge it or not, the defense budget is the largest public works program the Nation has ever known. Every Federal contract for weapons procurement provides jobs for Americans. And every time we try to eliminate overpriced, outmoded, or inefficient weapons systems, Members of Congress are faced with the possibility of job losses in their congressional districts.

If we were to set up a national program which provided Federal assistance and expertise to communities facing dislocations because of shifts in Federal spending, we could minimize the disruptions which such shifts may cause. Such a program would in turn make it easier for the Congress to assess defense programs strictly on their merits.

We already have a name for such a program: "economic conversion." Indeed, economic conversion has been the subject of a great deal of discussion in recent years, but not much action. Thus far, almost nothing has been done in a practical way at the Federal level to facilitate the development of a rational economic conversion plan. Our colleagues TED WEISS and NICHOLAS MAVROULES have both introduced economic conversion legislation in the 99th Congress, as they have in previous years. I am a cosponsor of both bills. Their legislation deserves our consideration and support. It is needed to deal with the very real problems faced by communities, defense industries, and their workers, when cutbacks or changes in military plans shut down bases or military procurement programs. But economic conversion should be seen as more than simply damage limitation. It is also a great opportunity.

Why, in the face of all the evidence that absolute military superiority is unachievable, do we and the Soviets continue to spend ever larger amounts of money on ever more exotic weapons? Why, on the 40th anniversary of the bombing of Hiroshima, is it seemingly impossible for us to agree on sensible cuts in nuclear weapons? In a brilliant article in the September, 1983 edition of Harvard magazine, the distinguished author, Francois Leydet, suggests that the answer is simply because neither the leaders of the United States nor the Soviet Union have the wisdom or courage to believe that such cuts are really possible.

As Leydet notes, we and the Soviets have become "nukeaholics," addicted to the arms race and unable to believe that it can be stopped, just as hopeless alcoholics are unable to believe they can stop drinking. Says Leydet:

> Before the alcoholic can stop drinking, he must believe it can be done, and he must believe that life without alcohol will be better than life with it. There must, in other words, be a shift of perception, a change in his subjective reality. The same applies to the nukeaholic.

What will it take to bring about that shift of perception that will enable the nukeaholics to get off their arms race binge? An impartial observer from another planet might expect that the very real danger of mutual suicide in a nuclear holocaust would be enough. Today, 40 years after Hiroshima, the threat has reached mind-boggling proportions. Yet the superpowers seem as far as ever from kicking their nuclear habit. Perhaps because the threat has never materialized—except for the people of Hiroshima and Nagasaki—it does not yet produce the kind of utter desperation that brings an alcoholic to the outlook that makes his recovery possible.

The cost of the arms race does, of course, affect most of us in a very immediate way, through higher taxes, inflation, enormous deficits, cutbacks in human services, and the loss of business and jobs to countries, like Japan, that are not pouring their human and material resources down the military drain. The doubling of our national debt to $2 trillion in only 5 years is but one measure of the enormous cost of the arms race to the people of the United States. And, as we in Congress know only too well, that cost continues to mount at an ever-increasing rate, despite all efforts to get it under control.

A few days ago, I inserted into the RECORD a speech by the president of Time Inc., in which he pointed out the connection between the arms race and the loss of American business to foreign competitors. The people of the Soviet Union are paying an equally heavy price for the continued diversion of a huge portion of their smaller national economic resources to the maintenance of their war machine.

Unfortunately, because of the complexity of national and international economic relationships, it is difficult for people, even in the United States, to get a very clear picture of the cost each nation is paying for our collective failure to bring an end to the arms race. Yet, if we are to achieve the psychological shift needed to extricate ourselves from this predicament, we are going to need a detailed, coherent plan showing what could be done with the resources that could be reallocated as a result of genuine disarmament.

Mr. Leydet, in his article, states that it is time we developed such a plan and challenged the Soviets to make similar plans of their own. He puts it this way:

> Once both of us, Americans and Russians, have developed a clear, coherent picture of what we would like to do with the vast natural, financial, and human resources we are now squandering on the arms race, it will be time to sit down together and compare notes. That's the conference that might really lead to disarmament.
> The task of envisioning a future and of making concrete plans for it, in which our respective resources are allocated to peaceful rather than warlike purposes, must start now, long before anything tangible comes out of the Geneva talks. Mind you, the two processes are in no way incompatible: rather, they need to be simultaneous and synergic.
> As things stand today, the most telling sign that the present regimes in Washington and Moscow have no faith in, or commitment to, a serious disarmament strategy is the total absence of any planning for peace.
> The clearest signal we could give the Soviets (and they to us) that we are serious about peace would be to come up with a well-though-out plan for the reallocation of resources once we have agreed to a freeze, followed by a gradual, annually increasing cutback in military spending.

At present, we have no clear idea how we would reallocate Federal resources currently slated for defense if we and the Soviets reached agreement on substantial arms reductions. Would we cut taxes? Increase funding for job training? Improve our health care system? Upgrade our schools? The possibilities are limited only by our imagination. Once we develop a clear idea how we might best reallocate resources at the Federal level, we can work out a comprehensive national plan for helping communities, defense industries, and the Nation to make an easy transition from our long binge of military spending.

With these thoughts in mind, I am today introducing the National Planning for Peace Commission Act of 1985. The Commission, comprised of 20 leading experts on the economy and economic conversion, from Government, business, labor, and the academic communities, would be charged with assessing the pressing national needs that we are not currently able to meet because of defense spending, with evaluating changes in Federal tax and other policies that would facilitate a shift from defense spending to meeting such needs, and with helping communities and businesses adjust to an economy not dominated by the arms race.

Other than the Secretaries of Defense, Labor, Commerce, and Health and Human Services, all members of the Commission would be appointed by the Speaker of the House and the President pro tempore of the Senate. The Commission would be empowered to hold hearings and meetings around the country, if necessary. Its ultimate goal would be the development of an economic conversion blueprint for congressional consideration. This plan would be due in 2 years. Although the Commission would go out of existence after 2 years, my bill would require regular updates of the economic conversion master plan by a working group comprised of representatives of the Departments of Energy, Defense, Interior, Agriculture, Education, Labor, Commerce, and Health and Human Services, as well as the Office of Management and Budget, the Council of Economic Advisers, the Environmental Protection Agency, and the Council on Environmental Quality.

The National Planning for Peace Commission Act of 1985 is not an alternative to the Weiss or Mavroules bills. It is, however, a companion piece. Its enactment would draw national attention to the need for better adjustment planning for communities, bring about a plan for the reallocation of Federal resources and economic adjustment, and build a national consensus in favor of such a plan. This is not simply a bill to appeal to liberal "peace activists." Changes in defense spending strike me as inevitable, and enactment of my bill could provide the Congress with the best information and the best possible recommendations of how to curtail or redirect Federal spending to maximize its productive use, how to assist constituents to deal with the adjustments of a real disarmament program, and, most important, how the enormous resources released from the arms race could produce higher living standards and a more stable, prosperous nation.

Of course, conversion need not be limited to military-related factories. For example, the U.S. Department of Energy recently decided to abandon the gaseous centrifuge enrichment plant [GCEP] in Portsmouth, OH, and to walk away from a $3 billion investment in the centrifuge technology. This decision adversely affects between 600 to 1,200 workers in Portsmouth, OH, as well as over 700 jobs elsewhere in the State, and leaves idle and unused a Federal facility which has been under construction for the last 10 years. With a comprehensive conversion plan in place, the Federal Government would be better set for quick action to minimize the kind of disruption the GCEP decision will inevitably cause in the lives of the workers, their families, and the communities in which they live. And an existing Federal economic conversion plan could help ensure that the taxpayers' GCEP plant would be quickly put to productive use instead of sitting idle and wasted.

It is high time that we acknowledged the need for a national economic conversion plan, and moved ahead to develop one.

PLANNING FOR PEACE

(By Francois G. Laydet)

The French have a facetious saying: "L'alcool tue lentement. Nous, on s' enfout, on n'est pas pressé" ("Alcohol kills slowly. We don't give a damn, we're in no hurry"). When I contemplate the real costs of the arms race to us, to our Soviet adversaries, and to the rest of the world, that French phrase keep haunting me.

There is a "rest of the world," you know. Nearly 90 percent of humanity is neither American nor Russian, yet its future is held hostage in the confrontation of the superpowers. It is a world of immense beauty, immense variety, immense potential—and immense problems. It is a world ravaged by cancers of hunger, disease, runaway population growth, and environmental decay.

While we and our Soviet partners, interlocked in our danse macabre, with eyes only for one another, with ears only for the strains of the security-through-strength martial bands, whirl ever closer to the final abyss, all these processes of planetary degradation go unattended for lack of concern, lack of commitment, and lack of funds. Prisoners of our ideologies, obsessed with a thirst for unachievable military security, which we indulge at the expense of social and life-support systems that are every bit as vital to long-term security, we and the Russians remain unable or unwilling to face the fact that these global trends, if not reversed, will do us in just as surely as a nuclear holocaust will. We just shrug: "Nous, on s'en fout, on n'est pas pressé."

Most experts on the disease of alcoholism agree that if an alcoholic wants to turn his life around, the first thing he has to do is to stop drinking. Only then can he begin to deal with all the other problems his drinking has caused or enabled him to ignore. You can say the same thing about what I've come to call nuke-aholism. We have got to stop nuclear arms race before we can begin to address effectively the ills that beset our society, Soviet society, and the society of mankind in general.

But before the alcoholic can stop drinking, he must believe it can be done, and he must believe that life without alcohol will be better than life with it. There must, in other words, be a shift of perception, a change in his subjective reality. The same applies to the nukeaholic.

Do you feel, as I do, that it is time we sobered up? That we need to get off this catastrophic arms race binge? If so, you will perhaps agree we might try to view the U.S.-Soviet stand-off from a different angle.

In the final chapter, "Coming up for Air," of a Union of Concerned Scientists book titled Beyond the Freeze: The Road to Nuclear Sanity, there is a paragraph that states:

"The threat of nuclear holocaust has been a fact of life for so long that it seems naïve to contemplate plans the United States and U.S.S.R. can make once that danger recedes, Yet it may be the attractiveness of those plans that convinces the two superpowers of the need to abandon the costly arms race [emphasis added], for both the dream of affluence in the capitalist United States and the promise of a socialist utopia in the U.S.S.R. are in great jeopardy. Both countries are beset by grave domestic problems that are growing all the worse because of the massive drain on their resources for military purposes."

I italicize one sentence in that paragraph because it seems to suggest the very mind shift that is essential if we and our Soviet rivals are to extricate ourselves from the arms race. I submit that it is time right now for us to start making plans—real, detailed, coherent plans—for the eventual reallocation of our resources.

It is time right now for us to challenge the Soviets to make similar plans of their own.

Once both of us, Americans and Russians, have developed a clear, coherent picture of what we would like to do with the vast natural, finanical, and human resources we now are squandering on the arms race, it will be time to sit down together and compare notes. That's the conference that might really lead to disarmament.

Both we and the Russians would need to approach this conference table sans truculence, sans braggadocio, sans recriminations and accusations about who was to blame for launching and perpetrating and escalating the Cold War. We both would need to enter these discussions with a spirit of humility, a recognition of being in a common mess, a sincere desire to help one another out of our predicament and to invest a part of our released resources, human and material, in what David Brower, archdruid of the environmental movement, has called a Marshall Plan for the Planet.

"Look," we'd say to the Russians, "our whole infrastructure—the vast, vital network of roads, bridges, sewers, rails, and mass-transit systems—is heading towards collapse. The cost of needed repairs around the country could run to $3 trillion. Where will we find that kind of money?"

"You think you've got it tough," the Russians might answer us. "We don't even have the network we need of roads and bridges and sewers and rails. It's so bad that much of our agricultural product is lost because we can't get it to market. We need 3 trillion rubles. Where will we find that?"

"We've got a big problem on our southern border," we'd throw in. "The only way to stop the horde of illegal immigrants, short of stationing a million-man army on the Mexican border, would be to help Mexico straighten out its economy so its people could find jobs at home and wouldn't need to come north. But that means foreign aid on a major scale. Where's that money to come from?"

"We're so strapped we can't even consider foreign aid on any significant scale," the Russians would reply. "And yet we're well aware of the needs of the Third World. But what can we do?"

"Do you suppose the arms control boys in Geneva could help us out?" we might ask.

"They will—if we both lean on them good and hard," the Russians might answer.

A naive fantasy? Perhaps not.

What I am suggesting is that there is a lot of work to be done, on our side and on the Soviet side, to prepare for peace. This work needs to be just as hard-headed and just as detailed as the preparations being made by our respective military establishments for a possible war. And it goes far beyond the goal of the Geneva arms control talks, which is to avert nuclear war. Indispensable as that goal is, both we and the Russians need to remind ourselves that there is much more to real peace than the mere absence of war. The task of envisioning a future, and of making concrete plans for it, in which our respective resources are allocated to peaceful rather than war-like purposes, must start now, long before anything tangible comes out of the Geneva talks. Mind you, the two processes are in no way incompatible: rather, they need to be simultaneous and synergic.

As things stand today, the most telling sign that the present regimes in Washington and Moscow have no faith in, or commitment to, a serious disarmament strategy is the total absence of any planning for peace.

The clearest signal we could give the Soviets (and they to us) that we are serious about peace would be to come up with a well-thought-out plan for the reallocation of resources once we have agreed to a freeze, followed by a gradual, annually increasing cutback in military spending.

The most persuasive evidence Congress could give that it considers real peace to be at least a possibility would be passage of a bill such as H.R. 229, the Defense Economic Adjustment Act. The purpose of this bill is to help prepare communities, industries, and workers for a transition to civilian production should the day come when, as a result of international arms control agreements, there would be substantial reductions in defense contracts.

But we'll never do any of this unless we break out of our hypnotic trance. Just over two centuries have passed since we declared our independence from Great Britain. I think the time now has come to declare our independence from the Soviet Union (and vice versa). In a sense, much of our policy is made not in Washington but in Moscow. Obsessed by what we observe Russia to be doing, by what we think she may be doing, by what we think she may be thinking of doing, we have lost our independence of action. We cultivate dubious friendships abroad; we squander our resources at home on military hardware; we neglect the most fundamental material, social, and spiritual underpinnings of our society—not because we prefer to do so but because we have convinced ourselves that the Kremlin allows us no other options. We've let expediency subvert our ideals, fear cloud our vision, reflexes abort reflection, frantic scrambles to cope with the crisis of the month divert us from creative, imaginative planning for the kind of future we choose.

It is high time, I submit, that we stop blaming the Russians for all of our and the world's ills, that we get our eyes off them for a while, that we make a priority of putting our own house in order, that we take a good hard look at our own deficiencies, that we develop a vision of what a peaceful America—and eventually a peaceful world—would mean in specific terms, not just as a romantic ideal.

Besides continuing to press for a nuclear weapons freeze, there is nothing of greater moment that the "peace movement" in this country could do in the immediate future than to draw up a preliminary blueprint for a conversion to a peace economy.

To help us in the task we will need to enlist the help of like-minded experts in the business, labor, academic, environmental, educational, and political communities.

Assume, we would tell them, that an agreement could be negotiated with the Soviets that would bind each side to reduce its defense expenditures over a ten-year period from the present annual level of $200 billion plus to perhaps $20 billion. Assume that each side would agree to invest the money thus saved in economically productive, socially useful, environment-enhancing programs, including greatly stepped-up aid to "have-not" countries for ecologically sound development. These programs would be mutually verifiable, and would provide hard evidence of the cutback in military spending since such a cutback would be the only possible source for the funding.

Assume all this to be true, we would tell our experts. You have hundreds of billions—eventually trillions—of dollars to play with. How can they do most good? How can they be invested to rehabilitate our decrepit infrastructure, to rejuvenate our industrial plants, to speed the transition to a renewable energy base, to halt the erosion of our topsoils, to preserve our natural and scenic resources, to salvage our decaying cities, to extend medical care to all, to upgrade our standards of education, to put our unemployed—including our hard-core unemployed—to work, to give to all our people a new hope, a new interest in the future, a sense that they are needed, a sense that there is work, important work, for them to do—work that would, incidentally, offer ample profits to interested private enterprise?

How much, we would ask the experts, of the money saved from defense could we afford to invest in helping to assure that peoples throughout the world have at least the minimum requirements for a fully human existence? How much could we allocate to the protection and repair of the essential natural life-support systems of the planet? How could we extend massive foreign aid to developing nations, regardless of the ideologies of their governments, but with sufficient controls to ensure that the aid gets to the people we mean to help and does not merely serve to prop up this or that repressive regime of whatever ideological coloring? Could we make such aid contingent on an equal reduction in the recipient country's production and importation of arms?

That, I submit, is the homework we in the peace movement need to do if we want to be taken seriously and to have a real impact on policy.

Yes, I am advocating that we think and plan "as if." As if the Cold War were over. As if we had more pressing concerns than the relative number and throw-weight of our and the Russians' ICBMs. As if the human race had more important decisions to make than whether to commit itself to the free-enterprise or centrally planned organization of production. As if we wanted our beautiful planet to survive.

I advocate it because, like the authors of Beyond the Freeze, I believe that it is the attractiveness of just such a plan that will convince both us and the Soviets of the need to halt the arms race. Imagine our next president going to his Soviet vis-à-vis and saying to him, "Look, here is our blueprint for peace. Here is how we want to spend our resources. There is no threat in this to you. How can you help us? How can we help you? How can we both help humankind?"

Perhaps I am a dreamer, but I suspect the response might surprise Mr. Reagan!

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I am happy to yield to my colleague, the gentleman from New York [Mr. WEISS], who has taken the lead in this kind of project, and I am happy to be a cosponsor of his bill.

Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I simply want to compliment him on a very important statement and a very important introduction of his legislation. As the gentleman knows, we witness in this chamber year in and year out the arms race and the defense budget sort of driving everything that goes on in the Congress and in the country. We witness time after time Members being persuaded to vote for legislation which they may not have voted for because they suspected they were not doing the best thing for the country, but they were sort of jobnailed into voting for it because the alternative was to suffer job loss in their districts.

So I think the gentleman's proposal and the gentleman's commitment over the years is extremely important. What is significant also is that this is not a first-time entry by the gentleman. He not only talks about vision for the future, he votes day in and day out to help us come closer to achieving that vision. I want to compliment the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SEIBERLING].

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I appreciate the work he has done in this field, which has been monumental indeed.

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from California [Mr. LUNGREN] is recognized for 60 minutes.

[Mr. LUNGREN addressed the House. His remarks will appear hereafter in the Extensions of Remarks.]

FURTHER MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A further message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment concurrent resolutions of the House of the following titles:

H. Con. Res. 179. Concurrent resolution providing for a conditional adjournment of the House from August 1 or 2 to September 4, 1985, and a conditional adjournment of the Senate from August 1 or 2 to September 4 or 9, 1985; and

H. Con. Res. 181. Concurrent resolution to correct the enrollment of the bill H.R. 2068.

The message also announced that pursuant to the provisions of section 276 of title 22 of the United States Code, as amended, the Vice President appoints Mr. SIMPSON and Mr. ZORINSKY as members of the Senate delegation to the Interparliamentary Union Conference to be held in Ottawa, Canada, on September 2-7, 1985.

MY ADVICE TO THE PRIVILEGED ORDERS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GONZALEZ] is recognized for 60 minutes.

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, at this hour and after having approved the resolution that will bring us into recess until the days immediately following Labor Day, it is well to ponder on just where we are out in the real world. We just voted—that is, the majority voted—for the approval of a budget resolution that from the very beginning, as well as the President's budget proposal, as well as the Senate majority budget proposal, from the very outset are predicated on a fundamental misperception and erroneous predicate.

I pointed this out during the time that we had the first debates on the budget resolution for this year. It is well to point out that for 3 years we have not had a budget resolution in compliance with the 1974 Budget Reform Act, I was 1 of 10 that did not vote for it.

Now, my advice on this evening for the privileged orders as I have been since almost the outset of this Congress, this first session of the Congress—because I think we are living in similar times in which perforce we must face the fundamental basic issues that all through our history from the very inception of our nationhood we had to face: the basic question of whether the people or a privileged elite would be making the key decisions that would determine the economic, the fiscal, the monetary well-being of that particular people.

This was the issue that confronted our country when it was just beginning to shape itself into nationhood, when you had an amorphous, a rather not quite yet shaped union, and in that beginning struggle these great leaders and this great people were confronted with these basic issues, but they had to make decisions in the context of a population—in the 13 Colonies anyway—of just barely some 3 million in a very definitely agricultural type of society. But the issues have been the same all through mankind's history and societal experience when it comes to the basic forces at work within a beginning structured community.

In our case the first issue arose when the Continental Congresses were first organized in order to try to seek some consolidation of position, of outlook, that would unite them as a common thread in this very beginning of the 13 Colonies as a Nation. That issue was, as it has been all along: what would be the banker, the financial agency, for this group or, at that beginning period, aggregation? In the Congresses charters were issued to private individuals to form the Bank of North America, at that time in Philadelphia. Afterwards and during the Confederacy, that is, during the period of the Articles of Confederation, which soon dissolved, and with the calling of the Constitutional Convention, a firm resolve was made by those leaders, enlightened, cultured, and very conscious of the fact that they were fighting for freedom in its very rawest definition—freedom from what has been called by the historians a mercantile system.

We have got to think in terms of trying to consider what we have done today. We are a great multiple Nation, a pluralistic country, a vast country of 230-some million inhabitants, with first place power now in the world's structure, but under attack as to its ability to uphold what the political scientists call its hegemony, its power, its influence, over those areas throughout the globe that, as a result of two great convulsions known as World War I and World War II, have resulted in the United States inescapably having to confront destiny.

But we have heard the debates, like the discussion we had this evening with respect to this last-minute reconciliation between the Senate and the House and apparently with some kind of understanding from the President on what would be and what would not be acceptable as a net budgetary target or figure. But, as I say, when the captain and the kings have departed for the August recess, the fact of the matter is that they have departed into a future that is illusory, and the vary basis upon which we agreed on a so-called budget resolution is at best tenuous and in reality unsupportable, the reason being the reality of the existence of the problems confronting us, every one of which has not been confronted basically, beginning with the overall perception of the world as it is today in the 1980's, not as we would have it be, not with the mindset of our President and, I presume, the majority in this House after hearing these debates, a Europe, a 1947 Europe.

I believe that one of the basic premises that we must consider is that, unlike World War I, World War II has not terminated. Just recently we have had some newspaper discussion about something called the Helsinki agreements of about 10 years ago. That was the first effort made in the so-called postwar period to try to reach some kind of a basis upon which could be projected an eventual peace treaty. But the basic issue, the issue at the heart of the matter, as much as it was after World War I, is still with us after World War II, or during this sequella period after what most people consider to be World War II.

We have failed to differentiate between the hot shooting phase of a war and the relative inert period, but which still is in an environment of battle, of warfare, of conflict, of friction. Our economy reflects it. We are now an economy that is completely taken over on the basis of a garrison state, of a military type of endeavor and framework of reference.

Now, the steps by which this point has been reached have been gradual. As we look back in retrospect, we can see that it has been cumulative, but that was not the world and it was not the mind set of the leaders in and out of the United States in the 1940's, after 1945, in the 1950's with the beginning of the setting and the jelling of the so-called cold war.

Well, cold war was one way of expressing the fact that the hot shooting phase of the conflict had ended, but there was still some kind of conflict ongoing. In between, we had been involved in war and we have been challenged to confront the basic issue, which is a prime constitutional issue, one that brings forth in history the fact that it was an issue most bitterly debated, most hotly talked about and contested during the deliberations of the Constitutional Convention in Philadelphia, and that was where the exclusive power to declare war was deposited.

There was no question about it, when we see in article I and right before section 8 in clause 7, the fact that that power to declare was is exclusively mandated to the Congress. There are no ifs, ands and buts. In fact, it is just a simple terse statement of fact in the enumerated, the panoply of enumeration of powers granted by the Constitution to the Congress in article I. For good reason article I is the article that has to do with the Congress or the representative branch or the policymaking body of the Nation.

In article II, the executive branch, where for the first time such an office as we call the Presidency was considered, and that also took great debate. In the first 10 years of our national existence, in the Continental Congresses, in the Articles of Confederation, they could not even think they wanted anything like the Presidency. There was no such comparable office. They feared it. They distrusted it. These were iminent minds. These were minds that knew at long last mankind in a new world would envision a new order, a new order of liberty, a new order in which God-given endowments and talents to the individual and his personality could flower to the fullest under an environment of total freedom, unrestrained by kings governing in the name of devine power.

So in the first sentence of the preface of the Constitution, right in the preamble, the whole thing is encompassed in those seven words, "We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union"—and so on. It did not say, "We, the Congress," or "I, the President." It said, "We, the people."

The people are the sovereign power. All power emanates from them, but you would not think so nowadays. Whenever we start talking about that, let us really remember that. Let us really remember every day, every minute, every hour, that we are merely agents of the people, that we have a grant of a trust only. We are not masters and we should not even try to think that way. It is the only place in the world where that basic concept is actually not only preached, but governs a nation.

We are confronted before the 200th anniversary of that Constitution, that is, of the real birth of our form of government, with the issue of whether or not we in our time redeem ourselves and reaffirm or whether or not we continue to succumb to this loss of faith, where we have entered into a period of twilight wars, Presidential wars, if you please, where Presidents whether they have or have not been directly or indirectly, through a delegation of constitutional power from the Congress or not, engaging the country in wars.

This President has done so. In the course of doing so, he has violated solemn treaties that at least for the foreseeable future have jeopardized our ability to lead morally and collectively those nations with whom we must share the future.

Destiny has said these are the nations of the new world. Not one in the Western Hemisphere shares our policies with respect to what this administration has done and continues to do; yet we budget and we appropriate and we hear great talk about how we are going to reduce the deficit, but the President himself even in sending over his version of the budget said quite candidly that it would not result in anything but for the next 3 fiscal years a built-in deficit of not less than $200 billion.

But why, why should that be? Then why tell the American people that we must have a constitutional amendment to balance the budget?

Just what point have we reached in our national destiny where we can with great glee conclude a session on the eve of momentous occurrences? Have we forgotten that just less than a month ago our Nation was in the throes of an agonizing dilemma, an ordeal with the hijacking of the airplane with those Americans? Have we forgotten as we trot off and enjoy some kind of rest perhaps for the majority or some trips throughout the world or just simply go back to our districts to have a chance to forget about this for a while, that there are seven Americans held captive in Lebanon alone? Was there no thought given to that as we depart?

Should we not be knowing for sure that while we are away lulled in a recess, there will be decisions that continue to be taken as a result of action or nonaction, budgetarily or appropriation-wise, in Central America?

What will be our reaction while we are gone—and I pray to the Lord that I am dead wrong—if we have a disastrous occurrence in which some of our servicemen are killed in Central America? What will be the reaction? What will be the request of the President? This has been overlooked. The Congress has refused to consider these facts.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GONZALEZ. Yes, I am glad to yield.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I deeply appreciate the gentleman mentioning those seven hostages in Lebanon. I know they are always on his mind, as they are on mine.

Has the gentleman been able to come up with a concrete proposal to the President—I have really not—on what he could do to put maximum pressure upon the State of Lebanon, which really is in chaos and has no specific government, or the State of Syria, which has a very specific government under the leadership of President Assad; what does the gentleman think we could do to bring pressure during this break while we are enjoying the wonderful educational process of travel or enjoying our beautiful 435 districts in this country, in Hawaii and Alaska and all the other legislative designated areas, the Virgin Islands, Guam, and so forth, Puerto Rico, beautiful vacation lands?

Mr. GONZALEZ. And San Antonio, TX.

Mr. DORNAN of California. San Antonio, a beautiful district where I went through preflight training and did more pushups than I have ever done in my life or since in only a 3-month period—what are we going to do? What does the gentleman think the President can do to keep the world aware of these seven fine Americans that are in terrorist captivity?

Mr. GONZALEZ. If the gentleman will allow me, I have pondered that. I did when the President was Jimmy Carter and we had the Iranian captivity. And I pondered a long time.

As a great admirer and worshipper of the Constitution that governs us, I saw in that article I, section 8, clause 10, the anticipation on the part of those who voted that such things would continue to happen as had happened on the high seas, piracy, and a specific phrase that is in the Constitution in clause 10 about punishing, defining, and punishing the violations of the laws of nations, which I felt was a terrible, gross violation in the case of the Iranian capture of our Embassy officials and employees because that captivity, that type of hostage-taking had not occurred since the Crusades. It just had not happened.

You know, when our wars have broken out, like the first war, and then with Hitler, our Ambassadors in Berlin were taken in and placed in a hotel. We took theirs and put them in a hotel.

Mr. DORNAN of California. We sent them up to the Greenbrier in West Virginia. We had a nice soft, diplomatic word "interred."

Mr. GONZALEZ. That is right. But as soon as possible, they were allowed to go back to their land, and ours were allowed to come back.

Mr. DORNAN of California. Even under Adolf Hitler and the Tojo war lords,

Mr. GONZALEZ. That is right. That is right.

But in the case of Iran, this was absolutely something new, both internally and domestically where you have a theological, you have a religious government. It was a throwback in a way to the 11th century. And you had a hard thing to deal with.

I felt that the Constitution was telling us, hey, Congress, you have this power to define the offense, and punish for it, because right following that it says you will be and are hereby granted the power to give and issue letters of marque and reprisal.

So I wrote President Carter and I suggested two things, or three things really. One, that we should proceed through what we had then constituted, as we now have it, the United Nations. And sure enough, the United Nations, even Russia joined in condemning the Iranian action. But there is no power to enforce.

I suggested the second thing, and that was that more immediately would be to impound the assets within our reach, which were considerable. I used to be chairman of the Subcommittee on International Finance, and I estimated that that amounted to about $11 billion. And if the banker in Iran hollered, as the President says, uncle, they would release those hostages or they would find some accommodation.

Well, that was not done. I had no immediate reaction to my letter. I had a short sort of an indirect response.

But then I alluded to the fact that the Congress had a responsibility under that article I, section 8, clause 10, and I introduced a resolution in which I said it is the sense of the Congress that under this section we shall, and perhaps through the executive branch, if necessary, issue letters of marque and reprisal.

Now in this case, I think that is really far more appropriate than the other two. As you say, this is no well-defined political entity of a State. You have a diffused, as you have had for years, hundreds of years, in what we call Lebanon now, so you do have that, you have that impossibility of affixing responsibility to any given scheme of government. But you do have little fiefdoms and little groups and apparently some of these are more or less, properly or improperly, attributed to the responsibility of having taken and still holding the seven American hostages.

Mr. DORNAN of California. There was a story in the Washington Post, if I may interrupt the gentleman, that it may be even one family, a large extended family, the Masawu family.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I saw that. I believe that it is very possible. I think it is very feasible.

I do not think we ought to throw the whole weight of the responsibility on the President. I believe we do have a responsibility that we can discharge.

So I have introduced, I formulated and introduced a resolution to that respect invoking in the name of the Congress article I, section 1, clause 10.

Mr. DORNAN of California. I think that is an excellent suggestion.

May I submit for you to ponder, and then I will let you get back to your excellent special order, and for the American citizens who may be with us still in the gallery, or what I call our extended gallery throughout the country; that is, thanks to the magic of cable television, to ponder if the direct action that Teddy Roosevelt recommended in 1904 when a Moroccan, although it was not the nation of Morocco then, a man by the name of Rosolo took an American, Petrocari, prisoner, and Roosevelt recommended in one simple sentence "Petrocari alive or Rosolo dead."

If the American Sixth Fleet was to pull up along the coast of Levant, the eastern Mediterranean, and seal off all access to the sea for both Syria and Lebanon and announce to the world that we thought we had the legal backing to sit there until either government, the confused situation in Lebanon or the government in Syria, either government leaned on this Masawu family to turn over our innocent Americans, including two religious people, and that at least would be direct action. I happen to be of the opinion that it would probably work, and I just submit that to the gentleman for his analysis.

Mr. GONZALEZ. I appreciate that.

Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to express my appreciation to the gentleman from California. I think that he and I are basically in agreement that this is an issue that we cannot quite overlook. We should not forget, certainly, and sometimes I believe timing, and in this case, of course, the judgment of the Commander in Chief and the President would be something that I guess we would have to defer to. In my humble opinion, at this point I think that with the diffusion of these centers of local power that perhaps a massive assault, or even a massive blockage would result only in the overuse, it may be an overstrained or an overcharged type of attack.

I would prefer an up-to-date, 20th-century version of a letters of marque and reprisal in which we could find ways and means to accomplish the same purpose. But instead of a sort of a shotgun approach, we use a 30-30 approach and single out and punish the culprits.

Obviously, whatever form or vestige of organized government exists has not had the power to control the deprivations, the piracies that have occurred, but even that is just a symptom of what I think the more fundamental issue is that we must resolve, both domestically as well as in confronting these powerful international forces now that impinge upon us domestically.

For example, Lebanon, we must never forget our policy or lack of policy in Lebanon has been very ill-defined since 1970 when the British pulled out after they and the Russians had installed the Shah of Iran. In 1970, and I made allusion to this last week, the so-called Nixon doctrine was that we would rely on client states, the Saudis, and the Iranians, to look after our interests in the gulf there.

I have always believed that if you have a business, any businessman will tell you you cannot delegate it. You have got to tend to your business. You keep your business, you keep it up, and it will keep you.

When we start getting client states, we become sort of the puppets and creatures and victims of those very client states that we think in our hubris, in are arrogance, that we actually are controlling. I think that also we have to have a review, a review of just what the facts are. The budget which was debated and the great opposition that I heard here this evening was to the point that it had an inordinate share of for defense or military or whatever you want to call it. I find that my quarrel with it is not so much the allocation of the funds but as to the overall emphasis on a proper and certainly invulnerable system of defense. But if we are going to think in terms of defense it is one thing. If we are going to think in terms of aggression, war, then we have to call the budget a war budget.

That is what I called it when the President, in an incremental, almost an exponential manner in the last 4 years has asked for that. But I quarreled with the allocation and the apportionment and the perversity of the priorities. The reason I quarrel is, as I have brought out here, when the President is saying that he has to get $20 billion for something that may never be developed, it may never be deployed, and I am not even speaking about star wars, and I am going back not to this President but to one of his predecessors, to his predecessor President Carter and the case of the MX where the military themselves have been in great conflict of opinion and where the very debates I have listened to here in a passionate way have shifted around so much that they have ended up in the very situation that was being contradicted to begin with.

Now when we say that we are going to demand an allocation of $20 billion, but the Secretary of Defense tells me, like he did last year and the year before, that is the Secretary of the Air Force, that the Air Force did not have and does not have the sufficient budget to give air pilot training time to our Air Force pilots, certainly there is something wrong with that priority because we may never deploy, we may never even construct a system of the MX. We may never even reach the stage where we can place into reality even a sort of prototype system of what has been known as the star wars, as it is popularly known. But we do know that we have men and women whose morale must be there, we must have a country that is worth defending. If in the meanwhile our infrastructure, which is a fancy word given by professors to the vitals of a community, its road system, bridges, sewage system without which you have no modern community, all of those are crumbling down around our ears throughout the country. The same President that is asking me, and I am certainly defense oriented, in fact I was attacked for being too defense oriented. I have been attacked always. I have been attacked as a hawk, I have been attacked as a dove. Yet I look at the source of the attack and realize that it is predicated on an ignorance of the total role.

My utterances are all in the record. It is nothing that I have said now as compared to what I said 15 years ago. I am saying essentially the same thing.

What I am saying is that with the perversity in the priorities, with the abdication of our basic responsibility to go to the bottom of things whether it is our domestic needs, community development needs or our rural needs, and when the President comes to me and he says "80 percent of the thrust of the programs that I'm going to cut are going to be in the area which your subcommittee has jurisdiction over," that bothers me. What is that? Housing, both community development, rural as well as urban. Now as chairman of that subcommittee, and that is the largest subcommittee in the whole Congress; I have been privileged in the last 4 years to go into over 30 States as chairman.

I have been into every single agriculture-producing area of this country, whether the Eastern Shore which is just 1 hour and 15 minutes from here or elsewhere. I can take you to a situation where I saw labor camp situations that are atrocious. We just cannot reconcile them with America. They are just as bad, if not worse than some of the situations in the undeveloped Third World countries, so called.

Now that is just 1 hour and 15 minutes from the Nation's Capital. These are invisible people. It is the same thing elsewhere; I have been to southeast Bronx, I have been to east Brooklyn, I have been to Philadelphia. In fact, I was scheduled to take the subcommittee to the very area where the police in Philadelphia bombed and burned up entire neighborhoods, killing children, women, men. Now this is in America, in the United States, while we spend elsewhere.

He says we have to cut all of the housing programs; this is the President's recommendation.

In this budget which I cannot support—I cannot support what the so-called glorious compromise was: Look, we are not going to kill the programs, we are just going to compromise with the Senate and just barely, maybe, keep them a little bit alive.

But the country is not a stagnated country. Our country is a dynamic country, a growing country. That is why they started all this jazz about freeze. I said, "You don't freeze living material, you don't freeze living matter. The only thing you freeze is inert matter." Our country is bursting, it is dynamic, it wants outlets for growth and production. It does not want to see the fruits of its labor and its produce stolen through a system of international currency that is going to eventually relegate our workers to peonage. They have placed in competition with every peon and coolie of the world because they have been sold out, as I have been saying for 15 years, on and off of this floor.

These are the issues that we ought to be confronting so that we can face the Communists somewhere and say, "Sure, we are against communism, but who dares take on the Chairman of the Federal Reserve Board?" Who in the meanwhile, leading this army of voracious, voracious elements, the ones that Jefferson reviled against and also Andrew Jackson. Why did he kill the chartering of national banks in 1837, the Second U.S. Bank? Why did Lincoln the day he was killed and the week he was killed have uppermost in his mind what was happening in that area? Well, that was the year they passed the 1864 Currency Act, the 1865 National Bank Act and he foresaw and he said and he worried about it and he spoke about it.

Then you had the recurring panics and depressions of 1892 and 1893; 1908. That gave rise to the Congress, after a lot of hearings and the Peugot committee in the House of Representatives, they finally struck off the Federal Reserve Board system.

Today, I am absolutely depressed when my fellow Congressmen say, well, you do not want to interfere with the freedom and the independence of the Federal Reserve Board. You mean we are going to let this groups of unaccountable panjandrums, who are the hirelings of the dollar barons in our country? Who have sold us out?

Why, these same banks have speculated against the American dollar every day they could for the last 10, 12 years, since Richard Nixon took us off of the so-called gold exchange and devalued the dollar; went into the so-called floating rate of exchange, which meant that the American businessman—today, anybody trying to get what they call a consumer loan from a bank will not pay less than 17 percent interest. This is what is killing us. This is what is doing us in.

The budget we passed today, that is a bubble, just a bubble. We floated it up; it is going to burst just like the others, because they are predicated on the wrong and erroneous quality.

The other thing is, the President, for whatever reason has embarked on stimulating, fostering a spirit—in fact, I call it a psychosis of war toward Russia.

Well, George Washington warned us—he said, and I am going to quote exactly:

> The nation which indulges towards another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its beauty and its interest.

Pick up the paper of last week, and you will see that the President entered into some kind of a treaty with the Chinese Communist regime, if you please. They are bold about it; make no bones. We do not know the details of that; nobody has bothered, in the Congress, to try to find out.

He entered into a secret deal. Part of it was that the Chinese Communists were supposed to buy 6 million metric tons of our wheat and grain. They reneged on that deal last year; that is why we had the farm crisis we were all reading about late last year.

But the reason was the Communist Chinese reneged on the deal. Yet, with great pomp and ceremony just last week, he had the Chinese President in the deal, the ramifications of which I do not know and I do not know of anybody else in the Congress that does.

I believe that these are the things that are making a joke of our actions and our activities and our debates and our talk.

The other notice last week was that the State of Israel was—the Ambassadors of Israel and Russia were meeting in Paris; and they were talking about some kind of a reconciliation.

Russia broke off diplomatic relations with Israel during the 1973—I believe that was the Yom Kippur war.

Now, one good thing is that if there is some reconciliation there, the United Sates undoubtedly will benefit by some kind a conciliatory move toward Russia.

Now, if we insist, however, as the President has continued to, in making the smallest country in the Western Hemisphere the scene of an East-West confrontation, making us the laughing stock of the world, any knowledgeable citizen throughout the world just laughs when General Haig says: "We are drawing the line in El Salvador, right here."

Four years later, and after $4 billion, we are nowhere near. Why? Because it is predicated on a misperception. There is no such thing as an East-West confrontation in these impoverished nations.

What is happening? It is very simple to see. It does not take an expert. You have these masses, well, now they exceed us in population by some 80 to 90 million, for the first time I guess about 15 to 20 years ago they exceeded our total population. It is another world there. They have taken oppression; their own oppressive, tyrannical master rulers have looked down upon them, treated them like dogs, killed them off like they did in El Salvador in the 1932 uprising—that was taken care of then.

Our interests; we are identified—you go to those countries and you will realize what a tremendous awe and power there is in Los Estados Unidos el Norte; the United States of the North, because the United States of the North, for instance, in Honduras, is United Fruit. In Chile, Anaconda Copper, and the like.

So they are indistinguishable; our Government and those entities.

I think the time has come when we have got to read a little bit of that history. We have got to take time out for the sake of our children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren; because the way we are going, we are growing no wiser, no better, no more civilized than the misdirected nations in Europe where you have these ancient rivalries and hatreds still boiling over, even after the war.

As a matter of fact, the great passion in some of the West German provinces or states is the Silesian refugee saying, "We've got to get Silesia back from Poland." And what is Minister Cole telling them? He is saying, well, now, wait a while, do not overcharge here; wait until we have a peace treaty.

Well, who here in this Congress has even conceived of the fact that anybody in Europe is talking about a peace treaty and defining those issues that even though they look as if they are buried, are percolating and churning and boiling underneath the surface?

That is what the President found out when he tried to get a joinder of West Europe, in trying to embargo the construction of the gas pipeline from Siberia into Western Europe. He soon found out that that pipeline, its management headquarters was over in the Ruhr; they call it Ruhr Gas. And the principal stockholders are Exxon and Mobil and the British Oil, and behind those entities are the Chase Manhattan Bank, the First City National—these are now tremendous multi-transnational entities. They can thumb their nose at any sovereign government.

In our case, we have been victimized, because once we have gone into this unsettled business of these vast exchanges, what they call the international currency exchange, which is now what? It is a speculative market. You have speculators speculating there like you do in the commodity exchanges in Chicago, and you have these very same banks, some of them trying to dodge taxes in Europe—and certainly taxes in the United States—so who talks about what I call the Latin dollar market, where not only in the Bahamas but in Panama we have this escaped capital now up in the hundred billion dollar range.

Well, every day—there is no such things as offices for this international market; you have these agents or hired hands of the banks at their computer 24 hours a day. Every day you have mass movements of over $75, $80 billion of this, and every one of that has an implication for our banking system, domestic banking system in the United States.

We are beginning, and we should have known, that if we had certain factors that were well-established since 20 years ago, 1965, some of us spoke out then, that we would have to anticipate, that we would have to try to do something.

I have not gotten up on this House floor to criticize or point my finger without having a corresponding suggestion, and I am delighted the gentleman from California [Mr. DORNAN] rose a while ago, because it gave me a chance to report on what, humbly, but very solitarily I have been trying to offer as thoughts, as resources.

Obviously, in reading the history and the contents of the Constitution, were in anticipation of such things as these.

We cannot afford that. No nation can. And how best to prepare I think is to soberly sit down and think, not to react out of emotion. Whether it is humility or humiliation, I believe our nation in its greatness can confront. What I am saying is that those of us serving in this great, vast body, are privileged class, and I am offering my advice to the privileged classes of America. As I said, my hero and the fellow I followed in this example was the famous Joel Barlow, the revolutionary poet. He was one of the ministers who served Washington's Revolutionary Army. But he was also a revolutionist and a great pamphleteer. He was a great friend of Tom Paine. He addressed such a message to the privileged orders of Europe. In my case, I am offering my messages with specific suggestions. All I have ever asked, as I have presented resolutions, is that they be duly considered by the committees that are set up for the purpose. I never have done anything frivolous. I think too much of this body and I have too much self respect in my membership of this body and how privileged a position it is to ever in frivolity offer anything. I do believe, though, most sincerely, like Shakespeare said, when we become arrogant, complacent, "but when we in our viciousness grow hard, Oh, misery on't! The wise gods seal our eyes. In our own filth drops our clear judgments. Make us adore our errors. Laugh at us while we strut to our confusion."

I appeal to my colleagues when we reunify, God willing, September 4, we pick up where we left off, realize that the real chore, no matter how politically feasible it is to explain and say we did something about the deficit, something about the budget, we have got to face the reality, for only we will be strutting to our own confusion if we do not.

PROPOSED PRISON CONSTRUCTION IN URBAN AREAS

(Mr. STOKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, recently, it has come to my attention that the mayor of Milwaukee, WI, and the Governor of the State have been embroiled in a 3-year dispute about a proposed $50.5 million prison in downtown Milwaukee.

Questions concerning the desirability and feasibility of building a prison in urban and residential areas are at the center of this particular controversy. This issue is not only controversial in Milwaukee but also in other areas around the Nation including my congressional district in Cleveland where State officials are planning to build a 500-bed medium security facility in a residential neighborhood.

Mr. Speaker, as State prison officials attempt to alleviate overcrowding in prison facilities by building new ones, more cities will be confronted with the tough prospect of having prisons built well inside city limits and possibly in residential areas.

While some prison reformers suggest that such a movement might increase the accessibility of family members to inmates, there has not been very much recent research on the overall impact of this proposal.

Specifically, there are few up-to-date studies which examine the impact of prisons in cities and residential areas on property value and security. Furthermore, to my knowledge, there also has been no substantial research exploring the balance between the number of new job opportunities which a prison facility brings with the decline in property values and opportunity for new residential development and construction.

In the Collinwood section of Cleveland, the State of Ohio plans to build a prison in the heart of a residential area. Within a 3-block radius of the proposed site on Coit Road, there are 626 housing units with 1,750 residents.

For the last several months, the proposed prison has been the source of great public debate in the Cleveland area with many area residents strongly opposing the construction of the prison.

Mr. Speaker, the debates in Milwaukee and Cleveland are indicative of the situation many urban centers may be faced with in the future. As a means of beginning the discussion in the Congress about this issue, I would like to insert in the RECORD newspaper articles on the proposed prison facility on Coit Road in Cleveland.

RESIDENTS WANT PRISON ELSEWHERE

(By Dave Rowe)

Put that thing someplace else.

That was the unmistakable theme as nearly 150 residents of the E. 140th Street and Coit Road neighborhood loudly applauded council's passage of a resolution opposing the state's plan to build a prison on the site of the old Fisher Body-Coit Road plant.

The resolution, passed unanimously, declares council's official objection to converting the old plant into a 500-bed medium security prison, largely due to "widespread community opposition."

Ward 10 Councilman Larry Jones, sponsor of the legislation, told council prior to the vote that in addition to worries about safety and housing values, his constituents also were concerned about being deprived of some of their constitutional rights.

"These are the people that pay the taxes, and pay the bills," he said, referring to the crowd in council chambers and an anti-prison crowd of more than 500 which attended a February hearing in Ward 10 conducted by the Ohio Department of Corrections. "It is unfair to impose a prison on my constituents against their wills."

Past potential sites for a "Northeast Ohio Reformatory"—originally intended to be a 1,250-bed facility located somewhere within Cuyahoga County—included Valley View and the E. 55th-Broadway area, causing Jones to say, "There, the communities got together and said, 'No.' We're basically saying the same thing."

The Coit Road area residents, many of whom stood outside with picket signs prior to the meeting, cheered loudest when Jones directly addressed Mayor George Voinovich.

"Mayor, it is unfair of you to support the prison against the will of the people," Jones said. "We're prepared to fight this issue all the way, but if the prison is built, we would not forget those individuals who allowed this to happen."

Voinovich, who along with Council President George Forbes, Gov. Richard Celeste, State Sen. Mike White (D-21) and State Rep. Ike Thompson (D-14) supports the concept of a Coit Road prison, gave no immediate response. After the meeting, he told reporters, "In the long run, I think a prison would improve the area—frankly, the safety of that area would be improved."

White, not present at the meeting but perhaps the loudest proponent of the Coit Road plan, has argued that demolition of the old auto plant and construction of the facility for mostly young, first-time offenders would mean an immediate $30 million in construction salaries, as well as more than 200 permanent jobs. He also has argued that the 49-acre Coit Road site is not suitable for any other type of development, saying, "I wish I had a Saturn plant to put in there, but I don't"

Jones, whose position is supported by Cong. Louis Stokes (D-21), argued Monday night that the site could be developed by private industry. "Instead of 200 jobs, we could be talking about 2,000 jobs," Jones said.

The decision, to come after a 13-member task force presently studying the issue delivers its recommendation, will be made by the department of corrections in conjunction with the area's elected representatives. The task force, composed of individuals selected by the elected officials and including planning director Hunter Morrison and director of economic development Gary Conley, has been told to deliver its report by May 10.

"We will not abide by their (the task force's) recommendation," Jones said Monday night. "This is a task force we have here tonight."

Besides a "task force" of angry residents, Jones also has been promised further support from some of his council colleagues.

"Instead of catching criminals, the state wants to put them into our neighborhoods as permanent resident," Ward 12 Councilman Dennis Kucinich said in vowing to work against the state's plan. "This involves the principle of local control—the right of the people to determine the future of their neighborhood."

Along similar lines, Ward 11 Councilman Michael Polensek said, "If we go and disregard their (residents') will, then we do not have a democratic body or a democratic system."

Jones, whose resolution passed through council's committee system intact and virtually unopposed, said it should have some impact on what finally happens.

"The whole city council is sending a message to the governor and the other officials telling them to choose another location," he said. "At least, I'm hoping it will have some effect on some of the advisory committee members."

Polensek, though, said it still is possible that the state will proceed with the projects in spite of the resolution. "If the state decides to go ahead and ram this down people's throats, it's be an uphill battle," he said.

PANEL PICKS COIT ROAD FOR PRISON—CLOSE VOTE, MINORITY REPORT KEEP DISSENSION ON SITE ALIVE

(By Harry Stainer)

A citizens advisory council recommended by a 5-4 vote yesterday that the state build a 500-bed reformatory on the site of the old Fisher Body plant at Coit Rd. and E. 140th St.

The proposal to build a state prison in Cleveland has been turned down at several other sites in the city since 1982. The delay in building it resulted in the size being reduced from the original $76 million and 1,250 beds to $35 million and 500 beds.

The chairman of the advisory council, the Rev. James G. Hannah, pastor of Central Christian Church, 697 E. 105th St., released copies of the majority report at a news conference at his church. Among those attending was State Sen. Michael White, D-21, of Cleveland, who has supported construction of a prison here.

A few hours later at a conference in the Bar Stop Co., a small business in the plant at 13227 Coit, the four members in the minority released their report opposing construction. Among those present were Councilman Larry A. Jones, D-10, and a representative of Rep. Louis Stokes, D-21, of Warrensville Heights, both of whom oppose the proposed site.

White said the group had agreed to abide by the majority decision and it was disquieting that the minority was holding a news conference.

Jones said that the agreement was to participate in the group and that he was speaking for the people in his ward who overwhelmingly opposed the Coit site.

Hannah, who as chairman did not vote on the issue, said that if there had been a tie, he would have voted to build the prison on Coit Rd. He was appointed to the group by the state.

Two members of the 13-member advisory council represented Mayor George V. Voinovich (a supporter of the site), but were not allowed to vote. The reason, Hannah said, was that the mayor's delegates did not attend the meetings or go on field trips. The group adopted a rule that the right to decide the issue should be given to those who attended at least three meetings, Hannah added.

The advisory council was to be the answer to delays on a decision to build a medium-security prison in Cleveland. Richard P. Seiter, director of the state Department of Rehabilitation and Correction, officially appointed the members, but elected officials submitted two names each for appointment.

Split votes appeared to indicate how difficult the decision was White, who favors the construction, saw his two voices on the council split, one for and one against. Stokes, who is against construction, saw his nominees split, one against and one abstaining.

Council President George L. Forbes' representatives both voted for construction. (City Council passed a resolution against the project, but Forbes, D-9, is a supporter.) Jones' people both voted against the project. And those named by State Rep. Ike Thompson, D-14, of Cleveland, voted for the project.

The majority voted for the prison, Hannah said, because construction would mean jobs, encourage economic development and clean up a neighborhood eyesore. Others pointed out that a local state prison would make visits easier.

The report recommended that 60% of the 215 people expected to be employed by the reformatory should be residents of Glenville-Collinwood, and that the state buy the 15 homes with backyards facing the site and use as many minority contractors as possible.

The report called for a permanent advisory committee that would be notified if more than 500 inmates were housed.

The minority report, said member Anthony Ray, concluded that despite discussion and trips to Grafton and Dayton, no evidence was submitted to support the theory that a prison could be put in a densely populated urban neighborhood.

The minority report said the 50-acre site was not large enough for a 500-bed prison, that it would create fear in the neighborhood and that the prison cells were designed for two beds, which indicates a future prison size of 1,000 beds.

Grafton, in Lorain County, would be a better choice, said the minority report, because of its space, and would be close to Cleveland for visitors.

The minority report said the wishes of only the people of Ward 10 were being ignored. Earlier proposals to build the prison in the Broadway and Valley View communities were dropped when residents protested.

The abstention came from Carl Anderson, who said he did not like the way Hannah directed the council activities.

COIT ROAD CHOSEN AS PRISON SITE

(By Joseph D. Rice)

COLUMBUS.—A 31-month search for a site for a medium-security prison in Cuyahoga County ended yesterday.

The 500-bed reformatory will be built on the site of the old General Motors Corp. Fisher Body plant at E. 140th St., and Coit Rd. in Collinwood, Richard P. Seiter, director of the state Department of Rehabilitation and Corrections, announced.

The facility will take a year to design and two more to build, said department spokesman Robert Prosser. It will house men under age 30 who are in prison for the first time, Prosser said.

Cleveland architects Richard L. Bowen and Thomas Zung will design the reformatory, which probably will have four to eight buildings, Prosser said.

Prosser said Seiter assured the Rev. James Hannah, chairman of a citizens advisory committee that recommended the site, that the state would take "deliberate efforts" to involve minority contractors in the construction.

The facility will cost an estimated $39 million.

State Sen. Michael R. White, D-21, of Cleveland, said a permanent citizens committee would be formed soon to work with state officials on the prison.

"It will be involved in everything from the landscaping and the construction to any problems that may arise from integrating the facility into the community," White said.

White said the state agreed to give preference to area residents in hiring the 215 guards, clerks, teachers, social workers and others who will work at the reformatory. The annual payroll is estimated at $3.0 million.

Rep. Louis Stokes, D-21, of Warrensville Heights, who led the fight against the Colt Rd. proposal, said yesterday he would "continue to oppose this demeaning act by the governor. . . ." He and Councilman Larry A. Jones, D-10, planned a rally against the plan at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in New Calvary Baptist Church, 722 E. 150th St.

"In his decision to place a prison in the 21st District . . . against the wishes of the residents and property owners of the Colt Rd. area, Gov. (Richard F.) Celeste has once again displayed his disrespect and distain for the people in the 21st District," Stokes said.

"I have not given up the idea that there will not be a prison," said Jones, whose ward includes the site.

Mayor George V. Voinovich, in Washington yesterday to be briefed on President Reagan's tax proposal, said he had not been opposed to the Colt Rd. site.

"In the long run, it will provide jobs and . . . ultimately an improvement in the area," he said.

"I sympathize with the people who live in the area. As the mayor, I've got to look at the big picture. I can understand their opposition, but in the long run things often work out correctly.

Voinovich and other city officials had been lobbying to have the facility in Cleveland since the correction department announced in November 1982 that it had scarpped the site of the old Standard Oil Co. (Ohio) refinery in the Flats because of chemical contamination.

Considered in the ensuing search were an adjacent site at 2929 Broadway and sites at E. 40th St. and Woodland Ave.; W. 130th St. and Bellaire Rd.; Canal and Rockside roads in Valley View; and city-owned land in Warrensville Township.

In each case, the state met community opposition or found the site was too small, its terrain unsuitable or other problems.

A minimum of 50 acres was needed. The Coit Rd. site is about 50 acres.

"This (Coit Rd.) was the only available site in Cuyahoga County that could meet the design critiera," Prosser said.

The state had originally planned to build a 1,250-bed reformatory in Cleveland. Officials decided to put 750 of the beds in Grafton in Lorain County, where a 500-bed reformatory had been planned, when it could not find a suitable site here. Graton already has an honor farm.

Stokes and some residents of the Coit Rd. area had said the prison would lower property values and pose a security problem for residents. White said studies showed there was no basis for such fears and that the area would become safer and property values would increase.

Prosser said Seiter based his decision on the majority report of the advisory committee that studied the Coit Rd. site. The committee approved it by a 5-4 vote.

"This has not been an easy public decision to make but I sincerely believe the long-term results will prove it to be the correct one," Seiter wrote Hannah.

"Housing prices will automatically go down. Would you buy a house next to a prison?" Pearson asked.

"Now maybe everybody in the area will have to buy a gun. This is wrong, entirely wrong. I feel like the black politicians sold us out. I'm, going to wait and face them on election day."

But Sebe Young, an advisory council member who supported the site, said he believe the reformatory would bring jobs and attract service industries.

"I'm 65 years old. I saw this community deteriorate. I saw the exodus to the suburbs. People, grocery stores, everything," Young said.

Asked about people who oppose the prison because they fear for their safety, Young said, "That's kind of ludicrous. It's not a prison who's going to rape your daughter. It's the man who hasn't been sent to prison."

Prosser said the reformatory would be screened from nearby homes by landscaping and that two electrified fences would surround it.

The reformatory will be the area's first. It is one of 12 new facilities planned to meet the growing prison population, now totaling 19,500 in 12 institutions.

Neighborhood Is Hot About State Corrections Decision

(By Dave Rowe)

The state and its prison apparently are going to move in and already, residents of the Coit Road area are thinking seriously of moving out.

"I'm going to consider it, and so are a lot of my neighbors," said longtime Coit Road homeowner John Baker upon learning that the state now definitely plans to build a 500-bed, medium security reformatory on the site of the old Fisher Body plant. "The property values are going to go down, and who is going to want to live in a prison camp?"

"Why put this in a residential area? They could put it out in the country somewhere," Baker said. "We've got kids here; they can't go out and play next to a prison."

"I'm bitterly against the prison, and against what it represents," said Earl Ellis, Baker's neighbor. "We protested against this think and it didn't do a darn bit of good. We even had rich people from Bratenahl protesting and it didn't do any good.

"The state doesn't give a darn about anyone's property but its own."

During the debate preceeding last week's decision, corrections department officials and State Sen. Michael White (D-21) had maintained that a prison would pose no safety threat to the neighborhood and that property values would actually increase, due to housing needs of prison employes.

"That's not what's going to happen," argued Michael Moore, another Coit Road resident. Moore, who bought his home there 12 years ago, now is taking steps to sell it. "This neighborhood is going to become totally a rental area, which means it's going to go down. Right now, most people are homeowners, but a lot of them are saying they aren't going to stay."

Moore believes efforts of Ward 10 Councilman Larry Jones and Cong. Louis Stokes (D-21) have fallen short of convincing the state to build elsewhere largely due to the lack of accountability of other elected officials.

"I think the neighborhood has been totally sold out," Moore said. "It's been sold out by Mike White, (State Rep.) Ike Thompson and by Gov. (Richard) Celeste. It's been clear from the start that the majority of people are totally against it. I think that, if they gave it a little time, the Fisher Body plant could be developed."

Dave Champion, the Park Corp.'s first and still only tenant in the huge old plant, also is unhappy with the state's decision. "With all the problems of a start-up, I certainly didn't need this," said Champion, who leased space before the state's interest in the site became public knowledge.

Bar Stop Inc., Champion's business, began customizing steel coils there last month, but Champion now is looking into potential relocation sites. "I'm going to look at a site on E. 55th Street. I'd like to stay in this area."

In the minority of area residents pleased with the news was Vernon Hollins of Coit Road. "It's excellent—it means more jobs and what this neighborhood needs is more jobs," Hollins said. "A lot of people around here don't have cars. As long as they hire people from around here, it'll be all right."

Representative Stokes Adds Voice To Fight Against Prison

(By Jim Parker)

Some 300 residents of Wards 10 and 11 cheered, applauded and amened last night while their leaders, from Congress to City Council, told them why there should be no prison in the aging, changed Collinwood community.

Leading the ticket and telling his enthusiastic audience what it wanted to hear was Rep. Louis Stokes, D-21, of Warrensville Heights.

"It is rare that I find myself in the district on a Thursday night," the nine-term congressman said, "but there is a crisis situation confronting the community tonight, and we," he said gesturing around him at the gathered political and community leaders behind the pulpit, "are here to tell you the facts."

The facts, Stokes said, are that the first proposed chairman of the citizens advisory committee on the $39-million, 500-bed medium security prison was Walter A. Burks, president of Burks Development Co., employer of State Sen. Michael R. White, D-21, and a potential contractor on the job.

White is a chief sponsor of the proposal to put the prison in the abandoned General Motors site on Coit Rd. near E. 140th St.

Stokes acknowledged that modern penal thought advocates putting prisons nearer urban areas, but "it is unknown anywhere to build one in the inner city," he said.

"If the people in that area don't want a prison, then that is my position. I don't want a prison in that part of my congressional district," Stokes said.

Later, Stokes introduced his two appointments to the advisory committee, neither of whom, perhaps strangely, live in the area.

Martha Smith, introduced by Stokes as a prolific writer and a member of The Plain Dealer's Editorial Board of Contributors, said she was initially denied her vote when she explained she could not make a particular meeting and was told the vote would not be until the next day.

She said she was allowed to vote the next day by phone.

Carl Anderson, introduced by Stokes as a Boston College graduate and a trial attorney, said he was present at the meeting where the vote was taken, but left early to study some reports.

Anderson said he was called the next day and told a vote had been taken. He asked what it was and said he was told that if he voted the way they expected it would be 5-5.

"I felt I must abstain and must make public that the process is tainted," Anderson said he told the Rev. James Hannah, committee chairman.

The committee approved the hotly contested proposal 5-4. Anderson's no vote would have resulted in a tie that would have been broken by the chairman's vote.

Hannah said later the motion to vote was made by one of the minority voters, and said there was no ramrod. Hannah said he would have cast a yes vote if needed.

Councilman Larry Jones, D-10, was joined by Councilman Michael D. Polensek, D-11, in telling the mixed, but mostly black audience that it was not too late to fight and pointed to a unanimous resolution from council opposing the prison.

Also present and acknowledged by Stokes was David Kramer, 30, a Democratic candidate for mayor.

SOME THOUGHTS ON THE USE AND MISUSE OF POWER

(By Martha L. Smith)

I am a member of the committee which met to decide the suitability of the old Fisher Body auto plant as a site for a 500-1,000 bed prison. Even though I was part of the minority who felt a prison should not be built at that location, these thoughts are not primarily about the merits of either position. It is a look at the use and misuse of power.

I do not live in Collinwood and therefore am not directly affected by the final choice. What offends me as a black and as an American is the cavalier and insulting decision to build the prison despite the overwhelmng resistance of the community.

I joined the committee willing to consider the kind of sound evidence that might outweigh my basic conviction that it is rankest paternalism to presume to know what is best for another adult.

Certain local and state politicians, the Cleveland media and those who have the audacity to prescribe for others the medicine they would not take for themselves are afflicted with a malady suffered by many of our predecessors—the Tory who did not share the Minuteman's thirst for freedom, Dred Scott's master who was chagrined that this famous slave craved liberty. At the core, it is a lack of respect for people and a failure to understand that the end does not justify the means.

The ugly ghost of racial discrimination, still defying all attempts to lay it to rest, is a strong factor here. Two Greater Cleveland neighborhoods (both white) considered as possible sites for an urban prison declined that honor. They were respected. A black community which similarly declined was not.

A Plain Dealer editorial on the topic purposely confuses the bone of contention. "But several industries are near the site—which was a Fisher Body auto plant for decades—long before most of the current neighbors lived nearby. They knew that area before they moved in."

An industry and a prison are hardly synonymous. It adds insult to injury to suggest that this is so. Such a lame defense implies a lack of strong and convincing argument.

As a black American and a realist, I am quite aware of the need for prison reform. I subscribe fully to the idea that prisons should be accessible to visiting family and friends. I know that blacks are more likely than whites to be incarcerated for minor offenses, more likely to receive capital punishment. I know all the social and spiritual ills that feed the criminal justice system. I also know that it is highly lucrative, and reform is not the goal of many of those who profit from its present form.

What I fail to understand is how building a soon-to-be overcrowded prison on Coit Rd. will address prison reform issues. What I don't know is why white protests were honored and black protests were dismissed as the ignorant whining of persons who haven't enough sense to know what is good for them.

Another point must be made: It seems that the white politicians who represented the neighborhoods which turned down the golden opportunity to improve their communities with a prison listened to their constituents. They told prison director Richard Seiter thanks but no thanks. Some black politicial representatives apparently chose to do otherwise. They ignored their constituents. The oppressed turning oppressor is a sad and fascinating phenomenon.

If the prison is build on Coit Rd., in the face of overwhelming community opposition and insufficient space to humanely house 500 prisoners, it will be another chapter in the countless volumes on the misuse of power.

Force feeding, even for high and noble aims, is never the better way. When it is used to reach goals which, when shorn of rhetoric have little merit; it is not only dehumanizing but ultimately counterproductive.

IT SEEMS CHEAPER TO BUILD PRISONS

(By Richard M. Peery)

A couple of seemingly unrelated decisions in the past few weeks may tell more about the future of this community than all of the ballyhooed study plans that periodically paper the city. Cleveland is not known for civic cooperation, but seldom have a pair of actions from separate governmental agencies matched so well.

Among the cutbacks the Cleveland Board of Education is making to cope with a budget crunch is closing the Woodland Job Center, a unique training institution that gives another chance to school dropouts and pupils who require special counseling and remedial training to make it into the workaday world.

At the same time, Gov. Richard F. Celeste, Mayor George V. Voinovich and other leading local politicians have put their stamp of approval on a proposal to build a prison on the site of the former General Motors Coit Rd. factory where thousands used to work.

The job center's average enrollment has been about 500 students a quarter. The $38 million medium security reformatory is to have room for 500 inmates.

Only an uninformed cynic would suggest a deliberate connection. The decision makers in the school system certainly did not base the job center closing on communication with the prison builders. It's just that the facts dovetail so well.

But any similarity ends when it comes to the way community leaders have reacted to the two proposals. There was no response from local officeholders when the school board members said they were closing the job center reluctantly as a money saving move. On the other hand, a lot of elected officials have turned the prison's construction into a crusade.

These are politicans who remained absolutely silent as the school board laid off teachers' aides, reduced the staffs at magnet schools and got entirely out of the business of training adults in apprenticeship programs.

Yet, many of the politicians have shown the greatest compassion for the plight of prisoners in overcrowded jails. Their sympathy is certainly justified. Ohio's prisons are mass atrocities. State Sen. Michael White, D-21, is absolutely right when he says prisons should be built where family members and social service professionals have easy access to aid in rehabilitation.

But maybe just building more cells is an exercise in simplistic straw grasping rather than a serious way to meet the problems of overcrowded prisons and the fear of crime.

New prisons that are supposed to relieve overcrowding often have a way of becoming jammed beyond capacity themselves. There are more people behind bars now than ever before in history and they are serving longer sentences. Yet, the fear of crime does not seem to abate. Maybe we should be trying some other things with the money.

One of them could be keeping places like the Woodland Job Center open. Such schools might accurately be called prison-preventers because they train people to earn their own way. Poverty does not force anyone into a life of crime, but the best evidence is that it makes an illegal career harder to avoid. It's easier to be law-abiding when you have money in your pocket.

Records show that more than half of the job center's graduates have gone on to become wage earners. That's a lot when you consider the chances of the unskilled before they came to the school.

Of course, schools are less spectacular than prison projects. And those politicians whose mouths water when they smell construction contracts may not see the value of building people instead of buildings.

But wouldn't it be nice if they put as much energy into giving people a chance to keep out of jail as they do in fighting for new places to put them?

LINING UP AT THE TROUGH

A good case for building a prison in Collinwood is being undermined by the propensity of certain politicians to indulge in cronyism, conflicts of interests and political feuds.

The Coit Rd. decision was no sooner announced when it was learned that the property owner, Park Corp., is represented by Council President George L. Forbes' law firm. Park had had a hard time unloading the former Fisher Body plant. With the state coming to the rescue, it remains to be seen whether the state will buy it for the $300,000 that Park has said the property is worth.

In recent days, Rep. Louis Stokes has been blasting a potential challenger for his job—state Sen. Michael White—for promoting a prison in Cleveland to benefit White's private-sector boss, Walter Burks. White no longer works for the Burks Development Co., which was to oversee the prison construction. But having a different title in Burks' empire does not change the aroma of a conflict.

Nor is the air made any cleaner by the reported switch of Burks' contract from Colt Rd. to another prison project in Grafton. William Sykes, the state bureaucrat in charge of making crony decisions look rational, says no decision has been made on construction managers. Nonetheless, the word clearly is out in government and industry circles.

Burks also is co-manager of the W.O. Walker worker rehabilitation center being built, at long last, at Euclid Ave. and E. 105th St. The other manager is Snavely Construction Co., whose owner, Thomas Snavely, is a former business associate of Gov. Celeste's father, Frank.

Both Burks and Snavely are experienced construction people. For a contractor to have political ties is not unusual, especially to get government contracts. Since Burks is a longtime friend and supporter of the governor, he did not need White to put in a word with Celeste. But White did help rally public support for the Coit site. Otherwise, Cleveland would have lost the prison to Grafton, and with it a separate construction contract.

White stuck his neck out politically in behalf of the governor and the reform-minded concept of an urban location for a prison. He is savvy enough to have sought legal rulings on his ties to Burks. They may hold up technically, but they don't wash publicly. He and his wife both work for an employer getting a contract on a project White promoted.

The administration is right in seeking qualified minority contractors. And its deals with political chums may be no more rampant than in regimes that were more discrete. But the prison has dumped the governor into another quagmire. When Celeste promised an end to business as usual, nobody thought he meant doing business ineptly.

COIT CONTRACTORS GOT WORD EARLY

(By John S. Long)

The state officially announced the construction managers for the Coit Rd. and Grafton prisons yesterday, nearly three weeks after it quietly selected and informed the companies they would be getting the work.

Gilbane Construction Co. will operate in a combined venture with Burks Development Co. and Polytech Inc. as construction manager at the Coit Rd. site, although the state has yet to purchase the location from the Park Corp.

Construction managers at the Grafton prison will include Turner Construction Co. along with Ozanne Construction, Los Primos Inc. and Mary Zunt Associates.

Construction managers oversee building projects and generally are paid 5% of the total contract price. It is estimated each prison will cost $40 million, so construction managers on each project would divide $2 million.

The Plain Dealer reported last week the state had chosen Gilbane-Burks for Coit Rd. and Turner-Ozanne for Grafton before it had announced that Coit Rd. would be the location for the Cleveland area prison.

But the state considered switching the contracts because the administration of Gov. Richard F. Celeste feared conflict of interest charges since State Sen. Michael R. White, D-21, of Cleveland, a main force supporting the selection of the Coit Rd. site, is a business partner of Walter Burks, president of Burks Development Co.

White said last week he disagreed with the idea of switching the contractors because it added to the appearance of a conflict.

Yesterday he said Gilbane-Burks competed and won and should not be penalized because of its associates or because of unfounded innuendo. "They won without involvement from me or the governor's office," White said.

Burks was not the only politically connected firm to be awarded a construction-management contract yesterday.

Los Primos, a Canton-based minority firm, is owned by Roy Gutierrez, a Canton lawyer who is also chairman of the Stark County Democratic Party. Mary Zunt is a former Cleveland city councilwoman.

Los Primos and Mary Zunt do not have the construction management background the other firms have and will provide "less technical and more supportive services to the management team," said Gretchen Hall, state Department of Administrative Services spokeswoman. Hall said she did not know what those services entailed.

The Coit Rd. prison site has been a center of controversy among some area residents who said the prison would lower property values and be a security problem. This contingent has been led by Rep. Louis Stokes, D-21, of Warrensville Heights.

White has led those supporting the site. He has said studies show there was no basis for the fears. He predicted the area would become safer and property values would increase after the 500-bed prison was built.

The property had been a General Motors Corp. Fisher Body plant until the automaker halted production in August 1983. It was sold the next April.

CONFLICT DENIED, CLEVELAND JAIL PACT AWARDED

(By John Funk)

Despite questions about conflict of interest, the Ohio Department of Administrative Services has awarded a Cleveland prison construction contract to a former employer of state Sen. Mike White, D-Cleveland, a chief proponent of the prison.

The department, a division of Gov. Richard F. Celeste's administration that awards contracts and makes purchases, awarded on Tuesday the construction of the Coit Road prison to a consortium of three companies, including the Burks Development Co.

Until June 1, Burks employed Sen. White as a sales representative. He also did administrative work for the company. Additionally, company president Walter Burks and White have been business partners in the recent past.

When it became clear that Burks was a contender for the $30 million Coit Road prison project, U.S. Rep. Louis Stokes, D-Warrensville Heights, and others raised questions about a possible conflict of interest. White acknowledged the appearance of a conflict but denied any and said he had kept state officials, including the attorney general, apprised on his situation.

White said last week that he had been cleared of any potential conflict of interest. He said his decision to quit Burks was unrelated.

Gretchen Hull, a spokesperson for Administrative Services, had no comment Tuesday on the question of conflict of interest.

Burks, a minority-headed company, will be paired with Polytech, another minority-headed company, and the Gilbane Building Co., a major contractor, Ms. Hull said.

Gilbane-Polytech is the joint venture contractor for the Sohio Building in downtown Cleveland.

"Obviously, the administration is anxious to aid and develop small, minority firms. And the best way is to link them with large companies like this," Ms. Hull said. Stokes could not be reached for comment Tuesday.

Administrative Services also awarded a second prison construction contract for $36 million in Grafton to a similar joint venture of minority-headed firms tied to a major contractor. That joint venture will involve the Turner Construction Co. and minority firms of Ozanne Construction, Los Primos and Mary Zunt Associates.

Ms. Zunt is a former Cleveland council member.

Ms. Hull said she could not comment on reports from sources close to the prison projects that the state had planned to switch the two projects to avoid the appearance of a conflict.

The state is negotiating to buy a 46-acre parcel at Coit Road and East 140th Street in Cleveland for the new 500-bed medium security prison, Ms. Hull said.

In addition to Stokes, Cleveland City Council is opposed to a prison at that location because it is a residential area.

STATE READY TO PAY 16 TIMES LAST PRICE OF PRISON SITE LAND

(By Joseph D. Rice and John Long)

Ohio has budgeted $3 million to $5 million to buy land for a prison site in Cleveland. The owner of the land paid $300,000 for it about a year ago. The state could have bought the land for $1.8 million about 18 months ago.

Daniel Shields, state public works director, said a new appraisal of the property, the former General Motors Corp.'s Fisher Body plant on Coit Rd. near E. 140th St., should be done by August.

State Corrections Director Richard P. Seiter said he expected to pay less than $3 million to $5 million for the land, but declined to discuss the amount he had in mind.

"But everybody that's dealt with me thinks I'm pretty cheap, from the corporations to the contract managers," said Seiter.

The state refused to pay $1.8 million for the land nearly 18 months ago. About three months later, GM sold the property to a non-profit group that resold it the same day to Park Corp., the present owner.

Park Corp. stands to reap millions in profit—as much as $8.5 million by one estimate—from sale of the land and auctioning equipment bought separately.

County Auditor J. Timothy McCormack assessed the property at $8.2 million in 1983 when GM said it was worth $4.8 million. Park Corp. has asked the county board of revision, which decides appeals on tax appraisals, to cut the value to $300,000.

Park bought it for $300,000 in April 1984 from the National Council for Community Development Inc. Park Corp. paid $200,000 for equipment GM left. The equipment was assessed by the county at $3.9 million in 1984.

Earlier this month, Park auctioned off much of the equipment. Park officials did not return numerous calls from The Plain Dealer seeking to find out how much the equipment sold for. If the auction brought the full assessed value and the state paid $5 million, Park could realize a profit of $8.5 million.

GM closed the 65-year-old Coit Rd. plant in September 1983 and tried to sell the 1.6 million-square-foot building and its 46 acres or donate them to charity and take a tax deduction.

In late 1983, Ostendorf-Morris Co., a Cleveland company specializing in selling commercial property, approached the Ohio Department of Rehabilitation and Correction about buying the plant as a penitentiary site. Joseph Ditchman, Ostendorf-Morris vice president, said GM wanted $1.8 million but was open to offers.

Seiter said he rejected the offer because the state was looking then for at least 70 acres for a 1,250-bed medium-security prison. Earlier this year, Seiter changed plans and decided to move 750 of the proposed beds to the Grafton prison, in Lorain County, and build a 500-bed prison on the smaller Coit Rd. site.

In early 1984, GM offered the property to the National Council, a nonprofit New York corporation that tries to create jobs and build tax bases in cities. National Council initially rejected the idea.

"GM came to us and said they wanted to donate the property to us," said National Council Executive Director Robert W. Davenport. "We said, "That's very kind, but we have no way of taking care of it and won't accept it until we have a buyer for it."

Canter said under federal tax law, GM could not restrict future use of the property if the corporation wanted a tax deduction.

Davenport said the council did not restrict future use when it sold the plant to Park. "It was our understanding and Park's intention to subdivide it and turn it into smaller units, "Davenport said. "I have no reason to believe they (Park) weren't totally sincere when they took the property from us.

"Our whole public purpose is to create jobs for the community. We never would have stood still for the type of transaction (for a prison) that it is now likely to be.

"When I found out that was going to be turned into a prison, I was in a state of shock. That's not what we intended it to be," Davenport said.

Davenport said nothing can be done because Park owns the property. In future sales, he said, he will try to write in guarantees so the land will be used only to create jobs.

Davenport said he did not know how the sale price to Park was agreed on, and speculated it might have been the only offer the council received. But a realtor involved in the sale, who asked not to be identified, said many people had been interested in the property.

The PD, without mentioning names, described the deal to IRS spokesman Steve Pyrek in Washington and asked if the sale for below market value violated any laws.

Pyrek said of the transactions, "It doesn't sound to me as if it should be . . . but I'm no expert. It sounds real shady, but I don't know specifically if it is."

Pyrek said there was nothing wrong with a non-profit organization's obtaining property and selling it the same day, as long as "the charity sells the land for fair market value."

When asked whether the IRS considered a $300,000 price tag for land valued between $5 million and $8 million as fair market value, Pyrek said it depended on the specific circumstances of the sale.

"That brings up all sorts of questions," said Pyrek. "It could be a problem, it is quite possible that is a problem, but it is tough to generalize in cases like these."

"There is no obligation to sell at fair market value," Canter said. "The market value assumes you had a rational profit maximizer, with wherewithal to maximize potential Charities don't.

"If you are a charity and you receive a property, what are you going do do with it? You liquidate it. Any charity will liquidate as soon as possible," Canter said.

National Council found a buyer—Park Corp.—through Ostendorf-Morris.

The sale to the council and then to Park occurred about the month after Park officials learned the land had been discussed as a potential site for a prison, sources told The Plain Dealer. Soon after it purchased the Coit Rd. land, Park resumed sale talks with state corrections officials.

Davenport said the council got the GM plant in a "bargain sale. A bargain sale is the technical name for a donation which is (part) donation and part sale," explained Davenport in a letter to Rep. Louis Stokes' office.

Davenport told Stokes, D-21, of Warrensville Heights, an opponent of building a prison on Coit Rd., the council did not know Park Corp. would try to sell the land to the state for a prison.

"A prison does not meet the economic development objectives the council pursues," Davenport's letter said. "Had we any idea that the property would be so utilized, we would not have participated in the transaction."

The council also does not become involved in a piece of property with "a negative social, or economic nature," he wrote.

[From the Plain Dealer, July 7, 1985]

PLAYING "THE PRICE IS RIGHT"

In a deal with a repugnant odor, Ohio may spend two or three times as much as it could have spent 18 months ago for the Coit Rd. prison site.

Not that anything has been proven illegal, mind you, but something is seriously wrong when $3 million to $5 million is set aside for property that was offered for $1.8 million in late 1983.

Something is seriously wrong when estimated values and actual sales vary widely. The county auditor assessed the former auto plant at $8.2 million in 1983, but General Motors claimed it to be worth $4.8 million. In a tax writeoff, GM unloaded it for $300,000 to a charity, which instantly resold land and buildings for that amount, but profited by peddling $3.9 million in equipment for $200,000.

Something is seriously wrong when the state could wind up paying a whopping 10 to 16 times more than the Park Corp. paid for the same property in April 1984.

Perhaps the politically connected Park Corp. simply was practicing basic free enterprise by shrewd deals. If property and equipment resales bring top dollar, Park could realize more than $8 million on a $500,000 investment—made only after Park learned the state was interested in the site.

Perhaps something more is involved in this tidy arrangement that would involve millions of tax dollars. How can there be such wild swings in the value of a piece of property—from $8.2 million down to $300,000 them up to as much as $5 million—all in just two years?

The Celeste administration does not have to pay as much as is provided in the new state budget. The $5 million is maximum. Nor does Park, which must continue to do business in this city and state, need to ask an exhorbitant price

There are sound reasons that favor building a prison in Cleveland and using the Coit Rd. property. But so far the project has reinforced the state's experience that it is nearly impossible to do anything constructive in Cleveland because of chronic political infighting and money shenanigans. The price ploy as the kind of issue that twitches the nostrils of IRS sleuths, enrages the taxpaying public and enlivens a gubernatorial campaign.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

TELECOMMUNICATIONS TRADE ACT OF 1985

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO
OF NEW JERSEY
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, the Telecommunications Trade Act of 1985, H.R. 3131, which we are introducing today is not intended to send our foreign competitors a "signal"; it is instead intended to convey a promise. The promise is that unless foreign markets are opened to competitive U.S. telecommunications equipment and services in the immediate future, the United States take unilateral action to restrict the access of foreign telecommunications firms to our own domestic market.

We do not make this promise in a vain effort to protect a noncompetitive industry. In almost every respect—quality, technological innovation—the U.S. telecommunications industry is comparable or superior to its foreign competition.

Instead, we make this promise in recognition that even America's most competitive industry cannot penetrate the formal and informal barriers that have kept most major foreign telecommunications markets closed to U.S. equipment and services.

The breakup of the AT&T system was the most recent of a series of regulatory and judicial actions which have had the effect of opening, on a nonreciprocal basis, the U.S. market to imports of telecommunications equipment. As a result, imports of telecommunications equipment into the United States have risen sharply.

The increasing access which foreign producers have gained to our domestic telecommunications equipment market has not been matched by equivalent market opportunity for U.S. equipment producers abroad. Foreign markets in the industrialized nations remain largely closed to U.S. telecommunications products, reflecting factors such as the strong preference of domestic post and telecommunications authorities for domestic suppliers, "buy national" industrial policies, and a variety of tariff and nontariff barriers. As as result of this lack of balance in market opportunities, the U.S. balance of trade in telecommunications equipment is deteriorating dramatically.

Last year alone, foreign telecommunications equipment coming into the U.S. jumped more than 25 percent over the year before. During the same time, U.S. telecommunications equipment exports remained almost constant. As a result, the U.S. telecommunications balance of trade has gone from a surplus of almost $1 billion in 1980 to a deficit of over $600 million in 1984.

Left untended, the situation promises to grow far worse this year. The Regional Bell Operating Cos. are planning major purchases of sophisticated equipment to maintain and update our Nation's huge telecommunications network. It now appears likely that a large share of these purchases may go to foreign suppliers most of whom, unlike American producers, are protected against foreign competition in their home markets. Unable to compete in foreign markets, American producers of telecommunications equipment may also soon be unable to compete in our own domestic market unless remedies are imposed.

We believe it is important for our trading partners to understand very clearly that we cannot, and we will not, stand idly by while one of our premier industries is destroyed due to unfair trade relations. Either the opportunity to compete in the international telecommunications market must be greatly increased, or new conditions governing foreign access and participation in our own domestic market must be implemented. The administration has expressed its concern over the imbalance in market opportunities in telecommunications equipment trade and is currently seeking to negotiate greater market access for U.S. companies abroad.

We are all hopeful that negotiations will produce the changes in policy that will allow U.S. firms to compete for their rightful share of foreign markets. This bill would provide ample time for negotiations to be held, their results implemented and their effects to be demonstrated before sanctions could be imposed in the U.S. market.

In the event these efforts do not yield immediate and significant benefits for American firms seeking access to foreign markets, we feel it is only fair that our trading partners know there is a strong and growing commitment in the Congress to impose sanctions on foreign access to the U.S. market.

This is a matter of the utmost importance to our Nation. We feel the bill we are introducing today provides a workable mechanism for achieving the goal of access to foreign markets that we all seek. The bill sets forth the following procedures for identifying foreign telecommunications markets that may be restricting participation for U.S. suppliers and the steps to be taken in order to open up those markets.

After contemplated negotiations occur—the bill does not take effect until July, 1986 to permit negotiations and their results to be felt—the Secretary of Commerce is required to determine whether any foreign country which might provide a substantial market for U.S. telecommunications suppliers is denying equivalent market access to U.S. producers of telecommunications equipment and services.

In addition to the Secretary's initial investigation, any interested person can petition the Secretary to find that a foreign market is denying equivalent access to U.S. suppliers.

If the Secretary finds that a foreign country is denying access, the President would be required to take enforcement action by directing the FCC to restrict access to the U.S. telecommunications market—the earliest time that a Presidential sanction could be imposed would be January or February of 1987. Such enforcement action would be directed at producers of foreign telecommunications equipment only.

If the President takes action under section 301 of the Trade Act of 1974, however, he would not be required to implement restrictions through the FCC.

The Secretary must conduct an annual review to determine whether the purposes of the act are being fulfilled.

The bill is sponsored by 26 Members, including 22 members of the Committee on Energy and Commerce. It should also be noted that the bill has strong support from our Republican colleagues, including Mr. LENT, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism which I chair, and Mr. RINALDO, the ranking minority member of the Subcommittee on Telecommunications, Consumer Protection and Finance.

The bill has also received strong industry backing. At this time, Mr. Speaker, I request permission to insert in the RECORD statements of support from the Electronic Industries Association, AT&T, and the U.S. Chamber of Commerce.

ELECTRONIC INDUSTRIES ASSOCIATION,
July 26, 1985.

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Chairman, Commerce, Transportation, and Tourism Subcommittee, Energy and Commerce Committee, House of Representatives, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. FLORIO: The Information and Telecommunications Technologies Group of Electronic Industries Association (EIA/ITG) has been provided with a draft copy of a bill which we understand will be introduced by yourself and Congressman Wirth. We have circulated the bill to our members, and they have overwhelmingly endorsed the approach you are taking to address our critical trade problem. They have also indicated that they want EIA/ITG to work on their behalf for passage of the bill and that they will also be working to line up co-sponsors.

Our members represent over 90% of the telecommunications equipment manufactured in the United States. On their behalf, I would like to thank you for your interest and support in helping us open up foreign markets to competitive US products.

Sincerely,

JOHN J. MCDONNELL, JR.,
Group Vice President, Information and Telecommunications Technologies Group.

U.S. CHAMBER PRAISES EFFORTS TO OPEN TELECOMMUNICATIONS MARKETS

WASHINGTON, July 31.—The U.S. Chamber of Commerce today praised Reps. Timothy Wirth, D-Colo., and James Florio, D-N.J., for their leadership in introducing legislation seeking broader access for American exports to foreign telecommunications markets.

"American industry seeks truly free and open trade in telecommunications products and services," said Wolf Brueckmann, director of international investment policy for the Chamber. "We applaud the efforts of Wirth and Florio to address specific barriers to these products and services. We are encouraged by their continued willingness to work closely with the business community to develop credible negotiating leverage for our government to open telecommunications markets worldwide."

Brueckmann has been coordinating a working group of business associations and companies which has been active since last year with Senate and House committees working on telecommunications legislation. In further comments, the Chamber official emphasized that the following principles should be incorporated into any telecommunications legislation:

The air of U.S.-initiated negotiations should be to achieve open trade in telecommunications products and services.

Legislation should provide a mandate to the administration to negotiate the reduction or elimination of barriers to telecommunications trade and should include the authority to negotiate the elimination of any remaining U.S. barriers.

Progress toward greater access should be determined by monitoring the results of existing and future trade agreements to assure that all barriers are removed.

The U.S. Government should take flexible and credible action to enforce existing agreements and to restore competitive opportunities if negotiations fail to produce significant progress toward a more open market.

Any bilateral agreements entered into by the U.S. government should be supportive of future multilateral negotiations and the international trade and investment system.

To the extent possible, legislation should encourage the use of existing U.S. government trade authority.

The following statement was issued today by Gerald M. Lowrie, AT&T senior vice president for public affairs, regarding legislation introduced by members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee:

AT&T is encouraged that key members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee have focused attention in a bipartisan manner on the critical problems that American companies face in selling telecommunications equipment abroad.

As in the Senate, this is most encouraging because this matter goes beyond party and politics. It affects the creation of new jobs at home and the strengthening of America's competitive position abroad.

But beyond these major considerations is another. It is sometimes overlooked but it transcends international borders and trade barriers. For the fact is that, in the rapidly evolving Information Age, nations and their people everywhere stand to gain by having access to the most modern telecommunications technology and services. In a spirit of mutual accommodation, the United States is in a unique position to make a significant contribution in this effort providing it is allowed to do so.

So we welcome the House initiative along with previous legislation proposed in the Senate by Senator Danforth. AT&T will continue to speak out on this issue and will watch closely the efforts by the Administration and the Congress to forge effective new public policy in this key area.

Mr. WIRTH's subcommittee and the subcommittee I chair will hold joint hearings on this legislation on Wednesday, September 18, 1985. I urge my colleagues to give this initiative their strong support.

Thank you.●

HIGH TECHNOLOGY ACTIVE BUSINESS ACT OF 1985

HON. JUDD GREGG

OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. GREGG. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join today with Mr. STARK

in introducing the High Technology Active Business Act of 1985, a bill that addresses the problem of the application of the personal holding company penalty tax upon small software companies.

The personal holding company penalty tax provisions were adopted decades ago, at a time when corporate tax rates were significantly lower than the top individual rates, to prevent the incorporation of passive investment activities in a closely held company. By contrast to this passive investment repository and "one-man corporation" case which Congress intended to address in adopting the personal holding company provisions, software companies clearly are engaged in substantial active business activities on an ongoing basis, including the continuous development of new software products and improvements, maintenance, and updates with respect to existing software products.

The personal holding company provisions are triggered in the case of small software companies because these companies, by reason of their size, are closely held and because the software industry sells its products by way of licenses to the general public—the so-called "box-top" license, computer manufacturers, and other customers. The software products are transferred via license for the fundamentally important business purpose of protecting the software company's proprietary rights in the software. However, the Internal Revenue Service has taken the position—which I believe to be an incorect interpretation of present law—that the income resulting from these transfers of software products, characterized as royalties, constitutes personal holding company income. As the result, the software company becomes subject to the 50 percent personal holding company penalty tax that is imposed on top of the regular corporate income tax already paid by the software company.

Since the personal holding company provisions were enacted to discourage the incorporation of passive investment activities, the imposition of this penalty tax on software companies conducting extensive active business operations on an ongoing basis produces unintended and extremely harsh results. This severe problem affects small software companies throughout the country. The imposition of this penalty tax—or the alternative, a dividend distribution of essentially all of the corporation's income—could well force many small software companies, which presently plow the bulk of their after-tax income back into the development of new software products, out of business by depriving these companies of the funds necessary to conduct current production activities as well as to undertake the R&D necessary to maintain their competitive edge.

I believe that the proposed legislation addresses this software personal holding company problem in a fair and carefully circumscribed manner by adopting a new exclusion from personal holding company income for computer software royalties that are earned by a company in the active conduct of a trade or business. Consistent with the "mechanical" nature of the personal holding company provisions, the legislation adopts a series of objective, numerical tests for determining whether the software royalties were derived from an active business. The structure and approach of this new exclusion are quite similar to the nearly one dozen other "carve-outs" from the personal holding company provisions that have been adopted by Congress over the years as various other types of active businesses have become entangled in the personal holding company provisions because these mechanical provisions have failed to keep pace with the changing way in which such companies do business. The proposed exclusion has been carefully crafted with various protections to ensure that it applies only to truly active business activities.

While the new exclusion for software royalties that are derived in the active conduct of a trade or business would be effective with respect to taxable years ending after date of enactment, the legislation also is intended to clarify the proper treatment of computer software royalties under present law for personal holding company purposes.

The legislation also includes a technical correction of an unintended problem that arises under changes to the minimum tax made by the 1982 Tax Act. Under the 1982 act, code section 174, R&D expenses are treated as a minimum tax preference item for personal holding companies—but not for corporations generally. As the result, startup high technology companies that are treated as personal holding companies because their only income during the startup phase is the interest derived from their balances of working capital have their loss carryforwards "tainted" such that, in future years when the loss carryforwards are offset against operating profits, the companies will be subject to minimum tax liability on 90 percent of the R&D that had been expended in the startup taxable years in which the loss carryforwards were generated. To address this problem, the legislation removes R&D expenses as a minimum tax preference item for personal holding companies.

I would expect this legislation to be noncontroversial and would hope that it can be promptly considered and enacted by Congress.●

STRESSING THE NEED FOR POSITIVE REFORMS WITHIN THE MULTILATERAL DEVELOPMENT BANKS

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration is in the midst of a major effort to reform the lending policies of the multilateral development banks to which we annually contribute millions of dollars from our foreign aid programs. Many of the reforms stressed by the administration are based upon those I suggested during my years of work overseeing funding for these programs.

It is no coincidence that at the forefront of the administration's effort to reform the policies of these multilateral banks is Deputy Assistant Secretary of the Treasury James W. Conrow, who formerly was my associate staff member responsible for foreign aid appropriations. Together, Jim and I called attention to many of the excesses and poor policies at these banks and developed sound alternatives to improve their lending policies. Among the recommendations we repeatedly made over the years was the importance of changing multilateral bank policies so that they promote economic growth through investments in private companies and organizations rather than continuing to loan money to Government agencies to create Government supported that stymie economic growth and development.

Jim Conrow delivered this message in May to the annual meeting of the Asian Development Bank. He said the United States will determine future levels of support for the banks based on our assessment of the effectiveness of the banks and the extent to which they develop significant policy reforms to encourage economic growth through the private sector.

The Wall Street Journal published on July 25 excerpts from Jim's speech and commented in an editorial that his "ideas are forming the basis of a new development consensus." Following my remarks I would like to include his remarks and the editorial because they are indicative of the important steps the Reagan administration is taking to reform the policies of the multilateral banks—reforms I have advocated for many years.

The articles follow:

U.S. AGENDA FOR REFORMING ASIAN LENDING

At the annual meeting of the Manila-based Asian Development Bank in May, the U.S., the ADB's second-largest donor (after Japan), urged lending policies that help private businesses, not governments. That stance was reiterated at a June 17 meeting of donor nations to the ADB's "soft-loan" window, the Asian Development Fund. The U.S., in a speech by James W. Conrow, a deputy assistant secretary of the Treasury, said it won't continue contributing unless the fund makes major policy changes. Though the meeting was confidential, we've obtained a copy of Mr. Conrow's talk and reprint portions of it below. (See related editorial nearby.)

While most of the world's great economic success stories of the past 30 years are located in the [Asia-Pacific] region, there is also a group of countries that for one reason or another continue to have serious economic problems. The Asian Development Fund . . . serves these countries. The ADF can potentially serve an invaluable function, if it can assist in transforming the problem cases into success stories—by acting as a catalyst for policy changes. . . .

We have been a supporter of the fund since it was created and fully intend to participate in the upcoming negotiations for the fourth replenishment. However . . . we have taken absolutely no decisions on the level of our participation. That will be partially dependent on the results of a review we have under way on the effectiveness of the various MDBs [multilateral development banks]. . . .

I can say that our participation will be critically dependent on the extent to which we are satisfied that the fund is prepared to adopt policy reforms that will enable it to assist in transforming the economies of its recipients more in line with those of the region's success stories.

The United States regards the present paper [prepared by the ADB] as a disappointing extrapolation of past replenishment exercises with little original thinking to meet present-day realities. . . . Let me now list some of our policy concerns and say why I think they are important.

Hardening of terms: The U.S. wants a comprehensive review of ADF terms and conditions, the first since the creation of the ADF.

The degree of the concessionality in ADF financing has increased sharply since 1961. . . . The present terms no longer reflect the high cost imposed on donors under intense budgetary constraints.

A comparatively modest hardening of terms would . . . significantly increase the number of development projects funded over time. . . . ADF must make this effort to become more self-financing. The Bank self-finances more than 30% of its lending, compared with less than 8% in ADF.

We would like to see . . . hardening the terms to, say, 3%-4% interest [from 1%] during the grace period and 5%-7% thereafter as well as a shortening of the grace period to seven years [from 10] and the repayment period reduced to 25 years [from 40]. . . .

Improved policies to help the private sector: [Management must] extend the benefits of equity lending to the private sector without a government guarantee to ADF countries. . . .

A further important element of this approach is to establish firm guidelines for the funding of para-statal organizations [state-owned or state-run companies]. The U.S. has an internal review of MDB assistance in privatization and assistance to para-statals under way. . . . We believe that assistance to para-statals . . . should be reduced sharply or eliminated in those instances where a viable private-sector alternative exists.

The ADF as a financial catalyst: [T]he ADF should maximize its development impact by funding more projects while taking a smaller share of each one by mobilizing other sources of funding.

Regularization of funding for [technical assistance]: We would like to see an enhanced role for technical assistance in the Bank's operations . . . to effect market-oriented growth policies.

The United States proposes that a small portion (1% to 2%) of ADF funds be earmarked for technical assistance in the ADF-eligible countries. . . .

Management of the ADB: The increased assistance to the private sector and an enhanced policy role for technical assistance will require strengthened personnel policies and, in many cases, personnel with different skills than those currently on board. . . . This will require effective evaluation and termination policies for those whose skills no longer match the Bank's needs.

[From the Wall Street Journal, July 25, 1985]

NO MORE EASY MONEY

Imagine that you're a bureaucrat in a poor country with little government revenue. You have a lonely job. Then one day along comes a well-dressed foreigner offering millions of dollars if only you'll write a proposal to build a dam, or an irrigation ditch or something. Do you say, no thanks, the private sector can do it better? Or do you take the money and run?

You take the money, or course. And that's more or less what has happened for 40 years as the world's big development banks have passed around easy money to the very poorest countries through their "soft-loan" windows.

These glory days are just about over, however. As part of its campaign to make the Asian Development Bank do more for real development, the Reagan administration is paying special attention to the bank's soft-loan window, the Asian Development Fund. Elsewhere on this page, we print excerpts from a confidential speech given last month by James W. Conrow of the U.S. Treasury to an ADF donors' meeting in Rome.

Mr. Conrow pulls few punches, saying that the U.S. won't contribute unless the ADF's policies change to promote growth. More than anything else, this means relying far less on governments and more on the private companies and individuals who are the real wellsprings of growth. In particular, the U.S. wants the ADF to stop creating government companies. But it also wants the ADF to set stiffer terms for borrowers, thus applying market discipline to development projects.

Some will try to portray all this as American stinginess, especially because ADF money goes to only the poorest Asian countries such as Bangladesh, Sri Lanka and Pakistan. But it is no accident that these South Asian countries, with large public sectors inherited in part from the British, have remained the poorest in Asia. The East and Southeast Asian countries that have relied more on the private sector have grown much faster.

Ideology hasn't much to do with the U.S. position. The issue is what works. In the past, ADF money has created government monopolies, thus foreclosing all possibilities for greater efficiency through competition among profit-minded private concerns.

What's going on here involves much more than just the Asian Development Bank. The ADF debate is really part of a sea change taking place in the philosophy of economic development. The Robert McNamara-World Bank orthodoxy of lending to governments is giving way to the East Asian example of incentive-led private growth. The tired dialogue of the rich North "aiding" the poor South is giving way to ideas about how the South can make itself rich.

In the case of the ADF, the U.S. is taking the visible lead. But ADB sources tell us that June's donors' meeting was actually one of the least contentious in years. Mr. Conrow's ideas are forming the basis of a new development consensus—one much more likely to really help the poor.●

STEEL RESEARCH INITIATIVE

HON. DOUG WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, the Interior appropriations bill before the House today, H.R. 3011, includes $10 million for a cost-shared steel technology research and development initiative. This will provide funding for an initiative which the Science and Technology Committee accepted at my suggestion in the Department of Energy research and development bill, H.R. 1799.

The industry has been caught in a vicious cycle of weak demand, poor profitability, lagging investment, high costs, and technological advancement abroad. In the 1980's, the industry was hit with the "double whammy" of recession and subsidized imports flowing into our ports at levels as high as 33 percent. Steel jobs have been cut in half.

We have to be honest with ourselves and recognize that our steel industry has lost its technological advantage, a foundation which was key to steel employment in the two decades following World War II.

Study after study has emphasized the need for the industry to modernize. In the words of the Office of Technology Assessment, "The trend of improving and changing technology is necessary to maintain competitiveness, improve profitability, and improve product quality and innovations." Commendably, the steel industry, despite its adversities, has put over $10 billion into capital expenditures since 1980, much of this into modernization. Labor too has granted major concessions.

Despite these efforts, the industry is not strong enough to both meet the difficulties of the present market and to do basic research required for long-term competitiveness at the same time.

There really has been no comprehensive, long-range Federal strategy to address the underlying problems of the steel industry, unless it is the silent strategy of neglect. In my view, the longer we avoid developing such a strategy, the more it is delayed, the more we lose. The longer we neglect the problem, the more intense Government involvement will be. By virtually allowing the demise of steel research and development over the past two decades, we have forfeited much of our industry.

AN R&D ROLE FOR GOVERNMENT

Government support for R&D is appropriate and not without precedent. The Federal Government subsidizes defense industries substantially through a guaranteed return on investments, promotion of export sales, and direct subsidy for research. In aerospace, 72 percent of total research and development expenditures come from the Federal Government. But less than 2 percent of steel R&D expenditures are supported by the Federal Government.

There is a role for Government. The President has certainly hinted at it. On August 30, 1984, he said, "We must maintain and increase our older industries ability to compete in the world." On October 13, 1984, he stated, "But we can't and won't be satisfied * * * until we modernize and make our older industries more competitive with new technologies."

STEEL TECHNOLOGY RESEARCH INITIATIVE

The steel technology initiative is a program to begin long-term, high payoff steel manufacturing research in DOE's national laboratories. It would involve scientists from Government, industry, and the Nation's universities in developing new "leapfrog technologies," that literally by-pass present modern steel making capacity.

The provisions in the DOE bill follow through on an initiative begun within the administration by the President's Science Advisor, Dr. G.A. Keyworth. In Dr. Keyworth's words, "We have done a poor job of harnessing our strength. We have to work together toward a common purpose, that of improving our industrial competitiveness abroad. We need a strong, new partnership among Government, universities and industry."

According to the Department of Energy, "The proposed Steel Industry/Federal Laboratory Initiative had the potential for a reduction by one-third of the expensive input required by today's technologies and a corresponding reduction in capital and operating costs targeted at 30 percent and 50 percent respectively, reflecting the flexibility, product control and energy savings associated with the exploratory technologies.

Steel industry scientists and engineers and their counterparts in the national labs have identified four areas of possible work: reduction of domestic raw material, including scrap, to liquid steel; production of near-net shape solids from liquid steel; development of universal grades of steel; and application of automatic processing technology.

The steel industry has agreed to commit $2.8 million in labor and services to this effort, and another $2.5 million authorization is included in H.R 1617, the National Bureau of Standards Authorization Act of 1985, now on its way to the President.

This Nation has the scientific minds and the technological know-how to bring this industry back. The industry and it workers are willing to share in the task. It only takes a commitment to do so. I hope we can provide the administration and the congressional commitment necessary to mate our technological genius with the needs of this crucial, renewable industry. It can be one step toward revival of one of our most basic industries and one step toward regaining our international competitiveness.

I am very grateful to the Appropriations Committee and my colleagues for their help and support on the steel technology R&D initiative.●

PETER C. GOLDMARK, JR.: AN OUTSTANDING PUBLIC SERVANT

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute today to a good friend, a fellow Brooklynite, and one of America's outstanding public servants, Peter C. Goldmark, Jr. In a few weeks, Peter will step down from his position as executive director of the Port Authority of New York and New Jersey, a job he has held with great distinction for the last 8 years.

When he leaves the Port Authority, Peter will have completed 20 years of superb service in the public sector. Peter has worked for the office of economic opportunity, as a top aide to Major John Lindsay, as the human services secretary for Massachusetts, as the budget director for the State of New York, and as the executive director of the Port Authority.

In each of these positions, Peter has performed as a dedicated and imaginative public servant. His work and his philosophy of government call to mind Jacqueline Kennedy's description of her husband as "an idealist without illusions." He combines a singular capacity for generating new ideas with a sensible understanding of what is politically possible.

As budget director for Gov. Hugh Carey, Peter Goldmark was an unsung hero in resolving the fiscal crisis in the city of New York. As executive director of the Port Authority, he has made an extraordinary contribution to the economic resurgence of our region.

In years to come, we will reap the benefits of Peter's good works, from the Fishport that will bring jobs to south Brooklyn, to the Bathgate Industrial Park, which is already bringing jobs to the south Bronx. We will benefit as well from the leadership Peter has shown on the infrastructure issue. Peter has emerged as a national spokesman for rebuilding what he aptly calls our life-support systems and he has exerted a very positive influence on the Congress on this important question.

Peter's achievements are indisputably impressive, but what I find equally appealing is his avoidance of the inflated sense of self-importance that can be an occupational hazard of positions of power. Peter is not only a gifted man, but a gracious and generous one as well. He has a delightful sense of humor and an infinite capacity for puncturing pomposity. The respect he has gained over 20 years in public service is in no small measure due to the respect with which he has treated others.

The special qualities that have endeared Peter to his friends and given him a special standing in the public sector should make him eminently successful in his new position as a vice president of the Times Mirror Co. I know my colleagues in the New York and New Jersey delegations join me in wishing Peter well as he begins a new career. I trust that while Peter is leaving government, he is not abandoning the public arena, and that we can continue to call on him for guidance and good ideas in the years ahead.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. HERBERT SCOVILLE, JR.

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in memory of a man whose passing will be sorely felt by many of my colleagues.

As you know, yesterday the arms control community lost one of its leading figures, with the death of Dr. Herbert Scoville, Jr.

In his many years of Government service—first as Deputy Director for Science and Technology for CIA and then as Assistant Director for Science and Technology at the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, Pete Scoville worked tirelessly to advance the cause of arms control. He carried this commitment into private life, when he became president of the distinguished Arms Control Association.

In his many speeches and writings, Pete Scoville combined a deep commitment to the cause of nuclear disarmament with an impressive mastery of the details of this complex and sometimes arcane subject. As anyone who has ever watched him debate can attest, he was invariably successful in presenting his case.

Pete Scoville's always incisive analyses of the crucial national security issues of the day have always been followed closely by those of us in Congress who have taken on the difficult task of fighting destabilizing weapons systems or promoting serious arms negotiations.

Those of us who have so often relied upon his wisdom and expertise in our deliberations on defense and arms control issues will miss him. We will miss his good advice, his gentle humor, and his dedication to controlling the nuclear arms race.

At this point I would like to insert into the RECORD a Washington Post article on Pete Scoville.

DR. HERBERT SCOVILE JR., EX-CIA OFFICIAL, DIES AT 70

(By Joseph D. Whitaker)

Dr. Herbert Scoville Jr., 70, a former deputy director of the CIA and assistant director of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency who had written extensively on issues relating to arms control, died of cancer July 30 at Georgetown University Hospital. He maintained homes in McLean and Taconic, Conn.

Dr. Scoville began his campaign for nuclear arms control in the 1950s following the famed nuclear tests at Bikini Atoll. He argued at the Pentagon in 1954 for a test ban treaty and over the next three decades was a consistent opponent of a nuclear arms buildup.

Through his books, "Missile Madness" and "MX: Prescription for Disaster," and in speaking engagements in this coutnry and abroad, Dr. Scoville sought to lay the issues of arms control before the public.

Dr. Scoville said in a 1983 article in The Washington Post that he believed the U.S. was "drifting toward annihilation." "Somehow the public doesn't seem to be able to grasp the significance of the issue," he said. "They read these numbers—50 million will be killed in an atomic attack, whole cities wiped out. It's nothing they can conceive of. It has no meaning in their day-to-day lives.

"If an airplane crashes and 75 people are burned up, that's a disaster everyone can visualize," Dr. Scoville continued. "They can picture themselves in the airplane. But a nuclear war that destroys our society—that tends to be just numbers. It's too depressing and they don't see what they can do about it anyway."

From 1955 to 1963, Dr. Scoville worked for the Central Intelligence Agency, where he became the deputy director. For the next six years, he was the assistant director of the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. He resigned from the federal service in 1969. Between 1958 and 1966, he also was a member of U.S. delegations to three disarmament conferences in Geneva.

Dr. Scoville was born in New York. He graduated from Yale University and earned his doctorate in physical chemistry at the University of Rochester. He moved to Washington in the early 1940s and went to work for the National Research Defense Committee.

He was president of the Arms Control Association and had served on the boards of the Union of Concerned Scientists and the Center for Defense Information. He also had served on the council of the American Association for the Advancement of Science.

In 1981, he received the Rockefeller Public Service Award from Princeton University. He also recevied the Hutchinson Medal from the University of Rochester.

Survivors include his wife, Ann Curtiss Scoville of McLean and Taconic; three sons, Anthony and Thomas, both of Washington, and Nicholas, of Los Angeles; a daughter, Molly Fitzmaurice of Washington, and six grandchildren.●

SEVEN STILL NOT HOME

HON. JIM KOLBE

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. KOLBE. Mr. Speaker, yesterday we had the opportunity to meet with seven American families. Though each was from a different part of the country, they shared a common bond that brought them together. Each family was missing one member, whether a father, a brother, or a husband. The missing family member is a hostage in Lebanon.

It is all too easy, now that 39 Americans have returned safely from their ordeal aboard TWA flight 847, to forget that seven Americans are still held by terrorists in Lebanon. It is too easy to allow the pain of the families we met yesterday to go unshared and too easy for the cries for release of their loved ones to go unheard. But we cannot allow these men to remain entombed in the dark cellars of Beruit. We cannot conduct business as usual in Lebanon or in the Middle East as a whole until these men are released.

On July 9, the House agreed to an amendment which I offered to prohibit aid to Lebanon until all Americans taken hostage in that country have been released. I am pleased that the conference committee agreed that the release of these men must be our first priority in Lebanon. All aid for Lebanon has been removed from the Foreign Assistance Act and specific language has been included in the conference report. To quote from that report:

> The conferees supported general U.S. policy in Lebanon * * * (but) believe that at this time higher priority must be given to obtaining the immediate release of the remaining American hostages in that country.

The time has come for terrorism to be destroyed before it can destroy us. By eliminating aid for Lebanon we have sent a clear signal to the Middle East that American cooperation in efforts for peace will depend on their respect for the sanctity of human life. We can and we will end the reign of terror which has claimed the lives of 269 American servicemen in the past two years and we will bring peace to a region which has been engulfed in anarchy and fratricide for decades.●

UPON INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON UNITED STATES-JAPANESE TRADE

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am joining with seven of my colleagues, Representatives CLINGER, FISH, GREEN, PURSELL, MCKINNEY, NIELSON, and SNOWE, in introducing legislation to address the current deplorable state of our trade deficit, particularly our staggering trade deficit with Japan. In addition, this legislation addresses the high cost of providing for our defense as well as that of our allies.

Our economy is being seriously impacted by the size and intractability of our trade deficit with Japan. Calls for increased quotas and tariff barriers are met with equally strong cries of distress from industries that are subject to retaliation and from the agriculture community, which is heavily dependent upon export sales. In addition, such solutions to the balance of payments problems would be greeted by a chorus of rejections by many of our trading partners, charging that such actions would violate our complex web of international trade agreements. This legislation avoids these pitfalls while making substantial progress toward alleviation of the trade deficit.

The rapid increases in defense spending over the past 4 years have come at a certain cost to our economic health. While we can rationalize these expenditures on behalf of our own defense, it becomes increasingly difficult to justify spending such large sums on the defense of Japan, particularly when we are being forced to cut back drastically on domestic spending. However, constitutional and political restrictions prevent Japan from contributing directly to its own defense. This legislation would allow Japan to relieve the United States of some of this burden without violating its own laws.

This legislation calls upon the President to inform Japan that in order to gain access to our markets, it must assume a fair share of its defense costs by manufacturing or constructing U.S. defense goods from our materials. The purchase of these materials would help redress our trade imbalance while the return of the finished goods to the United States would aid in reducing our defense expenditures. The Government of Japan would also be required to allow American products free and fair access to its domestic markets.

I hope that others of my colleagues will join me in this initiative to reduce our stifling trade deficit while granting us some relief from the burden of providing for Japan's defense.●

CHARLES KIRKWOOD: AMBITION AND ACHIEVEMENT

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, during his boyhood in Bethlehem, PA, leisure was more than a luxury for Charles Kirkwood. It was an impossibility. His father scraped by, intermittently working as a steelworker and tending bar.

Some boys might only have dreamed of a different future life. But Charles Kirkwood did more. He worked hard enough that today he has achieved success beyond even the wildest imaginings of childhood.

First, there was acceptance as a scholarshop student at prestigious Williams College in Massachusetts. Then there was the law degree, with election to Phi Beta Kappa, from Harvard Law School.

Today, at age 50, Charles Kirkwood is far more than an international lawyer—founding partner of Caplan, Kirkwood, Russin & Becchi, with headquarters in Thailand and 24 offices around the world. He also is the benevolent patron of Shawnee Village, his private vacation community with 1,100 employees, and the largest employer in Monroe County of Pennsylvania.

This volunteer fireman—not chief—with the Shawnee Volunteer Fire Company each winter offers free season ski passes to dozens of Shawnee resident under age 18 and summer or part-time jobs to any youth willing to work hard. Town residents, and any employee, can receive free tickets to theatrical productions at the Shawnee Playhouse.

This weekend more than 300 persons are arriving at Shawnee, flying to the Poconos from throughout the free world, for a 3-day extravaganza to mark their friend's 50th birthday. But they should be celebrating something just as special: The unique opportunity in this Nation for boys and girls of aptitude and ambition to exceed even the fondest parent's wildest dream.●

STUDY PUBLISHED ON THE PROPOSED SALE OF CONRAIL

HON. DENNIS E. ECKART

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. ECKART of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, today the United States Railway Association published its long awaited study on the proposed sale of Conrail. In this study, the USRA examined the feasibility and viability of Conrail now and in the future and the impact of a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger on other railroads and rail employment.

This independent analysis of this important issue shows that Conrail does have the ability to stand on its own financial feet and that it can continue to offer vigorous competition to the benefit of rail shippers across our Nation.

I would like to insert into the RECORD the summary of this report for my colleagues to share:

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

CHAPTER 2. FINANCIAL OUTLOOK FOR AN INDEPENDENT CONRAIL

Compared to Conrail's May 1984 outlook, which was the basis of USRA's April 1, 1985 report, the revised Conrail traffic outlook is stronger as a result of more current estimates of the macroeconomic environment—specifically, reduced inflation rates and elimination of a recessionary cycle during the forecast period. While a nonrecessionary period of such duration could be regarded as unusual, it is typical of other current macroeconomic forecasts. Moreover, Conrail has been conservative in the industrial production index growth assumed during the forecast period. Conrail reasonably estimated traffic flows within the assumed economic environment.

Conrail's operating income was reasonably forecasted for the assumed traffic levels, and was based on rates of productivity improvement below historical accomplishments.

Conrail's maintenance and capital program estimates are appropriate to the current condition of the plant and the wear on plant implicit in projected traffic levels.

Morgan Stanley adopted the outlook prepared by Conrail for traffic, operating income, and capital spending needs.

Morgan Stanley's nonoperating income and financing assumptions during the outlook period differed from those used by Conrail, reflecting the assumption that the Morgan Stanley purchase proposal was implemented. Equipment purchases were assumed to be lease-financed, which USRA agrees is reasonable. This aspect of the projections was contained in a July 22, 1985 revision of Morgan Stanley's previous outlook and had the effect of improving net cash flow, after capital spending, to the point where projected dividend payments did not reduce cash balances below $500 million at any point during the outlook period.

Norfolk Southern's five-year outlook for Conrail employed macroeconomic and traffic assumptions substantially similar to Conrail's own forecast. Norfolk Southern's ten-year outlook for Conrail—that negative cash flows would occur in serious magnitudes in the 1990's, culminating in the need for renewed federal aid—was determined by USRA to be rebuttable. No one can say that the Norfolk Southern predictions will not possibly come true, but the specific reasons advanced for them can be refuted.

USRA found no reason to alter the Conrail viability conclusion reported in April. No one can guarantee the events of tomorrow, but all available evidence supports a finding that Conrail can generate positive cash flow for the foreseeable future. Traffic shortfalls compare to the forecast should not threaten Conrail's survival as long as the rail regulatory framework allows service to be shaped to meet the demands of the marketplace.

CHAPTER 3. TRAFFIC DIVERSION POTENTIAL OF AN NS/CR CONSOLIDATION

An NS/CR consolidation would divert traffic to its lines. At issue is only the degree to which such diversions would impact other carriers.

Estimates of traffic diversion prepared by the Norfolk Southern and the impacted carriers used reasonable procedures, well-developed and widely used in the rail industry. Differences in diversion estimates reflect subjective judgments about the divertability of specific traffic movements and differences in traffic samples rather than any methodological differences.

Traffic shifts are caused by both "simple diversion" and "source competition." Norfolk Southern and most other carriers only endeavored to forecast simple diversion. Others, notably CSX, estimated losses from source competition. USRA agrees that source competition is a real and potentially significant consequence of the NS/CR merger, but the volumes affected are likely to be significantly lower, at least in the near term, than CSX estimates.

For "simple diversion"—the shifting of current traffic from one railroad to another without a change in origin or destination—Norfolk Southern and many other carriers estimated impact. Part of the difference in estimated volumes diverted can be explained by Norfolk Southern's use of a base period in which traffic is low relative to later years (and today) and its inability to quantify the TOFC traffic moving through the Chicago and St. Louis gateways. There remain, however, other variances which only can be explained as differences in judgment as to the divertability of certain flows.

Norfolk Southern calculations of traffic diverted probably fall in the lower end of the likely range, while the impacted carriers' estimates represent the upper limits of likely effects.

USRA concluded that the most likely simple diversions generally would fall between estimates by Norfolk Southern and those of the other carriers except in the case of estimates made for GTW, Soo/Milw, ICG, and CNW, whose calculations are closer to the likely level of diversion than the estimates made by Norfolk Southern.

Carriers both large and small will be affected by diversion. CSX, with its major overlap of network with NS/CR, will suffer significant loss in absolute dollars. Smaller carriers, such as Grand Trunk Western, Illinois Central Gulf, Chicago and North Western, and Soo/Milwaukee, will lose substantial volumes of traffic in relation to their traffic bases. Larger carriers in the west will not escape the effects of diversions either, particularly those caused by the redirection of some of Conrail's current traffic over the Norfolk Southern line to Kansas City.

While generally the consolidation causes Norfolk Southern to gain traffic at the expense of other carriers, it is possible that modest traffic increases would be experienced by some of the railroads connecting with Norfolk Southern at Kansas City.

CHAPTER 4. COST SAVINGS RESULTING FROM AN NS/CR CONSOLIDATION

Within the scope of circumstances considered by Norfolk Southern, its assumptions and methodologies appear reasonable. USRA takes no exception to the Norfolk Southern estimates, considering the assumptions and level of detail of its planning.

Norfolk Southern staff characterized their estimates as "conservative." The estimates were made for internal Norfolk Southern decision-making purposes (whether to make a purchase offer for Conrail) and as such were judged by USRA to be much closer to "minimum, virtually certain" types of estimates that "potential maximum." Norfolk Southern acknowledged that lack of either access to confidential Conrail data or collaboration with Conrail staff precluded it from estimating all potential merger savings. USRA concluded for the above reasons that actual merger savings were likely to exceed the Norfolk Southern estimate.

The Norfolk Southern estimate of labor protection liabilities associated with estimated merger savings appears to be based on reasonable assumptions.

CHAPTER 5. EMPLOYMENT IMPACT OF AN NS/CR CONSOLIDATION

Norfolk Southern's estimates of NS/CR positions eliminated were derived directly from its merger savings analysis and, as such, are subject to the same conclusion: they represent credible estimates of the minimum likely impact; potential maximum impact is higher, but not precisely measurable.

CSX's estimates of its own job losses from an NS/CR consolidation were development from its traffic diversion estimates. USRA's conclusions concerning those underlying factors, reported in Chapter 3, thus apply to employment impact figures: the CSX estimates of diversion-related job loss are too high at least as "immediate" impact and probably even over two-three years after an NS/CR merger.

Morgan Stanley purported to estimate total rail industry job loss resulting from an NS/CR consolidation. Their approach was to accept and total the job losses where already calculated by individual carriers, then add carriers for which Morgan Stanley alone made the estimates. These aggregate carrier loss figures are probably higher than even the maximum likely impact, especially insofar as the CSX component of the total is concerned. Moreover, aggregation of such figures does not represent net rail industry impact, because diversion-related job loss at one carrier would be offset to some extent by employment gains at the carrier (NS/CR) benefiting from the diversions.●

SHOE RESTRICTIONS WARNING BY U.S. RETAILER

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, below is a letter to the President from a shoe retailer in my State who reminds us of dangers of establishing an import quota on footwear. I would recommend his advice to my colleagues.

TRADEHOME SHOE STORES, INC.,
St. Paul, MN, June 14, 1985.

Hon. RONALD REAGAN,
President of the United States, The White House, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Shortly you will be asked to act on the International Trade Commission's order to provide relief for the United States shoemaking industry.

As a small retailer in the upper midwest, I would urge you to go back to the original decision of a year ago, in which the International Trade Commission voted that the U.S. shoemaking industry did not need any special relief.

Implementation of import quotas will do nothing but delay the necessity of the U.S. industry to become more competitive. The answer to the dilemma is not a period of protectivism, but a sincere effort to install the latest state-of-the-art equipment and a change of their attitude as managers. It would appear to me that they have never heard of Tom Peters, or if they have, they do not understand what he is saying. Imposition of quotas would only make it more difficult for us to operate, as well as increase the retail prices of our shoes to a clientele which is already suffering from the conditions in the farm belt.

I understand the political implications and the efforts of the Congressmen from a few states like Massachusetts, Missouri and Tennessee. However, if we as a nation are going to regain our supremacy in world markets, we must be competitive in the world market in which we operate, and the shortsighted policy of the latest International Trade Commission vote will only delay the required efforts.

As a world power, we must look at the long-range necessities and I would urge you very strongly to reject this recommendation of the International Trade Commission.

Looking forward to hearing from you with reference to your views,

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD J. SMITH.●

FUNDING FOR THE STRATEGIC DEFENSE INITIATIVE

HON. NORMAN D. SHUMWAY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. SHUMWAY. Mr. Speaker, the conference committee on the Defense Authorizations for fiscal year 1986 reported out its compromise bill this week, reminding us of our vital responsibility to provide for the national defense. We have, however, betrayed that responsibility in a critical area: funding for the strategic defense initiative. Although the conferees agreed to provide $2.7 billion for SDI next year, $200 million more than the House was willing to authorize, this level of funding remains $1 billion below what the administration requested for defense technologies research. By slashing the funds for SDI research, we relinquish both the opportunity for rapidly developing a nonnuclear defensive shield for our Nation and the prospects for achieving a significant and far-reaching arms accord with the Soviet Union.

The Soviet Union has been looking for just such a unilateral retreat from our commitment to strategic defense to confirm its own ascendancy in the development of several critical technologies. Without a single concession in Geneva, the Soviets could achieve their objective of restraining U.S. progress toward a defensive strategy while retaining their own virtual monopoly over advanced defensive technologies research. Soviet spokesmen have loudly criticized the SDI as a new, threatening element in the competition between the superpowers despite the fact that the U.S.S.R. has been pursuing the very same type of technologies for two decades. To use a favorite term of SDI critics, the "destabilizing" impact of strategic defense has been operating now for 20 years without an effective American response. Rather than bow to Soviet propaganda pressure and unilaterally reduce our commitment to researching defensive technologies, we must utilize our tremendous scientific capabilities to explore fully the potential for a world free from the theat of "mutually assured destruction." By clearly demonstrating an unwavering American commitment to research at a level consistent with the President's program goals, the United States would place pressure on the Soviets to move beyond its self-imposed arms control deadlock. The superpowers could then, as the veteran arms control negotiator, Paul Nitze, recently observed, proceed to "a serious discussion of how—should new defensive technologies prove feasible—our two sides could move jointly to a more stable strategic relationship, building upon the research efforts of both."

Before this important goal can be achieved, however, we must recognize and dismiss the deceptive criticism of the SDI promulgated by the Soviet Union, criticism that neglects to acknowledge the massive investment the U.S.S.R. has itself made, and continues to make, to create a shield of strategic defense. Alun Chalfont, chairman of the all-party defense committee in Great Britain's House of Lords, recently published an excellent commentary on this subject of Soviet defense research which I submit here and urge my colleagues to read. Given the prospect of an increasing Soviet strategic defense capability that would render useless our Nation's current deterrent forces and would be unmatched by any comparable U.S. defensive system, I believe we must provide full funding for our own research into promising defensive technologies.

MOSCOW'S STAR WARS PLAN: KEEPING FACTS UNDER WRAPS

(By Alun Chalfont)

The Soviet Union, unlike the United States, does not advertise its Star Wars research. Indeed, if it were to do so it would be difficult at the same time to characterize the U.S. program as "dangerous, destabilizing and provocative."

In 1984, a working group of the Committee of Soviet Scientists for Peace Against the Nuclear Threat published a report which concluded that space-based systems are too expensive, technically unattainable and easily neutralized by countermeasures—arguments now at the heart of the campaign in the West against the Strategic Defense Initiative (SDI). Yet in January this year, Nikolai Basov of the Soviet Academy of Sciences announced in Moscow that the Soviet Union would have no technological difficulty in matching the American SDI program.

It may be argued that the Soviet Union cannot really have it both ways. Either the SDI is dangerous, provocative and destablizing, or it is useless, expensive and easily neutralized; either it is technologically infeasible or it is well within the reach of Soviet military scientists.

On this last point the evidence of Mr. Basov must be thought to carry some weight. Since he won the Nobel Prize in 1964 for his work in quantum electronics, he has been one of the driving forces behind the Soviet strategic defense program.

Indeed, what appears to be a baffling contradiction in Soviet attitudes to strategic defense is easily explained if one simple proposition is accepted—namely that the Soviet Union has been engaged for many years on a secret program of research into space-based defense, and that it now fears it may be overtaken by a similar program that has all the weight of Western technology, industrial infrastructure and economic resources behind it.

The principal area of technology on which much strategic defence research is concentrated is that known as "directed energy." This includes (a) the laser, an intense beam of electromagnetic radiation aimed at a missile to penetrate its surface and damage its guidance system and warheads, (b) the radio-frequency weapon, involving electromagnetic radiation at wavelengths similar to those of radar, designed to damage the electronic components and circuits of a missile, and (c) particle beams, produced by a high-energy accelerator, which can cause not only thermal or mechanical damage but also secondary nuclear or X-ray effects deep inside the target missile.

Soviet research into laser weapons began as early as the 1960s. It is conducted by some of the best scientists and engineers in the Soviet Union, including Mr. Basov and the the man who shared the Nobel Prize with him in 1964, Alexander Prokhorov.

For many years, Western intelligence reports have suggested that the Soviet Union is at least as well advanced as the United States, and in some areas well ahead of it, in laser technologies for military application. It already has a ground-tested anti-satellite system (the only one in existence) and, according to some intelligence assessments, could have operational space-based systems before the end of the century.

Although Soviet research and development have tended to concentrate on laser technologies, impressive progress has also been made with particle beams. Research into nuclear accelerators has obvious applications in normal high-energy physics for peaceful purposes, but equally it has obvious military potential. Similarly, Soviet expertise in microwave weapon technology is at least as great as that of the United States.

None of this will come as a surprise to any serious student of Soviet strategy. The Soviet Union has never subscribed to the concept of Mutual Assured Destruction (MAD). Soviet strategists have consistently emphasized that their planning is based on the calculation that any war between the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the Warsaw Pact will inevitably escalate into a nuclear war, which it is their purpose to win. In any case, they know that effective defence is an essential ingredient of a credible deterrent.

For these reasons the Soviets have placed far more emphasis than any NATO government on civil defence. They have protected Moscow with the only existing operational ballistic missile defence system and recently upgraded it. They have developed an orbital as well as a ground-based anti-satellite system.

Furthermore, they have built large phased-array radar systems, which some Western authorities believe to be in contravention of the Anti-Ballistic Missile Treaty, and they have begun to deploy a surface-to-air missile system (the SA X 12) which is capable of intercepting some types of Western ballistic missiles. It would be surprising, therefore, if Soviet scientists and military planners had not carried out serious research into space-based strategic defence systems. They do not, of course, have the kind of political system in which this has to be the subject of a presidential announcement; nor, if it had been announced, do they have the kind of press which would have been ready to produce Star Wars headlines and columns of hostile and derisive comment.

Those who suggest that the United States should abandon its strategic defence research program in the interests of successful arms-control negotiations might do well to ponder one significant aspect of the public debate. Within a month of President Ronald Reagan's SDI speech on March 23, 1983, a letter appeared in The New York Times attacking the initiative. It was signed by more than 200 Soviet scientists—a powerful blast, one might have thought, against the whole idea of strategic defence.

What might have escaped general notice at the time was that many of the signatories, including Mr. Basov and Mr. Prokhorov, have spent their professional lives designing Soviet strategic missile systems, military aircraft and nuclear submarines. The most interesting signature was that of Evgeny Velikhov, vice-president of the Soviet Academy of Sciences and the leading figure in Star Wars research in the Soviet Union. Perhaps he should have declared an interest.●

OUTSTANDING SENIOR CITIZENS

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a moment to congratulate some of southern Ohio's most prominent citizens. These 11 Ohioans have earned the respect and admiration of their fellow citizens who nominated them to receive special awards from their home counties which honor the time and dedication they put into their own lives and the betterment of the lives around them.

As recipients of Ohio's 1985 Outstanding Senior Citizen Award, these 11 men and women exemplify the kind of caring and effort that Ohioans and Americans of all ages would do well to follow. For their individual service to their communities, I am proud to honor them. Chosen from other well-qualified applications it was only in this group of names that the spark was found deserving the title of "Outstanding Senior Citizen" to each of these 11 people.

MRS. ESTHER GREENE, ADAMS COUNTY

Adams County has chosen, from all the many senior citizens who donate time and effort to others, Mrs. Esther Greene as its "Outstanding Senior Citizen of the Year." As a resident of Adams County, Esther has dedicated the greater portion of her life to the future of Adams County. Her activities in such varied areas as the Valley View Shopping Center, the Business and Professional Womans Club and the Adams County Historical Society, to name a few, have been invaluable to the continued growth of the area. For her efforts, she is truly deserving of the title "outstanding citizen."

MRS. FLORA WUCHER, BROWN COUNTY

In Brown County, Mrs. Flora Wucher was chosen by the Brown Senior Citizens Council as the Outstanding Senior Citizen of 1985. Flora is truly an example to others of how to combine business and community affairs for the betterment of everyone. Her contributions to the businesses of Brown County as well as her involvement in such community activities as the Senior Nutrition Council are only a few examples of the time and effort she puts into making Brown County a better place for all those who reside there. She is truly the kind of person who is acclaimed by one and all as the proper recipient of this honor.

MR. VALSENT (BILL) KREBS, HIGHLAND COUNTY

The Highland County Senior Citizens Center nominated its own Bill Krebs for this award, and their pride has been rewarded. As 1985's Outstanding Senior Citizen in Highland County, Bill exemplifies the resource and talent that earns him this vote of thanks from the center, and all citizens in Highland County. An electronic engineer retired from Wright Patterson Air Force Base, Bill uses his experience to design and build such comforts and necessities in the center as cabinets, chairs, and special setups for different activities. He is a poet, too, and for his diverse and many talents the people of the center and Highland County are justifiably proud of him.

MS. MAE LAWRENCE, GALLIA COUNTY

Mae Lawrence brings to mind, for Gallia County, the ideal of the Outstanding Senior Citizen. As a dependable volunteer in the Senior Citizens Program, much of her time has been devoted to money raising projects and creative activities. To her coworkers and all who come into contact with her, she is an inspiration. Gallia County has chosen her for this award as just one small way to repay her for the many hours of selfless devotion she has given to the citizens who call Gallia County their home.

MRS. CECILE MC GINNIS, JACKSON COUNTRY

Cecile McGinnis, the mother of two daughters and wife of a minister, has made a tremendous impact on the lives of children and young people throughout Jackson County. Her contributions to the senior citizen organization for 11 years as well as the Jackson County Board on Aging are just a few of her many accomplishments. Her talents also extend to the spiritual side of Jackson County life. Often her duties would extend to Sunday school teaching, choir directing, and piano playing. In Jackson County, there is no person more worthy of this estimable honor of Outstanding Senior Citizen than Mrs. Cecile McGinnis.

MRS. SYLVESTA HOLLBACK, LAWRENCE COUNTY

Volunteering at Lawrence County General Hospital and the Senior Citizens Center in Sybene, OH, is just one of the many ways in which Sylvesta Hollback helps create a special place for others in Lawrence County. A willing worker, Sylvesta is also an active church and neighborhood worker. Her courage, too, is to be commended. She saved the life of a neighbor by bringing her mother to care for the children while she took the neighbor to the hospital for life-saving treatment. Lawrence County is proud to have her as a resident there, and so honors her with this award.

MR. EDGAR LEWIS, PIKE COUNTY

Pike County wishes to honor, for the Outstanding Senior Citizen of 1985 a person who is the epitome of reliability. Mr. Edgar Lewis is an active member of the Pike County Senior Citizens Center. His touch is felt throughout the center, whether in the work he performs in the volunteer programs or in the creative activities. He is also a major participant in the Outreach Program for other senior citizens. It is his spirit and nature that made one of his nominators describe him as a "free-hearted and jolly person that keeps everyone else smiling." For these contributions, Pike County takes pride in awarding him this title.

MR. AND MRS. JOHN HAMMON, ROSS COUNTY

In a departure from tradition, John and Ruth Hammond have been selected a double recipients of the Ross County Outstanding Senior Citizen Award for 1985. They are both retired from their jobs with the Mead Corp. and have belonged to the Senior Citizen Center for 6 years. Married for 55 years, they donate $1 for every year of marriage to the center on their wedding anniversary. Their donations do not stop there, through, for they do the same on their birthdays, and John donates paper for the monthly newsletter, totaling over 1,000 reams of paper through the years. Whether it be time or financial assistance, John and Ruth are always willing contributors to the Senior Citizens Center. They also serve on the Ross Co.'s, Committee for Elderly, Inc., board of directors at the monthly business meeting. Together they form a team that Ross County awards with the honor.

MRS. ELIZABETH FROWINE, SCIOTO COUNTY

Elizabeth Frowine is Scioto County's choice as this year's recipient of this honor. A long time worker with senior citizens, Elizabeth began her work in New Boston in 1967 and is presently a charter member of the New Boston Senior Center, holding such positions of trust as president and treasurer. Her ability also extends to the district presidency of the Ladies Auxiliary of Veterans of Foreign Wars, as well as chairman for Senior Citizen's Day for the past 2 years. I am sure her son, granddaughters, and great grandson join the other citizens of Scioto County in lauding this talented women upon her nomination as "Senior Citizen of 1985."

MRS. RUTH ONEY, VINTON COUNTY

Vinton County is proud to nominate a woman of diverse abilities, Mrs. Ruth Oney, as the winner of the 1985 Senior Citizens Award for Vinton County. Ruth has been treasurer of the Ray Senior Citizens Council for several years. She is also a member of the Vinton County Council on Aging and has served that organization as president. Presently she is serving the council as an at-large member of the executive committee. Her influence also extends into the many activities of the Corinth Church in Ray, where she is superintendent of the Sunday School classes and a participant in the bible school program. A 4-H leader and member of the Leo Grange, Ruth is also a devoted mother and grandmother. This award is one way Vinton County expresses its thanks to a woman who has devoted so much of her time and life to the works and people of the county.

All of these people, whatever their day to day occupations, have earned a place in the hearts and minds of the citizens of their counties. I am sure that my colleagues join me and all of southern Ohio in praise of these people who have contributed so much for the betterment of the lives of so many. They have given their time, spirit, and energy to their communities and counties, thus earning them the title, for each of their home counties, "Outstanding Senior Citizen of the Year 1985."●

HONEYWELL CHAIRMAN ADDRESSES TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, last week, Congressman DICK SCHULZE and I had the opportunity of participating in the 22d Annual Japan-United States Business Conference in Minneapolis sponsored by the Advisors Council on Japan-United States Economic Relations. This is the highest level business group consisting of company CEO's both from Japan and the United States who meet annually to discuss bilateral trade issues. They have been particularly involved during the last few years as our bilateral trade problems continue to mount.

The outgoing chairman of the group, Edson W. Spencer, presented the U.S. view of the status of bilateral relations between the United States and Japan. I thought Mr. Spencer did a great job communicating the responsibilities of both sides toward lowering the massive trade deficit we have with Japan.

His statement is printed below. I would recommend its content to my colleagues.

BILATERAL RELATIONS—THE U.S. VIEW

My task today is to give the conference an American view of the status of bilateral relations between the United States and Japan. Needless to say, the subject immediately turns to trade.

There is increasing agreement between our two countries on diplomatic initiatives. A common understanding is clear between our two countries on defense matters and the Soviet threat—and in that regard Japan is steadily increasing her commitment to increased spending in the interest of her own self-defense. There is an increasing willingness of our two nations to work together to fund emergency food and other aid programs in the less developed countries. Our President and Japan's Prime Minister have developed a close and trusting personal relationship. Nevertheless, tensions with Japan are running high on this side of the Pacific, thanks to the overwhelming burden the United States bears due to its massive trade deficit.

I want to quantify the problem with a series of charts (not included). Then I will make some suggestions for solutions.

There are four major resaons for the deterioration of the international payments position of the United States in the last five years.

First, in the 1970s the competitive position of American industry weakened. One reason of course was the new captal investments and rising technology levels of our foreign competitors. We let productivity slip. We failed to keep up with plant modernization. We made non-competitive labor settlements in the U.S. that were even more non-competitive in the international marketplace.

Many of these factors have been corrected. Our older industries, in most cases, have modernized and production per man hour is internationally competitive. Our new industries in high-technology fields are state-of-the-art. Corrective action in rebalancing labor contracts is underway.

However, it should be noted that, partly because of the high standards of living in the U.S. but largely because of the strength of the dollar, our labor rates continue to be internationally non-competitive.

In addition, American business executives live with conditions that favor Japan and other international competition. We have a higher cost of capital due to tighter debt/equity standards set by our financial comminity. We are under entirely too much short-term pressure for earnings performance. I don't see meaningful change in either of these factors in the near term.

Second, real interest rates have been higher in the U.S. in the 1980s than in many other industrial countries. This is the result of a restrictive monetary policy to drive down inflation—very successfully, I might add—and is the result of our massive federal budget deficit. In addition, our country has been a safe political haven for the world's surplus cash, which has flowed into our country in massive amounts due to solid economic growth and a rising stock market. A non-competitive exchange rate is the result.

Third, we have the world's largest market, particularly for industrial products. Growth of market share in the U.S., even at the expense of profits, is an obvious target for our industrial competition in Japan, Asia, Europe and Latin America. This problem is particularly critcal when those competitors can sell at lower profit margins than are acceptable under American standards of financial measurement.

Fourth, our trading partners have not always given us the access to their markets that they enjoy in selling in our country. The European Common Market has high tariffs and a heavily subsidized agriculture. Many of the newly industrialized countries—Korea, Taiwan, India, Mexico, Brazil, and others—have high tariffs, import quotas and licenses, and restrictions on incoming investment. This created problems for our country, and Japan as well, as our two nations find export sales to the NICs restricted, at the same time as the very low labor costs of those countries enable them to invade the U.S. and Japan with low-cost imports.

Japan deserves credit and appreciation for having gone a long way to lower trade barriers in recent years. For most products, Japan today is an open market in a legal sense, although traditional buying habits, industry-government relations and distribution systems make Japan a tough market to penetrate. However, the Japanese market remained closed far, far too long, preventing American exporters from building up market position when they did enjoy a competitive advantage, even in some cases into the 1980s.

The results of the deterioration in our international trade and investment balances have created a political crisis in Congress that threatens our good political relations with Japan. This crisis is clearly growing as evidenced by the introduction last week of an import surcharge bill by the chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee. The Senate Finance Committee has sent to the Senate for action a bill that calls for retaliation against Japan.

What the charts don't say is that our trade deficit is estimated by the Federal Reserve to have cost some two million jobs and 2-3 percent lost growth in gross national product. These factors hit at the industrial heart of America, and at the voters who send their Senators and Representatives to Washington from our major industrial population centers. "De-industrialization of America" is a popular phrase, regularly linked to discussion of our trade deficit. And let me remind our Japanese friends that no American politician can stand idly by and watch our industrial base deteriorate.

Japan today bears the brunt of American criticism for this loss in jobs and gross national product. In the 1960s, it was Japanese textile imports that forced a reduction in our textile industry employment—a market that Japan subsequently lost as well. Then it was television sets. Then steel. Then autos. And now we see our semiconductor, computer and communication markets threated with Japanese imports.

In the cases where Japanese imports have forced a realignment of American manufacturers, Japanese exporters have provided high-quality, well-styled, favorably-priced products that have created a market of well-satisfied American customers. Unfortunately, these strong Japanese export industries grew up in a domestic market that was protected from American competition until well past the time when our industry enjoyed a competitive advantage and could build a market in Japan. To be fair, I should point out that Japan will find much the same problem arising as exporters in Korea, Taiwan, Hong Kong, Malaysia, India, Brazil, Mexico, and the PRC produce more competitive products with low labor costs, behind high protective walls. There are the reasons, then, that our trade balance has deteriorated.

The question is, what can be done to prevent friction caused by Japan's large and rising trade surplus with the U.S. from threatening all the positive progress between us in other economic, in political and in strategic matters?

To the U.S. government, I would say the following:

1. Make trade policy a high priority along with and as an equal part of budget and fiscal policy. The three are intimately entwined.

2. Get your own economic house in order. Further cut the budget for discretionary programs. Insist on a more effective and lower cost defense program. Cut out cost of living escalation in entitlements. Get the deficit down. As a result, help get the dollar down.

(As an aside, it is quite an anomaly for a conservative republican president to have presided over a classic keynesian economic recovery. Unfortunately, the long-term risks of continued deficits, negative trade balances, and a non-competitive rate of exchange have been ignored for too long.)

It is worth repeating, however, that even though our own economic house is not in order, Congress in its frustration is turning to protectionism, rather than standing by and doing nothing while the nation's industrial base declines.

3. When all other measures to cut budgets have been exhausted—then, and only then—increase taxes. We cannot make substantial cuts in the deficit without a tax increase—perhaps a specific tax to be spent only on deficit reduction. The alternative is further deep cuts in discretionary programs, which at some point will become politically unpalatable. Or a major cut in defense expenditures, which can only follow a major breakthrough in arms reduction negotiations. The tax increase, if enacted, should be some type of transaction tax that penalizes consumption, not investment. Incidentally, such a tax would put our tax system more in line with Europe and Japan, with some benefits to our export-import trade balance.

4. Use Section 301 of the Trade Remedies Bill of 1974, and use it aggressively. This is a powerful weapon in the hands of the President—not to restrict imports—but to penalize our trading partners for what we see as unfair trade practices that restrict our ability to sell in their markets. Unfortunately, our government has been far too benign in its use of actions Congress provided to negotiate for fair and equal trade practices. Laws already provide for adequate remedies. Mandatory retaliation in new protectionist laws is the wrong cure.

5. Continue to negotiate vigorously on all fronts to reduce international barriers to trade and investment flows. In this, we have a common interest with Japan.

To American businessmen, I would say:

1. Go after the Japanese market—the second largest in the world. Go after it with patience, persistence, understanding, and a willingness to invest for the long term. Also, recognize that Japan is a different market, and has to be approached very differently than California or Minnesota.

2. When you feel you are unfairly the victim of discrimination, move quickly and publicly to get the support of the U.S. Trade Representative's office and the President to initiate a 301 action.

Japan has its share of responsibility as well to help reduce trade friction between our two countries. Japanese businessmen in particular have a great interest in seeing that protectionist forces in the U.S. do not become so strong as to set in motion a series of steps that would reduce world trading opportunities. To our Japanese political and business friends, I would make the following suggestions:

1. Do something visible and immediate about increasing your imports—and from the undeveloped countries as well as from those trading partners with whom you enjoy large surpluses. There are many specific actions that can be taken, some of which have been suggested and are underway, others of which need immediate implementation.

2. Be sure that your U.S. trading partners have the same freedom of access to the Japanese market that your exporters and investors enjoy in the United States. You as businessmen are in a posiiton to do something about this.

3. Continue to expand productive investments in the U.S., so as to provide jobs and meet American demand for your products from American sources. This is how you will preserve your market share while contributing to our job market.

4. Expand your domestic economy. Draw more manufactured imports. Japan has not done its share of importing manufactured products from less developed countries, a well as from more advanced industrial countries.

5. Be sure your market is truly open to imports and investment and capital flows—not just on paper, but in attitudes. Japan will eventually become as open a market for international consumer tastes as the U.S. and Europe. Because of Japan's massive trade surplus, it is important that that trend be accelerated.

Finally, let me say I am an optimist about our ability to solve the trade problem that is causing so much difficulty for both countries. Everyone attending this conference, from both sides of the Pacific, has a common interest in free trade, in fair trade, in limiting protectionism, in reduced barriers to investment flows, and in a stable world economic scene.

Some of the solution lies in our hands as businessmen interested in our own companies' futures. Much of it lies with our respective governments. There, too, we businessmen can be a powerful force for influencing the course of events. To the extent we are successful in influencing those political events, we can play a valuable part in preserving an open and properous trading world.●

KOREAN SECURITY AND THE UNITED STATES

HON. BOB McEWEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. McEWEN. Mr. Speaker, recently the gentleman from New Jersey addressed the second C.S.I.S. Council for Northeast Asia Forum in Seoul, Korea. His scholarly work regarding the mutual needs and interests of Korean security and the United States was one of the outstanding presentations of this conference.

Mr. Speaker, it is important to note that the leadership throughout the Pacific Basin attended this conference which studied the various crises that free nations face. Mr. COURTER's relentless work on this issue has earned the respect and admiration of his colleagues. I commend the gentleman from New Jersey for his effort and insert his comments for the consideration of the Members of the House in the RECORD:

KOREAN SECURITY AND THE UNITED STATES: MUTUAL NEEDS AND INTERESTS AN AMERICAN PERSPECTIVE

(Comments of Congressman Jim Courter)

Chairman Brzezinski, Dr. Kim, distinguished representatives of the Republic of Korea, Ambassador Sherman, congressional colleagues Badham and Blaz, ladies and gentlemen: Thank you for the opportunity to speak before you today, and for the opportunity to take part in what have been very valuable discussions.

In a book titled The Problem of Asia, published in 1900, a United States Navy Captain named Alfred Thayer Mahan described his countrymen as "distinctly averse to studying political problems (until they were) pressed home upon our consciousness by an immediate emergency." War with Spain, which pulled the U.S. into involvement in the Philippines, provided just such an exigency. At last, Mahan said, America was taking "a longer view." America's vision rose "gradually above the Antilles and the Isthmus, (and) saw beyond them the Pacific, Hawaii, and the beginning of momentous issues in China and Japan."

Eight decades later, in 1982, United States trade with Asia surpassed in volume our trade with Europe. This is but a small, silent statistic in technical books, but it is the key to a geopolitical change of immense importance. American ties to Europe have always been the strongest, by reasons of patrimony, sentiment, commerce, and alliance in war. While this instinctive American allegiance will endure, it seems certain that our ties to Asia will be strengthened in the next decades by immigration, trade, and political and cultural contacts, as well as by the harsh necessity of increasing danger in the Pacific. In Mahan's day, men talked of a dream—a great canal through the Isthmus to open the Pacific. Today men talk of another, parallel canal.

In certain respects, the Asian rim and the long Pacific basin have become the hope of developing nations the world over. Nowhere in the last decade has the predominance of capitalism become more dramatic. Following in Japan's wake, South Korea, Singapore, Hong Kong, Taiwan, and other small island and Isthmus countries are enjoying prosperity and economic growth rates which could never be matched by socialist and state managed economies. On the Asian subcontinent, giant and democratic India is moving toward a freer market model after years of quasi-socialism, with economic deregulation and dramatic tax rate reductions. Far to the South, New Zealand and Australia are striding toward robust economic expansion via increased competition and the incentives of tax cuts. A strong rate of economic growth is the only way to fund the great cost of defense which is made necessary by the threat from the Communist oligarchs. But no matter how high economic growth rates rise in the future, we realize the R.O.K. and the rest of the free nations of Asia cannot go it alone against the Soviet empire.

UNITED STATES SECURITY AND THE PACIFIC

The gifted French observer of American democracy, Alexis de Tocqueville, observed as early as the 1840's that America and Russia were two powers moving rapidly toward mutual domination of the world stage. He wrote that each would become so large that only the other would be a rival. Perhaps no more than a few Americans took note of that fascinating prediction. But in 1904 the American historian Albert Beveridge published The Russian Advance, and it's first sentence reflected a geopolitical movement begun by Peter the Great and fully achieved at last: "The Russian has arrived on the Pacific." The apparition of that "gray-clad militant figure standing on the frozen shores," Beveridge continued, has claimed "the acute attentions of every cabinet in Europe and of every thoughtful American citizen."

As World War Two ended, the U.S.S.R.'s armies advance into the rimlands of Eastern Asia, and reached far enough into Europe to occupy half its heartland. They were never to retire. Thus the Soviet Union became, and so it remains, the central security concern of the American people, and is such on both American shores.

Soviet power and Soviet designs will remain the chief American defense concern over the next decades. This is an undeniable fact of geopolitics. One could say that today America faces Russia as Britain did in the nineteenth century: as an "island" power which faces a much larger land power. Certainly America is a much larger island than Britain. But then, Russia has grown enormously as a land power; it now extends across twelve time zones from the Sea of Japan to the Elbe River. And the invasion of Afghanistan carried Soviet armies to within 300 miles of the Persian Gulf, threatening to split the continent in half. If now the Soviets destabilize or neutralize Pakistan, the Detroit News observes, "they will be able to use their Yemeni and Ethiopian bases on the east coast of Africa to surround the Persian Gulf effectively. They will have finally won the Great Game that pitted them against Britain a century ago. And if the same happens to Thailand, the gigantic pincer movement last attempted by the Berlin-Tokyo Axis 45 years ago will be achieved by the U.S.S.R."

Just as British security in the nineteenth century required that no continental European power come to dominate, and have the power to close, the European coastline and its centers of maritime trade, America would find it impossible to survive in the Pacific should all of Eurasia fall under the domination of a single government. Yet what has happened of late? The loss of the Vietnam war has left the Soviet Union with numerous ports and airfields in Indochina, particularly Cam Ranh Bay which controls the strategic juncture between Northeast and Southeast Asia. America closed some bases in the Philippines, and gave up sovereign authority over certain other basing areas. We surrendered formal control of the Panama Canal. We have pledged ourselves not to increase aid to Taiwan, and even discussed a gradual decrease of arms sales.

There have been reasons for some of these actions. But it is certain that most represent strategic losses which must be offset. Since the United States can do very little about the mass of Soviet power within Asia, it can and must do more to guarantee the freedom and strength of those countries on the Asian rim.

IMPORTANCE OF KOREA TO U.S. SECURITY

Our Mutual Defense Treaty, which officials of the Republic of Korea and the United States signed in 1953, affirms our mutual desire to strengthen peace, in the Pacific region. The signatories desired—and here let me quote exactly—"to declare publicly and formally their common determination to defend themselves against external armed attack so that no potential aggressor could be under the illusion that either of them stands alone."

These were fine words. But they were not only words. They expressed a brotherhood born in terrible battles a very few months before. Koreans were to fight alongside Americans again in Vietnam. Our military relations have continued to develop: The R.O.K. and the U.S. have established a joint military command for better coordination in Korea, and our annual "Team Spirit" exercises are the largest the Americans carry out anywhere in the world. 40,000 U.S. troops remain on the ground in Korea. Some Americans say that is too many; some say it is too few. The point is that they remain, as they have for three decades. The Department of Defense has regularly declared that "American forces will remain on the peninsula as long as the Korean people want them there."

Defense Secretary Weinberger has stated that "the defense efforts of Japan, China and Korea have the potential to affect the global balance of power more profoundly perhaps than those of any other countries in the world, outside the U.S. and the Soviet Union." Let us look for a moment at Japan and China. Each has immense potential to help in protecting the Pacific countries. But each has its limitations. Japan's defense budget has increased by 7 percent each year for the last decade and a half, but it multiplies from a very small base. Japan's self defense is still unassured. The November 1976 Cabinet reaffirmation of the policy of holding military spending to one percent of the GNP paid dignified respects to the constitution Americans helped design so many years ago, but it is a policy which the Japanese must and are now considering amending. Ours is a world in which the Soviet Union routinely spends 14 percent of its enormous GNP on armed forces. North Korea spends 24 percent.

China fascinates Americans, who have a traditional habit of overestimating the part China plays, or will play, on the world stage. Its defenses are many men deep, but it still lacks the power to project force. China was in no position to interdict the Soviet-backed conquest of Indochina, or Soviet annexation of Afghanistan, even though Laos and Afghanistan's Wakhan Corridor both border on China. The celebrated border war with Vietnam was indecisive. It was most noteworthy, in fact, that Vietnam never felt compelled to withdraw its troops from Laos and Cambodia and redeploy them northward against China. That indicated much about Hanoi's expectations about the extent of the Chinese designs. There is something else which many Americans have overlooked: There are signs, especially since about 1981, that China's political and economic relations with the Soviet Union are much improved. Chinese contacts and exchanges with the Eastern European satellites are now commonplace. Peking has just announced that trade with the U.S.S.R. is to quadruple by 1990.

SOVIET POWER, SOVIET PLANS

The alliance of states opposed to further Soviet geopolitical gains in Asia is thus a very loose one, and includes an uncertain member. We can hardly avoid pondering this, since Soviet ground forces in eastern Asia have tripled in size since the mid-1960's. Tactical air forces have been doubled since 1970, and systematically modernized. Backfire bombers by the dozen have been deployed. SS 20 deployments cast an ominous shadow over Korea, China, Japan, portions of Alaska, the Philippines, and southern Asia. The Soviet Pacific fleet is the largest of their four Navies. The Merchant Marine, the incomparable ally of a navy in war or peace, surpassed in size that of the U.S. many years ago, and is easily the world's largest. And 13,000 men, 260 tanks, and 300 armored personnel carriers have been deployed on the southern Kurile Islands just north of Japan.

What are these new forces for? First, they can dominate the sea lanes of the Asian Pacific, and exclude other interested countries' ships. Second, Soviet power has been brought to bear to consolidate the newly-created Indochinese federation of Laos, Cambodia, and Vietnam. Vietnam is already a full member of the communist economic bloc. The same future awaits the two other countries. Soviet plans, Soviet money, and Soviet military advisors are behind this integration. Third, augmented Soviet power is intended to neutralize Korea and Japan, the economic giants to whom freedom of the seas is everything. Militarization of the Kuriles, repeated violations of Japanese airspace by fighters and bombers, frequent usage of the Japanese and Korean straits, and harassment of fishermen off Hokaido are all linked to this design. Fourth, the U.S.S.R. is serving notice to China that it is in no position to oppose Soviet grand strategy during peacetime or war.

A fifth Soviet foreign policy goal in Asia, of course, is support of the government of North Korea. The two countries signed a defense accord in May of last year. The celebrations during this past month of the first anniversary of Kim Il-Sung's 50-day tour of the Soviet and Eastern European bloc were enthusiastic, marked by militant rhetoric, and full of promises of further integration and further enterprises for "the international communist movement." So were press releases accompanying recent state visits to Pyongyang of a Czech Vice Premier and the Bulgarian dictator Todor Zhivkov. Regular North Korean involvement with Soviet allies from Syria and the P.L.O. to Cuba, Nicaragua and the last government of Grenada have served notice to Americans that North Korea is a global problem, not just a South Korean problem. Americans also tended to see the attack on the President and Cabinet in Rangoon in 1983 as indicative of the character of the North Korean regime, rather than as an excess of particular elements within its Army.

THE NORTH KOREAN THREAT TO THE SOUTHERN REPUBLIC

When Ambassador Sherman spoke on Korea to a distinguished audience at the Hoover Institution at Stanford University last year, he made the point that on a 120 mile front, North Korea possesses three-quarters as many artillery pieces as the U.S. Army has world-wide. North Korea has a 2 to 1 advantage in offensive weapons generally. Practically every able-bodied male is enrolled in the army, or its reserves, or some kind of militia. The country has less than half of the South's population, but maintains 150,000 more men standing to arms.

What are these capabilities for? Defense? Perhaps. But a state-sponsored act of mass assassination—and that was what the Rangoon bombing was—should tell us something of the North's intentions. So too should the simple fact that military analysts recognize North Korea's force configurations as offensive in character. The army is increasingly deployed forward along the demilitarized zone, and American officials believe there are some 10 new forward basing areas. Forward redeployment of what had been rear echelon forces continued even during delivery of the celebrated flood relief assistance of last autumn. One must consider too the tripling of the North's amphibious landing capabilities since 1971, and the tunnels, shocking in their size and potential efficiency as means of troop transport. These are not defensive assets.

PROJECTIONS FOR THE IMMEDIATE FUTURE

It seems likely that the dangers will remain on the Korean peninsula, and that the Republic of Korea, due to no fault of its own, will find it necessary to continue speaking of managing tensions rather than of ending them. First, there is no indication that Soviet military growth will abate. Second, there is every reason to believe that the economic gap between the two countries' economies will widen, and remain a continuing reproof to Northern pretensions about the superiority of communism. South Korean prestige will also be enhanced by the international economic talks scheduled for this autumn, the Asian Games slated for Seoul in 1986, and of course the Olympics in 1988. Third, if President Chun does step down from office when his term ends in 1988, he will have crowned a good period in the Republic's history with the nation's first peaceable transfer of power since the war. This will even further enhance the country's sense of well-being and its position in international forums as an exponent of democracy, and what is an advantage to the South will prove an irritant to the North. Lastly, if the Sino-Soviet rapprochement continues, the reservations both those powers now seem to hold about any conflict on the Korean peninsula could diminish.

It appears that there is little likelihood of Korean reunification in the near future. Certainly the Koreans want it. Most of the world wants it. But the operative question is and will remain: "Reunification on whose terms?" We see the same dilemna in Germany. The experience of South Vietnam should be sufficient to suggest that reunification on any terms can be a bad proposition.

North Korean politics are not expected to change. It seems unlikely that anything will break the present slow passage of power from Kim to his son. The latter already appears to be in charge of many day-to-day activities, and the extent of his father's enormous personality cult will protect him against many likely enemies. If these is a succesion struggle, it is not easy to project what effect it will have on the R.O.K.'s security. Most nations turn in upon themselves in times of internal crisis, but others hurl themselves outward as an alternative to, or as a means of dealing with, insoluable internal difficulties.

Were I to name, in one word or a few, those things which would benefit us most during these next years, they would be: Regional Cooperation, especially between Korea and Japan and China. Vigilance. Democratization. Americans look for continued movement in the R.O.K. towards greater self-government as a complement to its dynamic market economy. More freedom of elections, trade unions, and the press would strengthen Korea, not weaken it. I know that your democracy is young. But I believe Koreans recognize that Americans, wherever they are on the political spectrum, find it difficult—and, in the long run, impossible—to support governments which deny human and political rights. Democracy requires full freedom of vocal dissent from current policy, so long as that dissent is expressed peacefully. Granting fuller political rights to opponents would end Americans' uneasiness about the R.O.K., just as several sets of elections in El Salvador have silenced those who wished to end American economic and military aid to that once troubled and now startlingly successful country.

CONCLUSION

I noted de Tocqueville's prediction that, one day, the U.S. and Russia would each "hold in its hands the destinies of half the world." But his characterization of how each would hold its half is of equal interest. The American "combats the wilderness and barbarism," said this Frenchman, while Russia "combats civilization itself." "America's conquests are made with the plowshare, Russia's with the sword. To attain their aims, the former releases personal interest and gives free scope to the unguided strength of common sense of individuals. The latter in a sense concentrates the whole power of society in one man. One has freedom as the principle means of action; the other has servitude."

This distinction, made more than a century ago, recalls that between Athens and Sparta. It comes to mind in respect to the South and the North in Korea, too, and not only because of the upcoming Olympic Games. The power of the South, the national excellence of the South, is commercial. The R.O.K., like Athens, is outward-looking, maritime, ever bent on redoubling its contacts and its commerce abroad, and open and adaptive of the differing ways of the world. The power of the North is military, and its national character is marked by the militarization of the society, the pervasiveness of political organization and the refusal to permit anything to remain in the private realm, and suggestions of national xenophobia.

North Korea therefore suits the Soviet Union and its patterns of alliances, in which the tendency is always towards central control and discipline. And the South's independence suits as well the American pattern, best represented by NATO, whose divergences and disagreements are freely voiced and bare to the world. America believes that Korean self-interest will maintain and strengthen the present alliance with the U.S. without undue pressure from either party. Each comes freely to the agreement, which can be terminated by either at its pleasure, but which instead grows stronger year by year.

Soviet power can and must be confronted in Asia as surely as on the European continent. The R.O.K.-U.S. alliance will be an increasingly important dimension of this containment. America can no more afford to see Europe kept free while Korea and Japan are lost than it can hope to survive by fighting for Korea and Japan while Europe is overrun.

Let such necessities for mutual security be a sound foundation for all the other advantages of Korean-American friendship, trade, and cultural exchange. And let this alliance be an example, before the eyes of the world, of the best that can be struck by free men acting through the agencies of free government.●

LANGUAGE MINORITY STUDENTS DESERVE FEDERAL HELP

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, recent articles in Time magazine and the Washington Post have focused on bilingual education and the instruction of American students whose native language is other than English. While the factual information contained in these articles is limited, they have drawn attention to a critical national problem—the continuing educational neglect of students who are limited in their English language proficiency [LEP].

As Congress develops the fiscal year 1986 Federal budget and appropriations bills, I hope that my colleagues will consider the educational plight of LEP students and their families. I also hope that my colleagues will reflect upon the Federal Government's profound responsibility to ensure that these children learn English and all the subject-matter skills taught in our schools.

Earlier this year, Dr. Sarah E. Melendez, president of the National Association for Bilingual Education testified before the House Appropriations Subcommittee on Labor, Health and Human Services, and Education on the need for increased Federal education aid for LEP students. Dr. Melendez' statement provides a cogent, comprehensive, and compelling analysis of the needs of LEP students and the Federal Government's responsibility for these students. Accordingly, I submit relevant portions of her statement for inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

STATEMENT OF DR. SARAH E. MELÉNDEZ

Mr. Chairman, my name is Sarah E. Meléndez; I am the current president of the National Association for Bilingual Education (NABE). NABE is committed to helping all language-minority students learn English and succeed in school. NABE members—parents, teachers, administrators, and researchers—have found that soundly-implemented bilinegual education programs help children learn English, progress in subject matter areas, and remain in school through graduation.

We appreciate the opportunity to testify on funding for the bilingual education programs authorized under ESEA Title VII and the Vocational Education Act. These are the only Federal programs specifically designed to meet the special educational needs of language-minority Americans who are limited in their English language proficiency (LEP).

In requesting additional funding, I am cognizant of the compelling need to reduce Federal outlays. Voters want the Federal deficit reduced, and they expect their Representatives to exercise fiscal prudence.

I question, however, whether continued underfunding of bilingual education is a fiscally prudent course. The infinitesimal budget savings which accrue from the Administration's proposal to freeze Title VII funding will be more than offset in the outyears by expenditures to cope with and care for people who were denied the opportunity to succeed in school.

And so, I ask you to consider the following facts about these programs and the people they serve.

Funding for bilingual education programs has, in recent years, been cut to unacceptable levels.

The population of language-minority children who are limited in their English language proficiency (LEP) is one of the fastest growing student populations in America.

LEP children are the most educationally-needy in the United States.

LEP children are the most educationally-neglected students in our schools.

The Nation cannot afford the economic and social cost of continued educational neglect of LEP students.

The new Bilingual Education Act is worthy of increased financial support.

BILINGUAL EDUCATION FUNDING CUTS

Since FY 1980, funding for the bilingual education programs authorized under Title VII and the Vocational Education Act has been slashed by almost one-third. Indeed, last year's appropriation was almost $29 million less than that approved by Congress in FY 1980, and nearly $37 million less than the House mark in FY 1981. The impact of these drastic budget cuts has been amplified by continuing inflation.

GROWTH OF THE LEP STUDENT POPULATION

In 1978, the Federal government estimated that there were 3.6 million children, aged 4 to 18, whose home language backgrounds were other than English and who were limited in the speaking, understanding, reading and writing skills in English needed to succeed in the English-medium school.[1]

In 1978, three-quarters of all LEP students were born in the United States or in one of its outlying areas.[2] More than half of all LEP students had Spanish as their native language.[3] While there are no precise estimates of the number of American Indian LEP students, a 1978 ED study found that there were more than 24,000 LEP Navaho children of elementary school age.[4]

According to a Department of Education report issued last year, the number of LEP children of school age increased by 20 percent between 1978 and 1982—a growth rate two-and-one-half times that of the general school-aged population.[5] While the growth of the LEP student population poses a challenge to schools in all parts of the Nation, schools in some states are particularly hard-pressed to meet this challenge. Consider California where:

In the Spring of 1984, almost one-half million students were classified as limited-English-proficient by the California State Department of Education.

Approximately three-quarters of these LEP students had Spanish as their native language, more than 29,000 students spoke Vietnamese, another 18,000 spoke Cantonese, another 10,000 spoke Philipino/Tagalog, and so on.

Los Angeles County schools enrolled more than a quarter-million LEP students in the Spring of 1984.

More than 18,000 of the students attending the San Francisco Unified School District were classified as non- or limited-English proficient in 1984. Six years ago, fewer than 8,000 LEP students attended San Francisco schools.[6]

In the years ahead, more and more schools across the nation will confront the challenge now facing schools in California, Florida, Illinois, New York, Texas, and in our border states. Indeed, disproportionate growth in the LEP student population is expected to continue and accelerate through the end of the Century.

EDUCATIONAL NEEDS OF LEP STUDENTS

Mr. Chairman, there is in American today, no group of children who are more educationally needy than language-minority children who are limited in their English language proficiency (LEP).

LEP children have the educational needs of all other children. Some LEP children are gifted and talented, others have physical handicaps and learning disabilities. A disproportionate number of LEP children are poor[7] and suffer the debilitating physical, emotional, and social consequences of poverty—poverty amidst affluence. And LEP children, like all American children, continue to be harmed by deeply-engrained gender-based stereotypes which persist in our schools and in our society.

Many LEP children and even more of their parents have suffered discrimination at the hands of private parties and the State. And while we have moved closer to the goal of a color-blind society, we cannot ignore the fact that our schools have been, and in some areas continue to be, a powerful engine of discrimination. The educational opportunities available to Indian, Hispanic, Asian, and other non-white children remain inferior to those generally available to majority students.

In addition to these barriers to educational success—barriers addressed through numerous Federal statutes and programs—LEP students face other barriers.

LEP students must learn English—a language other than their mother tongue—if they are to progress academically. And while teaching English to a LEP child is neither simple, nor quick, nor easy, it is a task that can and must be accomplished by our schools.

At the same time, LEP students must advance in their development of basic academic skills, and in their understanding of our world and our society. Mastery of English is an essential measure, but it is not the exclusive measure, of effective instruction for LEP students.

And finally, many LEP students must learn to appreciate and accommodate a culture different from their own. For those LEP students who are newcomers to this society, "culture-shock" is often compounded by the traumas of war, famine, and disaster—the forces that drive many families to our land.

EDUCATIONAL NEGLECT OF LEP STUDENTS

LEP students are not only the most educationally-needy children in our society, they are also the most educationally neglected.

In 1982, Education Secretary Terrel Bell reported:

"Although local school districts and States are making an effort, schools in general are not meeting the needs of LEP students. Only about a third of the [LEP students identified in a 1978 ED study] received either bilingual instruction—or instruction in English as a second language without the use of their home languages.

"Many schools are not assessing the special needs of language minority children. They are not assessing the English language proficiency of these children, much less the home language proficiency, as a basis for planning programs and providing services."[8]

And while the presence of most LEP students in a school district is the result of Federal actions (e.g., territorial annexation, diplomatic policies, and foreign military actions), the Federal government provides Title VII programs for only one of every 20 LEP students.

Last year's ED report on the "The Condition of Bilingual Education in the Nation" provided fruther evidence of the ongoing neglect of LEP students. "[In 1980-81], approximatly 500,000 teachers, or nearly one-quarter of the 2.3 million public school teachers in the United States, had limited English proficient students in their classes. Approximately 56,000 of these teachers were using a non-English language (NEL), with or without ESL, in the classroom. Almost twice as many or approximately 103,000 other teachers were using ESL only."[9]

Put another way, a majority of all teachers with LEP students in their classes were not providing bilingual instruction and they were not providing ESL instruction; they were not providing any special program of instruction for their LEP students. But what about the minority of LEP students who are receiving bilingual and/or ESL special instructional services? Once again, according to the ED report, the picture is dismal. Of the 56,000 teachers providing bilingual instruction, only 21,000 or 40 percent had full academic preparation. The lack of academic preparation was even more severe among teachers using an ESL-only instructional approach. Of the 103,000 teachers providing ESL-only instruction to their LEP pupils, only 11,000 had full academic preparation to do so.[10]

Make no mistake about it, the situation would be far worse were it not for the Bilingual Education Act. According to ED, teachers whose training was supported by Title VII were four times more likely to be academically prepared to instruct LEP students than teachers who did not receive Title VII supported training.[11]

NATIONAL COST OF EDUCATIONAL NEGLECT OF LEP STUDENTS

Earlier this year, the President's Commission on Industrial Competitiveness released its report on "Global Competition: The New Reality." This report, prepared by a panel of experts on industrial policy and world competition, highlighted the most flagrant manifestation of educational neglect—student dropouts. The report said:

"The high dropout rate in our secondary schools is contributing to the development of a growing, permanent underclass in our society. Twenty-six percent of students enrolled in school drop out. At this rate, our Nation is producing in excess of 1 million dropouts annually. The dropout rate among minorities is substantially higher—estimated by the Census Bureau in 1981 to be as high as 40 percent among blacks and 43 percent among Hispanics."[12]

The report noted that because of the demographic structure of our society, minority youth constitute the fastest growing segment of the young worker population and continued . . . "It is this fastest growing segment of the young worker population that is most likely to drop out of school and enter the work force without critical basic skills."

New approaches are required to address the problem of school dropouts and stem this loss of human resources. National attention must be focused on the severity of the problem, its causes, and its consequences. The Nation must act decisively to reduce the dropout rate dramatically or it will suffer more than a decline in competitive ability. If the dropout rate continues to accelerate, part of an entire generation could be lost to the productive process and to society. The quality of life for the Nation as a whole is at risk when large numbers of our youth fall by the wayside.[13]

This dire assessment by a Presidential Commission—a Commission made up of captains of industry and commerce—understates what we—the parents and educators of language-minority children—know all too well from first-hand experience.

We know that children who come to school with non-English language skills are not being taught English effectively. We know that LEP children are not being taught the other subjects and skills deemed essential in our society. We know that the academic gap between language-minority and English-language-background children generally grows throughout their tenure in our public schools. And we know that the frustration of school-induced academic failure causes nearly half our youth to drop out of school. We also know that many of our children resort to drugs, and some even to suicide, in a futile attempt to flee frustration and failure.

THE NEW BILINGUAL EDUCATION ACT: WORTHY OF INCREASED SUPPORT

Mr. Chairman, let me be clear. Title VII, regardless of funding level, cannot eliminate all the barriers which inhibit the academic progress of LEP students in our schools. It can, however, help schools bridge the barriers of language and culture which imprison so many of our youth.

This was the conclusion of Congress last fall when it reauthorized Title VII by enacting Public Law 98-511. Of all the education programs reauthorized by this act, the greatest amount of attention and energy was devoted to Title VII.

The "Academic Equity and Excellence Through Bilingual Education Act", which began as a comprehensive revision of Title VII cosponsored by more than 50 Representatives, was further expanded and refined in Committee by a bi-partisan group of Members. The product of this effort is a law, which in the words of Committee Chairman Hawkins, "takes into account, as never before, the needs of students, the aspirations of parents, the expectations of taxpayers, and the experience of educators."

The improvements to Title VII set out in the new legislation are too numerous to detail here. Nevertheless, certain new features of the revised Bilingual Education Act should be noted.

First, the new law requires reporting of basic educational data concerning the LEP population, their educational needs, and how those needs are being met through Federal, State, and local programs. The data reporting requirements of the new Bilingual Education Act focus on obvious measures of academic need and progress, and are designed to provide parents, educators, policymakers, and taxpayers with accurate information about this high-risk student population.

Second, Public Law 98-511 guarantees that parents will receive information about the placement and progress of students in Title VII programs, and gives parents the right to decline placement of their children in Title VII programs.

Third, the new law further strengthens Title VII by requiring that all classroom programs "provide structured English language instruction" (such as ESL) and "allow a child to meet grade-promotion and graduation standards."

Fourth, Public Law 98-511 expanded Title VII's flexibility by authorizing two new programs: Special Alternative Instruction Programs which need not use a child's native language, and Developmental Bilingual Education Programs which bring LEP and English-proficient students together to learn English and second language.

Fifth, the revised Bilingual Education Act addresses the intergenerational problem of English illiteracy by creating a new Title VII grant for Family English Literacy Programs. These programs, which can be administered by non-profit community organizations as well as educational institutions, are exclusively focused on helping the parents of LEP students learn English so that they can be active and effective partners in the education of their children.

Sixth, Public Law 98-511 Addresses the national shortage of qualified teachers for LEP students by increasing the proportion of funds reserved for training and retraining, by strengthing standards for teacher pre-service and in-service training, and by focusing graduate-level training on neglected specialities such as special education for LEP students.

Because of these features and numerous other improvements, the revised Bilingual Education Act is a program which deserves expanded Federal support.●

DR. DAVID STEINBERG: ACHIEVING ACADEMIC EXCELLENCE

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to an old friend, staunch supporter, and outstanding academician. Dr. David Steinberg recently assumed the presidency of Long Island University, which I am proud to say is in my district in Brooklyn. A native New Yorker, Dr. Steinberg understands the complexities of city life, and he brings to LIU some specific recommendations for upgrading the university.

LIU, with an enrollment of approximately 20,000 students, is the ninth largest independent university in the Nation. There is a campus in downtown Brooklyn, which is generally referred to as LIU; there is C. W. Post College campus on the luxurious former Post estate in Old Brookville; the Southampton College campus on eastern Long Island, and rented facilities on the grounds of the Sisters of St. Joseph in Brentwood.

Dr. Steinberg's philosophy that "a university is a service organization to the community it surrounds" is exactly the kind of clear thinking that is needed in today's world. Making educational resources available to the entire community of 6.7 million people is a huge undertaking. This will include integrating the four colleges' libraries on to one computer for easy access, and bringing nationally known professors to teach and lecture at the university. If anyone can do it, Dr. Steinberg can.

Dr. Steinberg's qualifications for this position are without a doubt an example of how he will be able to effectively reach out to the community and integrate the four campuses. Educated at Harvard, Dr. Steinberg comes to LIU after serving as secretary, vice president, and executive assistant to the president of Brandeis University in Cambridge, MA. He has also served as a full professor at the University of Michigan for 10 years, and is one of the country's leading authorities on the Philippines.

I am confident that Dr. Steinberg will continue to make significant contributions to academia in his new role as president of Long Island University. On behalf of all Brooklynites, I welcome Dr. Steinberg to our town.●

BIAGGI LETTER SEEKS FULL SENATE HEARINGS ON UNITED STATES, UNITED KINGDOM SUPPLEMENTARY EXTRADITION TREATY

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, today I wish to place into the RECORD a copy of a letter I have sent to Chairman RICHARD LUGAR of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee relative to a new Supplementary Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom.

I am pleased to note that I was joined on this letter by 55 of my House colleagues and Senator PAUL SIMON. It calls upon the Senate committee to conduct full hearings on the Supplementary Treaty which was signed by the two governments on June 25 and forwarded by the President on July 17.

The concern that we have relates to the virtual elimination of the "political exception" category as well as the retroactive nature of the treaty.

Today the Senate Foreign Relations Committee conducted their first hearing on the treaty which they must report to the full Senate which must ratify it before it can be ratified. It was obvious from some of the observations and comments made during today's hearing that there will be careful and full consideration of the treaty by the committee.

At this point in the RECORD I would first like to insert the text of the Supplementary Extradition Treaty followed by a copy of the letter and the names of those who signed it.

LETTER OF TRANSMITTAL

THE WHITE HOUSE, July 17, 1985.

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith the Supplementary Extradition Treaty between the United States of America and the United Kingdom, with annex, signed at Washington on June 25, 1985.

I transmit also, for the information of the Senate, the report of the Department of State with respect to the Supplementary Treaty.

The Supplementary Treaty adds to and amends the Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, signed at London on June 8, 1972.

It represents a significant step in improving law enforcement cooperation and combatting terrorism, by excluding from the scope of the political offense exception serious offenses typically committed by terrorists, e.g., aircraft hijacking and sabotage, crime against diplomats, hostage taking, and other heinous acts such as murder, manslaughter, malicious assault, and certain serious offenses involving firearms, explosives, and damage to property.

The Supplementary Treaty, in addition to narrowing the application of the political offense exception to extradition, will also help improve implementation of the current Extradition Treaty in several other respects. I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to the Supplementary Treaty and give its advice and consent to ratification.

RONALD REAGAN.

LETTER OF SUBMITTAL

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 3, 1985.

The PRESIDENT,
The White House.

MR. PRESIDENT: I have the honor to submit to you the Supplementary Extradition Treaty between the United States of America and the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland, with annex, signed at Washington on June 25, 1985. I recommend that the Supplementary Treaty be transmitted to the Senate for advice and consent to ratification.

The Supplementary Treaty supplements and amends the Extradition Treaty between the United States and the United Kingdom, signed at London on June 8, 1972 (28 U.S.T. 227; TIAS 8468). The Supplementary Extradition Treaty would exclude specific crimes of violence, typically committed by terrorists, from the scope of the political offense exception to extradition. It therefore represents a significant step to improve law enforcement cooperation and counter the threat of international terrorism and other crimes of violence.

Article 1 of the Supplementary Treaty effectively limits the scope of Article V, paragraph (1)(c)(i) of the current Extradition Treaty—the political offense exception—by listing the crimes which shall not be regarded as offenses of a political character, namely: aircraft hijacking; aircraft sabotage; crimes against internationally protected persons, including diplomats; hostage taking; as well as murder; manslaughter; malicious assault; kidnapping; and specified firearms, explosives, and serious property damage offenses.

Article 2 of the Supplementary Treaty amends Article V, paragraph (1)(b) of the current Extradition Treaty by providing that extradition shall be denied if prosecution would be barred by the statute of limitations of the requesting State. The current treaty provision permits the statute of limitations of either the requesting or requested State to apply.

Article 3 of the Supplementary Treaty amends Article VIII, paragraph (2) of the current Extradition Treaty by providing that the requesting State shall have as much as 60 days following provisional arrest to submit evidence in support of an extradition request, and that if by that time such evidence has not been submitted the person arrested shall be set at liberty. The current treaty allows only 45 days.

Article 4 of the Supplementary Treaty provides that its provisions shall apply to any offense committed before or after the entry into force of the Supplementary Treaty, but shall not apply to an offense committed before the Supplementary Treaty enters into force if the offense in question was not an offense under the laws of both Contracting Parties at the time of its commission.

Article 5 of the Supplementary Treaty provides that it shall form an integral part of the current Extradition Treaty and sets forth its territorial application for the United States and the United Kingdom, respectively.

Article 6 of the Supplementary Treaty provides that it shall enter into force upon the exchange of instruments of ratification and shall be subject to termination in the same manner as the current Extradition Treaty.

The Department of Justice joins the Department of State in favoring transmission of this Supplementary Treaty to the Senate at the earliest possible date.

Respectfully submitted,

GEORGE P. SHULTZ.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, DC, July 31, 1985.

Hon. RICHARD LUGAR,
Chairman, Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: We, the undersigned, are writing to respectfully request that full hearings be conducted on the proposed Supplementary Extradition Treaty signed by the United States and the United Kingdom on June 25, and forwarded to the Senate by President Reagan on July 17.

We are aware that a hearing has been scheduled for August 1. A number of concerns have been raised about this treaty, concerns we share. In that regard, we believe that a full set of hearings are necessary to ensure that these concerns are registered and addressed.

This document is both extraordinary and significant in effect. Its ratification will result in the virtual destruction of the "political offense" exemption that since the 1870's has been a cornerstone of extradition law and treaty in both the United States and the United Kingdom. This treaty is unprecedented in many regards, not the least of which is the fact that it is retroactive upon ratification. The fact that the treaty establishes so many new precedents warrants that it be given full and careful consideration. It is interesting to note that this Supplementary Treaty is being considered within a time period of just over one month. The original Extradition Treaty, signed in London on June 8, 1972, required 4 years to negotiate.

We hope you will give consideration to our views. The need for expanded hearing beyond August 1 becomes evident as more examination of the treaty is undertaken. There are serious legal and political issues associated with this Supplementary Treaty, and we are hopeful they can receive full attention before your distinguished Committee.

Sincerely,

MARIO BIAGGI,
Member of Congress.

HOW TO STOP THE TIDE OF INFANT MORTALITY

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to bring the attention of my colleagues to an article in the July 23, issue of the Wall Street Journal. The article concerns the disturbing problem of infant death. While infant mortality is still decreasing, the rate of decrease is becoming slower and slower each year. In addition, the infant mortality rate continues to be twice as high for black babies as for white babies.

Mr. Speaker, the article suggests that part of the cause for this trend toward leveling off is the tremendous decrease in Federal funding for prenatal and immediate postnatal care. If we are to continue to control the tragedy of infant mortality, we must ensure that programs for young children and pregnant mothers receive the funding that they desperately need.

The text of the article follows:

HOW TO STOP THE TIDE OF INFANT MORTALITY

(By Alan L. Otten)

WASHINGTON.—We're in the middle of a bad trend," says Sara Rosenbaum of the Children's Defense Fund, "and for the administration still to come forward and cut prorams of proven effectiveness is unforgivable."

Replies Dr. James O. Mason, the ranking health official at the Department of Health and Human Services: "Until we know a lot more about why it's happening, simply throwing federal dollars at it won't work. Particularly if it's not met by increased concern at the community level and many other changes."

Ms. Rosenbaum and Dr. Mason represent the two sides in an escalating argument over what to do about a slower-than-expected drop in infant mortality rates—long regarded as a bellwether social indicator. As is so frequently the case in Washington, both sides are probably at least partly right.

SOME GOOD NEWS

There's some good news, to be sure. Infant mortality—deaths during the first year of life—continues to fall, for blacks as well as whites. The preliminary overall rate for 1984 was 10.6 deaths per 1,000 live births, a 57 percent drop since 1965.

But there's lots of bad news, too. Preliminary data show the rate of decline slowing over the past two years. Each year, 40,000 infants still die. The black infant mortality rate still is double the white rate. The incidence of low-birth-weight babies—5.5 pounds or less are 40 times likelier to die in the first month than are normal-weight babies—remains distressingly high, particularly among blacks. The proportion of pregnant women receiving prenatal care during the first trimester actually has been declining.

All this adds up to a situation the administration concedes is "disquieting" and "cause for concern," but which liberal groups insist is far more serious than that.

They want higher spending on a broad range of child and maternal health programs that the Reagan administration has cut back, frozen or allowed only minimal increases. The administration says it's spending more than its critics contend. Exact figures are hard to separate from broader health categories. But, for example, in one program, supplemental nutrition for infants and pregnant women, the administration is projecting a 2 percent increase in the current fiscal year, to $1.44 billion, a sum that liberals note will cover only the same number of individuals.

The Department of Health and Human Services predicts the nation still will meet one key goal set by the Public Health Service in 1979: to cut the overall infant mortality rate to 9.0 deaths per 1000 live births by 1990. However, it admits that other major infant and material health goals set for 1990 will be missed, some by wide margins, and, in particular, goals that affect blacks. Health and Human Services Secretary Margaret Heckler will try to shed more light on the administration's attitude in a speech to the National Urban League here today.

At some point, of course, infant mortality rates will reach an irreducible minimum, but most experts say the U.S. is nowhere near there yet. Largely because of its high proportion of low-birth-weight babies, the U.S. has been falling further behind other industrialized nations, in 1980 ranking behind 15 others, and their infant mortality rates continue to drop. The rate for U.S. whites alone still puts this nation only in 12th place.

TECHNOLOGY HELPED REDUCE RATE

Much of the U.S. decline in infant mortality over the past two decades has resulted from technological advances in the care of low-birth-weight and other problem births and to the steady spread of intensive-care units for the newborn. Now, says Dr. Vince L. Hutchins, head of maternal and child health programs at Health and Human Services, "we may be near the maximum" of what technology can do in this area.

Other factors also are making it hard to bring down infant mortality now, administration officials say: the large numbers of pregnant teen-agers, especially poor young women at high risk for problem births; smoking, drinking and drug abuse during pregnancy; and the reluctance of many poor women to seek early prenatal care, even when it's available.

"And why is it always federal money" that must solve these problems? Dr. Mason demands. "Primary responsibility for the achievement of the 1990 goals," he argues, rests with state and local health agencies and the pregnant women themselves.

The major federal responsibility right how, he says, is research to find out what's happening and why, "and that we take very seriously," with more than a dozen task forces at work.

Naturally, all this doesn't impress the critics. Sure, they say, it would be nice to reduce teen-age pregnancy, get pregnant women to stop smoking, and have state and local governments do more. But the federal government also must spend more, on everything from family planning and prenatal services to Medicaid and food programs for low-income people.

Administration cutbacks in prenatal and infant programs "have contributed significantly to the change of trend in the infant mortality rate," Dr. C. Arden Miller, a public health specialist at the University of North Carolina, writes in the July Scientific American. He accuses the Reaganites of "slavishly trying to implement an ideology, when the better course might be to allow some exceptions, especially cost-effective exceptions."

For example, a prestigious committee of the National Academy of Sciences' Institute of Medicine recently reported "overwhelming evidence" that early prenatal care makes for higher birth weights, and that every $1 spent on such care for low-income women would save more than $3 in care of low-weight babies after birth. Yet in 1982, slightly over one-fifth of all pregnant white women and well over one-third of pregnant black women didn't get first-trimester care.

Moreover, administration critics note, many areas of longtime unemployment and high poverty currently are experiencing level or even rising infant mortality rates, especially for older infants. "You are talking about a Third World phenomenon here in the U.S.," charges Ms. Rosenbaum. "Babies dying because of infectious diseases, poor nutrition, lack of access to basic medical care."

Paradoxically, White House support of right-to-life efforts to curb abortion could swell infant mortality figures. Unintended or unwanted pregnancies often produce high-risk babies, but since the Supreme Court's abortion decision, more women have chosen to abort unwanted pregnancies.

Studies by Michael Grossman and colleagues at the National Bureau of Economic Research conclude that the wider availability of abortion has been "the single most important factor in reducing the neonatal mortality rate" among blacks over the past two decades, and also helped cut the white rate. "If abortion were illegal," Mr. Grossman writes, "neonatal mortality, especially among blacks, would fall more slowly than otherwise, and might even rise."●

STAR WARS—A WASTE

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, as we gather increasing evidence on the Defense Department's strategic defense initiative, one thing has become clear: It simply will not work. Here we are haggling over various ways to trim the country's budget, to tighten the belts of the needy and truly deserving. Meanwhile, we grant enormous increases in funding to a program that is technically impossible and strategically destabilizing.

It is easy to understand why universities would be anxious to receive star wars research funding. In today's market of rising costs of education, their mouths must surely water at the prospect of lapping up their share of the delectable star wars pie. Yet a few concerned scientists and universities have had the courage to speak out. Now we are beginning to see the snowballing effects of their movement to garner opposition to the program. Letters and petitions have been circulating nationwide among those scientists who recognize the star wars program for the boondoggle that it is. While the movement is substantial now, I would like to warn my colleagues who approved star wars funding to look for a massive wave of opposition from the scientific community in the fall.

Mr. Speaker, let us in Congress stop fooling ourselves. Star wars is going to be the biggest incident of defense waste and fraud ever—to the tune of almost $3 billion this year alone. Only this time, we aren't just throwing away our taxpayers' dollars. We are throwing away our national security.

At this point, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues to a recent editorial from the Boston Globe. The text of the article follows:

PORK BARRELS IN THE SKY

Most scientsts who have studied it regard the Star Wars premise of a technical defense against nuclear attack as a fraud. No technology imagined, let alone developed, holds a faint hope of providing safety to populations. The radical escalation in Star Wars research sought by President Reagan and rubberstamped by Congress is a scam.

Technical innovation has been crucial to the U.S. economy. Scientists who are bribed into devoting their lives to "interesting" military problems, such as hardening computers to withstand the electromagnetic pulses in nuclear blasts, are not available to pioneer manufacturing techniques or robotics or biogenetics.

This "brain drain" affects the U.S. position in the world economy, just as the Apollo program, which drew European scientists in the 1960s, damaged the European economy.

For scientists, the moral issue in Star Wars centers on the acceptance of a bribe to do work that there is reason to believe will be, at best, wasteful and, at worst, corrosive to the peace. Scientists know they are being used by the government to manipulate Congress and public opinion.

Congress agreed with Reagan's first Star Wars funding requests in 1983, but the plan met with overwhelming criticism from the best-informed scientists and defense specialists.

As that criticism began to take its toll, co-opting scientists became important to continued congressional support. James Ionsen, who hands out federal Star Wars grants, said in a recent interview in Science. "This office is trying to sell something to Congress. If we can say that this fellow at MIT will get money to do such and such research, it's something real to sell."

Some see this largesse as the malice of a cynical administration, bamboozling the public to keep the arms race prominent and profitable. or, as MIT physicist Philip Morrison puts it, "to inoculate us against the possibility that peace will break out."

Even if there is no malice, the result is alarming. Kosta Tsipis, an MIT physicist specializing in defense issues, opposes random increases in funding for Star Wars. He is confident that the space-defense program will eventually collapse of its own weight. The issue that alarms him is the misallocation of scientific talent into areas of research that are virtually useless.

Whether malice or folly, Star Wars represents prodigious waste. Never before has so much money been thrown into military spending projects of such dubious strategic merit. Many of these barrels of intellectual pork have not been defined on anything but the back of an envelope. Serious scientists have a responsibility to blow the whistle until Congress listens.●

SAFE RIDE PROGRAM

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I was recently visited by three students from East Hartford, CT, Dennis McCabe, Brian Marcus, and Edward Fenton. They came to urge my endorsement for Safe Ride, a program to combat drunk driving. The Safe Ride Program plays an important role in preventing drunk driving among our teenagers, and provides our youths with a genuine awareness of the problems associated with drinking and driving. I believe their volunteer actions in the Safe Ride Program and the program itself are worthy of my colleagues attention.

Let me briefly describe the Safe Ride Program. It is run and financed by students to provide other students who might have been drinking on the weekend a safe ride home. Generally three volunteers are on duty every Friday and Saturday night from 9:30 p.m. to 1:30 a.m. One student acts as a dispatcher and receives incoming calls from teenagers who need a ride home. The other two volunteers are responsible for picking up the teenagers and driving them home safely. All volunteers in the Safe Ride Program are insured by the Boy Scouts of America.

The town of East Hartford, where Dennis McCabe, Brian Marcus, and Edward Fenton live, is one of many towns in Connecticut that has a Safe Ride Program. I would like to extend my sincere support and congratulations to the Safe Ride volunteers throughout the State. This includes my son, John Kennelly, who is a volunteer. While Safe Ride is a simple concept, it is nonetheless effective, and I hope its fine example will encourage other communities both in Connecticut and across the country to start similar programs.

Again, I commend the fine work done by the students who are serving as Safe Ride volunteers and pledge my continued support to the values and awareness this program has generated.●

TESTIMONY OF JAMES W. COMPTON, PRESIDENT OF THE CHICAGO URBAN LEAGUE

HON. CHARLES A. HAYES

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HAYES. Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of my colleagues to testimony of Mr. James W. Compton, president and chief executive officer of the Chicago Urban League, presented before a special session of the House Education and Labor Committee in conjunction with the National Urban League's annual convention which was held here in Washington during the month of July. The hearing, which I chaired in part, was on the subject of full employment. Mr. Compton's statement eloquently expresses the plight of the unemployed and the human costs of joblessness.

Mr. Speaker, because Mr. Compton's statement also makes a strong argument for the concept that every ablebodied American should have the right to productive and fulfilling paid employment as embodied in my bill, H.R. 1398, the Income and Jobs Action Act of 1985, I believe you and the rest of my colleagues will find it very interesting.

Mr. Compton's statement follows:

TESTIMONY OF JAMES W. COMPTON, PRESIDENT AND CHIEF EXECUTIVE OFFICER, CHICAGO URBAN LEAGUE, JULY, 24, 1985

Chairman Augustus Hawkins, distinguished members of the House Committee on Labor and Education, I am James W. Compton, president and chief executive officer of the Chicago Urban League. I thank you once again for providing me with this second opportunity and privilege of coming before the committee to address a full employment agenda for our Nation.

The Chicago urgan league, the oldest and largest race relations organization in Illinois, has been working for over 68 years to ensure equal access and opportunities in housing, education, employment, and economic development. The league's strategies toward this end include research, advocacy and direct services.

Coming from a city with 1.3 million blacks and over one-half million Hispanics and other minorities, I am here to express our concern about the pervasive and persistent unemployment which has idled too many of our people and too much of our Nation's productive potential. We are alarmed that disproportionate numbers of those sidelined by joblessness are minorities concentrated in the inner cities of urban areas such as Chicago. Especially affected are blacks, youths, and single-parent, largely female, heads of household.

Chicago, like most of our Nation's large urban center, was particularly hard-hit by the recession. Between 1979 and 1982, according to official reports, Chicago's unemployment rate skyrocketed from 7% to over 17% non-white workers were the main victims, as non-white unemployment rates soared from 11% in 1979 to 26% in 1983, the purported year of "recovery", declining only to 21% in 1984.

The situation is particularly critical for non-white youth. While white teenage unemployment fluctuated between 20% and 30% during the last six years, non-white teenage unemployment in the best of years was 40%, and in the worst of years, 66%. Against these odds, it is small wonder that staggering proportions of our young people are being forced to conclude that they have no chance to obtain and hold a decent job or to be self-sufficient. In 1984 only 16% of non-white teens in Chicago had jobs, and only three in ten were still active participants in the labor market.

We know that in Chicago our official statistics say:

Nonwhite workers are over twice as likely as white workers to be unemployed;

Center city workers are 1½ times more likely than suburban workers to be unemployed;

Teenagers are 2½ times more likely than adults to be unemployed.

But we also know that these unhappy official statistics, like current national policy, seriously downplay the scope of the problem. You are already familiar with most of the dimensions of this camouflage, so I will only mention them without comment:

The census undercount, particularly of young minority men;

The "hidden" unemployed, those not factored into official data because they have abandoned the futile search for employment;

And the underemployed, or those who work part-time but are in reality seeking full-time employment.

But a newer element in the underestimation of unemployment is only now emerging into full view. This newer problem is that the complex formula used for generating official estimates of employment and unemployment for local areas— the formula which was revised just before the recent recession—clearly seems to produce lower unemployment figures than the more straightforward sample survey data gathered by the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics.

These data were available for comparision with official statistics for only eight central cities in 1983. For six of the eight cities, including Chicago, the official unemployment statistics reported significantly lower unemployment rates—that is, two to five percentage points lower—than the more reliable survey data. We also know that for every year, beginning with 1980, there were substantial discrepancies between the two data sources in reporting the level of unemployment in Chicago. The gap was widest during the depts of recession.

Since the official statistics become the raw data for fueling public discussion, informing public policies, and allocating public funding, we would hope that this committee would investigate more throughly what appears to us to be a serious, consistent underestimation of actual unemployment in major cities like Chicago and possibly elswhere.

In spite of these deficiencies, there is every indication that the Federal Government intends to continue its current movement toward providing less rather than more reliable data. We are increasingly concerned with reports of significant cutbacks in staff, data collection and analysis, and slowed publication schedules at both the U.S. Census Bureau and the U.S. Bureau of Labor Statistics, but contrary to what President Reagan and some members of his administration may believe, supression and downplaying of the "bad news" of unemployment cannot hide the simple, glaring reality which confronts our Nation's economy.

The administration's strategy of blind trust in "market forces" and in "trickledown" benefits from a general economic "recovery" has not and cannot appreciably diminish the severe structural problems that block economic opportunities for blacks, other minorities and the poor.

Speaking from our own experience, after two years of purported "recovery", nearly 200,000 Chicago workers are still unemployed. This represents twice the number unemployed in the pre-recession year of 1979. Total employment in Chicago has dropped 2% since 1979, while the working age population has grown by 9%. Virtually all of the additional workers, I hasten to add, are non-white. In 1984, barely half the working age population in Chicago was at work, and less than half (46%) of the nonwhite population had jobs. Such trends auger that the situation, if left alone, will only worsen.

There are two major components to this crisis in employment in our cities. First, very simply, there are not enough jobs to employ everyone who would like to work in Chicago. We know that the structure of work is undergoing dramatic changes, jobs are shifting from cities to suburbs, from "rustbelt" to "sunbelt" or out of the country altogether. Manufacturing is declining, service industries are growing. And minorities in inner city areas such as Chicago are the heaviest losers. Not only are they suffering from local, regional, and national trends in the flight of jobs, but the data clearly show that within the central city itself minority communities, not the white communities, are continuing to experience the brunt of the job exodus. This is occurring because of declining employment opportunities in manufacturing and in the public sector in which minorities have become particularly heavily concentrated.

Optimists point to the growth in service industries as replacements for jobs lost elsewhere. We are skeptical of suggestions that the growth industries will provide enough jobs to employ all the workers dislocated by these shifts as well as the young workers entering the labor market. Without even looking at inner city and metropolitan employment patterns, we found that State figures suggest a potential shortfall of 500,000 jobs in Illinois by 1990. Moreover, the new jobs being created provide considerably less in the way of wages, benefits, security, and opportunities for advancement. For example, half the workers employed in eating and drinking establishments, a growth industry in Illinois, earned less than poverty level wages.

The second component of the employment crisis is that the "good" jobs of the future require advance skills and training which our current workforce lacks and which our inner city public schools are not providing to our children. In 1984, the high school graduation rate in the Chicago Public Schools was less than 50%. Those who graduated from Chicago's Public Schools were far too often unable to read, write, or compute well enough to compete for college places or for decent jobs.

Far too often we continue to abandon our young people to the prisons of functional illiteracy, dead end jobs, and deteriorating communities from which there is no escape. The facts are too well documented for us to feign surprise or moral indignation when they turn to drugs, youth gangs, other forms of crime, or to public aid as their only means of survival.

The first step in addressing these problems, and one we have not yet taken as a nation, is to concede the fact that there are no cheap, quick, or easy solutions.

We must agree that eliminating or distorting statistics won't stop the rising tide of unemployment in Chicago or elsewhere. We must be realistic in recognizing that the elimination of programs that provide public service employment hinders the creation of extra jobs which are needed but are not coming to Illinois and Chicago.

Abandoning job training programs won't prepare our youth for meeting the future and becoming productive members of our society.

Ignoring the gross inadequacies in public education will compound and exacerbate our Nation's economic and social problems.

Proposing "solutions" such as the subminimum wage adds further insult to the indignity of joblessness and underemployment. One study conducted in Dayton, Ohio tends to suggest that providing an employer-incentive for hiring certain groups of people may stigmatize those groups and hamper rather than aid their hire by private sector employers.

Engaging in all out war on affirmative action is wrong when we know that blacks continue to be the chief victims of unemployment and underemployment and that well-designed affirmative action programs do work.

Highly competent empirical research has already been done on the benefits of early childhood education, the Job Corps Program, affirmative action, and various job training programs. Research has also shown the failure of programs based on a dual track system of education, employment and wages for prospective workers.

The Department of Labor has on file 16 years of reports by the Chicago Urban League. These records show between 500 and 700 or more minorities and women being placed annually in construction industry apprenticeship programs and in non-traditional jobs through our labor education advancement program [LEAP]. You have 8 years of reports on our computer training center which trains computer programmers and word processors and has an overall 85% job placement rate. In each of the last few years we have helped minority-owned businesses secure between $10-15 million in contracts as part of our affirmative action/minority business enterprise program. We work in 22 inner-city high schools to help students with an interest in math to improve their skills. We work with hundreds of teenage mothers, moving them toward economic independence, helping them to become better parents while coping with their own adolescence and—as demonstrated through several years of documented research—reducing significantly the birth rates among these mothers during the remainder of their teenage years.

There is no lack of good ideas and programs for addressing our current crises in employment. We simply have to exercise the national will to rescue our greatest source of wealth—our "human capital."

The failure of the past was not that too much was done for minorities and the poor. The failure of the "great society" was caused by a wavering of commitment, abandonment of compassion, and a national paralysis that impeded futuristic and realistic planning for securing America's economic vitality.

We must recognize that our Nation's unprecedented military buildup continues to be the main engine that powers and perpetuates the deepening crises. It has led to the most severe recession in 50 years and the biggest deficit in our Nation's 200 years of existence.

A moral commitment to peace and an end to the insane arms race—one which the human race cannot win—will provide the fundamental basis for converting our Nation's energies and ingenuity to the imperative of stimulating an economic rebirth.

Mr. Chairman, your efforts and those of your fellow committee members, offer us renewed hope.

Last year, as I stated in my introductory comments, we were privileged to speak in favor of two bills presented by members of this committee. Congressman Hayes' "Income and Jobs Action Act of 1985" still provides a cogent statement of a public policy that clearly and accurately addresses the problems of unemployment and income facing those in the basement of the American economy. It articulates goals and offers a framework to achieve them. It dispells that self-serving notion that human development may be left to the vicissitudes of an imperfect market system. It challenges the myth that a hands-off posture by government in the economic sphere will lead to greater profits, which, in turn, will solve our most pressing crises.

Congressman Hawkins' "Youth Incentive Employment Act" provides a specific blueprint for action to address the barriers confronting youth who are our most valuable and vulnerable asset. It draws upon a sound and tested program that for several years successfully provided low-income youth with wages, part-time jobs during the school year, and full-time employment during the summer. A basic requirement was that these youth had to be enrolled in school and making satisfactory academic progress. Several evaluation studies have confirmed the positive results of such programs. Participants were found to remain in employment longer, and were earning more than nonparticipants one year after completion of the program.

Despite the wisdom and practicality of these bills, and the pressing need for such initiatives, Congress has not mustered the will to act on this legislation. Obviously, it will require more than just a few voices in the wilderness to persuade our Nation that we must act—now.

As you return to Congress with our words on the record of concern, be assured of our solidarity and our resolve to add our voices to yours as you urge compassion and demand jobs and job training for every able-bodied American citizen who needs work and the opportunity to pursue happiness.

Thank you.●

OVEREATERS ANONYMOUS CELEBRATES 25TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make my colleagues aware that from September 27-29, Overeaters Anonymous will be celebrating its 25th anniversary at its convention in Anaheim, CA. This organization has been enormously helpful in providing a program of recovery from compulsive overeating and the many life-threatening illnesses associated with obesity and related disorders.

Patterned after Alcoholics Anonymous, the OA fellowship has helped to restore thousands to normal weight and healthy, productive lives. Like AA, Overeaters Anonymous does not specialize in professional counseling. Instead, its members extend to fellow compulsive overeaters only the shared experience and support that helped them recover.

Obesity and eating disorders are serious problems for millions of Americans—OA can and does help these people. We should all applaud the dedicated people of OA who attend to the well-being of their fellow citizens. Overeaters Anonymous, continued success means that many more people will successfully control their eating habits.●

THE CONSERVATION SERVICE REFORM ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, today I and Congressman SIKORSKI are introducing legislation to preserve and improve two important Federal programs for energy conservation: The Residential Conservation Service [RCS] and the Commercial and Apartment Conservation Service [CACS].

The RCS Program, enacted originally as part of the 1978 National Energy Policy Act [NECPA], requires large electric and natural gas utilities to provide onsite "energy audits" to residents of buildings with four dwelling units or less. The CACS Program, enacted in 1980 in the Energy Security Act, establishes a similar service for certain commercial buildings and for residential buildings with five or more units. Both programs seek to provide reliable conservation information to energy consumers in order to encourage the implementation of conservation measures which will reduce energy demand. The conceptual framework of the RCS and CACS programs is a simple one: To provide cheap conservation information to energy consumers in order to spur investment in conservation measures. The result is lower energy costs to the consumer, and a reduction in net energy demand for the Nation.

Both RCS and CACS are fledging programs. On the RCS side, those States which have taken an active approach to residential conservation have shown marked energy savings from the program. For instance, a January 1985 study by the Oak Ridge National Laboratory [ORNL] of the first 2 years of the Minnesota home energy audit and retrofit loan programs finds a statistically significant net energy saving of 2 to 3 percent. Similarly, an ORNL study of Connecticut's Conn Save Program concludes that it:

> Stimulates installation of additional conservation measures, it probably reduces household energy consumption, and it is likely to be cost-effective for both participants and the State as a whole.

As for CACS, the Department of Energy has now approved a total of 25 State plans. To date, however, only one State, Michigan, has its CACS Program actually in place. Early reactions from the State of Michigan indicate the potential for substantial energy savings through this program.

The legislation we introduce today addresses two frequent criticisms leveled at the RCS and CACS programs: First, that individual States should be allowed to "opt out" of the Federal RCS and CACS Programs in favor of State initiatives which might accomplish conservation by alternative means; and second, that the programs fail to link the information generated by the energy audits to the implementation of actual conservation measures. As to the first critique, the Conservation Service Reform Act of 1985 would allow the Governor of a State or the appropriate State agency to implement an alternative State plan to effectuate the conservation objectives of the RCS and CACS legislation. As to the second critique, our bill provides that the alternative State plans must include performance standards designed both to result in 5 percent annual participation in the program by eligible customers, and to achieve energy savings or reduction in peak electricity use of 10 percent annually for each customer participating in the program. This modest performance target, which would amount to a net annual decrease of 0.5 percent in energy use, could be met by the alternative State plan in a variety of ways.

We are passing through an era of false calm spawned by the temporary respite of falling energy prices. The temptation is to return to the pre-1970's mindset of central plant construction and lax conservation which preceded the passage of the RCS and CACS legislation of 1978 and 1980. We must resist the temptation. Conservation continues to be a vast and largely untapped energy resource which inures to the benefit of consumers, utilities, and the national security. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this bill.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1.—Short Title: The Conservation Service Reform Act of 1985.

TITLE I—RESIDENTIAL CONSERVATION SERVICE

Section 101.—Changes in certain plan requirements.

This section makes changes in certain plan requirements under the existing RCS program.

Extension of announcement date.—The bill would extend from January 1, 1985, to January 1, 1991, the last date on which utilities and participating home heating suppliers are required to issue announcements of the RCS program to their customers.

Elimination of arranging and listing requirements.—The bill would eliminate the requirements that covered utilities and home heating suppliers arrange for the installation and financing of conservation measures and provide a list of suppliers, contractors and financial institutions to residential customers. (However, the bill would not prohibit such activities by a utility.)

If a Governor or public utility wishes to revise a previously approved residential energy conservation plan to reflect this legislation's elimination of requirements relating to arranging and listing, this section explicitly permits such a change without requiring that a plan amendment be submitted to the Secretary of Energy.

In the case of states or public utilities that elect to continue a residential energy conservation plan approved by DOE prior to enactment of this legislation, the appropriate official in charge of such plan must notify the Secretary in writing that the announcement date requirement shall be extended to January 1, 1991, as required by this section.

Section 102.—Temporary programs.

The Secretary of Energy must approve or disapprove any pending applications for temporary programs under section 218(a) of the National Energy Conservation Policy Act (NEPCA) no later than 30 days after enactment. If the Secretary takes no action within 30 days, the temporary Program shall be deemed approved.

Section 103.—Alternative plans for residential buildings.

The bill allows an exemption from the requirements of the RCS program for states adopting an "alternative plan." This section would add new sections 226 and 227 to NECPA. Section 226 allows states to adopt an alternative plan, while section 227 allows utilities to develop alternative plans in states that choose to continue their existing RCS programs.

Alternative State plans (new section 226).—A Governor of any state or state agency authorized under state law may certify to the Department of Energy that the state will carry out an alternative plan. Any state which certifies an alternative plan shall continue to have such plan in effect for the five-year period after certification or until January 1, 1991, whichever occurs first.

Formulation of the plan.—In formulating an alternative plan, the Governor must hold a public hearing with opportunity for oral and written comments prior to certification.

Content of the plan.—In formulating an alternative plan, the Governor should be guided by the items set out under "Content of Plan," in section 226(d). The content of the plan is described below.

(1) The plan shall be designed to result in the dissemination of general energy conservation suggestions to all residential customers of utilities in the state. This is a minimal requirement of the plan to insure that general conservation information is available to all residential utility customers.

(2) In addition, the plan shall be designed to include result-oriented energy conservation programs. The state would have maximum flexibility in designing this class of program, keeping in mind that it should be designed to reach the targets set out in section 226(d)(2). Three broad types of approaches are named under this class of program. An alternative plan may include items from any of the three categories or a combination of these categories. The categories follow:

(a) Specific energy conservation suggestions regarding a customer's residential building;

(b) Programs designed to result in energy conservation improvements to the customer's residence; and

(c) Programs designed to result in load management improvements in the customer's residential building.

(3) The plan shall be designed to result in annual participation in the alternative program by at least 5 percent of the residential buildings served by natural gas or electric utilities included in the state plan. In the case of an alternative plan carried out by the state only, without utility involvement, the plan should be designed to reach at least 5 percent of the residential customers served by utilities covered under NECPA.

Section 226 also requires that the plan be designed to result in annual energy consumption reductions of at least 10 percent per household for buildings that participate in the energy conservation programs designed under section 226(d)(2). The Governor of the state shall define by rule the term "energy consumption reductions."

In the case of load management improvements included in the alternative program, the plan shall be designed to result in annual peak electricity demand reductions of an average of at least 10 percent in residential buildings served by such programs.

(4) The alternative plan shall be designed to benefit individuals with low or moderate incomes, as well as other individuals.

(5) The plan shall contain adequate procedures to assure that, if a public utility supplies or installs residential energy conservation measures, such actions shall be carried out in accordance with Section 216 of NECPA and at fair and reasonable prices and rates of interest.

(6) The plan shall contain adequate procedures for preventing unfair, deceptive or anticompetitive acts or practices.

(7) The plan shall be carried out by the states, by utilities within the state or a combination of both.

(8) The plan shall be consistent with DOE rules developed under NECPA in consultation with the Federal Trade Commission concerning unfair, deceptive or anticompetitive practices.

(9) The plan shall contain rules consistent with the rules under section 215(c) of NECPA concerning the accounting and payment of costs for the program.

(10) The plan shall contain provisions to assure that any person who alleges injury resulting from inadequate implementation shall be entitled to redress under state law or procedures established by the Governor, or the appropriate state agency. This provision is consistent with existing law governing the RCS program.

(11) The plan shall contain provisions described in section 213(b)(2)(B) of NECPA to insure that a utility will not inspect a furnace which uses a source of energy other than that provided by the utility unless the residential customer requests such inspection in writing. This provision is consistent with existing law governing the RCS program.

(12) The plan shall contain an analysis of the data and rationale used by the Governor or State agency to determine that the plan is likely to achieve the results described in paragraphs (1) through (4).

Certification.—The Governor or State agency which elects to certify an alternative State plan shall, in addition, certify that that plan meets the precedural and substantive requirements of the bill, that the plan is likely to achieve its objectives, and that the plan will be adequately implemented.

Annual report.—The state shall submit an annual report to DOE describing implementation of its alternative plan and reporting on the number of buildings reached and energy savings achieved within 60 days after the end of the one-year period to which the report applies. The report shall include an estimate of the actual energy savings resulting from the plan.

Administrative and judicial enforcement proceedings.—A resident of any state in which an alternative plan has been certified may, no sooner than one year after the program's certification, petition DOE to conduct a public hearing to determine if the alternative state plan has been adequately implemented. At the time that such a petition is filed, the state may opt to implement its previously approved RCS plan and thus halt the DOE hearing process.

If the Secretary finds the program has not been adequately implemented, he shall initiate Federal standby authority (implementing the regular RCS program) within 90 days after the petition is filed.

If the Secretary does not initiate Federal standby authority within 90 days, the petitioner may bring an action in U.S. District Court to require the Secretary to implement the alternative state plan. An individual who prevails in court in an action against the Secretary shall be awarded reasonable attorneys' fees and costs.

Alternative standards.—Under this provision, the Governor or appropriate state agency may establish an alternative standard to the annual participation rate of 5 percent under the alternative plan. Following a public hearing, the target may be reduced to no lower than 3 percent, if the state finds that any of three conditions exist: (1) customers will not be adequately informed of the program in the first year, (2) such a large number of eligible buildings is already equipped with conservation or load management improvements as to make it unlikely that the alternative program could achieve the bill's targets of 5 percent annual participation and 10 percent average annual energy savings, or (3) if the alternative program will primarily benefit low- or moderate-income individuals.

The first finding may be made only with respect to the first year of the alternative plan, if the Governor finds that the programs under the alternative plan are sufficiently new and unfamiliar as to require extra efforts at making their availability known to customers in their start-up phase.

Alternative utility plans: regulated utilities (new section 227).—In a state which does not have an alternative plan, an individual regulated utility may certify that it will carry out an alternative program if supported by the Governor.

The provisions applying to an alternative utility plan are similar to those governing an alternative state plan in formulation of the plan, content of the plan, annual report, and administrative and judicial enforcement proceedings.

Nonregulated utilities.—A non-regulated utility may be included in a state alternative plan only if the Governor has legal authority to include it or the non-regulated utility elects to be included in the state plan. A non-regulated utility may certify to DOE that it will carry out an alternative plan if the Governor does not include the utility in the state plan.

Section 104.—Reports and dissemination of information.

No later than January 1, 1987, and every two years thereafter, DOE shall submit a report to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce and the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, comparing predicted energy savings with actual savings achieved under both the RCS and alternative plans and identifying the most successful programs. DOE shall compile a summary of annual reports on alternative plans to be delivered annually to Congress.

Dissemination of information by DOE.—At least annually, the Secretary shall provide information to states and utilities, including technical assistance for calculating energy consumption reductions and information about the most effective programs.

Section 105.—Load management improvement defined.

Load management improvements are defined as those load management techniques included under the existing RCS program, plus the installation of any devices which reduce electricity demand during peak periods. The Governor of a state may add load management devices to those approved by DOE.

Section 106.—Limitation on supply and installation by public utilities.

NECPA prohibits utilities from directly installing or supplying conservation measures, as defined by NECPA for purposes of the RCS program. The existing law provides three types of exemptions from these prohibitions.

(1) A utility may, with the support of the Governor, petition DOE for a waiver from the prohibition. DOE may grant the waiver after making certain findings aimed at preventing anti-competitive activity.

(2) A utility may contract with an independent contractor to supply or install conservation measures. Under current law, no waiver is required for this exemption.

(3) A utility that supplied or installed conservation measures, or made substantial preparations to do so, may receive a "grandfather exemption" from DOE to continue such activity.

This section would amend existing law to provide an opportunity for a public review of potential competitive abuses in each of the three types of exemptions named above.

Additional requirements for waiver.—In granting a waiver to a utility from the prohibiton on supply and installation of energy conservation measures, the Secretary of Energy must make an additional finding that there will be no unfair competitive advantages to the utility in carrying out such activities.

The Governor may not support the petition of a regulated utility for a waiver to DOE unless the Governor provides advance notice of the waiver petition and opportunity for a public hearing. In order to support the petition, the Governor must make the same findings required of the Secretary in granting the waiver petition. The utility must make available to the Governor all relevant documents and records requested by the Governor.

Contracting exemption.—Utilities which installed, supplied or advertised residential conservation measures through contractors on the date of enactment of this Act may continue to supply and install those same measures without applying for a waiver.

New utility contracting programs, starting with the date of enactment of this legislation, are subject to the amended waiver process.

General exemption (grandfather provision).—No change is made in the grandfather provision under Subsection d(3) of Section 216 of NECPA, which exempts utilities from installation and supply prohibitions in states where a state law or regulation requires or permits such supply or installation.

However, the grandfather provision is narrowed for those utilities that received a grandfather exemption pursuant to subsection d(1) or d(2) of section 216. These provisions provide a grandfather exemption to utilities that supplied, installed, advertised, or prepared for such programs prior to the enactment of the 1978 National Energy Conservation Policy Act. Starting July 1, 1987, the grandfather exemption would remain in effect only for those utilities which, during the 12-month period prior to June 1, 1985, were installing and supplying those specific measures for which they had received the grandfather exemption.

State hearing for grandfathered utility.—If any person requests review of a grandfathered utility and includes adequate documentation of anti-competitive activity by the utility, the Governor shall review the grandfather exemption in a public hearing.

The exemption shall continue for a grandfathered utility if the Governor, following a public hearing, makes any of the following findings:

(1) The utility is not charging fair and reasonable prices and rates of interest.

(2) There are unfair competitive advantages to the utility.

(3) Such activity is inconsistent with the prevention of unfair methods of competitive or the prevention of unfair or deceptive acts or practices.

(4) The utility has not provided the Governor with all the documents he determines necessary to make the above findings.

Regardless of whether the Governor makes any of the above findings, the Governor may condition the continuation of the grandfathered activity on the provision of appropriate competitive safeguards by the utility in carrying out the activity.

TITLE II—COMMERCIAL AND APARTMENT CONSERVATION SERVICE

Section 201.—Alternative plans for commercial buildings and multifamily dwellings.

This section allows an exemption from the requirements of the CACS program for states adopting an "alternative plan." The section would add new sections 750 and 751 to NECPA. Section 750 allows states to adopt an alternative plan, while section 751 allows utilities to develop alternative plans in states that choose to continue their existing CACS programs.

Alternative State plans (new section 750).—A Governor of any state or state agency authorized under state law may certify to the Department of Energy that the state will carry out an alternative plan. Any state which certifies an alternative plan shall continue to have such plan in effect for the five-year period after certification or until January 1, 1991, whichever occurs first.

Formulation of the plan.—In formulating an alternative plan, the Governor must hold a public hearing with opportunity for oral and written comments prior to certification.

Content of the plan.—In formulating an alternative plan, the Governor should be guided by the items set out under "Content of Plan," in section 750(d). The content of the plan is described below.

(1) The plan shall be designed to result in the dissemination of general energy conservation suggestions to all residential customers of utilities in the state. This is a minimal requirement of the plan to insure that general conservation information is available to all residential utility customers.

(2) In addition, the plan shall be designed to include result-oriented energy conservation programs. The state would have maximum flexibility in designing this class of program, keeping in mind that it should be designed to reach the targets set out in section 750(d)(2). Three broad types of approaches are named under this class of program. An alternative plan may include items from any of the three categories or a combination of these categories. The categories follow:

(a) Specific energy conservation suggestions regarding the eligible customer's building;

(b) Programs designed to result in energy conservation improvements to the customer's building; and

(c) Programs designed to result in load management improvements in the customer's building.

(3) The plan shall be designed to result in annual participation in the alternative program by at least 5 percent of the eligible buildings served by natural gas or electric utilities included in the state plan. In the case of an alternative plan carried out by the state only, without utility involvement, the plan should be designed to reach at least 5 percent of the eligible customers served by utilities covered under NECPA.

Section 750 also requires that the plan be designed to result in annual energy consumption reductions of at least 10 percent per household for buildings that participate in the energy conservation programs designed under section 750(d)(2). The Governor of the state shall define by rule the term "energy consumption reductions."

In the case of load management improvements included in the alternative program, the plan shall be designed to result in annual peak electricity demand reductions of an average of at least 10 percent in buildings served by such programs.

(4) In the case of multifamily dwellings, the alternative plan shall be designed to benefit individuals with low or moderate incomes, as well as other individuals.

(5) The plan shall contain adequate procedures to assure that, if a public utility supplies or installs energy conservation measures, such actions shall be carried out in accordance with Section 713 of NECPA and at fair and reasonable prices and rates of interest.

(6) The plan shall contain adequate procedures for preventing unfair, deceptive or anticompetitive acts or practices.

(7) The plan shall be carried out by the states, by utilities within the state or a combination of both.

(8) The plan shall be consistent with DOE rules developed under NECPA in consultation with the Federal Trade Commission concerning unfair, deceptive or anticompetitive practices.

(9) The plan shall contain rules consistent with the rules under section 731(b) of NECPA concerning the accounting and payment of costs for the program.

(10) The plan shall contain provisions to assure that any person who alleges injury resulting from inadequate implementation shall be entitled to redress under state law or procedures established by the Governor, or the appropriate state agency. This provision is consistent with existing law governing the CACS program.

(11) The plan shall contain provisions described in section 710(b)(5)(F) of NECPA to insure that a utility will not inspect a furnace which uses a source of energy other than that provided by the utility unless the residential customer requests such inspection in writing. This provision is consistent with existing law governing the CACS program.

(12) The plan shall contain an analysis of the data and rationale used by the Governor or State agency to determine that the plan is likely to achieve the results described in paragraphs (1) through (4).

Certification.—The Governor or State agency which elects to certify an alternative State plan shall in addition certify that that plan meets the procedural and substantive requirements of the bill, that the plan is likely to achieve its objectives; and that the plan will be adequately implemented.

Annual report.—The state shall submit an annual report to DOE describing implementation of its alternative plan and reporting on the number of buildings reached and energy savings achieved within 60 days after the end of the one-year period to which the report applies. The report shall include an estimate of the actual energy savings resulting from the plan.

Administrative and judicial enforcement proceedings.—A resident of any state in which an alternative plan has been certified may, no sooner than one year after the program's certification, petition DOE to conduct a public hearing to determine if the alternative state plan has been adequately implemented. At the time that such a petition is filed, the state may opt to implement its previously approved CACS plan and thus halt the DOE hearing process.

If the Secretary finds the program has not been adequately implemented, he shall initiate Federal standby authority (implementing the regular CACS program) within 90 days after the petition is filed.

If the Secretary does not initiate Federal standby authority within 90 days, the petitioner may bring an action in U.S. District Court to require the Secretary to implement the alternative state plan. An individual who prevails in court in an action against the Secretary shall be awarded reasonable attorneys' fees and costs.

Alternative standards.—Under this provision, the Governor or appropriate state agency may establish an alternative standard to the annual participation rate of 5 percent under the alternative plan. Following a public hearing, the target may be reduced to no lower than 3 percent, if the state finds that any of three conditions exist: (1) customers will not be adequately informed of the program in the first year, (2) such a large number of eligible buildings is already equipped with conservation or load management improvements as to make it unlikely that the alternative program could achieve the bill's targets of 5 percent annual participation and 10 percent average annual energy savings, or (3) if the alternative program will primarily benefit low-or moderate-income individuals in multifamily dwellings.

The first finding may be made only with respect to the first year of the alternative plan, if the Governor finds that the programs under the alternative plan are sufficiently new and unfamiliar as to require extra efforts at making their availability known to customers in their start-up phase.

Alternative utility plans: regulated utilities (new section 751).—In a state which does not have an alternative plan, an individual regulated utility may certify that it will carry out an alternative program if supported by the Governor.

The provisions applying to an alternative utility plan are similar to those governing an alternative state plan in formulation of the plan, content of the plan, annual report, and administrative and judicial enforcement proceedings.

Nonregulated utilities.—A non-regulated utility may be included in a state alternative plan only if the Governor has legal authority to include it or the non-regulated utility elects to be included in the state plan. A non-regulated utility may certify to DOE that it will carry out an alternative plan if the Governor does not iclude the utility in the state plan.

Section 202(c)—Limitation on supply and installation by public utilities.

NECPA prohibits utilities from directly installing or supplying conservation measures, as defined by NECPA for purposes of the RCS program. The existing law provides three types of exemptions from these prohibitions.

(1) A utility may, with the support of the Governor, petition DOE for a waiver from the prohibition. DOE may grant the waiver after making certain findings aimed at preventing anti-competitive activity.

(2) A utility may contract with an independent contractor to supply or install conservation measures. Under current law, no waiver is required for this exemption.

(3) A utility that supplied or installed conservation measures, or made substantial preparations to do so, may receive a "grandfather exemption" from DOE to continue such activity.

This section would amend existing law to provide an opportunity for a public review of potential competitive abuses in each of the three types of exemptions named above.

Additional requirements for waiver.—In granting a waiver to a utility from the prohibition on supply and installation of energy conservation measures, the Secretary of Energy must make an additional finding that there will be no unfair competitive advantages to the utility in carrying out such activities.

The Governor may not support the petition of a regulated utility for a waiver to DOE unless the Governor provides advance notice of the waiver petition and opportunity for a public hearing. In order to support the petition, the Governor must make the same findings required of the Secretary in granting the waiver petition. The utility must make available to the Governor all relevant documents and records requested by the Governor.

Contracting exemption.—Utilities which installed, supplied or advertised residential conservation measures through contractors on the date of enactment of this Act may continue to supply and install those same measures without applying for a waiver.

New utility contracting programs, starting with the date of enactment of this legislation, are subject to the amended waiver process.

General exemption (grandfather provision).—These provisions provide a grandfather exemption to utilities that supplied, installed, advertised, or prepared for such programs prior to the enactment of the 1978 National Energy Conservation Policy Act. Starting July 1, 1987, the grandfather exemption would remain in effect only for those utilities which, during the 12-month period prior to June 1, 1985, were installing and supplying those specific measures for which they had received the grandfather exemption.

State hearing for grandfathered utility.—If any person requests review of a grandfathered utility and includes adequate documentation of anti-competitive activity by the utility, the Governor shall review the grandfather exemption in a public hearing.

The exemption shall continue for a grandfathered utility if the Governor, following a public hearing, makes any of the following findings:

(1) The utility is not charging fair and reasonable prices and rates of interest.

(2) There are unfair competitive advantages to the utility.

(3) Such activity is inconsistent with the prevention of unfair methods of competitive or the prevention of unfair or deceptive acts or practices.

(4) The utility has not provided the Governor with all the documents he determines necessary to make the above findings.

Regardless of whether the Governor makes any of the above findings, the Governor may condition the continuation of the grandfathered activity on the provision of appropriate competitive safeguards by the utility in carrying out the activity.

Section 203.—Reports and dissemination of information.

No later than January 1, 1987, and every two years thereafter, DOE shall submit a report to the House Committee on Energy and Commerce and the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources, comparing predicted energy savings with actual savings achieved under both the CACS and alternative plans and identifying the most successful programs. DOE shall compile a summary of annual reports on alternative plans to be delivered annually to Congress.

Dissemination of information by DOE.—At least annually, the Secretary shall provide information to states and utilities, including technical assistance for calculating energy consumption reductions and information about the most effective programs.

Section 204.—Load management improvement defined.

Load management improvements are defined as those load management techniques included under the existing CACS program, plus the installation of any devices which reduce electricity demand during peak periods. The Governor of a state may add load management devices to those approved by DOE.●

SUPPORT ELDERLY CRIME PREVENTION AND VICTIM ASSISTANCE ACT OF 1985

HON. MATTHEW J. RINALDO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RINALDO. Mr. Speaker, as ranking minority member of the Select Committee on Aging, I am increasingly concerned about the rising tide of violent crime aimed at our Nation's elderly. I will cite just a few graphic examples:

A 69-year-old New Jersey woman was mugged on the steps of her home as she returned from a baby-sitting job. As a result of injuries sustained in the encounter, she is no longer able to drive, and faces physical therapy bills of $45 per hour. Although she was able to give police a detailed description of her attacker, he remains at-large.

An 89-year-old Illinois man was robbed in the elevator of a public housing project. The take: $4.90 and his wedding ring.

The home of an 83-year-old California man has been invaded six times in 2 years.

A New York woman of 72 was robbed of her purse and sexually assaulted at knifepoint on the street. She dropped dead of a heart attack 4 hours later.

Serious crime—murder, rape, arson, assault, robbery and burglary—affects 1 out of 10 households in this country each year. The rate of serious crime has jumped over 20 percent in the past two decades to the point where nearly 37 million Americans were victims of crime in 1983. Older individuals have an even more difficult time recovering from a criminal incident physically, economically, and psychologically than do younger victims.

The truth is that all senior citizens are victims of crime—not just those who have been robbed, or assaulted on the streets, or who have had their homes burglarized. Many older Americans, afraid to venture outside even during daylight, are virtual prisoners in their own homes.

I believe Congress can do more to help senior citizens. Federal anticrime activities affecting the elderly are now scattered through at least eight offices in three separate Cabinet departments, making it difficult for other Federal agencies, State and local governments, the law enforcement community and private citizens to learn exactly what is being done and what resources are available to help combat crime. Currently, five distinct offices in the Justice Department have rsponsibility for some aspect of the elderly crime problem. The Department of Housing and Urban Development shares responsibility for crime prevention in federally subsidized housing projects, and the Department of Health and Human Services' Administration on Aging is authorized to undertake a variety of anticrime initiatives on behalf of older Americans.

On July 30, Mr. Speaker, I introduced the Elderly Crime Prevention and Victim Assistance Act of 1985 to help remedy this current Federal hodge-podge and establish one central office to coordinate Federal crime prevention and assistance programs for the elderly and provide centralized information and technical aid on: Elderly crime statistics; training of judicial and law enforcement officers to address the needs of older individuals who are victims of crime; financial assistance available to carry out State and local programs which assist older victims; and research on, or assistance for, the reduction and prevention of crimes committed against older individuals.

My bill also requires this office to serve as a liaison with all Federal departments and agencies having aging programs, in order to enhance communication and ensure that opportunities for coordinated anticrime and victim assistance activities are maximized. It does not call for the establishment of a costly new bureaucratic layer of administration.

I am particularly pleased to note that joining me as original cosponsors of this legislation are Mr. ROYBAL, the chairman of the Select Committee on Aging, Mr. BIAGGI, the chairman of the Aging Committee's Subcommittee on Human Services who, as a former police officer, has an especially strong interest in fighting crime against the elderly, Ms. SNOWE, the ranking minority member of the Human Services Subcommittee, and Aging Committee colleagues, Mr. MCCAIN, Mr. VENTO, Mr. MANTON, and Mr. SAXTON.

I encourage all of my colleagues in the House to cosponsor H.R. 3120 and urge that the House Judiciary Committee hold hearings as soon as possible.

The text of the bill follows:

U.S. CHURCH ACTIVISM STOKED BY APARTHEID, ISSUES DIVERSIFY

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, the July issue of the International Barometer includes two stories of faith and conscience which deserve the attention of all Members of Congress.

Please read on:

[From the International Barometer, July 1985]

U.S. CHURCH ACTIVISM STOKED BY APARTHEID, ISSUES DIVERSIFY

What social and geopolitical issues that influence business are the United States-based churches addressing most vigorously?

Most churches identify with the two recent pastoral letters authored by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops, titled "The Challenge of Peace: God's Promise and our Response" and "Catholic Social Teaching and the U.S. Economy." A number of specific issues of immediate consequence are being addressed by U.S. churches under the broad rubric of "peace and justice."

SURVEY

Earlier this year Dr. James Armstrong, former president of the National Council of Churches of Christ, wrote the heads of Protestant and Orthodox religious communities in the United States asking for information on issues being addressed, their priorities and potential courses of action.

Every major denomination responded, with the exception of the Southern Baptist Church.

Significantly, most responses came from internal church documents and communications with constituents.

The wide variety of resolutions, position papers and study documents have a direct bearing on American business. Expressing a collective conscience, they speak to millions of church members, and provide business an "early warning" of projected emphases and activities.

PRIORITIES

Atop nearly every list was apartheid in the Republic of South Africa, which appears to be a consensus issue akin to the civil rights and peace movements of the 1960s.

While apartheid is getting the most press, a number of domestic issues are pushing to the forefront as well: militarization and its effect on the economy, the farm crisis, agribusiness, environmental toxins, Third World marketing practices and the New International Economic Order.

Other, more traditional, priorities include family life, public education, racial justice, women's rights, abortion, euthanasia, capital punishment and pornography.

CONCERNS FOR APARTHEID EXPLODING

The focus on apartheid contrasts widely with the results of a 1984 attempt to assess issue priorities by the National Council of Churches of Christ.

A five-page report circulated last November by the NCCC failed to mention South Africa. It made reference to generalized peace and justice themes, but stressed "religious" issues, such as evangelism, spiritual renewal and congregational .

Responses to Dr. Armstrong's survey reveal a wide range of church concerns with subtle, but important differences.

The stress on apartheid requires our initial attention. Following, we will take an issue-by-issue look at trends in church activism.

THEOLOGICAL OPPOSITION TO APARTHEID

Many business-related concerns of the church are rooted in theological concerns.

Particularly instructive in this regard is the position of apartheid of the Reformed Church of America.

The Dutch Reformed Church of South Africa has provided the theological "justification" the Pretoria government uses to support apartheid. [Other churches in South Africa sharply disagree with it.]

The Reformed Church of America, though sharing the reformed tradition, has participated in anti-apartheid protests at various South African consulates.

An RCA press release explains that it joined forces with the "Free Africa Movement' specifically because it "firmly rejects" the DRC's "peculiar interpretation of the Christian faith."

Former Secretary General of the RCA, Dr. Arie Brouwer is now chief executive of the NCCC. This provides a broader base on which to showcase his concerns about South Africa.

BENCHMARK SULLIVAN PRINCIPLES

The American Baptist Church bases its South Africa stand on the Sullivan Principles, a series of requirements companies are asked to agree to that call for improved living and working conditions for black employees.

The ABC calls for divestment in those companies that have refused to sign the Sullivan Principles, or are not acting in accordance with signed pledges.

It also urges companies not to expand operations in the country until apartheid ends, and asks for withdrawal of funds from banks that have not agreed to stop making loans to South Africa.

MORE AGGRESSIVE APPEALS

The United Church of Christ was considering a more aggressive policy at its Fifteenth General Synod Meeting as Barometer went to press.

The proposal calls upon the United Church of Christ to "divest all financial resources from all companies doing business with South Africa . . ." and demands the United States halt "all U.S. government, scientific and military support" of Pretoria.

The American Lutheran Church urges the U.S. government to prohibit:

Any new investment not required to maintain market share;

Operations in Namibia, until it gains independence;

Loans from U.S. banks or any multilateral lending institutions in which the U.S. participates; and Sale of Krugerrand gold coins in this country.

It also advocates support of economic sanctions against South Africa through the United Nations.

WORLD PEACE

A number of churches make world peace through disarmament a top priority.

The Church of the Brethren, historically a "peace church," is focusing its efforts against high-tech weaponry such as the MX missile and Star Wars, and joining many other religious bodies in calling for a nuclear freeze.

The Greek Orthodox Church calls for "the complete prohibition and thorough destruction of nuclear weapons."

MILITARIZATION AND THE MARKETPLACE

The Christian Church (Disciples of Christ)'s influential study "Seeking God's Peace in a Nuclear Age" explores the links between militarization and the marketplace:

"The long and successful partnership of the magistrates of the military and the marketplace continues to produce highly sophisticated armaments for the defense of their own personal interests . . ."

A report of the Joint Commission on Peace of the Episcopal Church discusses the affect of an increased military economy on those resources that serve basic human needs:

"Missiles, planes, munitions and tanks put money into the economy in the form of wages, but provide no products to absorb that money. . . . They do not become part of the production and consumption process, but rather, have a separate economic existence and are eventually discarded or destroyed in war. . . .

"Massive military expenditures divert from the national economy many of the irreplaceable and limited resources needed to provide for other basic human needs. . . .

"[These priorities have] denied the use of those human skills used in such endeavors to industrial and commercial research efforts, which could increase productivity, develop new products, improve the quality of goods, provide items needed throughout the world, and strengthen the nation's ability to compete in world markets."

The American Baptist Church, the United Church of Christ and other sects voice similar concerns.

NEW ECONOMIC ORDER

Most church social action units see peace and economic justice as interrelated, but the focus seems to be shifting to economic justice.

A proposal to make the UCC a "Just Peace Church," offered at the recent General Synod, focuses on economic redistribution:

"[T]rade barriers, tariffs and debt burdens [must] not work against the poor and developing nations . . . poor nations must have a greater share in the policies and management of global economic institutions."

Specific recommendations call for:

Promoting popular participation in public policy;

Empowering the poor to make effective demands on social systems;

Encouraging decentralization and greater community control;

Redistributing existing and future assets, including land; and

Providing for self-reliant development, particularly in the area of food production.

A senior staff member of the Lutheran Church in America writes:

". . . [P]apers on issues such as plant closings, comparable worth, international debt crisis and unemployment are being prepared" that are consistent with the U.S. Catholic bishops' pastoral on the economy.

The "plant closing" paper advocates legislation for socially responsible decisions regarding plant closings, including "opportunities for cluster meetings where unemployed persons can develop networks that enable peer employment counseling, job referrals, talent banks and job retraining."

A 20-year-old paper on "poverty" still being circulated by the LCA also stresses a responsibility to "assure income adequate to secure the minimal standard of living," where a full employment economy is not possible.

UP ON THE FARM

Churches increasingly view the family farmer as suffering at the hands of agribusiness.

The Lutheran Church of America says:

"We are concerned with . . . where power flows from the hands of farmers and consumers to those institutions and corporations that have as their exclusive goal economic control, power and domination. . . .

"We recognize that market power passes from farmers and processors to retail chains, reducing competition in the marketplace. We should, therefore, be vigilant and resist any attempt to reduce such competition.

"We recognize that land once tilled by hundreds of thousands of farmers is passing into control of fewer and fewer people and we are anxious to preserve control in the hands of the family farmers."

The LCA acknowledges the need for large capital investment supporting farming, and the trends of increasing foreign investment and control of American agri-business.

But, it is critical of "cheap food policies, which artifically restrict food prices below the cost of production," the weakening market position of family farmers, and tax policies that attract non-farm investors.

The United Church of Christ is considering a pronouncement that says:

"Farming should provide a meaningful opportunity to earn a decent living, and owning farmland for speculative purposes should be prohibited.

"Ownership of agricultural land should be widespread in order to assure a democratic character to rural communities, as well as vigorous use of agricultural resources."

TWO STRATEGIES SEEK CORPORATE PRESSURE TO HELP END APARTHEID: SIT AND TALK OR STAND AND FIGHT

While corporate influence on South African apartheid is a consensus issue among leading church groups, a range of tactics is being used to prompt action.

The World Council of Churches (WCC) and the Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility (ICCR) of the National Council of Churches of Christ (NCCC) are each committed to what they describe as a "just, participatory and sustainable society." But these two influentrial ecumenical organizations appear to be employing quite different, although not mutually exclusive, tactics.

CONFRONTATION AND DEMANDS

ICCR's mainstay is "loyal opposition," according to executive director Tim Smith. This semi-confrontational mode is seen in the recent demands issued to 12 major U.S. corporations with operations in South Africa.

The companies—Burroughs, Chevron, Citicorp, Control Data, Fluor, Ford, General Electric, General Motors, International Business Machines, Mobil, Newmont Mining and Texaco—were called upon to "cease immediately all sales and service relationships with the South African government and government-owned corporations."

ICCR also demanded that, as a precondition to staying South Africa, the companies must require significant changes in the Pretoria government's polices, including:

Abandon the "homelands" policy;

End apartheid laws, such as flux control and the Group Areas Act;

Restore full political rights to all peoples, including freedom of speech, freedom of assembly and the right to vote;

Cease forced removals and population relocations;

Guarantee to all the right to own land;

Release unconditionally all polical prisoners, detainees and those charged with treason;

End the banning of organizations and individuals; and

Increase the public funding for black community education, health care, social and other services.

"Our patience has worn thin," with these companies, Smith said. Some of the targeted companies, such as Newmont and Fluor, "showed gross insensitivity to the situation," he said, while others are continuing 'business as usual' despite being very aware of what is happening in South Africa.

FOLLOW-UP THREATS

If the government has not made "significant progress" toward these goals, and if the companies fail to respond by the end of 1986, ICCR will intensify its campaign against the corporations.

Directed at the companies will be shareholder resolutions, divestments by ICCR-affiliated members of the NCCC [which have a combined portfolio of about $10 billion], "public witness" demonstrations, and "selective buying" campaigns.

Through the ICCR, church groups submitted 74 shareholder resolutions to 67 companies in 1985. South Africa-related measures comprise the largest groups of these, totalling 16.

[Significant numbers also deal with the issues of nuclear power, military contracts and the world debt crisis.]

WCC CONCILIATION

While ICCR has been extremely effective in its approach to the South African issue, the World Council of Churches, relying on the personal diplomacy of recently elected General Secretary, Dr. Emilio Castro, is moving toward a more conciliatory approach.

Castro is developing a consensus-seeking dialogue with business on apartheid and other subjects.

He recently embarked on a series of meetings with corporate executives in order to set the stage for cooperative efforts.

In April, Castro met with Helmut Maucher and Dr. Carl Angst, chief executive officers of Nestle, S.A., to discuss Nestle's marketing practices in the Third World and its corporate policies in the Republic of South Africa.

On June 11, Castro held separate meetings with senior executives of Ford Motor Company and General Motors Corp., including Ford's Chairman of the Board, Donald Peterson, and Louis Wilking, managing director of GMC-South Africa.

Castro voiced a deep concern over the international debt crisis and its impact on economic and human development in the Third World.

He asked that multinational corporate influence be applied to governments and international monetary agencies to ease the hardships imposed on the poor because of the "austerity programs" being enforced in conjunction with international aid.

SEEKS MEETING BETWEEN MNC EXECS AND SOUTH AFRICA'S BLACK LEADERS

Castro's most urgent pleas involved South Africa. He asked the companies to participate in a meeting of corporate executives with Nobel peace laureate Bishop Desmond Tutu and other black leaders.

Castro has a passion for justice in South Africa that appears to more than match that of those who would employ more direct methods. He sees the proposed meeting as a valuable information exchange and a powerful symbol to the South African government of the companies' willingness to include black leadership in discussions on corporate policies and apartheid.

One side effect, which is equally important: Castro's meetings seemed to be humanizing two sides that have long been both suspicious and antagonistic.●

STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES SHOULD BE EXEMPT FROM THE FAIR LABOR STANDARDS ACT

HON. HARRIS W. FAWELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FAWELL. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation with my distinguished colleagues from Illinois,

Mr. PORTER, Mr. GROTBERG, and Mr. HYDE, and from Iowa, Mr. LIGHTFOOT, which would relieve State and local governments of the burdensome overtime and minimum wage requirements of the Fair Labor Standards Act [FLSA].

In 1974, Congress passed Public Law 93-259, which extended FLSA coverage to most public employees. In 1976, the Supreme Court ruled in the National League of Cities versus Usery that Congress did not have the power to enforce the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA against States "in areas of traditional governmental functions." Thus, the National League of Cities decision made clear that municipalities, public schools, public hospitals, fire prevention, law enforcement, sanitation, public health, public parks and recreation, and traditional functions of State and local governments were exempt from FLSA coverage. This all changed with the Supreme Court's February 1985 ruling in Garcia versus San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority.

The Garcia case began in 1979 when the Department of Labor advised the Amalgamated Transit Union that publicly-operated local mass transit systems, such as the San Antonio Transit System, were not immune from FLSA coverage. In November 1981, the district court judge ruled in favor of the city of San Antonio and held that the Department of Labor could not constitutionally enforce the FLSA provisions against the San Antonio Metropolitan Transit Authority. In February 1982, after an appeal, the district court judge reaffirmed the earlier decision. The decision was appealed to the Supreme Court where it ruled the traditional/nontraditional doctrine established under the National League of Cities decision no longer applicable. The Court thus held that Congress does have the authority to apply the minimum wage and overtime requirements of the FLSA to the employees of State and local governments. In light of the fact that at the time of the Garcia decision, a majority of State and local employees were already exempt from the overtime and minimum wage requirements of the FLSA, the Supreme Court decided to bring a larger number of these employees under FLSA coverage, rather than exempt a small number of those public employees who were already covered by the act.

My bill would reverse the Garcia decision, and, basically, restore the conclusion reached by the Court in National League of Cities that occupations intrinsic to the operations of State and local governments would be exempt from the FLSA. Because the Court believes the traditional/nontraditional mechanism established under the 1976 decision is not workable, it appears to me that the most logical solution is not to bring all State and local employees under the FLSA, but to exempt the small number of those who had previously been covered. In essence, this bill returns us to the situation which existed prior to Garcia.

Until the Garcia decision was handed down, those traditional State and local employees not covered by the minimum wage and overtime provisions of the FLSA were protected under State laws and the collective bargaining agreements carefully worked out between employers and employees. Many of these agreements allow for compensatory time off in lieu of overtime payments because municipalities cannot afford to pay overtime at time and one-half, and because many employees prefer compensatory time instead of overtime pay. The FLSA prohibits State and local government from offering compensatory time in lieu of overtime. I have been given no reason to believe that the arrangements which have existed between State and local employers and employees for the last 8 years since the National League of Cities decision are not working. For this reason, the Federal Government should not interfere with a process that has proven workable.

The financial impact of Garcia on State and local governments is also onerous. At a Senate Labor and Human Resources Committee hearing last week, several mayors and Governors testified that cities and States would be hard pressed to maintain their current level of services if they had to pay the overtime required under the FLSA in lieu of compensatory time. In fact, it appears that most cities and states would be required either to reduce services for the same amount of tax dollars, or to raise taxes. If State and local governments choose to maintain current services, the cost to do so is estimated somewhere between $2 and $4 billion.

It is all too clear to me that the implementation of the Garcia decision would impose a severe financial strain on the budgets of State and local governments, and would take away State and local control over operations mandated to these governments under the 10th amendment. If the basic principles of the National League of Cities decision are not restored, I fear that the Federal Government will have transgressed the bounds of authority granted under the 10th amendment.

Mr. Speaker, the bill as introduced states:

H.R. 3173

A bill to amend the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 to provide an exemption from the minimum wage and overtime requirements of that Act for employees of State and local public agencies, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

Section 13(a) of the Fair Labor Standards Act of 1938 (29 U.S.C. 213(a)) is amended by striking out the period at the end of paragraph (15) and inserting in lieu thereof "; or" and by adding after that paragraph the following:

"(16) any employee of a public agency which is a State, political subdivision of a State, or an interstate governmental agency.".

SEC. 2. CONFORMING AMENDMENTS.

(a) SECTION 7.—Subsection (k) of section 7 of such Act (29 U.S.C. 207(k)) is repealed.

(b) SECTION 13.—Paragraph (20) of section 13(b) of such Act (29 U.S.C. 213(b)(20)) is repealed.

SEC. 3. EFFECTIVE DATE.

UDALL-CHENEY ACID RAIN BILL: THE VIEW OF THE NATIONAL GOVERNORS' ASSOCIATION

HON. DICK CHENEY

OF WYOMING

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. CHENEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. UDALL and I have introduced H.R. 2679, legislation to control acid rain. Some time ago, we wrote and requested the views of the chairman and vice chairman of the National Governors' Association Committee on Energy and Environment as to the extent to which our bill is consistent with the National Governors' Association policy on acid rain. I believe our colleagues will be interested in the response we recently received from Governors Earl and Sununu on this question, which is reprinted in full below. Of particular note is that the Governors' Association Committee leaders emphasize that the control strategy proposed in the Udall-Cheney bill is "very consistent" with the National Governors' Association policy. They note that there is disagreement within the NGA concerning the funding of acid rain controls, with some Governors, "particularly those from the Midwestern coal States," interpreting NGA policy to mean a "national contribution," while others support the "polluter pays" approach. I believe the NGA letter makes clear that there is strong support within the NGA for the control strategy in our bill. I infer as well that it is quite likely that there is very substantial support among the Governors for the "polluter pays" approach to dealing with this problem. For these reasons, I believe my colleagues in the House can reasonably expect support from many Governors for the approach taken in the Udall-Cheney acid rain bill. The letter follows:

NATIONAL GOVERNORS' ASSOCIATION,
Washington, DC, July 23, 1985.

Hon. DICK CHENEY,
U.S. House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, DC.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE CHENEY: Thank you for your letter regarding H.R. 2679, the acid rain control legislation you recently introduced with Representative Udall. We very much appreciate the effort you have made to tailor your bill to reflect many of the recommendations of the National Governors' Association. We are happy to provide you with an assessment of the extent to which H.R. 2679 is consistent with the NGA policy.

As regards the control strategy for reducing sulfur dioxide emissions, we find your bill to be very consistent with the NGA policy. Specifically, the legislation mirrors the NGA policy in that it:

Incorporates the centerpiece of the NGA policy, the two phased, ten million ton reduction in sulfur dioxide emissions in the 31 states bordering or east of the Mississippi River. The phasing is designed to encourage the development of emerging, less costly control technologies during the second phase.

Provides a full opportunity for the EPA Administrator to make mid-course corrections in the second phase of emission reductions to reflect new research findings.

Preserves the flexibility for states and emitting facilities to develop their own approaches to reducing pollution rather than mandating the use of scrubbers on specific plants.

Allows emissions trading between states and substitution of nitrogen oxides reductions for sulfur dioxide reduction requirements on a two pounds (NO_x for one pound (SO_2) basis.

Does not limit growth from new sources so long as they meet the new source performance standards. It does require any plants which convert to coal in the future to meet a 1.2 pounds SO2 per million BTUs standard.

Requires Canada to achieve equivalent percentage reductions in emissions.

H.R. 2679 does contain a slightly tighter schedule for completion of second phase reduction requirements than recommended in the NGA policy. However, this difference is relatively minor when compared to the many provisions in the control strategy which are identical to NGA policy.

As we indicated in our discussion with you and Rep. Udall, the Governors remain divided over the question of what kind of funding approach should be taken in an acid rain control bill. The program funding section of the policy states: "The Governors believe that the acid rain control program requires the development of an equitable plan for financing emission reduction strategies and mitigating economic disruptions and job losses in affected states." The preamble states: "The Governors believe that acid rain is a national problem and that the significant cost of reducing acid rain should be shared by the states in a fair and equitable manner." This element of the policy has two general interpretations: Some Governors, particularly those from the midwestern coal states, interpret "shared by the states in a fair and equitable manner" to mean a national contribution for this national problem. Other Governors interpret this clause to mean that the polluter pays. As a result, we cannot evaluate definitively whether or not the emitter pays approach found in H.R. 2679 is consistent with NGA policy.

In closing we thank you for providing us the opportunity to comment on this legislation.

Sincerely,

ANTHONY S. EARL,
Chairman.
JOHN H. SUNUNU,
Vice Chairman.●

THE UNITED STATES-MEXICO BORDER REVITALIZATION ACT OF 1985

HON. BILL RICHARDSON

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a new positive approach to immigration, one that combines economic opportunity and jobs.

The issue of immigration has been considered as a domestic matter for too long. Last year's debate over the Simpson-Mazzoli immigration bill focused on the need for the United States to regain control of its borders by instituting employer sanctions or by increasing border enforcement.

What is evident to me is that immigration is a multilateral issue between the United States and other recipient nations and all nations whose lesser developed economies and/or internal political turmoil contribute to the flow of emigrants.

This view was confirmed by what members of the congressional Hispanic caucus saw and heard on their trip to Latin America last December. During our stop in Mexico, we found a willingness among Mexican officials to discuss important bilateral issues—including the problem of undocumented migration. The bill I am introducing today is in part a response to those talks.

The United States-Mexico Border Revitalization Act of 1985 would create a free trade land coproduction zone along the United States-Mexican border; establish a United States-Mexican Bilateral Commission; initiate a joint United States-Mexico Development Bank; and develop a Multilateral Commission on Immigration.

I am pleased to announce that as of today four members of the congressional Hispanic caucus are original cosponsors of the bill. Congressman HENRY B. GONZALEZ of Texas, Congressman ROBERT GARCIA of New York, Congressman ALBERT BUSTAMANTE, and Congressman SOLOMON ORTIZ of Texas.

I want to take this opportunity to outline the four major initiatives in the bill:

FREE TRADE ZONE

The recent peso devaluation in Mexico has created an economic crisis in the border region between our two countries. Most of the border region is economically depressed—it has one of the highest rates of unemployment; the lowest levels of income; health care services; educational attainment; and industrial development in the United States. Under my bill, the President is directed to enter into negotiations of the Government of Mexico for the purposes of establishing a United States-Mexican free trade and coproduction zone within approximately 200 miles of each border.

The zone would provide for the duty-free treatment of products grown, produced or manufactured within the zone. United States and Mexican businesses located in the zone would be eligible to tax incentives, similar to those offered in enterprise zone legislation now pending before the Congress. Businesses that are at least 35 percent Mexican-owned or 35 percent United States-owned will be considered eligible ventures under this act.

UNITED STATES-MEXICAN BILATERAL COMMISSION

Under the act, the President would be directed to appoint a bilateral commission, composed of 15 members of the public and private sectors in the United States and an equal number of representatives from Mexico. It will meet quarterly with the goal of strengthening the political and economic ties between our two countries. Areas of discussion are, but not limited to: Immigration; the free trade and coproduction zone; tariff and trade issues; transportation; energy and pollution.

UNITED STATES-MEXICO JOINT DEVELOPMENT BANK

My bill will provide for the establishment of a United States-Mexico Joint Development Bank with the authority to make economic development loans in Mexico and in the border regions of the United States. Assistance provided by the bank would be directed at improving employment opportunities. The Government of the United States and Mexico would contribute equally to the capital of the bank, with provisions for an initial U.S. contribution of $4 billion.

MULTILATERAL COMMISSION ON IMMIGRATION

Immigration is a multilateral issue. My bill recognizes that fact and creates a forum in the establishment of a commission where the United States and prime sending countries can discuss such immigration issues as: The economic, political, and social factors that encourage legal and illegal immigration, the problem of border enforcement; the protection of rights of legal immigrants; and refugee relocation and refugee rights. The purpose of the commission will be to work out international agreements on immigration issues.

CONCLUSION

All of the problems of illegal immigration will not be solved with the initiatives proposed in my bill. But, it is time we in the Congress recognize that economic strife, the opportunity for a better life and freedom from religious or political persecution are the underlying reasons for the flow of illegal immigrants into the United States. My bill sets forth some new ideas for discussion in the immigration debate.

ISRAEL TURNS TO HIGH TECHNOLOGY

HON. CHARLES E. SCHUMER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SCHUMER. Mr. Speaker, Hendrick Herzberg, a fellow of the Institute of Politics at Harvard University, and Christopher J. Matthews, administrative assistant in the office of the Speaker of the House, recently traveled to Israel as part of a program sponsored by the Jewish Community Relations Council of New York. During this tour, Mr. Herzberg and Mr. Matthews had a unique opportunity to observe an encouraging economic revolution in Israel—the development of a vibrant high technology industry.

An article describing their trip and observations was recently printed in the Baltimore Sun and I am reprinting it here in the hopes that my colleagues will take the time to read about this important development in the economy of one of America's closest allies.

[From the Baltimore Sun, July 21, 1985]

ISRAEL TURNS TO HIGH TECH

(By Hendrik Hertzberg and Christopher J. Matthews)

JERUSALEM.—Israel is in trouble—big trouble—and the Israelis are looking to high technology to save the day.

This time the terrain is economic, not military. Yet in many ways the challenge is as great as in any of Israel's wars. This month, the government took drastic measures to stave off disaster. Bypassing the Knesset, Israel's parliament, for the first time in the 37-year history of the modern Jewish state, the cabinet decreed emergency measures that could mean a cut of one-third in family income.

The economic battle has begun. But the new short-term austerity measures are not the whole story. For the long haul, Israel seeks to build a modern technological economy, the economic equivalent of its famed citizen army. To that end—and with the same dash and drive many of them showed as soldiers—the country's entrepreneurs, scientists and engineers are charging into the future.

They have the support of leaders in government, business and academia, who have pinned big hopes on state-of-the-art export industries. Increased exports are an answer—if only a partial answer—to the economic crisis.

The result is an all-out push in fields such as agro-technology, communications and, most important, health-care technology.

Some examples:

In an industrial park near the Weizmann Institute outside Rehovot, scientists from a company called Omikron have developed an artificial skin—a transparent, flexible film that can be used as a bandage. Placed over a wound or burn, it can be left on until the patient heals, when it sloughs off easily.

At the Afek kibbutz near Halfa, collective farmers turned medical technologists manufacture the Lympha Press, a sophisticated pneumatic "sleeve" that can be used to treat swollen legs.

In agricultural laboratories in Galilee, geneticists who developed the dwarf gladiola are about to come up with a four-pit watermelon that's orange instead of red. They hope its novelty value will turn it into a fad—the next kiwi.

At Laser industries in Tel Aviv, engineers supervise the manufacture of a compact, second-generation laser unit that enables eye doctors to perform follow-up surgery right in their offices, without anesthetics.

The stakes in these technological gambles are high—because Isreal's economic position is so precarious.

Israel suffered from inflation of 31 percent a month in 1984—an annual rate of 374 percent, the highest in the world except for Bolivia and Argentina.

It's been no better so far in 1985. In April, in fact, the annual inflation rate went above 700 percent.

In terms of daily life, the inflation has not been as bad as the figures make it sound, because all Israeli salaries have been indexed and most bank accounts "linked" to the dollar.

"The problem is, you have to spend a lot of time managing your daily position," said Israel Makov, president of InterPharm Laboratories, a six-year-old biotech firm. "You get your salary at the beginning of the month, and then you try to keep it from losing its value by the time you spend it. Do you put it in a two-day account? A one-week account? A two-week account? The less liquid you are, the more linked. In this country, everybody's a financier."

For individuals and for export businesses, which do most of the accounting in dollars anyhow, inflation has been merely a nuisance. But for the country at large, it is a symptom of deep economic distress.

Israelis often use proportional statistics to make their experiences more understandable to Americans. Thus, Israelis point out that the 600 men they lost in the Lebanon invasion and occupation would be the equivalent in American terms of 36,000 fatalities.

By the same token, America's budget deficit, which this year is "only" $215 billion, would have to reach a staggering $650 billion before it would match Israel's as a percentage of gross national product.

Ditto for the trade deficit. At $5 billion, it's the equivalent in American terms of $812 billion. The actual U.S. figure, considered alarmingly high, is $113 billion.

Israel's main reason for moving into high-tech exports is to try to help solve its balance-of-payments problem, which is at the root of the rest of its economic difficulties. But there are also other reasons for the emphasis on high tech.

First, Israeli industries are denied access to many less-sophisticated markets. Israel cannot look to its neighbors as markets for basic industrial goods. Jordan and Saudi Arabia—let alone Syria. Libya and Iraq—can hardly be counted as potential Israeli export markets. Even Egypt has proved to be disappointing in this regard.

Nor does Israel see much possibility for sales in the rest of the Third World region that surrounds it. There are scant prospects for Israeli exports in the arc of Islamic countries from Pakistan to Morocco. And only a few other Third World countries are willing to risk the ire of Arab oil suppliers by trading with Israel.

That leaves Israel only one option: to make the kind of sophisticated products that can compete in European and American markets. In other words, it needs to leapfrog the lower-technology industries, whose markets have been slammed shut in its face, and challenge the more-advanced "First World" producers: the United States, Western Europe and Japan.

Second, Israel is forced to get along without the assistance of many of the big multinational corporations, because of Arab pressure. A visitor quickly notices the absence of many familiar brand logos. This is a country without Shell stations or Toyotas. (Subarus, however, are all over the place. They're the only Japanese car sold here.)

The boycott means Israel is shut off from many sources of investment and experience. But there is a positive side as well: As an economic island, Israel is obliged to be innovative and daring.

Third, high tech is a natural for Israel because of its highly trained work force and its superb educational system. The country's two great scientific universities, the public Weizmann Institute and the private Technion, are among the best in the world.

"It's all electronics now."

Ezer Weizmann, the man talking, helped create the modern Israeli air force. Pointing to an old photo on his office wall of himself in the open cockpit of a World War II vintage plane, he adds in clipped British tones: In my time, it was just me in my Spitfire with God as my copilot. Today it's all laser beams—and not just in warfare. In the economy, too."

"We've got to do what you're doing in the states," said Mr. Weizmann, who was minister of defense during the Camp David talks and now serves as a special adviser to Prime Minister Shimon Peres. "We need to build Silicon Valleys of our own."

Other Israeli officials strike similar themes.

Mordechai Gur, who later rose to become Israel's military chief of staff, was the Israeli ground commander who led the successful assault against Jordanian forces in the Six-Day War. It was he who captured the greatest prize of that war, the Old City of Jerusalem.

Today, Mr. Gur is helping to apply to the field of medical care the technological prowess the Jewish state displayed in battle. As minister of health, he holds the key government portfolio in the high-tech field. Israel, a country with one doctor for every 400 citizens (almost three times the proportion in neighboring Egypt), is counting heavily on its ability to exploit its high standard of medical care into a major export sector.

"We're working on a plan for what we call 'medical tourism,'" Mr. Gur recently told a group of U.S. visitors. "The idea is, if you need some elective surgery, you have it done over here—and while you're at it, you see a bit of Israel. You come over for medical treatment, and even with the trip and the tourism it's still cheaper than just the treatment at home."

But no matter how ingenious their marketing techniques, the Israelis cannot rely on increased exports to be the whole solution for Israel's economic woes.

To balance its economic order, the Jewish states also must cut its reliance on goods and services from abroad.

The steps announced this month—including a $750 million budget cut, layoffs of 9,000 government workers, and a stiff currency devaluation—will be acutely painful. They have evoked widespread protest because they will almost certainly mean sharply lower living standards and sharply higher unemployment.

For Israelis, high unemployment is especially painful because of Zionism's almost mystical view of the dignity of work. Also, authorities fear, many Israelis may simply pull up stakes and move to Denmark, Britain or, most often, the United States. There is nothing hypothetical about this danger. Already, 250,000 Israelis live and work in the United States—10 percent of Israel's entire population.

Even so, failure to deal with the underlying problems would threaten Israel's economic sovereignty. Israelis differ among themselves about almost everything, including economic policy, but one thing they all agree on is that more investment from, and trade with, the United States, especially in the crucial high-tech area, can only be all to the good.●

ANTIGUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MICA. Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct my colleagues' attention to the economic development needs of the people and Government of Antigua.

Antigua and its sister island of Barbuda (Antigua) are located in the Leeward Islands of the Caribbean, nearly 250 miles southeast of Puerto Rico. Since obtaining its independence from Great Britain in 1982, Antigua has had a moderate democratic government. Relations between the United States and Antigua traditionally have been very warm, reflecting a long-standing friendship based on common goals for the Caribbean Basin. Antigua has repeatedly cooperated with the United States in every circumstance. Since 1941, the United States has maintained two military facilities on Antigua pursuant to military base agreements, under which for many years Antigua received no compensation. Antigua has also permitted the United States to establish and maintain a Voice of America station for purposes of broadcasting its messages throughout the Caribbean.

Antigua traditionally has supported U.S. interests in the eastern Caribbean; it has provided valuable assistance and cooperation with U.S. efforts to combat the growth of illegal drug trade in the region, and is an active member in the Regional Security System.

Antigua is a developing country which has made substantial efforts to overcome obstacles common to all developing countries and to become economically self-reliant. It has enthusiastically endorsed the Caribbean Basin Initiative [CBI] and has initiated negotiations with the United States on a bilateral investment treaty.

Recognizing the inherent risks involved in concentrating its development exclusively in the tourist industry, the Antiguan Government has made substantial efforts to diversify its industrial and commercial activities. It is actively encouraging investments in the production of livestock, export-oriented food crops, and light-manufacturing industries. The involvement of foreign investors and increased United States-Antigua trade is an integral component of achieving these objectives.

These efforts to attract foreign investment, however, are impeded by an infrastructure that is in critical need of rehabilitation and further development. For example, the recent growth in the Island's population and an increased influx of tourists have imposed strains on existing housing, communication, transportation, and utility facilities. In addition, the prolonged drought in 1984 severely strained the water supply system. These infrastructure requirements demand immediate attention. ESF assistance would go a long way in providing the means by which the Government could resolve these basic developmental requirements. Last year, Antigua received no ESF assistance, and other forms of U.S. economic assistance have not been distributed to Antigua quickly enough to satisfy many of its pressing financial requirements. I believe that ESF assistance would enable Antigua to work with the United States to strengthen an already healthy relationship and build a basis for a more productive and functional economy.●

UNEQUIVOCALLY AMERICAN

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, a more personal side of our colleague KIKA DE LA GARZA was featured in a recent article in the Washington Post.

As Michael Barone wrote, KIKA's story is "unequivocally American." A strong sense of family and ethnic identity have fostered his successes as a Texas attorney and 20-year veteran of the House. As chairman of the Agriculture Committee, KIKA has offered strong leadership and has certainly become one of the most important powers in Government.

I would urge all Members to read the article.

"UNEQUIVOCALLY AMERICAN"—THE POLITICS OF TWO POWERFUL HISPANICS

The two most powerful Hispanics in American government today are Kika de la Garza, chairman of the House Agriculture Committee in the year a new farm bill must be passed, and Henry Cisneros, mayor of San Antonio, our 10th largest city, and a member of the Kissinger commission on Central America.

Kika de la Garza's family has lived in the lower Rio Grade valley since the 1700s, long before it was the border. For years it was mostly scrub and desert, and even when he was growing up in the town of Mission in the 1930s, "we were three blocks away from the woods." His father worked for Hidalgo County and then for the U.S. Department of Agriculture; his father and uncle were active in local politics. They weren't a rich family, and as a kid de la Garza shined shoes on Main Street in McAllen; but it was accepted that "you were going to go to college—period."

Kika grew up speaking both English and Spanish. In grade school the Irish nuns spoke English but didn't ban Spanish; at the dinner table the language "depended on the conversation." In 1945, when he was 17, de la Garza left high school for the Navy to serve, unexpectedly, in peacetime. He returned home and attended Edinburg Junior College in the valley, and saved his GI Bill benefits for law school at St. Mary's in San Antonio, where most of the students were Hispanic. The dean was "a tough cookie," and he says, "99.9 percent passed the bar." At St. Mary's he was in ROTC and served in the Army artillery. He wasn't in Korea but was a general's aide.

On leave in 1952 de la Garza ran for the legislature and beat the rough-hewn local "machine." Any discrimination in the valley, school, the service, the legislature? "I never had a problem." He is an amiable man who has learned eight languages because "people appreciate hearing their own language." In 1964 Rep. Joe Kilgore retired. Lloyd Bentsen Sr., father of the senator and one of the valley's biggest landowners, "read me my responsibilities: my family, my people, my country." (Bentsen, now 92, says he has known de la Garza "since he could walk. He was always a real worker, ambitious.")

So the young man who had become one of the first Hispanic partners in a big McAllen law firm became, at major financial loss, the first Hispanic congressman from the valley—moderate to conservative, loyal to party, hard-working on district matters. He can hold the seat, if he wants, for life.

Heny Cisneros' father also worked for the government, as a civilian at San Antonio's Fort Sam Houston, and he rose to colonel in the Army Reserve. "For him, if a world was structured by grade," Cisneros says, "that was a fair world."

But his family was also in politics: his grandfather, Romulo Munguia, in the turbulent years following the 1910 revolution in Mexico, was a follower of Francisco Madero. Mexican revolutionary politics was a lethal business (for Madero and others), and Munguia moved to San Antonio, part of an exile community of political intellectuals in the first big city north of the border.

On the open, treeless lands of south Texas, San Antonio had even then just enough skyscrapers to look urban, though its economy depended on the military. Its population was about one-third Hispanic. Romulo Munguia and his son ran a print shop, which did a lot of political work.

Munguia was an anticlerical, but the church ran the only good schools, and Henry Cisneros attended Catholic High School for Boys, run by the Marianist Brothers. "I don't know if they intended it or not," he says, "but they created a Hispanic management group": 20 boys from the classes of 1960 to 1968 now hold high positions. Cisneros went from there to Texas A&M and was part of the military corps; he was contemplating a military career at a time when other national Democrats his age were protesting the Vietnam war. He's proud to be an Aggie, and proud that the governor appointed him to the A&M Board of Regents.

Cisneros' military career was cut short as the war wound down; he went to graduate school and got a PhD in urban studies; as a White House fellow he worked for Elliot Richardson. After Cambridge and Washington, he was offered a position teaching in San Antonio, and he and his wife returned there in 1974. He lives on the Hispanic West Side, near the small yellow bungalow where his parents still live. His uncle talked him into running for the council in a west side district in 1975; he ran for mayor in 1981 and beat an Anglo slow-growth advocate.

Cisneros revels now in planning for San Antonio's future, helping to build in a low-wage, public-sector city a strong high-tech private sector. He's proud of writing important papers—"Target '90," the city blueprint—himself, and proud that in a city once bitterly divided between Hispanics and Anglos, he's established a consensus politics on issues of his own choosing.

Talented political families, tough Marianist schools, military service, total fluency in English and Spanish and ease among Anglos and Hispanic the short relaxed 57-years old de la Garza and the ramrod-thin 38-years-old Cisneros have much in common. From their unusual corner of the United States, they stay in touch with Mexico, but their politics like their lives are unequivocally American.●

REUNIFICATION OF SIBLINGS

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, we have all heard reports of brothers and/or sisters who have been separated at birth or in early youth and have been joyously reunited after many years of searching. These happily ever after stories, while touching and happy, represent only a small fraction of the separated siblings. Unfortunately, many brothers and sisters are still searching for their siblings and indeed never reach the happy ending of being reunited.

A constituent of mine, Edward Branca, of Nanuet, NY, was moved by the story of a reunion of three triplets in New York in 1980. Since then, he has been deeply involved in trying to help separated siblings who are searching for each other. Mr. Branca has on numerous occasions provided various committees here on Capitol Hill with written testimony on the need for a plan of "siblings' rights." According to Mr. Branca, such a plan is necessary to ensure that no further siblings will be separated and denied the right to ever see each other again.

Recently, Mr. Branca submitted written testimony to the Senate Finance Subcommittee on Social Security and Income Maintenance Programs, which conducted a June 24 hearing on the Reauthorization of the Adoption Assistance and Child Welfare Act of 1980. He provided the subcommittee with incisive comments about separated siblings and outlined a proposed plan for "siblings' rights" which I would like to share with my colleagues. Accordingly, I request that his testimony be inserted at this point in the RECORD:

STATEMENT OF EDWARD BRANCA, JR.

I respectfully request Congress to consider enacting legislation, possibly as an amendment to the reauthorization of P.L. 96-272, to reunite brothers and sisters who are separated by adoption or foster care, and to prevent brothers and sisters from being unnecessarily separated in future adoptions and foster care placements. More often than we would like to think, brothers and sisters have been separated, often unnecessarily, and then denied the right to ever see each other again.

While I am not an expert on social service law, I believe few states have laws on their books to grant adoptees a right of reunion with brothers and sisters they have been separated from, even in cases where siblings were adopted by different families. While I have not done any research, I would guess that few states have laws on their books to require that, whenever possible, brothers and sisters who are available for adoption, be adopted by the same family. I was told by a person who lives in Maine, that Maine only stopped separating brothers and sisters a few years ago. I regret to say that my own state of New York has not enacted a law to reunite separated siblings, even in cases where siblings who were separated as children have reached adulthood, and had been adopted by different families. A New York state bill, S4937-A/A5042-A, to require that whenever possible, brothers and sisters be adopted by the same family, has passed the state Assembly, though as of June 18th, it has not passed the state Senate. The following are some of the tragedies which have occurred when brothers and sisters were separated.

During the Great Depression, a group of siblings were placed in foster homes in western New York state. One of the children, Janet, returned one day from school, to be told by an older sister, that "Baby Lillian," their sister, had been taken away by the adoption authorities. Janet Gervaise has not seen her little sister for over fifty years.

Donald Booth, whom the 1981 ABC-TV. movie, "A Long Way Home" was based, was adopted by one family; his younger brother and sister were adopted by another. Don, who, according to the movie, greatly missed his siblings, did not see them again until all were adults.

Lorrine Brewer, who grew up in North Carolina foster care, has been unable to locate or obtain identifying information on her brother and sister who were adopted. It is a misdemeanor, under North Carolina law, to disclose information contained in adoption files.

Last year, after seeing a news report on the reunion of two brothers who had been separately adopted and denied contact with each other, I called the adoptive parent of one. When I asked her why the adoption agency didn't provide the childrens' adoptive parents with each others names and addresses, so that the children could keep in contact, she told me "they don't tell you that."

In 1983, a set of separately adopted identical triplets were reunited, at the age of fifty-seven.

The list of these tragedies could go on and on.

The International Soundex Reunion Registry, (ISRR), attempts to reunite adoption separated families by matching dates and places of birth. Emma May Vilardi, who Chairs the ISRR., states that, "Families of six to twelve children, all full siblings, were separated by adoption and foster care. War, depressions and the death of parent(s) are common denominators in the separation of large families." According to the ISRR's. 1984 annual report, 106 people, who know they have a twin they were separated from, are registered with the ISRR., in hopes their twin will also register.

I wish to point out how information given to adoptive families by adoption agencies can be false.

The February, 1981 issue of Good Housekeeping ran an article, "The Triplets Who Found Each Other," which is the true story of the accidental reunion in September, 1980, of a set of identical triplets who had been separately adopted shortly after their birth on July 12, 1961. The article stated that, after the triplets reunion, the adoption agency they were placed by, Louise Wise Services, told the triplet's adoptive parents that they were the last multiple birth babies who were separated. None of the triplet's adoptive parents had been told the children were multiple birth babies.

In May, 1985, I received a phone call from a woman who gave birth to brother-sister twins on June 23, 1969, eight years after the triplets were born. The "birthmother" surrendered the twins to Louise Wise Services. She told me that, shortly after the twins were born, she returned to Louise Wise Services, to see if the twins were being placed with the same family. Louise Wise told her that they would not attempt to place the twins together, unless prospective adoptive parents came to them requesting to adopt a set of twins. They would not ask prospective adoptive parents if they were willing to adopt a set of twins. So the twins were separated. When an adoption agency separately adopts siblings, it receives a fee from each set of adoptive parents, instead of receiving only one fee if the children are adopted by the same family. Louise Wise Services also conducted research on the effects of heredity by studying the multiple birth children it separated.

I have been told that Louise Wise Services separated many multiple birth babies, and has given false information to adoptees and adoptive parents.

PLAN FOR ENACTMENT OF "SIBLINGS' RIGHTS"

I have developed a plan to keep brothers and sisters together, in foster care and in adoption, and to reunite separated siblings. When I use the words "brothers," "sisters" and "siblings," I am, of course, referring to half-siblings as well as to full-siblings. I urge this plan be mandatory on states which receive federal aid for their foster care or adoption programs.

Siblings not be separated, in foster care or in adoption, unless absolutely necessary i.e. when no family is willing or able to take all the children in a sibling group.

II. That separated siblings, or, if they are minors, their legal parents, be allowed to obtain identifying information.

When siblings are minors, one (set of) parents should have a legal right to request a third party, perhaps the court, adoption agency or private organization, to contact the other (set of) parents to ask if they wish a reunion. If they agree, identifying information would be provided. If they decline, identifying information would not be provided, and the parent(s) notified of the turn down.

Adults should be allowed access to identifying information on their adult siblings without anyone's consent. (In many cases where siblings have been separated many years, the sibling won't be able to be located by the third party. Providing identifying information will help people in tracing their siblings.)

I do, though, believe it might be advisable if courts were allowed to withhold identifying information in cases where a sibling is developmentally disabled or suffering from serious mental illness. I do not believe that reunion should be denied in all such cases, as, in many such cases, brothers and sisters are the only family the person has left.

I urge that the right to obtain identifying information on siblings be allowed even in cases where a sibling(s) remain(ed) with the birthparent(s).

While I know revealing birthparents identity, even indirectly, is controversial, I urge that non-adopted, but separated, siblings be allowed reunion.

The Washington [state] Adoptee's Rights Movement, (WARM.), has been authorized in many of Washington's counties to act as "confidentual intermediary," to contact separated by adoption family members to ask if they wish a reunion. WARM. finds that ninety percent of the family members it contacts agree to a reunion. While I have no statistics on this, I assume that the vast majority of WARM's. intermediary contacts are on behalf of adoptees who wish to be reunited with their birthparents and vice versa. This, plus my own reading of adoption literature, as well as my own contacts with birthparents and other adoption separated and reunited people, has totally convinced me that the vast majority of birthparents wish to be reunited with surrendered children. I can only assume that, when the surrendered child has a brother or sister, the desire for a reunion is even greater.

I urge that the right to obtain identifying information apply to past adoptions and foster care placements, as well as to future cases. While I know Congress does not like to make regulations retroactive, I urge an exception be made to allow separated in the past brothers and sisters to be reunited. After all, these are cases where brothers and sisters who had nothing but each other left, were denied even each other. The information needed to reunite these siblings is locked away in a court or agency file, and denied to those, like Ms. Brewer, who need it most.

I suggest that Congress consider making the right to obtain identifying information enforceable by federal courts. Congress might wish to declare that the Constitutional protection of family relationships gives Congress the power to enact siblings' rights legislation.

III. That prospective adoptive and foster parents be informed if the child they plan to adopt, or take in as a foster child, has sibling(s), and, if so, if they are: (a) not surrendered, (b) available for adoption or foster care, and (c) have been adopted.

The fact that Louise Wise Services, and other adoption agencies, separated multiple birth babies, without telling the children's adoptive parents, explains why this regulation is necessary.

WHY STATE ADOPTION REGISTRIES ARE NOT THE SOLUTION

I believe that state adoption registries, which are being created by state legislatures in a number of states, including New York, are not the answer to the question of how to reunite separated siblings. I believe this for the following reasons.

Brothers and sisters who are separated had no say in the decisions which separated them from one another. Therefore, the law should make it as easy as possible for siblings, particularly adult siblings, to be reunited.

Professor Thomas Bouchard, of the University of Minnesota's Psychology Department, has studied about sixty-five sets of twins and triplets who were separated early in life, and reunited as adults. Professor Bouchard has told me that, while all his subjects have not had perfect reunions, none wishes the reunion had not happened. Professor Bouchard was not involved in separating siblings. He supports reuniting families who are separated.

A person who is active in helping adoptees search for birthfamily members, has told me that she knows of only a few reunions between separated siblings which were not successful. I thus believe that the vast majority of separated brothers and sisters wish a reunion.

State laws which govern adoption registries require that adoptees be adults before they may register. Most, if not all, state registries do not allow adoptive parents to register their minor children. To force parents to say to their child, that he may see his brother or sister again when he is an adult, is nothing more than government mandated child cruelty.

In order to register with the New York state adoption registry, adoptees must be over the age of 21, been born and adopted in New York state, and pay a fee of at least $45,00. (No small amount to many adoptees.) For this fee, adoptees receive certain non-identifying information on their birthparents. For a "match" (reunion) to take place, one or both birthparents, as well as the adoptive parents (if living) must register. Also, more fees must be paid. The registry, by the way, is prohibited from soliciting a registration from anyone, or accepting registrations from separated siblings.

I would like to point out, that several states require or allow that amended birth certificates, which are issued to adoptees and adoptive parents (In most states, original ones are sealed), change not only the names of the adoptees parents, but the place of the adoptee's birth. A person adopted in any of these states, might not know where he was born, and thus not know which state registry, if any, he can register with. There are also siblings who were adopted by families in different states. Not to mention sibling are separated by foster care.

The following are some of the laws Congress has, in recent years, passed, which preempt state authority.

The Family Educational And Privacy Act of 1974 (Buckley Amendment), which requires school districts to grant access to student's school records to parents, and to persons over the age of 18 who have left school.

The equal access provisions of the math and science education law, which require school districts to allow students to conduct religious worship in school buildings, during non-school hours.

The law which requires states to enact a minimum drinking age of 21, in order to receive their full allotment of federal highway aid.

The following states change adoptees place of birth on amended birth certificates. (Information may not be up to date.)

States where place of birth must be changed: Kentucky, Mississippi, and North Carolina.

States where place of birth may be changed: California, Georgia, Illinois, New Jersey, and Wisconsin.

DR. WALTER SMITH IS NAMED FULBRIGHT SCHOLAR

HON. DON FUQUA

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, one of my warm personal friends and one of the Nation's outstanding leaders in the field of education has been named the recipient of a Fulbright Scholarship. Dr. Walter L. Smith, the immediate past president of the prestigious Florida A&M University in Tallahassee, FL, has received another honor in a long string of academic and professional accomplishments.

We are all aware of the prestige and significance of Fulbright Scholarships. This one is significant because Dr. Smith will carry his academic and administrative expertise to Malawi in south central Africa.

Dr. Smith is uniquely qualified for his opportunity and challenge. Not only will he leave a significant mark on education in that nation, he will be a worthy ambassador of good will for this Nation in that part of the world.

The Capital Outlook of Tallahassee printed an article announcing Dr. Smith's selection. It is with genuine personal pleasure that I ask its inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The article follows:

FORMER FAMU PRESIDENT SMITH TO LECTURE AS FULBRIGHT SCHOLAR

(By Jere Smith)

Dr. Walter L. Smith, immediate past president of Florida A&M University, has been selected as a senior Fulbright Scholar for the country of Malawi in south-central Africa.

The year-long lecture-research appointment will begin this fall during Smith's sabbatical leave from the State University System after an eight-year tenure as president at Florida's only historically black university. The Fulbright Grant provides subsidies for Smith to travel, lecture, carry out specified research projects and will support his dependent's education cost during the one-year period.

Smith's son, Walter II, 12, a prospective seventh grade student at Florida A&M University High School, will travel with his father to Africa this fall.

Smith, 50, was notified of his appointment last Thursday by Ronald Trowbridge of the Board of Foreign Scholarships on behalf of the United States Information Agency. In his letter to Smith, Trowbridge cited Smith's academic and professional achievements as the basis for his selection.

Part of Smith's application reflected his personal leadership and involvement in the education of blacks throughout the United States in general and in Florida specifically.

He was the chief architect of the state's first Conference on the Education of Blacks in Florida and later was appointed by the State Board of Education to chair a committee which grew out of that conference and which advises the Board on the education of blacks.

Congressman Don Fuqua, who recommended Smith's candidacy, indicated that he's "delighted that one of my constitutents was chosen for this high honor. This experience should be mutually beneficial to the parties; Malawi will have the resources of a prestigeous and experienced educator, while former FAMU President Smith will have an opportunity to expand his international professional exposure."

In 1971, as an African-American Institute Scholar, Smith studied in the countries of Ghana, Togo, Dahomey (Benin), and Nigeria. Since that experience, he has traveled to England, France, Germany, Kenya, Greece, the People's Republic of China and throughout the Caribbean.

In 1979, Smith was a United States Non-government Organization delegate to the International Conference on Science and Technology for Development in Vienna, Austria. It was during this conference that Smith participated in many debates on harnessing international resources to enhance the quality of life in Third World Countries, Congressman Fuqua, who chairs the U.S. House of Representatives Committee on Science and Technology, was a major spokesman at that conference in Austria.

More recently, Smith traveled with Gov. Bob Graham to Israel to enhance economic and education relations between that country and the State of Florida.

Dr. Frederick S. Humphries, president of Florida A&M University, sent a message of congratulations to Smith for having received the prestigious honor. He said that his predecessor's experiences in the international arena, his desire to raise the standards of academic excellence among black people everywhere, and his proven record of accomplishments will "certainly impact the nation's effort bring about world peace through understanding and education."

Nominations for Fulbright Scholarships are made by the Council for International Exchange of Scholars advisory committees and forwarded to the Board of Foreign Scholarships.

During his 12-month stint, Smith will help the University of Malawi develop its graduate programs at Chancellor's College and at other colleges in that country. He will also research problems related to access and articulation between that country's secondary schools and the University System.

Smith, who resigned July, 1984, is one of three senior administrators within the State University System to receive sabbatical leave within the past 12 months. Dr. Robert Marston, immediate-past president of The University of Florida, will return as a professor in the School of Medicine at Gainesville for the 1985-86 academic year. Dr. Barbara Newell, immediate-past chancellor of the State University System, will also begin her sabbatical leave this fall.●

HIROSHIMA '85

HON. EDWARD J. MARKEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MARKEY. Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has proclaimed 1985 the "International Year of Animation," and to help commemorate this event, I would like to call the attention of my colleagues to a remarkable film festival which will take place from August 18 through August 23, in Hiroshima, Japan. The theme of this animated film festival is "Love and Peace," and its purpose is to promote friendship and understanding among all the world's peoples and cultures.

The festival will take place in an auditorium in the Peace Park, and like the park itself, it is a reminder of the anniversary of the first atomic bomb dropped on Hiroshima 40 years ago this summer. But this festival is not a grim reminder of the past, rather it is a celebration of peace and progress to, in the words of its organizers, "spread the heartfelt message of Hiroshima in hopes of an everlasting peace for the world."

"Hiroshima '85," the first officially sponsored film festival in Asia, will present a wide range of animated films to an international audience of educators, artists, film makers, critics, producers, and journalists. I am pleased to report the work of U.S. animators will figure prominently at the festival. In addition to an entire program dedicated to the work of several other American film makers, there will be a special tribute to Chuck Jones, perhaps the most internationally honored animated film maker in the world today.

Mr. Speaker, I salute the work of the artists and organizers behind "Hiroshima '85," and wish them well in their efforts to promote peace throughout the world.●

MID-VALLEY UNIT ACT OF 1985

HON. RICHARD H. LEHMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LEHMAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation which would authorize the construction of the mid-valley unit of the Central Valley project [CVP], located in California.

This legislation would authorize the delivery of supplemental surface water to approximately 4 million acres of intensively irrigated agricultural lands on the east side of California's Central San Joaquin Valley. This rich farmland faces a serious ground water overdraft problem which, if not resolved, would result in the loss of thousands of acres of productive land.

The legislation would implement a plan which would help preserve a portion of the economic and cultural development that already exists in the San Joaquin Valley of California, the Nation's most productive agricultural region. Supplemental surface water deliveries would help alleviate the heavy reliance upon ground water pumping and the negative impact on that limited natural resource which has resulted. Diversified family farming is the backbone of the agricultural economy of the region and water is the very essence which nourishes this thriving economy.

The concept of a mid-valley canal to provide additional water to the area has long had the support of water users, including local governments, the farm community, businessmen, and others who are concerned with the San Joaquin Valley ecosystem and the economic well-being of the region.

Various studies on the construction of a major conveyance facility to serve the eastern portion of the San Joaquin Valley were conducted in the 1950's and 1960's as part of the Central Valley project authorization and a proposed feasibility report on the east side division of the CVP was sent to the Secretary of the Interior in 1968. These initial studies made it apparent that a wide discrepancy existed between the existing supply of water and the consumptive demands of the entire region.

The need for this supplemental surface water was demonstrated in a joint study by the California Department of Water Resources and U.S. Bureau of Reclamation entitled, "Mid-Valley Canal, East Side Division, Central Valley Project, California, a Report on the Mid-Valley Canal Feasibility Investigation, U.S. Department of the Interior"—January 1981. The report conducted an extensive survey of the needs within the service area and the hydrologic, economic, and environmental considerations of constructing such a facility. The canal, as envisioned in this 1981 study, was a major conveyance facility to be constructed on the east side of the valley.

The study indicated that the service area faces an annual ground water overdraft of an estimated 1.5 million acre-feet. The Bureau of Reclamation indicated that local surface water supplies have been almost completely utilized and cannot realistically meet the long-term demands of the area. In addition, the report points out that overall basin irrigation efficiency is very high and additional conservation technologies would yield no appreciable irrigation supplies. The feasibility report concludes in part that over 440,000 acres of highly productive irrigated agricultural lands would have to be abandoned "within the foreseeable future unless a replacement supply can be imported."

Subsequently, the Bureau of Reclamation has included within its annual budgets for fiscal years 1985 and 1986, funds to conduct the "San Joaquin Valley Conveyance Investigation" to conduct updated studies. This investigation will evaluate the economic feasibility of various alternatives regarding the delivery, storage, and environmental impacts of implementing the concept of the mid-valley unit. The investigation will study the utilization of existing facilities as a means of producing a more cost-effective project. Complete consideration will have been given to resolving the present and anticipated ground water overdraft problem and meeting the water supply needs in the area, including water delivery systems, drainage, erosion, flooding, and fish and wildlife impacts. The Mid-Valley Water Authority is sharing in this cooperative investigation to be completed in 1986.

In addition, the legislation provides provisions to take into account the protection and enhancement of fisheries, wildlife, and recreation opportunties associated with the construction and operation of the project.

The mid-valley service area is comprised of irrigated agricultural lands in Merced, Madera, Fresno, Tulare, Kings, and Kern Counties. The area is represented by the Mid-Valley Water Authority, a joint powers authority formed in 1982 and comprised of 29 public agencies which serve the agricultural, municipal, and industrial water needs of the service area.

The authority represents a broad consensus of support for the project and as studies have already indicated there exists a dramatic need for the construction and operation of such a facility.

For the benefit of my colleagues, I have included a copy of the legislation.

SECTION 1. SHORT TITLE.

This Act may be cited as the "Mid-Valley Unit Act of 1985".

SEC. 2. FINDINGS.

The Congress finds that—

(1) there is need for a federally constructed project to serve approximately 4 million acres of irrigated agricultural lands located in Merced, Madera, Fresno, Tulare, Kings, and Kern Counties, California;

(2) there is presently an overdraft of groundwater in these counties that would be alleviated by providing irrigation, municipal, and industrial water supplies;

(3) a federally constructed project would facilitate optimum conjunctive use and reuse of surface and underground water supplies enhancing the agricultural stability of the San Joaquin Valley; and

(4) fish and wildlife resources and outdoor recreation opportunities would be enhanced by construction of a project.

SEC. 3. AUTHORIZATION.

(a) AUTHORIZATION.—The Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter in this act referred to as the "Secretary"), acting pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto), is authorized to contruct, operate, and maintain, the Mid-Valley Unit, as an addition to and an integral part of, the Central Valley Project, California, upon completion of a favorable Planning Report/EIS on the San Joaquin Valley Conveyance Investigation.

(b) PRINCIPAL WORKS.—The principal works of the Mid-Valley Unit shall consist of pumping plants, pumping generator plants, power plants, power transmission faciities, canals, channels, levees, drains, flood control works, pipelines, regulating reservoirs, off-stream and on-stream storage reservoirs, deep wells and pumps, and distribution systems and facilities consistent with the recommendations of relevant planning documents. The Secretary is authorized and directed to utilize, whenever feasible, existing water supplies, conveyance and storage facilities.

(c) PROVISION OF WATER.—The Secretary is authorized to provide water supplies for the irrigation of approximately 4 million acres of land in Merced, Madera, Fresno, Tulare, Kings, and Kern Counties, as identified in the Planning Report/EIS on the San Joaquin Valley Conveyance Investigation.

SEC. 4. FISH AND WILDLIFE ENHANCEMENT AND RECREATION.

The conservation and development of the fish and wildlife resources and the enhancement of recreation opportunities in connection with the Mid-Valley Unit shall be in accordance with the provisions of the Fish and Wildlife Coordination Act (16 U.S.C. 661 et seq.) and the Federal Water Project Recreation Act (79 Stat. 213).

SEC. 5. WATER DELIVERY AND STORAGE AGREEMENTS.

The Secretary is authorized and directed to—

(1) execute a contract with the State of California for the wheeling, delivery, exchange, and storage of water through the facilities of the State Water Project of California for use in the Mid-Valley Unit; and

(2) execute contracts with the State of California for the construction or enlargement of conveyance and storage facilities for joint use.

SEC. 6. LOCAL COST-SHARING AGREEMENTS.

The Secretary may enter into agreements with the Mid-Valley Water Authority, a California Joint Powers Authority, for the provision of all or any portion of the authorized distribution facilities as the local contribution to the cost of the project.

SEC. 7. STATE AND LOCAL PUBLIC INTEREST.

In locating and designing the works and facilities authorized for construction by this Act, and in acquiring or withdrawing any lands as authorized by this Act, the Secretary shall give due consideration to relevant reports by the State of California, and shall consult with local interests who may be affected by the construction and operation of the works and facilities or by the acquisition or withdrawal of lands, through public hearings or in such manner as in his discretion may be found best suited to a maximum expression of the views of such local interests.

SEC. 8. AUTHORIZATION OF FUNDS.

There is authorized to be appropriated for construction of the Mid-Valley Unit as authorized in this Act, the sum of $——, plus or minus such amounts, if any, as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations in construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indices applicable to the types of construction involved herein.●

HANS HACKER: EAST LIVERPOOL'S YOUNG ARTIST

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, many millions of people have come to America over the course of our history and the talents and skills that they have brought to our shores have contributed immensely to the arts and humanities of our Nation. Out of the many thousands of artists and painters who have come from foreign countries is one man who has brought joy and pleasure to the canvas: Hans Hacker, the youthful artist of East Liverpool, OH.

Hans Hacker developed his artistic skill in his native Germany where, by the age of 11 , he was well on the way to painting and selling his works of art. Coming from a family that was artistic to begin with—his father a commercial artist at a pottery and his mother an art teacher—Hans was well prepared to nurture the talents that he has expressed through his paintbrushes for well over half a century. Hans first embarked for America in 1932, joined by his wife but without their infant son who remained in Germany with Hans' parents. Coming to the town of East Liverpool, Hans worked for the Commercial Decal Co. while continuing to make frequent trips to Germany until 1939, when the spectre of war loomed ever larger in Europe.

Leaving the hills of Germany for the hills along the Ohio River was no major disruption for Hans and his wife, Johanna. Since coming to America, Hans has continued to create art from his surrounding environment—from the old buildings along Second Street in East Liverpool to the countryside of Columbiana County. There is nothing that Hans can't apply to canvas and the world around him is just waiting to fall under the stroke of his brush. As Hans would say, "I see beauty in practically everything." Hans served as the art and technical director at Commercial Decal's specialty division until his retirement in 1977, after his service of 45 years. But Hans has not retired from painting as he continues to create oil and watercolor paintings and is a frequent winner of awards at the many local art shows. Many of his works are given as gifts to the local community and raffled to raise funds for charitable organizations.

Mr. Speaker, Hans Hacker will be honored this month with an exhibition of his art sponsored by the East Liverpool Historical Society. I would like to extend my utmost recognition and that of the House of Representatives in saluting this talented artist. Most of all, the Philosophy of painting that Hans applies to his art are words that we should all remember:

You have to have the talent to begin with. It also depends on the environment you grow up in. You have to do it from when you were a youngster. Whatever you like, you put your heart and soul into it—it's what keeps me young.●

DAN RATHER ON INFLATION

HON. NICHOLAS MAVROULES

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MAVROULES. Mr. Speaker, for several months, it has been apparent that the economic recovery, which we hear so much about, is an uneven one, which has left behind several segments of our economic base—areas vital to our Nation's economic prosperity. Perhaps nowhere is this more evident than among our Nation's small manufacturers.

Last week, a report on the "CBS Evening News" highlighted this problem. In this report, which is reprinted below, Mr. Robert Lee, president of Hotwatt, Inc., of Danvers, MA, describes the difficult economic conditions which he and other small manufacturers are facing.

Mr. Speaker, my small business Subcommittee on Oversight and the Economy recently conducted a hearing on economic issues affecting small business. At this hearing, we learned that small business failures reached an all-time high in the first 4 months of this year, and that several sectors of the economy, particularly farmers and those involved in the domestic footwear industry, are in the midst of a very severe recession.

Don't get me wrong, there are segments of the population who are enjoying economic prosperity. Yet, for a large number of individuals, the words "economic recovery" have no meaning. Over the coming months, my subcommittee will continue to examine the economic health of our small manufacturers and other small businesses in an effort to ensure that our economic policies are designed to benefit all segments of the population.

CBS EVENING NEWS WITH DAN RATHER AS BROADCAST OVER THE CBS TELEVISION NETWORK

RATHER. The latest government report shows that June was another month of low inflation, with consumer prices up just two-tenths of a percent. So far this year, inflation is running at an annual rate of 3.7%. Low inflation is the kind of news consumers like to hear, but not all is well. As Jane Bryant Quinn reports, other economic road signs indicate slow going.

JANE BRYANT QUINN. Last May, President Reagan told businessmen that America was on a roll.

PRESIDENT RONALD REAGAN. (May 24). The economy has shown solid growth for the last nine quarters.

QUINN. But today, worried manufacturers want to know what the government has done for them lately.

BOB LEE. Some time, the customers whom we serve tell us that there's no business.

QUINN. In Bob Lee's small manufacturing plant in Danvers, Massachusetts, business started to fall apart in January. He has cut his workforce by more than 10%.

LEE. Profits have been squeezed down quite a bit. We've only really had one profitable month in the last six.

QUINN. The empty chairs and missing jobs in hundreds of factories like Bob Lee's are telling the politicians that something is very wrong. In the first six months of this year alone, America lost 221,000 jobs in manufacturing and it's getting worse.

IRWIN KELLNER [economist]. It's kind of an economic malaise, if you would. We're really in a recession, but, somehow or other, it just doesn't feel like an economic boom.

QUINN. And with reason. Ever since January, economic growth has been on the skids. Housing starts have been down this year. Business profits are hurting. Unemployment has gotten a little worse. The Administration hopes that the slowdown is over. Today, it reported a healthy 1.8% rise in new orders for consumer appliances and other durable goods. But despite this good news, many economists believe that the pace of business will remain slow.

KELLNER. We've had our economic recovery in '83 and in '84, and now from here on out we're just going to zig and zag up and down.

QUINN. Federal budget deficits have been catching part of the blame for the slow zigzag economy, because government borrowing pushed interest rates too high. But ironically, in a weak economy, government spending helps keep business going.

DAVID LEVY (economist). If we were to reduce the—the deficit, it will have exactly the opposite effect desired. It will hurt the economy severely.

QUINN. Hundreds of small manufacturers are crossing their fingers that they will not be hurt any more than they have already. Although, in shops like these a business upturn is not yet in sight.

OPIC: ROOM FOR IMPROVEMENT

HON. DONALD J. PEASE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. PEASE. Mr. Speaker, On September 30, 1985, the Overseas Private Investment Corporation's authorization is due to expire. Reauthorization bills are now proceeding through this Chamber and through the Senate.

OPIC's primary mission is to promote the economic and social development of lesser developed friendly nations by assisting U.S. private investments. The financial record of OPIC has been impressive in recent years. In 1984, its net income was $97 million, of which $74 million was interest earned on its holdings in U.S. Government securities. However, many of OPIC's projects have not been ones which most effectively promote development. Many projects have even been located in wealthier countries such as Saudi Arabia and Oman. Clearer statutory standards are now needed to assure that OPIC adheres to its developmental goals.

An article that will appear in the Council of Hemispheric Affairs' biweekly "Washington Report on the Hemisphere" by COHA Senior Research Fellow Frank Howard explores the performance of OPIC in light of its development goals and the current reauthorization proposals. For this reason, I encourage all of my colleagues to read the Howard article.

QUESTIONS ABOUT OPIC

(By Frank Howard)

In a year of struggles with the federal deficit, could anyone argue with a federal agency which showed an actual profit in 1984 of $97 million? Especially an agency dedicated to such objectives as the economic and social development of poorer countries, human rights, improving this country's balance of trade, and supporting U.S. small business? If the current Congressional reauthorization proceedings for the Overseas Private Investment Corporation (OPIC) are typical, few have any quarrels with this small but important federal agency. Nonetheless, although OPIC is all but unknown to the vast majority of Americans, the agency merits scrutiny, and measures should be taken to ensure that it more actively pursues its developmental goals—one of the original justifications for its existence.

OPIC insures billions of dollars of U.S. private investments overseas against political risks such as expropriation. Its insurance programs are especially attractive because it offers 20-year policy terms; private political risk insurers usually offer only 3-year periods of coverage. OPIC also provides direct loans and information services to U.S. investors as well as guaranteeing loans made by U.S. banks to them. All of its commitments are backed by the full faith and credit of the government.

The current four-year statutory authority for OPIC is due to expire September 30, 1985. As a self-sustaining agency, OPIC is largely exempt from the annual review to which other federal agencies are routinely subjected at appropriations time. Therefore the present reauthorization proceedings provide a rare opportunity for Congress to revisit the agency and determine that it is doing the job that in part earned it the right to exist.

The enacting legislation gave OPIC various, and possibly conflicting, statutory objectives. On one hand, OPIC is required to promote "the economic and social development of less developed friendly countries and areas," to give a preference to poorer countries, and to consider the effect of its programs on the "respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms."

On the other hand, OPIC is also required to prefer projects which further the "balance of payments and employment objectives of the United States," which "involve United States small business," and which are in countries that "are receptive to private enterprise."

OPIC has nearly total discretion in balancing these objectives. In recent years, the agency's emphasis has been on large projects and financial stability, at the expense of development.

OPIC's official reports play down its larger undertakings, advertising the small scale projects it has assisted through direct loan programs. A 1982 OPIC development report suggested that small business activities were a more cost-effective way to produce employment in the developing countries than large projects. In 1984, OPIC's small direct loan programs typically included $240,000 for a St. Kitts commercial fishing operation and $400,000 to a Grenadan nutmeg packaging plant.

For insurance undertakings, OPIC's graph summary in its 1984 report showed that of 124 newly undertaken activities in 1984, 13 were for over $10 million per client, which appears to be a modest portion. However, examining the actual dollar amounts and calculating their percentage reveals that the projects in excess of $10 million accounted for $942 million, or 83.7 percent of the total dollar amount of OPIC's 41.13 billion-worth of newly insured commitments.

Heading the list of countries receiving OPIC-insured U.S. investments in 1984 were the People's Republic of China and Chile. China had two projects totalling $278 million for oil exploration by Pennzoil Company and by Texaco, Inc. Chile had five backings totalling $242 million, including a $220 million gold and silver exploration effort by the St. Joe International Corporation. The projects in China and Chile alone accounted for 46.2 percent of OPIC's portfolio of new insurance in 1984.

Most of OPIC's loan activities in 1984 were not small direct allocations, but large guaranty undertakings. These were led by guarantees for loans of $40 million for an export fertilizer plant in Tanzania, $20 million for construction of a Hyatt International hotel in Egypt, and $20 million for a Brazilian fertilizer plant.

Statutory limitations now prevent OPIC from guaranteeing more than 10 percent of its total loan guaranty authority to any one bank's insured lending, and effecitve limit of $75 million per institution. OPIC wants the limit raised to 25 percent, arguing that many private U.S. financial institutions are now unwilling to lend to developing countries because of the current debt crisis afflicting the third world. However, the 10 percent limitation can be defended as honoring the reason why it was created: preventing OPIC from concentrating its loan guaranties among a narrow circle of lending institution. Raising the limit to $188 million per U.S. bank would only pave the way for further large-scale loan guaranty projects.

Another issue meriting attention is the development impact permitted by OPIC projects within the host countries. For example, the agency is assisting the construction of a $40 million fertilizer in Tanzania, a very poor country which surely needs outside investment. But in order to shelter it from local uncertainties, the project uses a so-called "island concept" which includes offshore bank accounts for revenues generated. Many of the multiplier benefits of this project for the rest of the Tanzania economy are thus lost.

Aside from the size of the efforts assisted by OPIC and their effects within the host countries, another important measure of the developmental impact of OPIC's projects is the extent to which they are located in the poorest of the lesser developed countries. OPIC is required to give "preferential consideration" to the least developed counties, with $680 or less in per capita income in 1979 dollars. The agency is also required to "restrict" its activities in countries with $2950 or more in per capita income in 1979 dollars. OPIC's own analysis provided by its 1984 audit statement shows 59 such projects in the poorest countries category, which was 42.1 percent of the total number of OPIC assisted projects in 1984. In dollar amounts, 44.6 percent of OPIC assistance was in these least developed countries. A statutory requirement that at least 50 percent of the dollar value of OPIC projects be located in the least developed countries would provide a clear standard for such "preferential consideration."

In recent years the OPIC board has granted numerous exceptions to the $2950 guideline to authorize projects in countries such as Saudi Arabia, Oman and Israel. The justification for projects in wealthy, or better off and stable, countries is that they serve one or more specific U.S. interests, such as promoting small business. An outright prohibition on lending in wealthier countries would mandate that the agency concentrate its resources exclusively in countries in dire need of economic development. Such a prohibition would also benefit the private political risk insurance industry, which usually can compete with OPIC only in the wealthier countries.

A proposal has been made by Congressmen Don J. Pease (D-Ohio), Howard Berman (D-Calif.), and Don Bonker (D-Wash.), to prohibit OPIC from assisting projects in nations which fail to observe internationally recognized labor standards, such as freedom of association. It is thought that where workers are free to exercise labor rights, the economic benefits of U.S. investments will flow more fairly to the general population. Countries desiring U.S. investment would have an economic incentive to reform their often restrictive practices.

OPIC strongly opposes any moves to curtail its discretion based on the quality of labor practices of host countries. But Congress has already adopted a similar certification process in regard to countries eligible for the Generalized System of Preferences (GSP) in the trade area; applying those same standards to OPIC projects would make for consistency.

OPIC's approval of $242 million in projects in Chile is especially interesting both because that country has a notoriously poor record of recognizing labor and other human rights, and the action may signal a favorable nod by the United States toward the Santiago military regime at the very time that Congress has taken actions on human rights grounds against South Africa. The Administration also recently voted at the World Bank to allow a $55 million development loan to Chile, after abstaining from two similar such votes earlier in the year as a sign of displeasure with a state of siege imposed by the Pinochet dictatorship. While the state of siege was formally lifted on June 17, 1985, the day before the favorable U.S. vote at the World Bank, the Chilean government remains as dictatorial as ever.

Under the leadership of president Craig Nalen, OPIC has grown quickly, as its total assets rose to $907 million by the end of fiscal year 1984. Net income in 1984 was $97 million, although $74 million of that amount was interest derived from its holdings in U.S. securities. But this impressive record cannot be taken as the last word by Congress in evaluating OPIC's reauthorization legislation. The original development objectives of OPIC merit increased emphasis and statutory clarity.●

SOVIET PERSECUTION OF VLADIMIR AND CARMELLA RAIZ

HON. MICHAEL A. ANDREWS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ANDREWS. Mr. Speaker, this week, Secretary of State George Schultz is in Helsinki for ceremonies commemorating the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, which among other things was designed to reduce restrictions on human rights and enhance immigration from the Soviet Union and its allies. Yet 10 years after the signing of the accords, the human rights and emigration situation in the Soviet Union is at its lowest point since World War II. This is especially true of the plight of the Soviet Jews.

One of the most dramatic examples of the situation faced by Soviet Jews is the case of Vladimir and Carmella Raiz, a Jewish family that lives in Vilnius, Lithuania. The Raiz first applied to emigrate to Israel in 1972. The reason cited was family reunification and repatriation to the Jewish national homeland, both legal and valid reasons for emigration under Soviet and international law.

As a result of their application, Vladimir was forced to resign his job in 1974. By profession, he is a molecular biologist. Since then all attempts by Vladimir to gain employment in the scientific field have been turned down by Soviet authorities. He currently works as a letter carrier.

Carmella, his wife, is a violinist with the Vilnius Symphony Orchestra. Although she has been able to keep her job on a part-time basis, she is not allowed to travel with the orchestra, has been demoted, and has been denied pay raises granted to the other members of the orchestra.

Vladimir and Carmella were first refused the right to emigrate in 1973. At that time, the Soviets stated that Vladimir could not be allowed to leave because he had access to state secrets. Yet it was widely known that he was working on a project that was part of an international study of pepsin, and that the lab was receiving assistance from the West. Despite the fact that there were thus no compelling reasons to refuse his family's application, the Soviet again rejected the Raiz request in 1977.

During the pendency of the Raiz application to emigrate, has the Soviet Government permitted Vladimir and Carmella Raiz and their children, Moshe and Shaul, to lead a normal life? Tragically, the answer is "No." In addition to their employment troubles, the Raiz family is also denied the right to practice their Jewish faith without harassment.

A recent American visitor to the Raiz, the first person from the West to make contact with them in 2½ years, stated in an affidavit:

> The most serious problem facing Dr. Raiz and his family is the difficulty they have in practicing their Judism. In the past two years, Dr. Raiz and his wife have become devoutly religious Jews. They, and the rest of the Jewish community are allowed to use the synagogue in the city only twice a year. They are not allowed to use the synagogue for daily, sabbath, and holiday services or any other function.

The testimony goes on to state the Raiz are forbidden to obtain Jewish books or articles. They cannot purchase kosher food. In 1984, Carmella was questioned by the KGB for holding a passover Sedar ceremony in their home.

Contact with the West, with the exception of their sister in Israel, is almost nonexistent. Western visitors to Vilnius are chased away by the KGB. Telephone calls are disrupted. Mail from the West is not delivered. I have personally written the Raiz on three separate occasions by registered mail. All of these letters have been returned to me undelivered. Last March, my staff sent a birthday card to Shaul Raiz, who turned 3 this year. Even this was not delivered. In short, all attempts by my office to make contact with Raiz have been stopped by the Soviet authorities.

This year, I learned that Vladimir was being threatened by the Soviets with conscription into the Red Army. Also, there have been reports that he has been assaulted by local authorities on the streets. Most disturbing of all, Vladimir has been diagnosed with diabetes, and has sometimes slipped into a comatose state. We are not sure that he is receiving adequate treatment.

In recognition of the increasingly desperate situation faced by the Raiz I took the unusual step of making a personal appeal for help to visiting Politburo member Vladimir Scherbitsky, when I traveled with him to Austin on his visit to the United States last spring. At that time, I asked Mr. Scherbitsky and Ambassador Dobrynin to secure a visa for Vladimir and his family to travel to Houston so that he could receive treatment at the Texas Medical Center for his illness.

Mr. Scherbitsky accepted my request, and assured me that the appropriate local authorities would be asked to review the case, and that I would be kept informed of any developments by the Soviet Embassy. It has been 5 months since this promise was made, and I have received no information from the Soviets, in spite of the promise and a followup letter I sent to Ambassador Dobrynin in May.

Mr. Speaker, the tragic situation faced by the Raiz family, refusal of the right to emigrate, denial of the right to work in their profession, denial of the right to practice their Judaism, harassment, and isolation from their friends and supporters in the West, represents the lack of human rights and religious freedom in the Soviet Union today 10 years after the Soviets signed the Helsinki agreement. The stark reality of the current level of oppression demands from us continued vigilance and effort, until such time as those who want to emigrate are permitted to leave, and those who want to stay are assured of the protection of their human rights under the provisions of the Helsinki agreement.●

51-059 O-86-46 (Pt. 16)

PROBLEMS IN SURINAME

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD an article by Rick Groeden of the Council on Hemispheric Affairs on the current situation in Suriname. I hope my colleagues find it interesting.

PRAGMATISM IN PARAMARIBO

(By Rick Groeden)

Plagued by falling commodity prices, near 30 percent unemployment, and subsistence living standards for half the population, Surinamese ruler Lt. Col. Desire Bouterse is renewing efforts to win United States and Dutch economic assistance. The two countries cancelled aid packages of $1.5 million and $1.5 billion, respectively following the December 1982 torture and killings of 15 opposition figures by followers of the Surinamese strongman. The colonel, however, has made recent gestures to moderate his authoritarian rule.

His reasoning stems from the realization that renewed economic growth hinges on desperately-needed infusions of foreign aid, not only from the U.S. and The Netherlands, but from international lending institutions as well. Following the lead of these two countries, these sources also have been less than cooperative, and a prospective $100 million International Monetary Fund loan is contingent upon a 10 percent reduction in state expenditures and a 30 percent devaluation of the guilder. Trying to meet U.S. and Dutch demands for political liberalization, Bouterse in January appointed 12 representatives of the military, labor and business to a cabinet under civilian Prime Minister Wim Udenhout, and created a National Assembly to draft a new constitution within two years.

But Bouterse indisputably has a tight grip on the assembly, since 14 of its 31 seats are occupied by military officials, with labor holding 11 and industrial associations, six. Moreover, the regime's fractious relations with labor—testy since a series of strikes over excessive taxes in February 1984 threatened to bring Bouterse's downfall—have thwarted substantive legislative activity within the government. On April 4, three ministers representing labor's Moederbond, the C-47 and Public Servants Organization Central Council (CLO) withdrew from the cabinet and demanded that Labor Minister Edmund Dankerlin resign. The three charged that Dankerlin, of the tiny, military-backed Progressive Workers Organization (PWO), had instituted personnel changes within the Ministry in an attempt to coopt legitimate labor interests. Although Bouterse withdrew official recognition of the boycotting trade unions the next day, a series of negotiations throughout the month eventually brought all but the C-47 back into government, the latter being replaced by the Federation of Surinamese Industry and Commerce (VSB).

U.S. officials view the promised constitutional transition to civilian rule warily. Although a State Department official affirmed that relations have improved between the two countries, he is "skeptical of a resumption" of the U.S. $1.5 million aid package in the foreseeable future. While Congress did authorize last month $50,000 in FY 86 International Military Education and Training (IMET) funds for the Bouterse regime—not subject to the rights restrictions affecting the economic aid—an administration spokesman noted that similar IMET sums for Suriname in previous years had been authorized, but not disbursed, by Washington.

The Netherlands has shown little inclination to rescind its embargo of its errant former colony. But a March 15 meeting in Brasilia between Bouterse and Dutch Foreign Minister Van den Brock—the first high-level talks between the countries since the December 1982 massacre—did produce agreement to pursue additional exchanges at the embassy level. A spokesman at the Netherlands chancery in Washington stated that the Dutch government wants "a way out of the present situation without losing face," and that minimal assistance might be reinstated "within a year." A Surinamese diplomat, while conceding that "Dutch assistance would be nice," noted that his country is seeking closer ties with other nations since Paramaribo is "hesitant to become dependent once again on Dutch development assistance."

Accordingly, Suriname's high-priority efforts to diversify its economic relations have borne some fruit. The European Development Fund, for one, has pledged $3.4 million for various economic projects in the country. In early March, Bouterse went to Libya to sound out prospects of securing a $100 million loan and Tripoli's cooperation in a possible joint oil exploration venture. But Brazil is rapidly emerging as Suriname's closest and largest benefactor, a pattern established shortly after the U.S. action in Grenada. As the Surinamese official put it, "there's an old Dutch saying: it's better to have a good neighbor than a far friend."

In 1983, the Reagan administration reportedly urged the then-ruling Brazilian military regime to pressure Suriname to cool its relationship with Cuba, and the Brazilians made it known they would not stand for a Marxist state on their own border. Since then, however, Brazil has supplied vital foodstuffs and other basic staples during the virtual Western financial boycott of Suriname. In addition, Brasilia has taken in an increased share of Suriname's bauxite exports, development and commercial agreements are in the works, and Brazilian firms are helping to modernize the country's telephone network. A military relationship may also have been established: last October, Brazil reportedly supplied Bouterse's armed forces with at least 16 small tanks and other military transport vehicles.●

FARRAKHAN REMARKS DESERVE OUTRAGE

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, at an event publicized mainly through word-of-mouth, the Reverend Louis Farrakhan, head of the Nation of Islam, recently addressed over 10,000 persons at the Washington, DC, Convention Center. In his remarks, Reverend Farrakhan continued his anti-Semitic attacks and other messages of bigotry and hatred. Perhaps just as dangerous as Farrakhan's outrageous remarks is the relative silence that has followed his visit. Aside from the following Washington Post editorial and Richard Cohen column, his words have gone essentially unchallenged by public officials and others in the Nation's Capital in what amounts to a collective disregard of his presence.

The question of economic equity among all races in our country will only be resolved through genuine, positive leadership which seeks to improve the quality of life for all people. I submit for the attention of my colleagues the Post editorial and column, which raise the same concerns.

[From the Washington Post, July 26, 1985]

FARRAKHAN BIGOTRY UNCHALLENGED

Call it religious freedom, but Louis Farrakhan is into bigtime bigotry for the masses—and too many people who know better are looking the other way. His garbage is drawing crowds too: some 10,000 people jammed into Washington Convention Center on Monday night to hear—and cheer—his stream of vicious anti-Semitic comments and his attacks against any and all leaders of blacks who might challenge his disgusting sermons. And judging from the sounds of silence in too many corners, Minister Farrakhan's preachings of hatred are effective. Where are the responsible and respected leaders who can recognize a Hitler in any color, who can be most effective in calling bigotry when they hear it?

Much of what Mr. Farrakhan spews could be coming from under a pointed hood of white linen: "Jews know their wickedness. . . . Whenever you put a black man in office and he betrays the best interest of the people who put him there, take him out, and if he does not repent . . . we will tar and feather them, hang them by a limb, chop off their heads." According to columnist Courtland Milloy, "he even makes the audience laugh when he mocks the Holocaust."

There are people of good will who suggest that if the press just ignores this man and his messages, he will disappear. Yet without a single well-publicized advance word of Mr. Farrakhan's latest visit—just posters and the spoken word along the streets—10,000 people show up to hear and cheer. He is news. He also is free to say what he wants just as others are free to listen if they choose. But where are those who are free to refute hatred? What happens to a society that blesses bigotry with official silence?

[From the Washington Post, July 26, 1985]

WHY THE SILENCE ON FARRAKHAN?

[By Richard Cohen)

The other night, the Rev. Louis Farrakhan, head of the Nation of Islam and once a ubiquitous presence at Jesse Jackson campaign rallies, came to town. With little advance publicity, he was able to draw anywhere from 10,000 to 15,000 persons to the Washington Convention Center to say, in the manner of the late Mr. Hitler, that "Jews know their wickedness."

Farrakhan had other things to say. We are told he mocked the Holocaust. We are told that he said, "Blacks will not be controlled by Jews" and that he declared blacks the chosen people—"the people of God." We are told these things in a newspaper column by Courtland Milloy in The District Weekly—not in The Washington Post's news account of the same event. That story did not mention Farrakhan's anti-Semitic remarks at all.

A troubling thing has happened with Farrakhan. The man is no longer controversial, and what he says is no longer considered news. Where once he was dogged by reporters asking him to justify himself, now he can fill a hall in the nation's capital, rant racism and not even have it mentioned in news accounts of the speech. Farrakhan's anti-Semitism has become something like his bow tie—just another personal and maybe quirky characteristic.

It goes without saying that someone named Cohen is not going to change any minds about Farrakhan. But that hardly means that others are not welcome to try. I refer, in fact, to those black leaders and journalists who have, in their discomfort, ignored what Farrakhan preaches, preferring not to deal with either him or his message, reserving their moral outrage instead for Ronald Reagan and his appointees to the Justice Department. Presumably they think Farrakhan will, like demagogues before him, simply go away. So far, though, he has not. And so far the relative silence of the black leadership (some had condemned him) has neither dampened Farrakhan's popularity nor muted his message.

When it comes to Farrakhan, we are told that we ought to ignore the man and concentrate instead on his audience. They are the poor, the downtrodden, the alienated. True. But demagogues always preach to these people. The Klan is not composed of orthodontists, the lynch mob of the Old South was not usually composed of the town elite and the Germans Hitler preached to were not without their grievances. But when violence is finally committed by people full of hate, it hardly matters that they have other, genuine grievances. What matters is that the innocent get hurt for no good reason.

The true tragedy of Farrakhan is that he is a digression. He has no program to make life better for ghetto dwellers. They are hardly poor because of something Jews have done, and the crisis in the Middle East has nothing to do with the job situation in the United States. Zionism is hardly "an outgrowth of Jewish transgression," as Farrakhan says, but even if Israel were to disappear tomorrow, Harlem would still be a slum and poor black teen-age girls would still be having babies. The sacrifice of the scapegoat solves nothing.

Anyone who can pull an audience of 10,000 without the benefit of an electric guitar is worthy of some attention. Anyone who preaches hate to that many people ought to be answered. This is particularly the case with Farrakhan because he comes credentialed by his erstwhile affiliation with Jackson. Like a combination Ed McMahon and Al Capone, he both warmed up the audience and supplied the bouncers. For that reason and because of his formidable personality and charisma, the man should not be ignored. That would smack of acquiescence, agreement—the notion that tolerance and justice are a luxury that's too rich for poor people, especially poor black people. History teaches, though, that it's not wise to patronize a hater.

The new media and the individuals they cover become infatuated with their own sense of importance. They all tend to think that reality exists only on television or the newspapers—that trees that fall unrecorded by video tape make no noise. But Farrakhan makes plenty of noise. His voice is still heard. Unfortunately, sometimes it's the only voice heard.●

INSURANCE RESERVES

HON. CARROLL A. CAMPBELL, JR.

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues the following New York Times article entitled, "Another Challenge to Insurers: Predicting Loss Payouts."

As stated in the article, the property and casualty industry as a whole is underreserved.

Analysts * * * have said that of the nation's 110 largest casualty insurers 50 had reserves as much as 10 percent below what researchers considered adequate, while 36 were deemed to be in even worse shape.

I, along with some of my colleagues, are concerned about the adequacy of reserves, and the underlying causes of underreserving. Mr. Speaker, I hope the Members of this body will carefully consider the points raised in this article, along with the added complications of the burdensome qualified reserve account [QRA] provision contained in the President's tax reform proposal.

The article follows:

ANOTHER CHALLENGE TO INSURERS—PREDICTING LOSS PAYOUTS

(By Eric N. Berg)

Insurance companies that provide general liability coverage for business are just now recovering from debilitating price wars and a drop in investment income. But they cannot seem to shake another threat to their well-being: an inability to come even close to predicting payouts on policy claims.

Fireman's Fund, the insurance subsidiary of the American Express Company, for instance, said last week that it had beefed up its loss reserves by $187 million to pay unexpectedly large claims already made and anticipated. Fireman's Fund was but the latest insurer to bolster its reserves, which reduces profits.

However, rather than having the bad news out of the way, analysts say, most insurance companies still have too little in reserves and will have to make up the difference soon. They expect the property and casualty industry, whose 1,300 companies in aggregate lost $2.9 billion last year, according to the Insurance Services Office, to turn in another poor earnings year in 1985, as a result.

"Just about every big insurer has reserve strengthening to do," said Charles L. Rouff, senior vice president for property and casualty insurance at Fred S. James, a big insurance broker. That means new charges against earnings, he said.

"Much of the losses reported in the industry this year have been from reserve strengthening, and there will be a lot more of that," said David J. O'Leary, director of research at Fox-Pitt, Kelton Inc., a Hartford securities firm specializing in the insurance industry. "For some insurers, this will involve a manageable amount of money; for others it will be substantial."

Analysts at his firm have said that of the nation's 110 largest casualty insurers 50 had reserves as much as 10 percent below what researchers considered adequate, while 36 were deemed to be in even worse shape.

Success in the insurance field has always depended on accurately predicting risk. An insurer would price policies based on the historicaly determined likelihood of loss. And, at least in the case of coverage for individuals, insurers were quite good at forecasting payouts since most casualties, such as car accidents and fires in the home, occurred with measurable frequency.

But for business insurance—particularly general liability insurance, such as product and construction liability, directors' insurance, and malpractice for doctors and accountants—predicting losses has proved to be much more elusive. Not only are juries granting plaintiffs huge sums in liability cases far above what was envisioned when the policy was written, industry experts say, but also, in many cases, courts are creating new types of liability.

The most prominent examples involve asbestos, the Dalkon birth-control device, the chemical Agent Orange and the recent court decision in New Jersey that a host, such as a tavern owner, could be held liable for the negligence of a guest who was served too much liquor.

In another case, the United States Fidelity and Guaranty Company, a Baltimore insurer, was ordered to pay the bulk of a $17.6 million award in a Jackson Township, N.J., pollution case. Although the amount has since been reduced, the figure is still well above what U.S. Fidelity had anticipated. To say the least, court interpretations such as these have made estimating future losses that much more challenging.

"It is clearly becoming more and more difficult to price these sorts of risks," said Kalman J. Ketzlach, controller of the Prudential Property and Casualty Insurance Company. "The past was more stable than the present and certainly more stable than the future will likely be."

"Liability," added Charles T. Bell, the director of investor relations at the Aetna Life and Casualty Company, "has a constantly changing definition. That has made it very hard to keep up."

In fact, many of the nation's property and casualty insurers have not kept up—not, at least, if they are being graded by the adequacy of their reserves.

Aetna, for example, recently told Wall Street analysts that the property and casualty insurance business as a whole is 8 percent to 10 percent underreserved. What that means is that reserves would not be sufficient to meet a huge increase in claims. Insurers would then have a choice: replenish reserves, thus reducing profitability, or reduce net worth.

Indeed, some big insurers have already moved to bolster their reserve position by dipping into their net worth, or stockholders' equity. According to insurance experts, a number of companies have been quietly transferring money from their net worth accounts to their reserves, then replacing the transferred funds by tapping the capital markets.

LONG-LASTING CASES

Another of the difficulties in predicting future payouts on claims is that many cases drag on. Among the most commonly cited examples are those concerning Hurricane Alicia and a freeze that caused widespread property damage, not only to homes but to businesses, in the South.

Although the storm and the freeze both occurred in 1983, insurers say that damage claims are still coming in. "Sometimes you don't know for many years how much your true costs will be," said Mr. Bell of Aetna.

And some insurers say their biggest problem is not slim reserves but premuim rates that remain dangerously low.

Industry members are still recovering from a series of rate cuts between 1979 and 1984. Rates, in fact, have climbed sharply since the middle of last year. According to the Insurance Services Office, a trade group, property and casualty premiums rose 15 percent in the first quarter from the 1984 period.

But insurance analysts say that many companies continue to suffer losses in the underwriting side of their business. Few are willing to guess when the property and casualty industry as a whole might return to profitability.

"We will have to see another round of price increases before I can say the industry is at reasonable price levels," said David E. Ostwald, a spokesman for the group.

RIDING OUT THE STORM

HON. DENNIS M. HERTEL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HERTEL of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the record an article on the incredible success of a Michigan credit union, during the period of the Chrysler Corp. layoffs several years ago when that corporation was fighting for its very existence. The innovative thinking and personal sacrifice of a group of people, already faced with the tragedy of job loss and payless weeks, saved their credit union and allayed the fears of their constituents concerned about possible loss of their savings. It is a story, in my judgment, worthy of calling to the attention of my colleagues.

[From the Michigan League Contact Magazine, May/June 1985]

RIDING OUT THE STORM

(By NCUA Board and Don Johnson)

The early eighties rained a host of problems on ABD Federal Credit Union. But, like its members' embattled sponsor, it persevered to make an amazing comeback.

At the end of 1979, ABD Federal Credit Union of Warren had assets of nearly $14 million, a membership base of 16,500 people and loans outstanding of $12.7 million. To all appearances it was as solid a credit union as anyone could find, one of the largest in the Northeast Chapter—and the largest of the seven Detroit-area credit unions serving Chrysler employees.

Therein, however, lay the rub. Chrysler Corporation was in a crisis situation, confronting a staggering set of problems, losing sales and running up monumental losses. In the end only a special arrangement with the U.S. Government and drastic action by management and employees pulled Chrysler out of its crisis—and while it lasted, the credit unions serving Chrysler employees were caught up in the situation as much as the company was.

The comeback of Chrysler is one of the most publicized stories in American industrial history. Largely unpublicized, but no less remarkable is the tale of how Chrysler credit unions hung on and managed to preserve themselves for their members' benefit. ABD FCU is a case in point.

The statistics tell part of the story. Within two years, by the end of 1981, the credit union's assets had plummeted to $7.8 million, a loss of more than 40 percent. There were 5,000 fewer members, and they held $6.4 million in loans—25 percent of which were in one stage of delinquency or another.

Statistics tell part of the story—but not all. They explain the depth of the crisis ABD FCU faced, but they do not explain its recovery. On the face of it, there was a hopeless situation in the making; no credit union could be expected to sustain itself under such circumstances. The condition of ABD FCU was, as National Credit Union Administration Supervisory Examiner Jack Parker bluntly put it, "desperate."

But the situation, as it turned out, was not a hopeless one. Plain hard work by board and staff, a willingness to confront upleasant realities and an equal willingness to struggle on all fronts contributed to the recovery, and so did he assistance of the League and NCUA.

Anticipation of events was a major factor. Even in 1979 it was obvious to credit union officials that hard times were in the offing. Three-year projections had been developed, indicating that even in the worst-case situation (massive layoffs, delinquency, shrinkage, etc.) the credit union could survive.

"Title II of the Federal Credit Union Act," explains Parker, "allows NCUA to provide assistance to credit unions, but it must be given judiciously. A prerequisite is a realistic and workable recovery plan. ABD FCU had developed one by the time the crisis came upon it."

The plan was comprehensive. It called for staff reductions, a cutback in employee benefits, the closing of branch offices, streamlining of operations, elimination of official travel expenses and the institution of service charges.

"We didn't exactly start counting paper clips," recalls one ABD FCU official, "but if we had been convinced it would have helped, we would have done that, too."

Nothing in the plan, however, could deal with one aspect of the situation: The abnormal volume of loan losses, combined with a shrinkage in earnings that precluded dividends. But, in the conviction that the credit union could eventually put itself back on an even financial keel, the NCUA allowed ABD FCU to defer losses during 1980 and 1981—losses totaling $918,000.

It also approved the mergers of two other financially troubled credit unions into ABD FCU. It might appear to be a strange approach on the surface, a compounding of the problem—but it wasn't. The National Credit Union Share Insurance Fund guaranteed the assets of the merged credit unions, avoiding a further drain on ABD FCU's reserves. The additional members only served to broaden and solidify the credit union's base, rather than shake it.

"These actions were key to our survival," says ABD FCU General Manager James Carson. "They gave us time, which we would not have had without such moves. We had to revise our operations, implement a realistic collections program, develop responses to various possible conditions. We couldn't consider ourselves out of the woods until a significant proportion of our unemployed members were back at work—or had found other jobs."

In the end, of course, Chrysler did make a comeback, and many were recalled to work. Other members found new jobs. The credit union passed the crisis point. An indication of the speed and substances of the recovery emerges from a glance at the statistics on ABD FCU's amortization of its 1980 and 1981 deferred losses. The credit union took care of $24,000 of the total $918,000 during 1982; $420,000 during 1983; and finally, $474,000 in 1984.

By October of last year, ABD FCU was clear of those deferred losses, and the NCUA assigned it the EWS code "2"—a significant change from its previous status.

It was a smaller credit union than in 1979; 12,000 members held slightly in excess of $11 million in assets. But it had beat the odds and survived. The sacrifices and the risks had paid off. There were still problems, of course, and the effects of the crisis will be long in disappearing—but the lessons will linger too.

"Everyone at ABD FCU," says Treasurer Livio Ottino, "can be proud of the results we achieved, volunteers and professionals alike. But it's important to remember that we didn't do it alone. We had the understanding, the cooperation and the assistance of NCUA. We were particularly fortunate in having an exceptionally competent and experienced field staff in our NCUA region, and in the Detroit area. We had the advice of our League and we had the backing of our colleagues in other credit unions in the area.

"Cooperation can prevail over long odds. That's certainly the main lesson we've all learned or confirmed during this trying period. Our task now is to apply that lesson in the days ahead."●

THE MYTHS OF GUN CONTROL

HON. ALAN B. MOLLOHAN

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to insert in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article which appeared in the July 15 issue of the NRA-ILA's Monitor.

This interview with Prof. James Wright, director of the University of Massachusetts' Social and Demographic Research Institute, is especially revealing in light of the recently passed bill in the Senate, S. 49, the Firearms Owner's Protection Act. Professor Wright, who has been studying the gun control question to the exclusion of everything else for the past 7 years, began his research holding views on this issue similar to those exposused by members of the antigun lobby. However, after exhaustive research covering every facet of this controversial problem, Professor Wright has found simply no basis for many of the outdated contentions of the antigun forces.

Mr. Speaker, it is especially interesting to note that Professor Wright believes that the most harmful type of gun law would be that directed at banning or restricting the so-called Saturday night special—those handguns variously defined as cheap, short-barrelled, or snubbies. Professor Wright has found that any ban on those types of firearm could only cause criminals to substitute better, more lethal weapons in their place. Additionally, Professor Wright points out that the most significant finding of his research was how little a role the over-the-counter gun transaction plays in the illegitimate gun market.

And finally, Mr. Speaker, Professor Wright has found that State laws have absolutely no effect on criminal carrying patterns, that is, most gun control laws can only serve to restrict the law abiding in their effort to protect their homes and their families. As Professor Wright points out, Why would they—criminals—be sensitive to gun laws when they aren't sensitive to laws against homocide or robbery?

Mr. Speaker, I encourage my colleagues to take a minute and read the following article. I believe the article sheds an important light on this very controversial issue.

JAMES WRIGHT: 7 YEARS' RESEARCH BRINGS NEW VIEW OF GUN CONTROL

(By Denise Tray Rosson)

MONITOR. What prompted you to do this study?

WRIGHT. We had a previous project with the National Institute of Justice in which we undertook a comprehensive review of all of the relevant gun-related literature in the U.S. That literature review subsequently appeared in book form as Under the Gun. The principal point of doing that review was to give the NIJ some advice and ideas on a research project that could close some of the gaps in this area of knowledge. A large-scale detailed survey of the "bad guys" themselves, and the where, how and why they carry firearms was a study that, in our judgement, really needed to be done.

MONITOR. Is this the first study of its kind?

WRIGHT. Well there have been other large-scale studies of prisoners, but none has focused specifically on guns and other weapons and prisoners.

MONITOR. Are the felons you interviewed basically representative of America's criminal population?

WRIGHT. I hope that they are. I believe in my heart of hearts that these results tell us something very important about the hard-core predatory portion of the criminal population. We have no juveniles in this sample and the first-time offenders are underestimated. But I can say generally that these are the general types of guys who end up doing time in state prisons.

MONITOR. What were some of the most surprising things you learned from your survey?

WRIGHT. First and foremost, I was surprised by how little a role the over-the-counter gun transaction plays in the illegitimate gun market. Overwhelmingly, the criminal gun market is an information market involving swaps, and trades between associates, private parties, drug dealers and so on. I guess that really isn't that surprising in some respects, but at least it surprised me.

I was also surprised, given the research others have done, at the role stolen firearms appear to play in servicing the criminal handgun demand. The men in my sample, who had stolen guns, reported stealing them from private residences but also reported stealing them quite regularly from high-volume sources including manufacturers, gun shows, shippers and even the military.

I was also quite surprised in how little interest the sample showed in the junk handguns or so-called "Saturday Night Specials." By and large, the men in my sample—particularly the more hard-core predatory types—preferred to carry, and actually carried much better handgun equipment than I had been led to believe, based on other handgun studies. My guess is that approximately one in six of the most recent handguns owned by these men would qualify as a "Saturday Night Special." The remaining five out of six are much better quality equipment.

MONITOR. Different states have different gun laws. For example, the gun laws are much more strict in New York and Massachusetts as opposed to Arizona and Texas. Did you find any differences in criminal carrying patterns and attitudes according to the states in which they lived?

WRIGHT. Truthfully, our data are not adequate to answer that. But any suspicion is that state laws have absolutely no effect on criminal carrying patterns. We asked the felons questions like, 'Have you ever registered your gun or applied for a permit?' and the portion that said 'No.' was essentially the same in every state regardless of whether the state had laws requiring permits or registration. My educated guess is that state laws or differences in state laws probably have very little effect on the firearm behavior of these types of people. In all honesty, they are rather indifferent to law as a matter of course. So why would they be sensitive to gun laws when they aren't sensitive to laws against homicide or robbery?

MONITOR. What about the retail laws that legitimate gun dealers comply with—do these laws affect the small, informal criminal market you mentioned earlier?

WRIGHT. Who can say for sure? Looking at the things these men told me, it is certainly possible that the principal consequence of the Gun Control Act of 1968 was to drive these (criminals) out of the over-the-counter market and into an informal market.

MONITOR. Your data indicate that the fear of encountering armed citizens and the threat of harsher penalties for the criminal misuse of handguns are effective crime deterrents. What did your sample say on these topics?

WRIGHT. The vast majority of my sample told me very clearly that the prospect of running into an armed victim makes criminals very nervous. Some 75 percent of the sample agreed that one reason burglars avoid occupied residences is that they fear being shot in the process. I also get very strong majority agreement that the smart criminal always tries to find out if his victim is armed. Whether it deters them from committing crimes is obviously a much more complicated question, but it certainly makes them nervous as they go about their business.

Additionally, about another 40 percent of the sample said they had been shot at, driven off, wounded or captured at some point during their career by an armed victim. Another 40 percent confessed that there had been at least one point in their carrer when they had chosen not to commit a crime because they had reason to believe their intended victim was armed. So I think the general run of results suggests, yes, armed victims do prevent some crimes. Unfortunately, we don't have a lot of information on who these victims are.

MONITOR. What about mandatory penalties for criminal misuse of a firearm?

WRIGHT. We asked the men in our sample, who had never committed any firearm related crimes, "Why not?' The possibility of getting a stiffer sentence for using a firearm in crime figured very high in their reasoning. So from that, one could infer that, for at least some segment of the criminal population, the prospect of a stiffer sentence, be it mandatory or conventional judicial practice, was listed as an important reason. Obviously the hard-core criminals aren't affected. But the guys who aren't quite as hard-core, not quite so predatory, do seem to consider stiffer sentencing and report it as one very good reason not to carry.

MONITOR. What is your opinion of the argument on behalf of banning handguns from the private citizenry in order to reduce the number of guns and therefore crime?

WRIGHT. Well, we asked (the felons) to imagine a world where there were no handguns. Essentially three-fourths of the hard-core predators said that they would carry sawed-off shotguns and rifles. Now would they? Who knows? My sense is that the possibility is sufficiently real that I don't want to test it, because of the drastically increased lethality of sawed-off long guns.

In the limiting condition, the argument is well made. If there were absolutely no guns then there would be no guns to steal and none to use in crime. But we are not at that point in American history. There are 60 million handguns out there. Anything short of a house-to-house dragnet is not going to confiscate but a tiny fraction of them. And I would rather suspect our experience in attempting to ban handguns would be a repeat in our efforts during Prohibition. A complete ban on the legitimate manufacture, sale and possession would open up an enormously large and profitable market for organized crime. They showed us 50 years ago they could get into the booze business very quickly and make a hell of a lot of money on it. It is not that much more difficult to manufacture a serviceable handgun than to brew up a batch of gin. In the process, we would turn a lot of law-abiding citizens into criminals dealing in the black market.

Perhaps a national ban on handguns would reduce the handgun stock by some amount. But the people who would step forward and turn over their guns are the people we are not the least bit worried about. And, of course, the people that would be the last to come forward would be the people that we would like to disarm the most.

Even under the best of circumstances, we can only ban the manufacture and sale of handguns within the boundaries of the U.S. Other countries like Israel, Argentina, Brazil and Czechoslovakia would still make them, which means they could easily be smuggled in. So it is obvious there are severe limits on what we can do.

MONITOR. Based on your understanding of the criminal element, in general, what type of gun laws do you think would be most harmful/beneficial to society?

WRIGHT. As far as harmful, I think a ban on "Saturday Night Specials" would be very bad. Based on what these men have told me, I believe that if they were unable to get the small, cheap, junk handguns they would carry big, expensive handguns instead. And I am convinced, the bigger the gun the more powerful it is and the higher the death rate will be. I would hate to see us enact a piece of legislation that effectively required criminals to carry better, rather than worse, equipment.

For a variety of reasons I believe the mandatory sentences for the felonious use of firearms is probably advisable. I doubt if mandatory sentences have much effect on the hard-core predators, but they do serve to keep them off of the street for longer periods of time after they are caught. As far as criminals who don't use guns in crime, the mandatory penalties serve as incentives for keeping it that way, according to the survey.

I would also support legislation that would make it a felony offense to steal a firearm from a private residence, a gun dealer or wherever. Right now the theft of a gun is treated no more seriously than the theft of any other object of equivalent value.

I also would like to see firearm manufacturers, the NRA, and local police officers offer more education courses on the problem of firearm theft and bring to light some ways to prevent or at least make it more difficult to steal them by various storing methods.

MONITOR. You have been studying this problem for a long time. Have your feelings on the issue changed and do you see a viable resolution to the gun control controversy?

WRIGHT. I have been studying this issue, to the exclusion of everything else, for seven years. When I started I was of the standard opinion that if we had fewer guns we would have a better society. And I must say today that I am not at all sure that is the case. My own personal feelings about the gun control issue at this point in my life are filled with ambiguity. On one hand, I would like to see less crime and violence, and on the other hand I am not sure that the way to go about that is through the gun side of the issue. I am filled with deep ambiguity about the direction American policy should take towards firearms.

I do know there are literally tens of millions of households out there that own guns for perfectly legitimate reasons. These people constitute absolutely no threat to the social fabric of this country. I think they resent, rightfully, being implicated in the modern day crime problem. And whatever we do, we ought to guarantee people of this sort the right to own and keep firearms as they wish.●

TRIBUTE TO BERNARD D. GOLDSTEIN, M.D.

HON. JAMES H. SCHEUER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SCHEUER. Mr. Speaker, as Bernard Goldstein is about to leave EPA after 2 years of dedicated public service as Assistant Administrator for Research and Development, I would like to take a moment and pay tribute to Dr. Goldstein and some of his many accomplishments.

When Dr. Goldstein arrived at EPA the agency was reeling from a series of scandals that cast serious doubts as to the quality of the science it produced and left the morale of its employees in tatters.

The Office of Research and Development was quite literally decimated by massive budget cuts, departures of many of its most talented scientists and an atmosphere of fear and repression.

To address these problems and restore credibility to the EPA R&D Program, Bill Ruckelhaus lured Bernard Goldstein out of a prestigious academic position at Rutgers University.

As events demonstrated, Mr. Ruckelhaus made the right choice.

Since Dr. Goldstein became Assistant Administrator 2 years ago, the quality and timeliness of data used as the basis for EPA regulations have dramatically increased.

More importantly, the American people now have a renewed faith that EPA's research program is being conducted in the public interest, not in the interest of polluters.

Through his personal efforts in the scientific community, Dr. Goldstein has been able to stem the departures of skilled personnel, recruit outstanding scientists, and restore much needed morale to the Office of Research and Development.

Dr. Goldstein contributed significantly to the increased acceptability of risk assessment as a valuable decisionmaking tool.

He promoted an agencywide approach that differentiated risk assesment from risk management.

He also strengthened the consistency of the risk assessment process across EPA's regulatory offices by promulgating a series of guidelines which provides a clear and concise process for determining the risk from exposure to environmental pollutants.

Dr. Goldstein also labored long and well to fashion a personnel structure that promotes quality science.

In addition to attracting highly respected scientists to EPA's research program, he afforded greater recognition to meritorious laboratory and headquarters staff.

He also strengthened the career ladder concept which permits scientists to be promoted on the basis of superior research performance rather than on the assumption of supervisory responsibilities.

Dr. Goldstein initiated a Distinguished Visiting Scientist Program which bring academic scientists of national reputation to EPA's research laboratories.

Dr. Goldstein has achieved all of these things with a style, wit, and unpretentious manner that are as refreshing among high officials as they are uncommon.

His frankness and willingness to address controversial issues have earned him respect and admiration.

Dr. Goldstein's energy, enthusiasm, and commitment to the public interest evoke an image of a model public servant which has sadly all but disappeared from Government in the last several years.

We will miss Bernard Goldstein in public service, but look forward to his many years of continuing service as a strong voice for quality environmental research.●

DR. HENRY KISSINGER'S PERSPECTIVE ANALYSIS OF THE ADMINISTRATION'S CURRENT MIDDLE EAST POLICY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, for some time both in public hearings of the Subcommittee on Europe and the Middle East and in private conversations, I have maintained that the so-called peace process in the Middle East is ill-timed. I was delighted to find that our former Secretary of State, Dr. Henry Kissinger, takes the same view.

I would like to share with my colleagues his extraordinarily thoughtful and perspective analysis of the administration's current Middle East policy.

The article follows:

LEAPING (SO SOON) INTO THE MIDDLE EAST

(By Henry A. Kissinger)

The Reagan administration seems bent on launching itself once again into the so-called Middle East "peace process" less than two years after the collapse of its previous effort and only a few weeks after the hostage crisis in Beirut. Those events should supply a warning to look—and think—before taking the leap.

The premises of the imminent peace offensive appear to be as follows: The main obstacle to peace in the Middle East has been the inability to engage the Palestinians as represented by the Palestine Liberation Organization—the PLO—in the peace process, due to the refusal of the PLO and Israel to deal with each other. Hence the search for some formula that will lure the PLO into recognizing Israel by the prospect of talks with the United States, while easing Israel's fear of an imposed peace by the prospect of direct negotiations between Israel and the Arabs.

In the most recent expression of this theroy King Hussein of Jordan has asserted, without contradiction from the PLO, that Yasser Arafat, its leader, is prepared to accept the relevant U.N. resolutions, especially Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. Since these resolutions presume the legitimacy of the state of Israel, Arafat is thus alleged to have met the preconditions of the 1975 U.S. understanding with Israel not to negotiate with the PLO until it recognized Israel. As another means to get around Israel's refusal to deal with the PLO, the king has proposed—and Israel and the United States seem to have accepted—the creation of a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation whose Palestinian component would be composed of individuals not technically members of the PLO but necessarily acceptable to it. This delegation would have at least one preliminary meeting with high U.S. officials, in all likelihood with Assistant Secretary of State Richard W. Murphy. All this is supposed to culminate in direct talks between the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation and Israel on the future of the West Bank. The end of the process foresees a Palestinian political unit on the West Bank loosely confederated with Jordan.

However, the key test of this minuet is not so much how to start negotiations as to define their objective. So far the chief actors have obscured their conflicting purposes by a fog of imprecisions. King Hussein, the most clearsighted of the principals, rightly perceives that he needs Palestinian support for the concessions without which Israel will not give up even part of the West Bank. But, as the target of several assassination attempts by the PLO, he knows that beyond the issue of the role of the PLO in negotiations looms the issue of the role of the PLO on the West Bank. He must aim for effective control of those portions of the West Bank he recovers; in other words, he must at some point seek to subdue the PLO.

As for the PLO, its objective is exactly the opposite. Once it is introduced into the negotiations, however convoluted the procedure, its goal must be ultimate sovereignty over at least the West Bank. Until now, the PLO has been reluctant to accept even this limited objective, because in its view the state of Israel, whatever its eastern borders, is located on the territory that at one time was home for most of the PLO's members or at least of their ancestors.

PLO leaders may be willing to muffle their ultimate objective of full sovereignty until the goal of American recognition has been harvested. But if they seriously pursue reconciliation with Israel, and a secondary role within Jordan, they may find themselves without followers.

The divided Israeli government, obsessed with politics, beset with domestic unrest and an unprecedented economic mess, would like the issue of negotiations to go away. Since that will not happen, it hides behind procedure so as to defer substance until after a new election or a change of government.

The American administration is divided between a top leadership eager to limit America's role to the promotion of direct negotiations and a bureaucracy determined to nudge these negotiations in the direction of its standard solution: the 1967 borders with minor modifications; a Palestinian entity that, however it starts, must wind up with sovereign attributes for the PLO; and some sort of neutral status for the old city of Jerusalem.

Given this plethora of views, deadlock is virtually guaranteed by the very expedient that is supposed to unlock the peace process: the Jordanian-Palestinian delegation composed of Palestinians acceptable to the PLO but not members of it. Whom and what precisely would such a group represent? why should it meet first and separately with a senior American official? How could its members be acceptable to both Israel and the PLO? The projected peace process in fact bids fair to produce a threefold split among the Palestinians: those who take their lead from Syria and refuse to recognize Israel; those who recognize Israel primarily to be accepted by the United States but who will resume the struggle at the earliest opportunity, and a minority sincerely interested in accommodation—whatever sincerity means on the shifting sands of Middle East allegiances.

Direct negotiations between the parties cannot possibly reconcile these differences, for the known positions are at bottom irreconcilable. Jordan requires the 1967 frontiers with "minor" modifications and a sovereign position in Jerusalem. I know of no Israeli government that would consider such terms or PLO rule over whatever is to be given up on the West Bank even—perhaps especially—after an election.

If there are to be significant changes in these positions, they must be extracted by a major engagement—and, let us be frank, pressure—by the United States on one or probably both sides. It has ever been thus—even in the negotiations between Egypt and Israel. And Egypt, as the largest and geographically most remote Arab country dealing with a territory to which Israel had little historical and emotional attachment, was in a much stronger position to be flexible than is little Jordan adjoining better armed and hostile neighbors and contesting a land to which Israelis attach Biblical significance.

The absolute maximum attainable—even with all-out U.S. engagement—would be akin to the plan put forward by the late Israeli foreign minister, Yigal Allon. It would retain key strategic West Bank areas for Israel, return populated areas to Arab control and perhaps create a kind of Vatican status for some Arab and Christian holy places in an undivided Jerusalem. (The last point was not part of the Allon plan.)

The projected peace process can succeed only if the United States is prepared to use all its influence to press both sides. If the United States is not fully committed to such a role, the negotiations will fail; Hussein, like Lebanese President Amin Gemayel, may be undermined by the peace process; American influence in the Middle East will be further weakened, and the whole area will have been thrown into turmoil. Those in the U.S. government—and it is my impression that they are the top officials—who seek to limit its role to merely bringing the parties together should ask themselves whether starting an uncertain and difficult "process" is worth such risks.

Negotiations, moreover, never occur in a political vacuum, especially in the Middle East. Historically, progress in Middle East negotiations has emerged from three factors; an Israel powerful enough to stand against any combination of Arab states; some evidence that radical Arab rhetoric and Soviet support are impotent; and a purposeful American policy that enables moderate Arab states to justify cooperation with America as indispensable to achieving at least some Arab objectives.

None of these conditions exists today. Israel is more divided than at any period in its history. Its unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon, its release of 1,000 convicted terrorists in exchange for only three prisoners of war, and its panicky ambivalence during the Beirut hostage crisis must have strengthened the hand of those radical Arabs who argue that in the end Israel will yield to pain if persistently administered.

As for America, one need only compare the original Reagan plan of 1982 with the final results in Lebanon and the West Bank to see the decline of its influence. Throughout 1983 the United States strove to expel Syria from Lebanon and to unify that country under Christian dominance. Less than two years later the United States required the assistance of Syria to extract 40 hijacked American hostages held by one of the many Moslem factions in a known location in Beirut. The decision-makers in the area judge America by its actions, not its assertions; they note the failure to retaliate for the murder of 240 Marines and the hijacking of 40 innocent hostages. It would be self-delusion to deny the growing perception that America may lack the means or the will to achieve its designs.

The confluence of these factors has defined Syria's growing role in the Mideast. The United States should have learned that excluding the tough, ruthless Syrians guarantees a major confrontation, which will be conducted by Damascus with characteristic guile and persistence. Before launching a new set of negotiations, an exploration of Syrian views would seem essential. And, if these views are rejected, the United States must be willing to devote the energy and resources to prevail in the resulting showdown. If the United States is not to demoralize its allies and undermine irretrievably the position of its Arab friends, it must clearly define its objectives before it commits itself.

Even then, the price of success will be tension with Israel, confrontation with Syria and constant uneasiness in Jordan. If the United States is not willing to pay that price, it would be reckless to launch a process on the basis of platitudes about "creating momentum" and "beginning exploration" put forward by a bureaucracy ingenious in devising formulas but rarely willing to face their consequences.●

NATIONAL TAX STUDY BRINGS DARK NEWS FOR WISCONSIN TAXPAYERS

HON. F. JAMES SENSENBRENNER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SENSENBRENNER. Mr. Speaker, a recently released study by the Advisory Commission on Intergovernmental Relations [ACIR] holds some disturbing data on the economy of a number of States, including my State of Wisconsin. The study, entitled "Tax Capacity of the Fifty States," is a yardstick for measuring the tax capacity of each of the 50 State-local fiscal systems. The study provides a measure of the abilities of the States to raise tax revenues. It also measures tax effort on actual tax productivity in relation to a State's tax capacity.

The tax capacity measure pertains only to the level of economic resources in my State, resources that by common practice may be said to be potentially taxable. This method provides a sophisticated, yet understandable approach to measuring State and local fiscal capacity.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the results of this study provides a detailed nonbiased evaluation of where Wisconsin stands in relation to the Nation in its ability to tax and be taxed. The study found that the Great Lakes States are a region in severe fiscal decline. Since 1979, Wisconsin has marked a deep decline in its tax capacity or ability to pay. If, Mr. Speaker, Wisconsin's ability to be taxed was declining at the same rate taxes were on the decline, I would not have found the results so devastating. But this has not been the case.

The tax effort index was constructed to determine the amount of tax each State actually collects. The tax effort index is constructed first by dividing actual revenues by the tax capacity of each State, and then multiplying by 100. This formula will show that the State of Wisconsin, compared to all others, is above average in the extent to which it exploits its particular tax base. The study determined that Wisconsin ranked 5th in tax effort per capita, whereas it only ranks 38th in tax capacity or ability to pay.

Under the study, a general taxpayer in Wisconsin is taxed $1,230 per capita, as opposed to the general taxpayer's true ability to pay, which is only $964.30. Some specific example in the area of Wisconsin personal income taxes show per capita taxes are $354.14, while the true ability to pay is only $192.66. Property taxes is another concern where the yearly taxes per capita are $435.80, whereas property taxpayers ability to pay is only $318.92.

The results are of serious concern to me. At a time when Wisconsin is attempting to increase it's economic base, it clearly shows that overtaxation is disturbing the economic ebb and flow of the State to the point where there is an economic flow in only one direction: out of the State.

I contacted the ACIR to secure updated 1983 tax figures, and, Mr. Speaker, these numbers only underscore this dangerous trend. The 1983 preliminary data shows the per capita capacity for personal income taxes is $195.76, as opposed to $364.99 in revenue effort. Total property taxes show capacity at $359.04, as opposed to revenue per capita of $536.36. General sales taxes in Wisconsin have a tax capacity of $237.49 versus $254.57 in tax revenue.

At a time in our country's history when the Federal Government and almost all State and local governments are reviewing their tax structures with hopes of reducing the tax burdens of their citizens, I find these numbers not only disturbing but frankly inexcusable.

Mr. Speaker, I have supplied two tables which express my concern for our State's future. Table I indicates total taxes and tax capacities for all States in 1982 to serve as a yardstick as to where Wisconsin stands. Table II lists by tax Wisconsin's ability to pay versus actual taxes levied.

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF HELSINKI ACCORDS

SPEECH OF

HON. THOMAS J. BLILEY, JR.

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. BLILEY. Mr. Speaker, it is with a strong feeling of disappointment that I rise to take part in this commemoration of the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act.

This document was negotiated in good faith by the United States and the democratic nations of Europe with the expectation that the totalitarian regimes that dominate so much of Europe would also negotiate in good faith. Sadly, this has proven to be an erroneous assumption.

The West recognized that the concessions it was making on international borders would be used by the Soviet Union to legitimize and solidify its claim to a sphere of influence that would be sacrosanct and that would be tantamount to recognition of Soviet domination of the people and the nations of Eastern Europe. We recognized this fact and yet we proceeded because many people felt that the human rights language calling for free emigration, open borders, freedom of religion, and freedom of information flow were even more important than a tacit endorsement of the current political situation in Eastern Europe.

Now, 10 years later, it is perfectly clear to even the most ardent advocate of détente that the Soviet Union and its puppets in Poland, East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Rumania did not negotiate in truth or in good faith. This is evident because the Soviet Union and its subordinate states do not observe the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act.

The Soviet Union flaunts its deception as it denies that Helsinki even had anything to do with human rights. As such, everyday that goes by is a black day for the prospects of peace and freedom. This is because everyday that goes by means one more day in prison, in the gulag, or in a mental hospital for the people inside the Soviet Empire who dared to believe their Soviet rulers and set up Helsinki Watch Committees. We do not hear from these people anymore. This is not only complete confirmation of Soviet violations of freedom of movement and information; it is also complete confirmation that the Soviet Union has not changed its policies since Stalin, that dissent will not be tolerated and that any questioning of the government will be treated as a crime against the state.

We have a most instructive lesson in how the Soviet Union negotiates and uses the good will and faith of the West against us. What stronger lesson could we ever be taught about how the Soviet Union honors its pledges than the Helsinki Final Act? How can we possibly continue to deceive ourselves on the good faith of the Soviet Union in arms control negotiations when that government defies peace each day with its refusal to honor its word at Helsinki?

A short list of Soviet compliance measures may prove instructive to anyone who still is in doubt?

First: Freedom of religion is guaranteed by Helsinki. Ever since 1980, the Soviet Union has conducted what has been called the "Brezhnev Pogrom" against Jews. By 1984, this resulted in the banning of the teaching of Hebrew. That doesn't sound like freedom of religion to me.

Second: Freedom of emigration is guaranteed by Helsinki. In 1979, more than 50,000 Jews were allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union. In 1984, the total number was less than 1,000. With a list of visa applications that exceeds 200,000, that doesn't look like freedom of emigration to me.

Third: Freedom of communication is guaranteed by Helsinki. I have adopted a refusenik family in Moscow and I have written to them with no response. I cannot even find out whether they received my correspondence. This doesn't sound like freedom of communication to me.

So here we are, 10 years later, on the floor of the House of Representatives, reporting the sad and depressing lack of honor in the Soviet Government. Mr. Speaker, I have no soothing words to say to the prisoners of the Soviet Union and their family members in the West about how negotiations with the Soviets will guarantee their liberty. We have been led down that road too many times and too many miles to be fooled any longer. It is time for the Soviet Union to prove its respect for humanity to the rest of the world. They have been given this opportunity before and have been found wanting. It is now up to them; not to us. This Nation should not deal with the Soviet Union until clear and concrete improvements are made in the attitudes and actions of the Soviet Union toward the Helsinki Final Act which they negotiated, signed and pledged to abide by 10 long years ago.●

THE HELSINKI FINAL ACT

SPEECH OF

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, in just 2 days, on August 1, the world will observe an important anniversary. That date will mark the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, an accord which calls for universal adherence to a widely accepted code of fundamental human rights.

As we approach this anniversary, it is a tragedy that despite the noble aims embodied in the Final Act's solemn pledges, the global assault on human rights continues. Sad evidence of this assault abounds: The harsh repression of dissidents and refuseniks in the Soviet Union; the savage indiscrimination between combatants and noncombatants in the Iran-Iraq war; the inability of workers to organize and freely express their views in Poland; the use of violence and terror to prop up a racist regime in South Africa; the practice of torture in nearly 100 countries. This list goes on and reminds us of our ever-pressing responsibility to promote global respect for human rights.

It is especially disturbing that on the 10th anniversary of the Final Act's ratification, the Soviet Union, one of its major signatories, continues to violate some of the accord's most fundamental terms. In compiling its dismal record on human rights, the Soviet Union has committed a long list of deplorable offenses; but its shameful mistreatment of Soviet Jews and the plight of Nobel laureate Andrei Sakharov immediately come to mind. During the past 5 years, the number of exit visas granted Soviet Jews has plummeted, while arrests and trials of Jewish activists and refuseniks has increased markedly. And over the same period, the fate of Sakharov has rested under constant question, as he and Yelena Bonner remain confined to internal exile in the city of Gorky.

The need for such abuses to come to an end should not be underestimated. In this age of superpower rivalry, when the world is haunted by the nuclear menace, any impediment to increased mutual understanding must be eliminated. The Soviet Union must cease its incessant trampling of human rights if a more stable peace, which is in the interest of us all, is to be established.

So Mr. Speaker, August 1 should stand not so much as a date of celebration, but as a date on which we must reaffirm our commitment to the promotion of human rights. The world is a better place for the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, but that event underscores the great weight of our responsibilities and the huge magnitude of the task which lies ahead.●

COMPARATIVE TRENDS IN WORLD WHEAT PRICES

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, recently I had the opportunity to review an article entitled "Comparative Trends in World Wheat Prices—1980 to 1984," written by Todd Darr, one of my constituents.

This article, which will appear in a fall issue of the Monthly Labor Review, examines the United States and some of its major competitors for the world wheat market and discusses wheat prices, grading systems, et cetera, and their impact on the United States' standing in the international market for wheat.

Although I have shared a copy of this study with the chairman and ranking minority member of the House Agriculture Committee, I feel it is worthwhile reading for all Members of the House of Representatives in preparation for consideration of the 1985 farm bill. If you would like to review a copy of this report, please contact my office. The basic findings of the study are noted in the abstract reprinted below.

COMPARATIVE TRENDS IN WORLD WHEAT PRICES—1980 TO 1984

(By Todd Darr and Gerry Gribbons)

ABSTRACT

Argentinian prices for its exports of hard winter wheat have declined at a rate of 4.3 percent relative to U.S. prices over the five year period, 1980 to 1984. Likewise, Canadian prices for hard spring wheat exports from the port of Thunder Bay showed a rate of decline of 2.0 percent relative to U.S. hard spring prices. Prices for Australian white wheat trend well above U.S. prices for U.S. white wheat. An analysis of the other major U.S. competitor in the world wheat market, the European Community, could not be carried out because of the lack of an appropriate price series, but available information suggests that the policy of export subsidization has allowed the Community to lower prices to or below U.S. levels.

The decline in prices relative to the United States corresponds with substantial gains in the market shares of Argentina, Canada, and the European Community in the 1980 to 1984 period. The U.S. share of world trade in wheat has declined by 5.6 percent in that period. Major markets in which the U.S. has lost shares or gained very little in the last five years include the Soviet Union, South America, Europe, and the Middle East. Price is only one variable affecting this change in market shares. U.S. policy and aggressive marketing strategies followed by the major wheat exporters which include promotional efforts through grading systems, special credit arrangements, and trade agreements were not analyzed empirically but also have worked in concert with price to determine the standing of the U.S. in the international market for wheat. ●

A TRIBUTE TO DREW KARPINSKI

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to acknowledge professionalism of the highest degree. I rise to bring to the attention of all of my fellow Members of Congress the accomplishments of a constituent of mine, Mr. Drew Karpinski, of Mendham, NJ.

Earlier this month, Mr. Karpinski completed his term as president of the Professional Insurance Agents of New Jersey, and he finished with such a long list of accomplishments that his peers named him the "Agent of the Year." This is only the third time in the history of the organization that this award has been bestowed upon a president leaving office.

Recognition by one's peers is the highest mark of accomplishment. It is recognition by professionals who know the meaning of excellence. It is recognition by those individuals who know, from their own personal experience, just what it takes to get a job done, and, more importantly, what it takes to reach the top.

Drew Karpinski is deserving of this recognition. Because of his efforts, the Professional Insurance Agents of New Jersey have risen to new heights within their industry. Because of Drew Karpinski's vision and understanding of the changing environment within his industry, the educational programs, the membership programs, and the legislative action program of the association are now second to none.

Under Drew's leadership, the association looked not only to help itself and its own members, it also looked upon the quality of life around the association and ventured to improve that quality. The Professional Insurance Agent's involvement in the Special Olympics Program is worthy of the applause of each and every Member of Congress.

I am lucky to have a constituent like Drew Karpinski. Having people in one's district like Drew helps to improve the district. Their enthusiasm, their pride and their abilities are contagious. Those qualities spread, and make the district a better place in which to live.

Mr. Speaker, I thank you for the time to acknowledge Drew Karpinski's accomplishments. ●

HELSINKI: TEN YEARS AFTER

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation and Europe. There are a number of pros and cons regarding the Helsinki accords, but I believe that on balance, they have proven to be useful in making the world more aware of the human rights abuses suffered by so many individuals in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union.

I have been fortunate enough to be a member of the House delegation to the North Atlantic Assembly, and more recently was afforded the honor of becoming the chairman of that body's civilian affairs committee. My work as a member of the civilian affairs committee has given me a great deal of exposure to the problems of East-West relations, particularly regarding human rights. If the Helsinki accords have done nothing else, they have at least served to further unify Atlantic Alliance nations in their fight against these abuses.

I am submitting for my colleagues perusal two articles from today's New York Times on the Helsinki accords by Stephen Larrabee, a former member of the National Security Council and by Jeri Laber, the executive director of Helsinki Watch.

To Many, Helsinki Means Hope

(By Jeri Laber)

Critics of the Helsinki process, who see it as a cynical charade enacted at the expense of human rights in the Eastern bloc, would like to see the United States nullify the accords. This would be a grave mistake.

It is true that the accords have been violated, almost from the moment they were signed. It is also true that the human rights situation in several Warsaw Pact countries is much worse today than it was 10 years ago. Repression has been brutal, blatant and often in arrogant defiance of Helsinki meetings in progress at the time. But these abuses, distressing as they are, make it all the more imperative that the Helsinki process continue. It is, after all, the only official East-West forum at which human rights violations are discussed.

Beyond this, and still more significant, the accords have provided a rallying point for people struggling for freedom and peace in the signatory countries. They have done so by encouraging private citizens in all European countries to "know and act upon their rights" by monitoring their own governments' behavior.

True, many of the citizens who took up this challenge soon became victims themselves. More than 50 Helsinki monitors in the Soviet Union are in prison or internal exile; others have been intimidated into silence or forced to emigrate. In Czechoslovakia, the authorities continue to persecute the more than 1,000 people who signed Charter 77 upholding Helsinki principles. The Polish Helsinki Committee, which operated openly during the Solidarity period, has been forced underground. A group that attempted to form in Rumania was snuffed out before it even began.

Nor is repression confined to the Warsaw Pact countries. In Turkey, 23 members of the executive committee of the Turkish Peace Association have been sentenced to eight years in prison.

Nevertheless, despite all this, courageous individuals continue to speak out, keeping the record and bearing witness to the sufferings of others. As recently as March, a group of Charter 77 signatories issued an appeal citing the Helsinki standards. Meanwhile, they and other human rights activists throughout the repressive countries of Europe continue to address their reports and appeals to the Helsinki forum. I have seen the Helsinki spirit at work in meetings with activists in Moscow, Prague, Warsaw, Budapest, Bucharest, Belgrade and Istanbul. Voices may lower but eyes light up when the word "Helsinki" is mentioned. To these people, "Helsinki" means hope.

If the United States were to pull out of the Helsinki process, this country would be abandoning these people and others like them who put their faith in the accords, sacrificing their freedom and sometimes their lives. We would also be squandering the moral force that the Helsinki accords have acquired as a result of those sacrifices. For the Russians, our withdrawal would be an ideological victory—a victory they in no way deserve.

Some Gains for the West

(By F. Stephen Larrabee)

When the Helsinki Final Act was signed 10 years ago today, it was heavily criticized in some circles in the West as a sellout and a Soviet victory. Such charges are as groundless today as they were then. Indeed, a decade later, many Soviet officials undoubtedly regret that Moscow ever signed the agreement.

The Russians' main gain—the one most vociferously denounced by Western critics—was the formal ratification of the postwar status quo in Europe. In fact, however, the postwar borders had been observed and implicitly accepted by the West for nearly two decades. They had also been explicitly acknowledged in the eastern treaties signed by West Germany and its eastern neighbors in the early 1970's. Thus, the West "gave away" nothing at Helsinki that had not already been agreed to and accepted. Moreover, in calling the frontiers 'inviolable" instead of "unchangeable," as the Soviet Union originally wanted, the Final Act preserved the possibility of a peaceful change of the borders at a later date—and thus kept open the theoretical possibility of German reunification.

In return, the West got the Soviet Union to agree that human rights and other humanitarian concerns were an important component of East-West security. To be sure, the Soviet record of compliance on humanitarian issues has left much to be desired. But the very fact that Moscow signed the agreement has given the West an important diplomatic means by which to hold Moscow accountable for its actions. It provided a mutually agreed upon yardstick for measuring compliance and put Moscow on the defensive diplomatically.

Even on human rights, however, the record has not been entirely negative. On some issues, such as reunification of families and working conditions for journalists, there has been important progress. Moreover, in contrast to the Soviet Union, the compliance record in some East European countries, such has Hungary, has been quite good. In short, the Iron Curtain has not come down, but it has become more porous.

There have also been modest improvements on military matters. The Final Act contained provisions for a number of voluntary confidence-building measures—such as prior notification of troop movements and the sending of observers to maneuvers—designed to reduce the danger of surprise attack and diminish the prospects that a conflict would arise out of accident or miscalculation. Compliance by the Soviet Union and its allies has been less than perfect, but on the whole the act has led to more openness and predictability in military activities—two of its primary goals. Moreover, the agreement prepared the way for a set of more stringent and politically binding measures, now being negotiated in Stockholm.

On the economic level, a visible increase in East-West trade and investment has contributed in small but important ways to opening up the countries of the Eastern bloc. This interaction has not, however, proved to be the economic bonanza that Moscow anticipated. On the contrary, East-West trade has actually declined since 1980 as a result of the debt problems in Eastern Europe and the recession in the West.

Finally, the Helsinki experience has had a unifying effect within the Western alliance, leading to improved policy coordination and a greater say for the Western Europeans in allied consultative bodies. It has forged a new sense of cohesion and unity among the smaller, neutral countries of Europe and given them a forum for articulating their security concerns. It has meant new room to maneuver for the more independent Warsaw Pact countries like Rumania and strengthened the constraints against intervention by other pact members.

In short, the balance is far from negative. Rather than renouncing the agreement, as some critics demand, the United States should build on what has already been achieved and continue to press for improvements in those areas where compliance has been faulty.●

THE LESSONS OF HELSINKI

HON. STEVE GUNDERSON

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GUNDERSON. Mr. Speaker, a pall hangs over the gathering that is now taking place in Helsinki marking the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords. Contributing to that pall is the experience of 51 members of the Moscow Helsinki group or its affiliates who have been incarcerated in prisons, labor camps, psychiatric hospitals, or who are serving terms of exile. The hope and promise resulting from the signing of the accords on August 1, 1975, have been nearly dashed as the number of Soviet Jews allowed to emigrate has dropped from 51,000 in 1979 to 896 in 1984. As Andrei Sakharov approaches his 50 year of internal exile in Gorky, without trial or sentence, it is certainly difficult to muster much of a cheer for the anniversary of the accords.

But I contend that the lesson of Helsinki is not that the United States should forsake future negotiations and agreements with the Soviets and other Eastern bloc nations. The dismal record of Helsinki is not reason for us to throw up our arms and surrender to the temptation to never again risk signing an agreement that may not be honored by our adversaries.

The continued threats to human rights and dignity, as well as the potential for worldwide nuclear anihilation demands that we continue to strive toward improved levels of international understanding and cooperation. The untiring energy of individuals like Avital Shcharansky who refuses to halt her efforts to free her husband, Anatoly, from the Gulag to which Soviet authorities consigned him 7 years ago, demands that we work even harder to find a way to bring and end to the conflict and human suffering that plagues our world. The hopes and dreams of our children and our grandchildren demand that we learn from our mistakes and the mistakes of our adversaries, and continue the difficult march toward agreement and cooperation.

The Helsinki accords may have proved a disappointment, but they cannot be considered a failure. As long as we take the lessons of Helsinki with us the next time we pull our chairs up to the negotiating table, we will be one step closer to the realization of positive and meaningful agreements.

What are some of the specific lessons to be gleaned from the Helsinki experience, as well as from our experience with other agreements with the Soviets?

First, above all else, the Helsinki accords made the Soviet bloc's commitment to human rights, previously regarded by bloc countries strictly as their internal affair, open to international review and comment. It would have been preferable if the Soviet bloc adhered to both the spirit and letter of the accord, provisions, but the importance and value of publicizing violations should not be underestimated. By focusing attention on violations, we can ensure that important issues such as fundamental freedoms and human rights are never removed from the international agenda.

Second, while the United States should continue to strive to reach improved levels of understanding with the Soviets, violations of past accords drive home the fact that when negotiating and signing future agreements we must never allow our security or well-being to be dependent upon the supposed good will or trust of the Soviets. Agreements must be either verifiable, or of a nature such that violations would not threaten American security or safety. Soviet willingness to violate agreements must not preclude our willingness to undertake negotiations—it does however, demand our recognition of this reality.

Third, America must never view any agreement, treaty, or accord as a final solution to the problems confronting the world, but as valuable tools for the focusing of attention on critical issues and for helping nations move further away from potential conflict and war. Agreements are part of a process; they are rarely a final solution. To view them as a solution only opens the door to disillusionment and disappointment.

There are obviously other lessons that could be learned from Helsinki. But let us recognize, not dwell upon, the disappointments of the past 10 years. Let us learn from Helsinki, reaffirm our dedication to peace, and resolve to continue working toward international understanding, cooperation and human rights.●

HISTORY OF U.S. VIRGIN ISLANDS

HON. RON de LUGO

OF THE VIRGIN ISLANDS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DE LUGO. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 35th anniversary of the opening of the first radio station in the U.S. Virgin Islands and how this event is being celebrated gives me an opportunity to share with my colleagues in the House some of the fascinating history of the U.S. Virgin Islands.

The history of our special relationship with the United States began on March 31, 1917. At 3 in the afternoon on that date, official representatives of President Woodrow Wilson and King Christian X of Denmark met in St. Thomas to formalize the transfer of the Virgin Islands from Denmark to the United States.

The year 1917 was a transition year, not only for the U.S. Virgin Islands, but for the world as well. It marked the end of what in retrospect is seen as the age of victorian genteel innocence, and the beginning of the 20th century, the age of technology, rapid social change, incredible scientific advances, and sadly, wars more massive than the world had ever seen before * * * the Yin and Yan of the modern age.

The next important event in this particular chain was March 13, 1926, the birth of Terence A. Todman, on St. Thomas. One of the Virgin Islands' most outstanding native sons, he is today the U.S. Ambassador to Denmark. He is a career diplomat in the finest sense of the phrase, and he has brought to his duties a sensitivity and a wealth of knowledge, understanding, and respect for the varied cultures of the world that has stood our Nation well. The appointment of Ambassador Todman to his current post in Denmark was a symbolic full circle that underscores the unique relationship between the United States, Denmark, and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

On August 1, 1950, radio station WSTA, the first radio station in the Virgin Islands, went on the air, 1950 was another significant year. The Korean conflict was just heating up, and the world was becoming embroiled in what would be known as the cold war, a contradiction in terms that belied the heat of the conflicts that ensued. In the Virgin Islands, our first native Governor, Morris de Castro, was inaugurated, another step forward for the U.S. Virgin Islands. WSTA became an instant hit, a true community station. As a young man fresh out of the service, I was fortunate to have been a part of the original staff of this pioneer station.

Continuing in that community spirit, the principals and staff of WSTA chose to celebrate its 35th anniversary and its commitment as a chronicler of all the bits and pieces of everyday community life that make a community and its culture unique. To celebrate this occasion, Addie Ottley has taken his popular "Morning Show" to Copenhagen, Denmark to broadcast his program live from Denmark to the Virgin Islands, using modern technology that was merely a dream when the Virgin Islands changed hands nearly 70 years ago. In this special broadcast this morning, WSTA paid tribute to Ambassador Todman, and in so doing, saluted the United States, Denmark, and the U.S. Virgin Islands.

The staff of WSTA and all the people of the U.S. Virgin Islands were honored to have received a message from the President of the United States for its historic broadcast this morning. President Reagan sent the following message which was read over the air this morning:

I am delighted to join the staff and listeners of Radio Station WSTA in St. Thomas and all the citizens of the Virgin Islands in paying special tribute to Ambassador Terence A. Todman. Let me also offer my warm congratulations on this 35th anniversary for the station.

Ambassador Todman has rendered great service to the Nation and to the people of the Virgin Islands in a variety of distinguished positions. In each of those posts he has been renowned for his skill, versatility, and his profound understanding of people of many different backgrounds. This understanding has been particularly noted in his current role as our Ambassador to Denmark, the country from which the United States purchased your beautiful islands. As a native of the Virgin Islands, he has demonstrated a unique appreciation for the special relationship between the Danish people and Americans, and has helped to make that great friendship even stronger. I know how proud his fellow islanders are of him and his efforts, and I join them in saluting his fine record of accomplishment in serving America and the Danish-American heritage of the Virgin Islands.

On behalf of WSTA and the people of the United States, I thank the President for this beautiful message. We are grateful for this special interest in the U.S. Virgin Islands and we all send him best wishes for his continued speedy and complete recovery.

Yes; the world has changed drastically since 1917 when the Virgin Islands changed hands. One reassuring constant that the people of the Virgin Islands know they can count on is the untiring effort of WSTA to bring meaningful cultural exchange programming for the benefit of all the people from all over the world who pass through the portals of the beautiful, peaceful, and free U.S. Virgin Islands.●

NUCLEAR WASTE SHIPMENTS THROUGH NEW YORK

HON. GARY L. ACKERMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ACKERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I insert my testimony of August 1, 1985, at the hearing held by the Energy and Commerce Committee's Subcommittee on Commerce, Transportation and Tourism.

TESTIMONY OF CONGRESSMAN GARY ACKERMAN ON NUCLEAR WASTE SHIPMENTS THROUGH NEW YORK

In "Animal Farm" George Orwell describes the corruption and decay of a society's ideals that strip individuals of their personal freedoms and rob them of their well-being. In a Democracy, public policy is supposed to be shaped by the people themselves, based on what will provide the greatest good for the greatest number. The Department of Energy/Department of Transportation proposal for their nuclear-waste route is a perfect example of this principle—in reverse. In this case, the greatest possible number of people would be put at the greatest possible risk.

The technology of the nuclear industry has raced ahead of our ability to keep up with the safety problems it leaves in its wake. We have scarcely mastered the difficulties of disposing of these highly radioactive wastes; we have done almost nothing to ensure their safe transport.

Is there even one person in this country who has never witnessed an accident on the freeway, never read about an overturned truck spilling its cargo? I would think not. But apparently, Department of Transportation officials don't drive and don't read newspapers. They insist that trucks carrying nuclear waste "cannot overturn," and that the containers "cannot leak"—much like the argument of a shipbuilder who claimed the Titanic could not sink.

Mr. Chairman and distinguished colleagues, the DOE's claim that the risk of incident is "infinitesimal" is absurd. It admits the possibility of a risk, however slight. It admits that as trucks roll through some of the most densely populated areas in the country—the City of New York and the Counties of Queens, Nassau, Westchester, and the Bronx—a disaster of catastrophic proportions could occur that would threaten the lives of millions of Americans. It admits all of this, but refuses to prevent it.

Even if one were to presume that the containers are leak-proof, one cannot presume that tractor-trailer trucks do not overturn.

The Department of Transportation has constructed its entire premise on a fantasy that ignores a key element: the New York City driver. It also pays little heed to driving conditions in New York City, and ignores national highway statistics. And under real highway conditions, this fantasy could quickly become a nightmare.

Everyone within the Metropolitan New York Area with a radio on in the morning hears almost daily of an overturned truck on the Long Island Expressway (L.I.E.), tying up major arteries all over the New York City region, and delaying hundreds of thousands of people. Can you imagine the panic and delay if it were a truck with nuclear waste, even if it were safe? Can you imagine the goings-on while waiting for experts to be flown in by helicopter to verify no leakage? DOE doesn't know for sure that its containers don't leak. DOT does know for sure that trucks overturn on the L.I.E. every day of the week.

We hear of overturned trucks on the L.I.E. hundreds of times during the year. We never hear of an overturned barge.

The question of where to route nuclear waste has no attractive answers. Every option is flawed to some degree. But to choose a route that endangers the safety of the greatest possible number of citizens is senseless. It flies in the face of reason. The report prepared for the City of New York verifies what common sense dictates: that there would be less danger to even fewer people if the waste were ferried across the Long Island Sound to our interstate road network for its trip West.

Let's put an end to this Orwellian "doublespeak," and do what is safest, and therefore best, for the largest number of people. Let us act responsibly and transport future shipments of dangerous, radioactive material by barge. And let us eliminate the "infinitesimal" risk that, in the City of New York, could become a full-fledged tragedy.●

I'M OK. YOU'RE OK.

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, often in the political arena, to ascribe blame is to excuse hate.

The following letter written by Dr. James Armstrong, vice president of the Committee on Dialog and Development, constitutes a departure from the deadly game of "good guys and bad guys" and ushers in the concept of "I'm OK. You're OK" for international and especially inter first, second, and third world relations.

It is the stuff of Ghandi and King and worth congressional attention:

COMMITTEE ON DIALOGUE AND DEVELOPMENT,
WASHINGTON, DC, MARCH 12, 1985.

The Rev. JAMES G. CALLAWAY, Jr.,
Executive Assistant to the Rector, Trinity Grants Program, New York, NY.

DEAR FATHER CALLAWAY: I wish to submit this request for the Trinity Grants Program to become an "early on" partner in the formation of the Committee on Dialogue and Development. The Committee (henceforth referred to as the CDD) has been incorporated to reduce the schism that currently exists between business leaders in the industrialized west and liberation theologians, Christian activists, and public leaders in the Third World.

The schism is reflected by the angry dismay many executives of transnational corporations feel when confronted by inaccurate and uninformed attacks on the free enterprise system originating in the Third World. They are mindful of the overt hostility directed against multinationals by an assortment of ecumenical pronouncements (see "Churches and the Transnational Corporations: An Ecumenical Program, "published by the World Council of Churches in 1983). At a meeting of CDD leaders with the staff of the International Division of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, one of the Chamber staff members said, "Many Latin American businessmen feel the church is their most hostile critic."

On the other hand, Christian leaders in the Third World feel they have been mistakenly labeled Marxists for identifying with the poor on the basis of their biblical and theological perspectives. Their dismay and despair are registered when an affluent First World appears to turn a deaf ear to the world's hungry and oppressed. Both groups have "tuned each other out." They tend to listen to their own voices while discrediting their "enemies." The manifestation of this disharmony in the organized church is most discouraging when one realizes that the majority of corporate leaders are active church members who want to feel a sense of Christian mission in their vocation.

Although its self-image is "religious and ethical" the CDD will operate outside organized structures of the church. It will utilize contacts with the business community, academe, the public sector and church hierarchies and agencies to bring about dialogue between the two parties.

This broader dialogue will have three programatic methods to bring about harmony and forward movement in commonly held social goals.

(1) Conflict Prevention.—The CDD will seek to identify emerging issues pertaining to corporate activities and Third World reality with a potential for adverse impact—economic, social and cultural—on affected groups and societies. It will try to position itself in a way that will prevent an emerging issue from becoming a negative, societal problem. It will initiate special studies and research programs that will help corporate leaders and Third World activists identify emerging issues, delineate their magnitude and scale, and suggest directions and strategies for future action.

(2) Conflict Containment.—The CDD will work vigorously to encourage constructive dialogue and maintain open avenues of communication among the affected groups where public policy matters impact transnational corporations, local business communities and the living and working conditions of the people immediately involved. It will seek to bring about a constructive reapproachment between conflicting parties keeping in mind both the positive impact of corporate investments and activities and the need for balancing the interests of the various parties. Above all, it will try to involve the most significant groups with a stake in the issues, facilitating communications among them.

(3) Conflict Resolution.—The CDD will act in the role of an honest broker and a voice of reason, justice and compassion in social conflicts where positions have hardened and mutual distrust prevent serious discussions and/or negotiations between affected parties. It will explore and cultivate the common ground that will facilitate new levels of trust and develop bases for mutual understanding and cooperation.

Among others, the CDD has met with representatives of the following organizations that have engaged in significant business/church dialogue and interaction:

(a) Berkeley Center for Ethics and Social Policy;

(b) Trinity Center for Ethics and Corporate Policy;

(c) Center for Ethics and Religious Values at the University of Notre Dame;

(d) U.S. Council on International Business (re: its dialogue with the American Lutheran Church);

(e) Center of Concern (re: its educational program on the U.S. Catholic bishops' pastoral letter on "Catholic Social Teachings and the U.S. Economy");

(f) YMCA's Center for International Management Studies (re: the Dakar consultation on "Development and Multinational Enterprises");

(g) Interfaith Center on Corporate Responsibility;

(h) Interfaith Committee on Economic Justice (re: the Overseas Development Council's experience with "business briefings"); and

(i) Council of the Americas (re: Board Room dialogues for corporate executives).

The CDD expects to network and cooperate with these programs and to help facilitate their important learnings into the Third World arena.

There have also been conversations with Christian leaders from around the world. Their supportive guidance has proven invaluable. Some of the leaders consulted have been:

(a) Emilio Castro, general secretary of the World Council of Churches;

(b) Ernesto Cardinal Arns of Sao Paulo, Brazil;

(c) Julio de Santa Ana, former director of the WCC's Commission on the Churches' Participation in Development;

(d) Dr. Jose Miquez-Bonino, liberation theologian, academician and former president of the WCC (1975–1983);

(e) Dr. Kim Choon Young, Korean Council of Churches;

(f) Bishop Federico Pegura, president, Latin American Evangelical Council of Churches; and

(g) Dr. Rubem Alves, liberation theologian, academician, author and poet.

These religious leaders noted their concern for the financial instability of their countries because of the international debt crises, for widespread unemployment—especially among the young—and for the disastrous impact of poverty and hunger on the women and children of the Third World. They feel that their church's faithfulness will be measured by it's advocacy of the rights and needs of the poor.

The CDD is now in the process of testing the interest of financial leaders in United States and transnational companies. One executive at Morgan Guaranty Trust said it could be "an important program if you can find meaningful ways to implement it." A meeting with seven staff members, including the director of the International Division of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, indicated their keen interest. They feel business in the developed world would be benefited by the CDD program. One staffer said, "If the right climate is created—then education can take place."

To implement the CDD program a "start-up fund" of $77,940 is needed for the first year's core budget. (It should be noted that it is possible to get underway with this small amount because of the volunteer commitment of board members, the utilization of consultants and the sharing of office space and secretarial resources.) Attached is a budget and statement of expenses and income to date. The budget is developmental and as CCD becomes more functional there will be a need for permanent staff members. A 20-percent reserve for operating contingencies has been added because of the unpredictability of initial costs without the benefit of prior experience.

The budget provides a modest sum to employ a part time executive director to coordinate present activities, service the board's governance and handle legal matters.

A similar sum is proposed for an organizational development consultant to guide the planning process for the new organization. This would enable a feasability study on CDD's potential to perform a unique, unduplicated service that would attract future funding and generate self-earned income through conference and seminar participation and publications. This person in cooperation with others will assume primary responsibility for developing lists of potential funders, resource persons, board members and future staff. He/she will also write grant proposals.

While CDD's mission will be global, there are dominant hemispheric considerations. A south Florida connection, linked with a university, seems highly desirable. A consultant has been identified who for a small stipend and expense reimbursement will establish local business, media, educational and institutional support to augment initial programs.

Consultation with members of the Council of Foundation's Committee on International Grant Making, and the Council of Americas, indicate their feeling that the CDD will offer a unique program. Most see a combination of church and corporate grants to provide necessary start-up funds.

Because of Trinity's historic relationship with the business community and its innovative grants program with a Third World priority, CDD would hope that Trinity would become an early partner with a $35,000 grant toward the first year start-up budget.

Thank you for encouraging this submission. I am deeply grateful to Dr. Parks, Dr. McCoy and Charles Schmidt for making yourselves available to our consultant Frank Kiehne and myself as we have explained our reason for being and have sought your guidance in this grant process.

Sincerely,

JAMES ARMSTRONG.●

GROWING POLARIZATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, observers can only marvel at Pretoria's continuing inability to come to grips with what is happening among black South Africans. The white populace seems to have an uncanny habit of misperceiving and misinterpreting black grievances and black leaders. This became painfully obvious when President P. W. Botha summarily rebuffed Bishop Desmond Tutu's requests for a meeting.

It seems to me that Botha could decisively avert a bloodbath by opening a dialog with Bishop Tutu and ANC leader Nelson Mandela. These leaders are respected by all blacks, and would be able to allay the rage which has claimed hundreds of lives. Unfortunately, Botha has been obstinate in his refusal to strike a deal with them.

The fuse of revolution has been lit. If Pretoria does not relent, all of South Africa will be ravaged by rebellion and racial confrontation. I insert the following article in the hope that this trend does not continue.

The article from the Washington Post, July 31, 1985, follows:

SOUTH AFRICA: SETUP FOR A SHOOT-OUT?

(By William Raspberry)

Last week, Bishop Desmond Tutu was warning angry blacks that he would leave the country and perhaps even abandon the liberation struggle if there were any more lynch-mob attacks on suspected police informers.

This week, South African President P. W. Botha was refusing the Nobel Peace Prize winner's request for a meeting to find a way to end the violence.

The two events say a good deal about the moral and physical courage of the Anglican bishop and perhaps more about the dismal prospects for peace in that racial time bomb of a country called South Africa.

Tutu is respected around the world as a man of peace and yet held in high regard by South Africa's black militants. That combination of attributes made it possible for him to elbow his way through an enraged crowd three weeks ago to rescue a man suspected of being a police informer and, last week, to threaten to quit the liberation struggle if lynchings continued.

That same integrity would have made him almost uniquely able to lead the near-revolutionary black population and the white government away from the brink of chaos. He was willing, even eager, to try.

"I have tried; I have failed," he said the other day after Botha decided against meeting with him. Tutu first broached his interest in such a meeting during two broadcast interviews. Botha, perhaps looking to his right flank, said he could not respond to offers made through the media but was prepared to talk to Tutu or anyone else "provided a proper appointment is made."

Tutu, who might have bristled at the rebuff and turned away, instead sent Botha a formal request for a meeting. Botha's office at first announced his willingness to talk with Tutu but later rejected the bishop's request, adding—incredibly—that he would talk only with people who had denounced both violence and civil disobedience.

That new condition eliminated Tutu, who refuses—disobediently—to carry the "pass" that South African law requires all blacks to keep with them. The bishop, who already had risked his credibility among blacks by seeking the meeting with Botha, could hardly afford to be seen as begging for an audience. So that, presumably, is that.

But important questions remain. For instance, what does the Botha government have in mind? Surely its refusal to talk to Tutu is a calculated move implying that it sees no point in enhancing the credibility of black moderates. The result can only be to render the moderates irrelevant or, more likely, to radicalize them.

Tutu, and men like him, could have been bridges, making it at least theoretically possible for the two sides to come together. Does the bridge-blasting, implicit in Botha's rebuff of Tutu, mean that the government has given up on a peaceful resolution of the current crisis? Is the scene being set for a full-fledged shoot-out?

And what, if that happens, will be the position of the Reagan administration? The White House, while continuing to assert its opposition to economic sanctions, is at least more vocal in its apparent consternation with Botha's obstinance, particularly with his refusal to meet with Tutu. Will Botha's continued obstinance transform that consternation into active impatience?

What will be Ronald Reagan's reaction if Tutu and other moderates are jailed? Where will America be if the crisis escalates, whether into revolution or all-out repression? When, in short, will this country gather up the political and moral courage to declare just which side it is on?●

REMEMBER OUR HEROES

HON. MERVYN M. DYMALLY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DYMALLY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to your attention as well as that of my colleagues an important tribute paid by the city of Hawthorne, CA, and the Hawthorne Veterans Council to the war heroes of our country who gave their lives in defense of democracy around the world.

It is with great pleasure that I submit to the Members of this body the text of a letter I received informing me of this community service, and inviting my participation in the activities. Perhaps my colleagues may find the initiative taken by my constituents worth staging in their congressional districts. The message is quite clear: We as a Nation should always remember the honorable heroic sacrifices of our fellow men and women that made possible the liberty and freedom we now enjoy.

The following is the body of the letter. I urge you Mr. Speaker and Members of the House to respond.

JUNE 24, 1985.

DEAR ELECTED OFFICIAL: On behalf of the Hawthorne Veterans Council and the City of Hawthorne we wish to invite you to attend the opening ceremonies for the showing of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial replica, on Sunday, August 11, 1985, beginning at 1:00 p.m. The ceremony will be conducted in the park at the Hawthorne Memorial Center, 3001 West El Segundo Boulevard.

This showing of the Vietnam Veteran Memorial replica is being conducted as part of our "Remember Our Heroes" tribute that will be held in Hawthorne, August 11-18, 1985.

During this time the Hawthorne Veterans Council will honor America's heroic men and women who have fallen while serving their country in the defense of freedom in the Spanish-American, WWI, WWII, Korean and Vietnam Wars, as well as other conflicts around the world.

The memorial replica is a half-scale, 250-ft long model of the Vietnam Veterans Memorial in Washington, D.C. It is a solemn and fitting tribute to the 58,022 American heroes who answered their country's call and served, and died in Vietnam. The exhibit will be lighted and open 24 hours a day.

Organizations and individuals may participate in this meaningful tribute by arranging for, and placing floral arrangements either on the day the exhibit opens or sometime during the week. It would be appropriate to have your organization's name included in the arrangement.

We would welcome written greetings you may wish to send, should you be unable to attend the opening ceremony, and will display it along with proclamations and resolutions from the cities of Los Angeles County in a special area adjacent to the memorial.

In order that we may properly recognize your involvement at the ceremony, please respond by August 1st.

We sincerely hope that you can participate in this tribute as we honor our American heroes and re-kindle the spark of pride and freedom for which they have paid the ultimate price to preserve.

Sincerely,

OLIN LAMBERT,
Commander, Hawthorne Post 2075, Veterans of Foreign Wars.

DANNY BELFONTAINE,
Commander, Hawthorne American Legion Post 314.
GUY J. HOCKER, Jr.,
Mayor of Hawthorne.●

THE ADMIRALTY MAZE

HON. WALTER B. JONES

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. JONES of North Carolina. Mr. Speaker, the maritime cargo and personal injury liability laws of the United States have evolved over the past 200 years through both statutory and case law. During all of this time the Congress has never done a thorough examination of this complex issue, with an eye toward rationalizing or making some type of logical sense out of these laws.

As a result, individuals who are injured have different remedies depending upon whether they are a seaman or a nonseaman, injured inside or outside of 3 miles of the coastline, and various other distinctions. The types of damages allowed varies, as well as the types of individuals allowed to sue in a wrongful death action. Cargo owners have different basis to recover for damaged goods depending upon whether the goods are being shipped to another point in the United States or to a foreign country.

You have to be an admiralty specialist in order to get through this maze. Over the years the Supreme Court has attempted to rationalize this system as best it could within the constraints of the statutes. However, even this has not removed many anomalies from the system.

In 1946 the Congress mandated that the 50 titles of the United States Code should be revised, consolidated, and enacted into positive law. To date, 21 titles have been codified. In 1983 those portions of title 46 related to vessel inspection and seamen were codified.

Subsequently, the committee staff began drafting a recodification of the maritime liability laws—including the Death on the High Seas Act, Jones Act—as it applies to personal injury cases—General Maritime Law, Carriage of Goods at Sea Act, Limitation of Liability Act, Public Vessel Act, and the Suits in Admiralty Act. In March of 1984, the first draft was circulated to interested parties; comments were received and analyzed and then included in draft 2, which was distributed in July. Again, comments were received and analyzed and changes based on these recommendations were included in a committee print circulated nationwide in January 1985.

The bills are the result of many hours of careful analysis by the committee staff on the comments we received on the committee print. These bills are the first attempt by the Congress to rationalize this system by standardizing these rights, remedies, and responsibilities. We have attempted to take the existing statutes, combine them with the case law, and develop a logical personal injury and death remedy system built on the current practice.

In dealing with cargo liability, we have repealed the old domestic system and made the current international system, which we have followed for nearly 50 years, apply to domestic shipments. We have also proposed to solve the "package" definition problem in the existing law by implementing the internationally recommended Visby amendments to the Hague Convention. However, we understand that some individuals in the administration and elsewhere favor the Hamburg Rules, which would totally replace COGSA. They feel that if we simply implement the Visby II amendments, the Hamburg Rules will not stand a chance of ever being implemented by the United States. Therefore, in order to be fair to all parties we have decided to put the Hamburg Rules on the table in this legislation for discussion. I, personally, have not taken a position on this Convention and plan on waiting until after the public hearing process is completed before I do so.

Most of the provisions these bills make no substantive change to law. When there are substantive changes, those can be broken down into two categories: First, totally new provisions to law, such as most of chapter 303 and section 30511; and second, when two provisions in the existing law are in conflict, a choice is made retaining one, as in differences in existing wrongful death provisions now contained in section 30505 and present types of damages allowed now contained in section 30507. The provision in the bill is in the current law but may not be applicable in all current cases.

These bills incorporate a number of provisions that the committee has adopted in the context of other legislation, such as requiring evidence of financial responsibility to protect against a corporation owning a single vessel getting out of paying claims in a disaster by not buying insurance.

By sticking as closely as possible to the existing system we hope not to create years of new litigation concerning the existing law. It is our desire to implement a system that will clearly define a person's liability and to put a reasonable limit on that liability and at the same time implement an easily understood system for fairly compensating individuals who are injured or killed on board vessels.

Since this is the first time this approach has ever been attempted, we recognize there may be some rough edges with this bill. We plan on being very open and flexible with this legislation as we have been during its drafting process. With the help of the administration and the various components of the maritime industry the goal of clarifying and codifying these laws can be achieved for the first time in 200 years. We look forward to receiving their input and working with them on this landmark legislation.●

THE 25TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE MARSHALL SPACE FLIGHT CENTER

HON. RONNIE G. FLIPPO

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FLIPPO. Mr. Speaker, this year marks the 25th anniversary of NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center in Huntsville, AL. The Marshall Center's contribution to our Nation's efforts in space exploration began shortly after our decision as a nation to meet the challenge presented by the Soviets' successful launching of the sputnik satellite and subsequent manned flights.

Propelled by the Von Braun team, who were then part of the Army Ballistic Missile Agency at Redstone Arsenal, the Marshall Center was responsible for the early pioneering efforts to meet the technical challenges presented by placing a man in space. Through these efforts, America quickly caught up with and surpassed the Soviets in what came to be known as "The Race for Space."

This period of time was also the beginning of America's fascination with space and space flight. What had once been the subject of writers' dreams was now happening before our eyes. Television brought us live coverage of the launches and splash downs of the Mercury and Gemini Programs and at once became the medium through which all people could share in the reality of space exploration.

In 1961, America inaugurated the youngest President ever elected, John F. Kennedy. President Kennedy shared the dream of space exploration and during his short time in office, made a commitment which was to dominate the world's attention for many years; to place a man on the Moon.

Manned flight to the Moon presented technical problems of a magnitude which had never been thought of before much less addressed. The solution developed by Marshall was the Saturn V booster, the most powerful rocket ever built. Marshall also had a hand in the development of additional hardware necessary for the Apollo Moon landing; the lunar rover bore the signatures of Marshall technicians and scientists. All of America watched as Neil Armstrong's hands released the ladder of the lunar lander and effortlessly floated to the surface of the Moon, his feet leaving man's historic footprints deep in the Moon's dust. His voice beamed 238,000 miles back to Earth, "This is one small step for man, one giant leap for mankind." And what a leap it was. A leap made possible by the ingenuity and dedication of the men and women of the Marshall Space Flight Center.

Although all of these efforts and tremendous accomplishments contributed greatly to our understanding of space and our solar system, NASA scientists envisioned a space transportation system that would allow us to truly utilize space on a long-term basis for the betterment of mankind. A continuous presence in space would also necessitate a system that would be less costly than earlier programs.

In 1981 America launched the first reusable space system, appropriately called the space shuttle. America and the world watched in awe as a rather ungainly looking combination of shuttle, external fuel tank, and solid rocket boosters lifted from the launch pad at Cape Kennedy, and slowly rolled 180° placing the shuttle upside down as it moved down range. Several days later, the shuttle came back to Earth as no other spacecraft had returned before, landing on an airstrip like a modern jetliner.

The Marshall Center's Shuttle Program responsibilities include the development of the shuttle's main engines, the external tank containing the enormous amount of liquid hydrogen fuel needed for launch, and the solid rocket boosters used for liftoff. The accomplishment of the successful Shuttle Program rivals that of the Apollo Program. For the first time, man has a sustained access to space which has opened new doors in man's ability to utilize space on a continuous basis.

The Shuttle Program has also provided an opportunity for other major efforts in space which will be managed at Marshall. The various spacelab missions have provided scientists throughout the world with experimental data never before possible to obtain. Marshall will also have a major roll in the development and management of America's first permanent manned orbiting laboratory, the space station, scheduled to be in place within the decade.

Twenty-five years ago, it would have been hard to imagine the accomplishments we have made in space since that time. It would also be hard to imagine where we would be as a nation today, were it not for the contribution our space efforts have made in other fields. The development and maturation of technologies in the area of computer science, medicine, communications, new space-age materials, the list goes on and on. In the technology-driven world we live in today, it is comforting to know that we have at the Marshall Center, individuals with the know-how, the "right stuff," to meet the technological challenges we face in the future.●

A SALUTE TO JOHN M. TOUPS

HON. FRANK R. WOLF

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WOLF. Mr. Speaker, Congressman STAN PARRIS and I are privileged today to bring to the attention of our colleagues in the Congress an unusual individual who has been selected for a special honor by his fellow citizens of northern Virginia. On September 7, 1985, the Virginia Community Foundation's Founders Award will be presented to John M. Toups, businessman and resident of McLean, VA, at a dinner at the Hyatt Regency Hotel in Crystal City, VA.

The Northern Virginia Community Foundation was formed in 1978 by a group of northern Virginia residents who wanted to return to the community some of the riches that they had received from it. Five areas of concern benefit from the foundation's endowment funds: The arts, education, health, youth and civic improvement.

The foundation receives charitable gifts from people from all walks of life with all levels of income—families, businesses, national corporations and foundations. Donations are used exclusively to benefit northern Virginia.

Each year, the foundation honors a citizen of northern Virginia who has made an unusual contribution to the life and prosperity of the community. The award is made to recognize the unselfish efforts of that individual and to promote awareness of the significance of individual's action in improving the quality of life for all members of the community.

This year, John M. Toups, chairman, president, and chief executive officer of Planning Research Corp., has been chosen to receive the 1985 Founders Award. In a few short years in northern Virginia, John Toups has made his leadership and influence felt in supporting the business community, in improving technical higher education, in supporting locally developed cultural activities, and in helping to solve the area's transportation problems.

John Toups is a member of the board of directors of the Fairfax County Chamber of Commerce, the Fairfax Symphony, the George Mason Institute Industrial Policy Board, the Tysons Transportation Association, the Washington Dulles Task Force and Fairfax County Neighborhood Watch/Crime Prevention Education, Inc. He has chaired and served on numerous committees and programs in Northern Virginia and in the Greater Washington area. He is president of the Professional Services Council, vice president of the National Security Industrial Association, and a director of the National Committee for Employer Support of Veterans Employment and of the Greater Washington Board of Trade.

He has helped his company become a significant factor for development and social commitment in the northern Virginia community. PRC officers and employees work on business, health, youth, educational, and cultural programs throughout the area, and the PRC building is opened to numerous community activities.

John Toups combines professional skills as a registered engineer with entrepreneurial skills as a businessman. When Toups Corp., a hydrology and land development engineering firm of which he was founder and president, was acquired by Planning Research Corp. in 1970, he became a PRC vice president. The company quickly recognized his abilities, and he became a PRC director in 1973, president in 1978, and chairman in 1982. Under John Toups' leadership, the international professional services company has grown from $280 million in revenue in 1980 to $375 million in 1985.

While its headquarters were still in Los Angeles, CA, PRC opened its first offices in McLean, VA, in 1970, John Toups moved the corporate headquarters from Washington, DC, to PRC's showcase building in the new Tysons/McLean development in 1981. PRC is now the third largest employer in northern Virginia, with more than 1,400 employees in McLean and Dulles, VA, and 7,500 employees worldwide.

Community leaders in northern Virginia also have quickly recognized not only John Toups' ability, but also his dedication to the well-being of his neighbors and his community. His friends, colleagues, and associates are inspired by his intelligence, integrity, and leadership in working to solve the community's problems and to enrich the lives of its citizens.

John M. Toups is a uniquely deserving recipient of the Northern Virginia Foundation's Founders Award.●

DR. DAVID BRUNELL, ARTISTIC AMBASSADOR

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the outstanding achievement of pianist and teacher Dr. David Brunell of Bloomington, IN. In 1985, Dr. Brunell represented the U.S. Government abroad as an Artistic Ambassador, sponsored by the U.S. Information Agency.

The Artistic Ambassador Program is a recent initiative of Charles Z. Wick, the Director of the U.S. Information Agency. Its purpose is to use the wealth of often undiscovered musical talent in the United States to enhance USIA's mission of cultural understanding. Under its program director, John Robilette, the Artistic Ambassador Program has sent 11 pianists to 33 countries where they have given public concerts, worked with students and faculties of conservatories, and occasionally lived with host families.

Dr. Brunell was a superb choice for the Artistic Ambassador Program, and has made many friends for America in six different countries. Through his personal example and his pianistic talent, Brunell, allowed people throughout the world to see what he is about as an American and as a musician. They liked what they saw. His impact and other Artistic Ambassadors like him can never be quantified or put into any statistical report, yet it may extend for generations.

David Brunell spent 5 weeks abroad, traveling to cities in Trinidad, Jamaica, Dominican Republic, Haiti, Costa Rica, and Mexico. His warm reception in each country shows that the splendor of music overcomes political differences. Often traveling into the provinces of these countries as a musical Ambassador for the United States, Brunell gave many people who have never seen this country perhaps the most vivid impression they will ever have of the United States.

Evaluations from our Embassies overseas have indicated a tremendous ground swell of affection and interest for those things American, particulary when we as a nation are represented through the innocence of music and cultural exchange. David Brunell ilicited no less than 31 press articles and captioned photographs in Dominican newspapers alone during his brief stay on the island of the Dominican Republic. Even the most leftist and anti-American newspaper in Santo Domingo praised the Artistic Ambassador Program and David Brunell's anticipated visit in an editorial which said, this is a "gift given in the spirit of 'good neighborliness' by the Government of the United States of America."

The American Embassy in Trinidad reported that:

> Several people approached the piano following the recital and said they hadn't heard such a talent in years. Perhaps not since Claudio Arrau visited Trinidad in the sixties. Many wanted to know how soon we could get him back here or why can't you get more performers with that kind of talent to appear here * * *.

The American Embassy in Jamaica rates Brunell's visit as:

> An unqualified success. A very accomplished pianist who captures his audience from the first note, Brunell had his audiences spellbound. He was an excellent Artistic Ambassador.

In the Dominican Republic, a major music critic and Juilliard graduate wrote of Artistic Ambassador David Brunell:

> it was not enough to call Brunell the Artistic Ambassador of the United States. After hearing his concert she felt "that his message of art and friendship would remain in the memory of the Dominican people for all times as that of an Ambassador-at-Large."

The American Embassy in Haiti proclaimed:

> Brunell is the most outstanding cultural program this post has seen in many years and, as one local journalist put it, "he has left an indelible mark on Haiti's musical annals." Brunell's talent, generosity of spirit and personality make him an ideal Artistic Ambassador.

Mexico reported that,

> David Brunell * * * established a standard of excellence * * * that will be extremely difficult to equal. The advance publicity for the Artistic Ambassador Program prompted the post to have great expectations of our first performing Artistic Ambassador. Brunell not only fully justified his advance notices, but his performances exceeded expectations * * *. David Brunell was a perfect choice to introduce the Artistic Ambassador Program and we hope to have more like him.

I want to emphasize that David Brunell is an outstanding citizen of Bloomington as well as the United States. His willingness to serve his country as an Artistic Ambassador makes me proud. I would like to express my gratitude to Dr. David Brunell for personally bringing the people of the world closer together through the magic of music, and my thanks also go to Charles Z. Wick at the U.S. Information Agency for initiating this unique and rewarding program.●

HALLEY'S COMET TIME CAPSULE

HON. H. JAMES SAXTON

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SAXTON. Mr. Speaker, today I rise to offer every youngster in the country the opportunity to contribute to a most unique project which is rapidly gaining national interest and popularity.

This project, which has taken root in Vincentown, NJ, in the heart of my 13th District, centers on the burial of a time capsule to mark the arrival of Halley's Comet early next year.

For some time now, school students throughout the country have been contributing poems, essays, and other original art to the capsule, which will be sunk in the ground on April 11, 1986, the same day that the comet will be closest to the Earth.

The capsule will be buried on the grounds of a historical one-room schoolhouse in the small, proud community of Vincentown, and marked by a plaque to assures its recovery 76 years from now, in the year 2061, when Halley's Comet reappears.

The Halley's Comet Time Capsule is an idea which originated with Mr. Joseph Laufer, associate dean of Community Services at Burlington County College, Pemberton, NJ.

Mr. Laufer states that "the return of Halley's Comet after 76 years provides a unique opportunity for youngsters to become aware of their responsibilities toward the people who will welcome Halley's Comet again in 2061.

Students who contribute to the capsule have a chance to share with future generations not just their creativity, but their concerns for the issues which faced us in the 1980's.

In reviewing the time capsule contributions thus far, Mr. Laufer has seen some interesting themes developing. Students have shown a keen concern for world peace and harmony, disarmament, social justice, and ecological matters.

Mr. Laufer says: "As an educator, I see the return of Halley's Comet as an invaluable pedagogical tool. In addition to being an opportunity to awaken an interest in astronomy, it has the much broader value of heightening intergenerational awareness and global unity."

I should also note Southampton Historical Society has been supportive of the time capsule. The historical society recently restored a one-room schoolhouse which was in use from 1860 to 1930, and it is the schoolhouse grounds which will hold the capsule.

Students, teachers, and others who are interested in participating in the 1986 Halley's Time Capsule project should write: Halley's Comet Time Capsule, Halley's Comet Society—USA, Box 2188, Vincentown, NJ 08088.●

TEXTILE AND APPAREL ACT

HON. WILLIAM W. COBEY, JR.

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 1562, the Textile and Apparel Act of 1985, which, if enacted, would prevent the loss of 240,000 textile jobs in the United States this year alone.

The American fiber, textile, and apparel industry is our largest manufacturing industry. It is also the world's most modern and productive industry. However, we are presently facing unfair competition from countries who subsidize their textile industries.

In 1974, the Multi-Fiber Arrangement [MFA] was organized as an international instrument of the General Agreement on Trade and Tariff. This was done to insure the orderly growth of world textile and apparel trade while avoiding the disruptive affects of that trade on individual markets. This trade agreement, signed by 43 countries, called for a 6-percent annual rate of growth for textile imports for most countries and a lower growth for major textile exporting countries. However, since 1980, textile products coming into the United States have grown at an average annual rate of 19 percent. Because of this, foreign imports now control over 50 percent of the U.S. clothing market, and this is only the beginning.

As I have stated, the U.S. textile industry has yielded one of the most productive work forces in the world. American textile and apparel firms are the largest manufacturing employers of women and minorities, and these companies are cost efficient.

Americans are strong supporters of fair play and open competition; but this sort of competition and fairness is not characteristic of the international textile market. Certain countries, such as, Taiwan, China, and Hong Kong, are subsidizing their textile prices to the detriment of American manufacturers. The final sale price of most textile imports does not represent the true or accurate product production costs. The prices of foreign goods are artificially reduced or subsidized. Without government subsidies, many foreign firms could not offer their goods in the American market at current prices.

It is unfair to expect our American textile firms to compete in this current situation. The continued flood of textile and apparel imports is drowning many of our communities, such as Wake, Franklin, Chatham, Orange, and Randolph counties in North Carolina. In the past 2 years alone, two textile plants in my district have closed. A recent study reported that textile employment in North Carolina has dropped to its lowest level in 35 years.

The administration argues that H.R. 1562 would lead to higher prices for American consumers because of decreased competition. The truth is that foreign imports are eliminating domestic production of many goods. After these goods are no longer produced in the United States, foreign producers would be free to set prices as high as they like. In economics, this type of action is known as predatory pricing, and we should not allow this to happen.

When President Reagan agreed to the 1981 MFA renewal agreement, he did so in good faith. Since that time, however, countries that signed the agreement have breached the contract. As a result, there has been a loss of over 500,000 jobs when dozens of textile and apparel plants in the United States have closed down.

The answer to the problem is for Congress to adopt H.R. 1562, the Textile and Apparel Act of 1985. This legislation would not violate any international agreement, but will fix 1985 import levels where they would have been if the multi-fiber arrangement had been propertly enforced since 1981.

Prospects are looking very favorable for ultimate passage of H.R. 1562. We currently have 287 cosponsors in the House and 53 cosponsors in the Senate. Passage of H.R. 1562 would encourage economic recovery in our textile industry and would create jobs for American workers, including many workers in my area of North Carolina.●

MADE IN SPACE SALE

HON. DON RITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RITTER. Mr. Speaker, from the beginning of the Space Program, NASA has had a special interest in the effects of weightlessness. Some of NASA's earliest studies were directed at propellant systems for rockets and structural welding in space. By the mid-1960's, however, the brief periods of weightlessness available in drop towers or on aircraft flights gave way to the longer microgravity experiments of the Apollo Program. Microgravity experiments were also conducted on sky lab and the Apollo-Soyuz project, jointly operated by the United States and the U.S.S.R. Most recently, microgravity research has taken place on the space shuttle.

The space shuttle opened a new era in microgravity science and applications. While opportunities for reflight and recovery of test samples were available before the shuttle, the shuttle permitted larger and more complex experiments than ever before. This combination of heavier payloads and repeated missions allows NASA to expand scientific and commercial research in space. For the 1980's and beyond, space-based microgravity research, especially materials processing will be one of the centerpieces of the U.S. Space Program.

Materials processing is one of the central elements of NASA's Microgravity Program, and is, in short, the science of processing ordinary and comparatively low-valued raw materials into crystals, chemicals, metals, ceramics, and countless other manufactured products.

Materials processing enables us to build modern computers to process information and communications systems to transmit it; enables us to build turbines for aircraft and electric power plants; makes possible revolutionary advances in the production of chemical and biological compounds, such as insulin; and, not surprisingly, by producing high-strength alloys and heat-resistent cermatic tiles, makes the Space Program possible.

Just as materials processing on Earth made the leap into space a reality, the Space Program today offers unique opportunities for materials processing. The most important benefit of processing in space is extended weightlessness. On Earth, gravity causes materials of different densities and temperatures to separate and materials to deform under their own weight. In the microgravity of an orbiting spacecraft, however, scientists can use unique materials processing techniques, techniques that are all but impossible on Earth. The results can lead to a material or a processing approach of scientific or commercial value.

On July 17, 1985, NASA announced the first sales of a product manufactured in space, plastic beads so small that 18,000 of them could fit on the head of a pin. The polystryene beads are 10 micrometers or about one 2,500th of an inch, in diameter; perfect spheres that small are virtually impossible to make on Earth because of the interference of gravity. The spheres were made by a chemical process developed by Dr. John Vanderhoff and associates in my congressional district at Lehigh University in Bethlehem, Pa.

The billions of spheres produced in the absence of gravity aboard several space shuttle flights are being purchased by producers of finely ground powder products such as paint pigments, inks, toners, chemicals, flour, and cosmetics as well as by technologists who monitor environmental particulate pollution from industrial and chemical plants.

The spheres also will be used by medical researchers who calibrate instruments to count blood cells and measure their shape and to perform a wide variety of diagnostic measurements. Moreover, the product is available to manufacturers as a reference in producing and distributing secondary measurement standards.

A vial containing about 30 million of the microbeads sells for $384; the proceeds will be split between NASA, which produced them, and the National Bureau of Standards, which measured and packaged them. There are 600 vials available for sale, of which a good number has already been sold.

The first fruits of materials processing in space have been realized; as microgravity research continues to develop, the benefits will become increasingly apparent on Earth. Like space, the opportunities offered by microgravity science and applications are vast and are only beginning to be explored.●

THE HOME HEALTH CARE PRESERVATION ACT OF 1985

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Home Health Care Preservation Act. This legislation would prohibit the Secretary of Health and Human Services from implementing any changes in reimbursement levels for home health care.

I offer this measure in direct response to the recent publication of regulations—July 5, 1985, Federal Register—by the Health Care Financing Administration [HCFA]. These regulations not only change the manner in which reimbursements are calculated, but also the amount of the reimbursement. These new regulations will strike a financial blow to that segment of our population least capable of absorbing it, our elderly.

The imposition of these new reimbursement methods comes at a time when the elderly who rely on home health agencies for care can least afford it. It seems likely that there will be a budget freeze for most Government programs, in a much-needed, overall effort to reduce our Federal deficit. A freeze, coupled with the change in reimbursement rates, will increase the out-of-pocket costs for our sick elderly while also discouraging home health care, which is proven to be far more cost effective and humane than long-term hospital or nursing home care.

As the General Accounting Office [GAO] noted in a report issued earlier this year, the implementation of Diagnostic Related Groups [DRG's] for hospital stays has resulted in the releasing of patients in a shorter period of time, and in physical conditions which demand continuing out-of-hospital care. Patients in need of longer and more technologically advanced treatment are being released to home health agencies as a result of these shorter hospital stays. The consequence of the DRG system is increased demand on the home health care system, and therefore, higher costs to the patient.

HCFA's new regulations demand that health care agencies take on a greater number of ill people with increased medical needs, while receiving a severly reduced level of reimbursement. The effect is to ration health care and cause serious deterioration in the quality of that care.

If home health care services are reduced, the only alternative for our sick elderly will be nursing home care. This option is not always the most appropriate or desirable and certainly not the most cost-effective method of treatment.

The cost for nursing home care is borne alternatively by society or the families of the elderly involved. A survey conducted by the Harvard Medical School's Massachusetts Health Care Panel found about half of all single people, 75 years or older, face poverty after 13 weeks in a nursing home. Those results are striking and point to a time when health care will become available only to the rich. Clearly, we must create a public policy to ensure long-term care for all our elderly.

Just as clearly, it is imperative that we delay the implementation of these onerous regulations. During consideration of the Orphan Drug Act—Public Law 97-415—the Congress commissioned a report from Brandeis University concerning alternatives to reimbursements for home health care. To date, only a preliminary report has been forthcoming. It indicates that the increases in home care are due to normal market factors and not, as HCFA contends, to inefficiency or over utilization of the program.

In addition, HHS has awarded ABP Associates of Cambridge, MA. a 5-year grant to set up a demonstration program to investigate alternative reimbursement methodologies. The grant proposal was due to Congress on January 1, 1985, and was to start in May of this year. No further action on this project has been taken, as it is under review by the Office of Management and Budget.

I implore OMB to undertake this study. Congress needs the time to analyze the results of these studies. The Home Health Care preservation Act would give Congress that time, and the opportunity to develop a method of method of reimbursement which is cost effective, fosters adequate quality health care. and equally important, humane to our nation's elderly.●

APPLAUD THE PRESIDENT'S PROPOSAL

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, in the last 48 hours, the President has made a very significant and meaningful arms control proposal to the Soviet Union, which has thus far gone unanswered. Members of this body should applaud the President's proposal as well as his willingness to go the extra mile in offering his far-reaching and praiseworthy offer.

His proposal is in fact an offer to the Soviet Union to send a team of experts here to the United States to monitor a nuclear explosive test at our Nevada test site. The proposal is important for a number of reasons. As Members of this body know, some have called for the resumption of negotiations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. for the purpose of achieving a comprehensive nuclear explosive test ban. One of the key problems with a comprehensive nuclear test ban is that it is unverifiable, given present monitoring technologies and equipment. We are unable to monitor with sufficent accuracy the size of the Soviet nuclear tests, both to insure their compliance with existing arms control agreements and to prevent a Soviet technological breakthrough of one type or another. At low yields, it becomes virtually impossible for our external monitoring equipment to detect underground nuclear explosions, or pick them out from what might be slight tremors or earthquakes. And Members know that the Soviets have thus far refused to allow onsite inspection at their nuclear test facilities.

During House Foreign Affairs Committee hearings on legislation calling upon the President to immediately resume negotiations for the purpose of achieving a comprehensive test ban, we heard from Dr. Don Kerr, the director of Los Alamos National Laboratory, that in at least one instance we discovered a Soviet underground test through human intelligence only—that is, our state-of-the-art monitoring equipment failed to even pick up the signal of a test which had taken place. And, contrary to some claims, such low-level tests can be militarily significant and can impact upon the reliability and effectiveness of the nuclear stockpile.

It would be unwise for the United States, in our passion for arms control, to agree to a test ban if we cannot insure through verification that the other party is living up to the terms of the agreement. It is unfortunate but true that the Soviets have seen it in their interest to violate the terms of test ban treaties. Based upon a thorough evaluation of all available data, the U.S. Government has determined that the Soviet Union has repeatedly violated the Limited Test Ban Treaty and has likely violated the Threshold Test Ban Treaty. Such a poor track record of compliance should not be merely cast aside in an attempt to get arms control for arms control sake. The Soviets' noncompliant behavior must be taken into account prior to the resumption of negotiations.

Mr. Speaker, the President has made a serious offer to the Soviets. Some would perhaps even criticize him for asking for nothing in return—he did not ask that U.S. monitoring teams be allowed to travel to the Soviet test site to monitor Soviet nuclear explosive tests. But the fact is that this President has gone the extra mile in an effort to create a favorable climate for bilateral U.S.-U.S.S.R. arms control. We should applaud his courage and put the onus for fair, equitable, verifiable and mutual arms control where belongs: with the Soviet Union.●

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I commend my colleague, Representative ROBERT A. BORSKI, for introducing House Joint Resolution 106, designating August 1985 as Polish-American Heritage Month, and I am pleased that this important legislation has since become law.

Since the earliest days of our country, Poles and Polish Americans have played an important part in forging our great Nation. Poles numbered among the first American settlers at Jamestown in 1608. Count Casimir Pulaski, Thaddeus Kosciuszko, and Hyman Soloman were leading figures in the Revolutionary War. Brig. General Col. Joseph Karg figured prominently among the 6,000 Poles who served during the Civil War on both sides.

Between 1870 and the close of World War II, 2.5 million Poles arrived in America. Most joined strong Polish-American communities in the Northeast and upper Midwest, keeping alive their vibrant cultural and religious traditions. Today the Polish-American community is over 8 million strong, and continues to make a very special contribution to our nation.

Tragically, the vitality and love of freedom that is so much a part of the Polish tradition remains unfulfilled in Poland, which continues to suffer under the totalitarian rule of the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, recent events there, particularly the widespread May Day demonstration against the military regime, are signs that the solidarity movement is still alive and well in the hearts and minds of the Polish people. The January 1985 conviction of four secret police agents for the ruthless murder of Father Jerzy Popieluszko was a positive sign to those who pray for the restoration of human rights, freedom, and true independence in Poland.

These glimmers of hope are a tribute to the indominable Polish spirit and to the hard work of the Polish-American community, which has led the international effort to support the Polish people in their struggle.

Mr. Speaker, in celebrating the Polish-American Heritage, we will celebrate the pursuit of freedom and human dignity throughout the world, and we honor the very special contribution that Polish Americans have made to our Nation.●

OLYMPICS OF THE MIND

HON. DOUGLAS APPLEGATE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. APPLEGATE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the recent achievements of several junior high and high school students from St. Clairsville, OH. The students competed in the Olympics of the Mind and received many honors.

Competition was held in three divisions—elementary, junior high, and senior high school. Through regional and State competitions, the starting 20,000 Olympics of the Mind teams were eliminated down to 486 teams. At the world competition, a top team was picked in each of 13 divisions. Three St. Clairsville teams were among the 13 winners from Ohio who went on to world competition. They were a junior high team called the Hi Tech Smarty Pants which took 13th place in division II, another junior high team called the Ecology Dozers which took 9th place in division II, and the senior high team called the High School High Tech Smarty Pants finished in first place in division III. Members of the first place, gold medalists included David Banfield, team captain, Matt Weaver, Jennifer Bayat, Shu Tung, Reza Sutandi, and Tom Wisvari. The coaches for the team were Marshall Piccin, Paul Wolodkin, Dennis Johnson, and Debbie and Glen Stemen.

Olympics of the Mind is a program which promotes creative problem solving by children from kindergarten through senior high school. Begun in 1978, Olympics of the Mind has grown rapidly from a local New Jersey event to one of international scope.

Teams consisted of seven members. There were five different problems in this year's world finals. The team members from St. Clairsville's high school chose to build the robot Smarty Pants project.

The students had to build Sam, the robot, themselves and they could spend no more than $75 for the construction. They had to include lights that worked, remote control movements of the body and arms, and a voice box. The rules also stated that no team member was to touch the robot during its performance.

This year's world finals was held on June 6, 1985, and was held at the University of Maryland. The competition required the students to design a 10 minute skit with the robot. The assignment called for Sam to take the place of an ill student at school for a day.

The students' world presentation was graded in three categories: the 10-minute presentation of Sam's skit, their style, and dress as a team, and a spontaneous question-and-answer period with the judges.

This year, more than 4,500 students competed at the world finals—representing 486 teams from 41 States and 2 Canadian Provinces.

Again, I am proud to inform you that 13 teams from Ohio qualified for the world championships, and one, in particular, from my district, brought home gold medals. These gifted students from St. Clairsville are truly remarkable. Their knowledge and skill will be seen in their future endeavors, which will most assuredly be successful.●

DIVEST FROM SOUTH AFRICA

HON. GUS SAVAGE

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I once again wish to use this forum to protest the brutality of the white minority in South Africa and the immoral support thereof by this country under the name of constructive engagement.

On June 5, 1985, I spoke out on this floor calling for total divestment from South Africa. I pointed out at that time, that the issue in South Africa is even more pernicious than racism. The issue is fascism with its most sophisticated capacity for barbaric oppression of a substantial part of its own population.

South Africa's barbarism has long been on display. Its intensification over the recent period has been so atrocious that the government has now banned outdoor funerals for those who die of unnatural deaths—or in other words, those murdered by the South African Fascists.

The question for us must be what can we do to stop this brutality, to fight this fascism. At a minimum, we must prohibit any and all U.S. dollars from supporting the South African economy, for any support of a Fascist economy strengthens that brutal regime.

Mr. Speaker, I support the sanctions the conference has agreed to place on the South African Government. They go further than this country has yet gone, though still, not far enough. I urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to pressure the administration to abandon constructive engagement and to join the international movement against fascism, oppression, violence, and degradation practiced by the South African Government. Yet, as my colleague from Maryland stated, leadership on this issue will not come from the Reagan administration, it is up to us in the Congress. Let us be sure that we do not compromise with fascism. Let us not defy the memory of those who died fighting fascism during World War II nor contribute to the murder of its modern-day victims.●

HERITAGE DAY

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, the importance of tradition cannot be overstated. Annual events across the country, whether they be county fairs or musical gatherings, bring people together with a feeling of community pride.

Morris County, NJ, has been transformed during the past two decades from a grouping of rural communities to a growing suburban center of diversity and change.

The importance of events that bring people together in a spirit of community is even greater in areas which experience such levels of growth.

On September 7, Morris County Heritage Day will bring together the people of our area to celebrate our sense of community by emphasizing our diverse cultural heritages. By sharing our individual traditions, we can build a common tradition for the future.

Heritage Day began in 1977 as an annual celebration within the Morristown community. after several years of waining support, the event was reborn last year with a broader mission—to involve the county as a whole in the common sharing of individual cultural traditions.

We are a Nation of immigrants, who brought their unique traditions and cultural heritage with them to our shores. This process is ever continuing as people from all over the world choose to become Americans and raise their children in the American tradition.

An important part of that American tradition is the passing, from one generation to the next, of traditions brought to this county from the native lands of these new Americans.

Our traditional music, our tastes in food, our celebration of special holidays, and our appreciation of cultural diversity all stem from our own backgrounds as the descendants of immigrants who came before us to settle in America.

We are carrying on this tradition today through events such as Heritage Day, which bring together the people of Morris County to share our common heritage and to enrich that heritage by adding new traditions brought to us from other nations in the Americas, as well as from nations around the world.

This Heritage Day celebration deserves the support and active participation of all people in Morris County. By celebrating our uniqueness, we find our common heritage. ●

TRIBUTE TO JOE WROBLEWSKI

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor a man from my district who has dedicated his life to serve his community and country.

Joe Wroblewski of Forty Fort, PA, has been elected as the president of Lions International. Joe will lead 1.5 million Lions in 159 countries and geographic areas. With Joe as their dedicated leader, the Lions will raise thousands of dollars to fund research for diabetes, eye and hearing disorders. They will educate the public on drug and alcohol awareness plus build parks, swimming pools and send kids to camp.

The community and humanitarian service that Lions provide to their home towns is embodied in Lion Joe.

For the past three decades Lion Joe has inspired the members of the Ashley Lions Club. He has been honored for his service by receiving nine President's Awards, an Extension Award, an Advancement Key Award and the highest honor that can be bestowed upon a Lion, the Ambassador of Goodwill Award.

While serving his community through the Lions, he was active in the Heart Association and the Catholic Youth Center. Lion Joe's list of achievements and activities could go on and on.

I am sure Joe would agree with me that his beautiful family is the foundation upon which he has built his life. His lively wife, Normajean, is his partner in life. His four children; Lisa, Joseph (Genevieve), Eric, and Marla (Bryan), and one granddaughter, Gennie are a source of constant pleasure to Joe and Normajean.

It is fitting that Joe has been selected as the Lions International President because he is a "king of the forest."●

THE HOME HEALTH CARE PRESERVATION ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, on July 9, 1985, just 4 days after the Department of Health and Human Services announced its new cost limits for home health care, the House Select Committee on Aging held a hearing on the impact of this and other cost containment measures on the elderly's access to long-term-care services. Through the testimony of witnesses and through two surveys conducted at my request for the hearing, we learned how recent regulations issued and proposed under Medicare and Medicaid are putting aged Americans in a tragic catch-22 situation.

On the one hand, the elderly are being discharged sooner and sicker from our hospitals due to pressures to limit length of stays under DRG's. Is the health care community being buttressed to absorb the greater need the elderly now have for inhome and nursing home care? No. Instead, what few public programs cover long-term care are being put to the cost containment test without adequate information on how beneficiaries will be affected.

The newly issued cost limits for home health care are a clear example of the priority this administration gives to savings—at any cost. In this instance, the cost is borne once again by the elderly who will find it harder and harder to get the home care they need and are fully entitled to.

I fully support measures that promote fiscal responsibility, but not when people are hurt. It is in this spirit that I endorse the Medicare Home Health Protection Act of 1985, introduced by Representative ROUKEMA to prohibit the Secretary of Health and Human Services from changing reimbursement levels for methodologies for Medicare home health services. It was also in this spirit that I, together with Representative RINALDO, and Senators HEINZ and GLENN, took action to forestall the administration's efforts to revoke the waiver of liability for Medicare providers. And, it is in this spirit that I will continue a detailed study of several regulations and internal procedures being instituted by the administration that serve to limit the elderly's access to essential long-term care services.●

GILMAN URGES PASSAGE OF ENDANGERED SPECIES ACT AUTHORIZATION

HON. BENJAMIN A. GILMAN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 1027, the Endangered Species Act authorization for fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988, which is designed to authorize programs that protect various plant and animal species from extinction. I commend the distinguished gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. BREAUX] for introducing this important piece of legislation.

H.R. 1027 authorizes a total of $139.4 million over a 3-year period, which represents a freeze at fiscal year 1985 levels for fiscal year 1986, with increases for fiscal year 1987 and fiscal year 1988. The funding levels authorized will enable the U.S. Departments of Interior, Commerce, and Agriculture to carry out various preservation and protection activities. Interior is responsible for land species through its Fish and Wildlife Service, Commerce is responsible for marine species through its National Marine Fisheries Service, and Agriculture is responsible for plants.

The Endangered Species Act [ESA] of 1973 was enacted to establish a strategy for protecting endangered species of fish, wildlife, and plants. A central part of the protection strategy is the listing of endangered or threatened species and their designated habitats. A final decision on listing a certain species as endangered is based on the best scientific and commercial data available regarding the status of the species.

H.R. 1027 requires Interior to implement a system to effectively monitor the status of species that are candidates for listing and authorizes Interior to use existing emergency listing authority whenever necessary to prevent significant risk to the well-being of any such species.

In addition, the measure also authorizes an experimental relocation plan for California sea otters, a species which has been listed as threatened since 1977. H.R. 1027 directs Interior to develop a plan for relocation and management of an experimental population of California sea otters. The bill stipulates that the plan include the age, number, and sex of the sea otters proposed to be relocated, the proposed relocation site, and the manner in which the sea otters will be captured, relocated, released, monitored, and protected. Interior is authorizing this measure to use all feasible, nonlethal means to capture any sea otter that travels outside of its protected area.

The relocation plan specified in H.R. 1027 could prove to be extremely helpful in removing the sea otter from the list of threatened species. If this plan is successful, it might also be used as a model plan to restore other threatened species to a safer level.

The authorization levels specified for fiscal years 1986-88 will ensure that the Departments of Interior, Commerce, and Agriculture will be able to continue to administer the valuable preservation activities assigned them under the ESA, and thus will ensure the continued existence of many of our Nation's dwindling plant and animal species. Accordingly, I urge my colleagues to join me in passage of this important measure.●

THE 27TH AMENDMENT

HON. CHARLES W. STENHOLM

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. STENHOLM. Mr. Speaker, I rise today in support of the balanced budget/tax limitation amendment and urge this House to take the lead in making House Joint Resolution 27 the 27th amendment to the Constitution.

I couldn't say that 6 years ago. When I first came to Congress, I did not support such an amendment. There was no substitute for political courage, I felt. The Founding Fathers, in their wisdom, had bequeathed to us a flexible, living Constitution, that we should not clutter up with specific economic theory. There were other ways, through the budget process and by statute, to reduce the deficit and balance the budget.

But Mr. Speaker, 6 years in this House and $1 trillion in new Federal debt have been a sobering experience. Statutory approaches don't work—we have not achieved the balanced budgets literally required under current statutes. Some of us have cast those unpopular budget-cutting votes and survived to tell about it but, the truth is, institutional pressures from within the Government and political pressures from without, to protect this group or save that program, continue to prove overwhelming.

The Founding Fathers never anticipated the kinds of deficits we are running today. If they had, a balanced budget amendment would have been in the Constitution 198 years ago. Thomas Jefferson wrote in his later years that if "it were possible to obtain a single amendment to our Constitution," he wanted "an additional article taking from the Federal Government the power of borrowing."

Finally, requiring a balanced budget is no more theoretical, and no more rigid, than many of the limitations on our Government already in the Constitution. But it is fast becoming central to the issue of the very survival of our national economy.●

ENVIRONMENTAL AND ENERGY STUDY CONFERENCE ANNOUNCES TASK FORCE ON TOXIC EMERGENCIES

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, the number of incidents exposing our citizens and our environment to hazardous materials climbs every year. Because hazardous substances play a role in every part of our daily life—from the fuel that drives us to work, to the chemicals that produce synthetic fibers for our clothing, to the pesticides used in farming—we are surrounded by substances that, if accidentially released into our air or water, could wreak havoc as devastating as that at Bhopal, India, last December.

For this reason, the Environmental and Energy Study Conference is organizing a task force on toxic emergencies. As cochairman of the study conference, I am proud to announce this effort to work with local communities to assess their capabilities to deal with accidents involving potentially deadly materials.

The members of the task force on toxic emergencies will work with local officials and industry representatives to assess emergency response procedures. The task force will also examine the risks posed by local manufacturing and storage facilities and by the transport of hazardous materials. The study will also review, for the benefit of the local communities involved, Federal emergency assistance programs, State programs and regulations, and private industry efforts to promote planning and training.

Most accidents are dealt with by local firefighters and police. The decisions they make in the first few minutes can often make the difference between life and death, between a quickly contained incident and severe environmental contamination. These incidents can be as difficult to control as they are dangerous. For their own safety, and for the safety of the communities they protect, it is critical that "first responders" have the information, training, and equipment they need in those first few minutes.

We had a graphic example of the need for preparedness, planning, and training just this weekend in Washington, DC. Firefighters responding to an electrical blaze at the Washington Hilton Hotel waited 2 hours before entering the room and extinguishing the fire because of fears that the burning transformers contained highly toxic PCB's. As this incident shows, the time to assess the hazards around us and train personnel in correct response procedures is before an accident occurs.

My cochairman, Senator SLADE GORTON, and I have asked the study conference's co-vice-chairmen, Representative BOB WISE and Senator ALBERT GORE, JR., to head the task force. Their experience both at home and in Washington with this issue makes them particularly well qualified to head this effort.

The task force itself is a bipartisan group representing every region of the country:

Congressman Thomas R. Carper (Democrat of Delaware).
Congressman Don Edwards (Democrat of California).
Congressman Dante B. Fascell (Democrat of Florida).
Senator Albert Gore, Jr. (Democrat of Tennessee).
Congressman John J. LaFalce (Democrat of New York).
Congressman Mel Levine (Democrat of California).
Congressman Bob Livingston (Republican of Louisiana).
Congressman Lynn Martin (Republican of Illinois).
Congressman George Miller (Democrat of California).
Congressman John R. Miller (Republican of Washington).
Congressman Bruce A. Morrison (Democrat of Connecticut).
Senator Claiborne Pell (Democrat of Rhode Island).
Congressman Don Ritter (Republican of Pennsylvania).
Congressman Jim Saxton (Republican of New Jersey).
Congressman Peter J. Visclosky (Democrat of Indiana).
Congressman Barbara F. Vucanovich (Republican of Nevada).
Congressman Bob Wise (Democrat of West Virginia).

I am proud that the study conference has initiated this effort and I look forward to sharing our findings with our colleagues.●

PUBLIC SERVANT RETIRES

HON. CARLOS J. MOORHEAD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MOORHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to call to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives the retirement of a dedicated and effective public servant, Chief Charles David Mitchell of the City of Arcadia Police Department.

Chief Mitchell was born in Cambridge, OH and served in the U.S. Marine Corps as an assault section leader in the Korean conflict and later as a member of the Cambridge Police Department and the Ohio State Police before joining the Arcadia Police Department in September 1964 as a patrol officer. He later served as a motorcycle officer and within a few short years was promoted to police sergeant. He moved on to serve his community as a crime prevention officer working out of the police chief's office. In that position, he made his presence felt immediately through his involvement in programs such as community relations, policemen on campus and crime prevention activities and training.

Within a few years he was appointed top law enforcement officer in the City of Arcadia. During his 21 years with the Arcadia Police Force, Chief Mitchell helped mold a police department that is a source of pride to the community and the people who serve in his department. He utilized police patrol wagons to transport prisoners and his undercover narcotics operations. Also among his innovations was the establishment of the canine program which was the first of its type to utilize multiple handlers for the police dogs.

The residents of Arcadia and the wider community will miss Charles Mitchell's leadership in the maintaining of safety and welfare for themselves and their families. His concern for the community is further evidenced by his desire to continue to provide services to the city on a consultant basis after his retirement. His many innovations and accomplishments will benefit the residents of Arcadia for years to come.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of myself and the residents of the 22nd Congressional District, I would like to express deep appreciation for the fine service Charles Mitchell has given to the community and our very best wishes on his retirement.●

FARMER OF THE YEAR IN TENNESSEE

HON. BART GORDON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to take this opportunity to honor Mr. Edward Harlan, 29, who was recently named "Farmer of the Year in Tennessee." His life is testimony to the fact that he is not only a credit to his family, but to the Nation as well. His life story embodies that of a true American success story.

At age 19, Edward Harlan's father died of cancer leaving him the family farm near Columbia, TN. The farm stretched for more than 700 acres and had a debt mounting to thousands of dollars. Through persistence and hard work, Ed kept the family of four children together, and turned the family farm into a business success. When Ed took over the farm, it was burdened with inheritance fees and mortgage payments. During the 1970's he was able to work off the debts by increasing soybean, dairy, and grain operations and eliminating less profitable products such as sheep, swine, and horses. While working long days that often lasted hours after dusk, Ed produced 30,000 pounds of tobacco, milked 80 cows daily, and at the same time, earned a science degree from Columbia State Community College. During this time he also had to adjust quickly to new methods of farming technology—the use of computers, new feeding techniques, double-cropping, aerial herbicide, seed application, telemarketing, embryo transfer, and other new discoveries concerning genetics. Ed's continued positive outlook, his respect for tradition, and his stubbornness in knowing that he would make a success of the farm regardless of what trials befell, were factors that have determined his success.

It is through people such as Edward Harlan that we find the American spirit still alive, and it is through people such as him, that we find the qualities of the ideal American farmer.●

CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE FOR SOVIET JEWS

HON. ANTHONY C. BEILENSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BEILENSON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleagues who have organized the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience for Soviet Jews, and to take a few moments to draw your attention to the plight of Boris and Elena Klotz and their two children.

Boris graduated from Moscow State University and works as a mathematician. Elena graduated from the Moscow Pedagogical Institute where she studied French and German; she is currently working at the Jewish kindergarten which her son, Mathew, attends. In December 1980, the Klotzes' were first refused visas on the grounds of the alleged secrecy of Elena's job, and since that time Boris has been demoted to a lesser job.

By granting the Klotz family permission to emigrate, the Soviet Union not only would indicate to the world its respect for the principles outlined in the Helsinki accords, but also would affirm its desire to improve the strained relations between the United States and the U.S.S.R. Such action would be particularly significant coming at this time as we mark the 10th anniversary of the Helsinki Final Act.

I fervently hope that Secretary Gorbachev will seek to reverse the continuing decline in Soviet Jewish emigration over the past several years, and that the Klotzes will be among those who are finally allowed to join their families in Israel.●

CONGRESSMAN WILLIAM M. THOMAS SALUTES THE ANTELOPE VALLEY DOMESTIC VIOLENCE COUNCIL AND THE VALLEY OASIS SHELTER

HON. WILLIAM M. THOMAS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. THOMAS of California. Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to call the attention of my colleagues to the Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council; the Valley Oasis Shelter and its director, Jan Rochelle; and the citizens of Antelope Valley.

In 1980, the citizens of Antelope Valley saw a need in Antelope Valley to combat the high incidence of domestic violence that was found to occur in the area and formed the Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council. Soon afterward, this council opened the Valley Oasis Shelter which, in 1985, will provide care, shelter, and counseling to over 400 women and their children.

This shelter is equipped with facilities to handle over 30 women and their children at one time. It provides food, clothing, housing, job training, and most importantly, counseling for the victim, the abuser, and their children. The Valley Oasis Shelter is working not only to rescue the victim from her environment, but to halt the cycle of abuse that may affect any children of the marriage.

The Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council was begun by dedicated Antelope Valley citizens. Churches, businesses, schools, and service clubs joined together in a unique effort to provide this invaluable community service. This volunteer effort has continued since its inception, with over 50 community volunteers assisting the 6 regular staff members in running the shelter. In addition, the shelter receives over 80 percent of their funds from the Antelope Valley community.

The Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council and the Valley Oasis Shelter are an excellent example of community resources joining together to solve a community problem. Rather than rely on the Federal Government to confront this social issue, Antelope Valley citizens have organized to produce this self-sustaining, effective answer to domestic violence. As Jan Rochelle, director of the Valley Oasis Shelter has said, "We are seeing positive change, and we're doing it with the help of every member of this community."

For its continuing efforts to reach victims of domestic violence and its inspiring community support, I believe the Antelope Valley Domestic Violence Council, the Valley Oasis Shelter and Director Jan Rochelle deserve the highest praise from this body.●

TRIBUTE TO LOUIE AND HILDA MARTIN

HON. TONY COELHO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. COELHO. Mr. Speaker, earlier this year, Mrs. Hilda Martin was named one of the Citizens of the Year by the Laton Chamber of Commerce in California.

Louie and Hilda Martin have lived in Laton for the past 40 years. During this time, Mrs. Martin has been very active in a wide variety of civic and community service organizations. She is a past president of the Laguna Mother's Club, the Laton High Home and School Club, the Laton Mother's Club, the U.P.P.E.C. Lodge in Riverdale and the I.D.E.S. Lodge in Hardwick. She was secretary of the fire commissioners for 10 years, and a C.D.C. instructor for 20 years. Mrs. Martin has been a member of the Kings County Dairywomen, the California Native Daughters of the Golden West, the Hanford Sacred Heart Auxiliary, the Fresno Cabrillo Club, and the Holy Family Guild. She is presently active in the Our Lady of Fatima Altar Society, the Our Lady of Fatima Choir, the Laton Lionesses, and the Laton Chamber of Commerce.

Civic involvement and community service is a tradition in the Martin household—Louie Martin was named Laton's Citizen of the Year in 1975 in recognition of his similar commitment to the community. On behalf of the people of Laton, I would like to thank both Louie and Hilda Martin for their long record of service and dedication to the Laton community, and I congratulate Mrs. Martin upon being named the city's Citizen of the Year.●

GOOD SAMARITANS MARVIN VERSCHURE AND BENJAMIN PAONI CITED FOR THEIR HEROISM

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, each new day brings something new, frequently the unexpected, sometimes opportunities to help another human being.

Last month, Monday, July 15, was a day three of my constituents will long remember.

In morning traffic, William Schultz of Lysander, NY, his seat belt fastened, was driving east on U.S. Route 690 in his sturdy 1974 Volvo near the Jones Road exit when he braked to a stop in a construction area. Driving a large Buick behind Schultz was Marvin VerSchure of Baldwinsville, NY. As VerSchure approached a rise in the highway, he was unable to see the halted line of cars ahead. He slammed into the rear end of Schultz's Volvo, causing the Volvo to collide with the car in front of it.

Schultz's car burst into flames. Fire spread to VerSchure's car but he was able to escape and go to the aid of Schultz whose shirt and beard were afire.

A worker on the construction site, Benjamin Paoni of Canastota, NY, and VerSchure pulled Schultz, a big man who is six feet four and weighs 250 pounds and then in shock, from his burning car. The rescuers dragged Schultz away to safety from the burning wrecks, smothered the flames burning his clothing and beard and placed him on an embankment to await the arrival of medics.

Schultz sustained burns and a whiplash. The seatbelt probably saved him from suffering more serious injuries. He was treated in a hospital emergency room and released, and is recovering from his injuries.

He has no memory of his rescue and events immediately following his accident. But he will always remember the good samaritans who saved his life.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, August 17, during the forthcoming recess, I will have the privilege of participating in a ceremony to honor the two heroes, Marvin VerSchure and Benjamin Paoni. The ceremony is being sponsored by the Vietnam Veterans of America, Central New York Chapter 103, of which William Schultz is a member.

With pride, I commend the deeds of these brave constituents of mine to the attention of our colleagues in the Congress of the United States.●

CONFERENCE REQUESTED

HON. ALAN B. MOLLOHAN

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MOLLOHAN. Mr. Speaker, I don't believe we should be leaving this Chamber for the August break without resolving an important issue.

As you know, the House and Senate have passed legislation enabling homeowners and small businessmen to use seller financing in the sale of their property.

However, there has been no conference on this matter and therefore, as of July 1, 1985, the IRS started licking their chops.

They see these transactions going on as we speak and without any law to protect the seller—the IRS may begin to penalize these sellers.

It is our job to provide certainty in the marketplace and nothing is happening.

The needs of our constitutents make it imperative that we move quickly to a conference so that we can go home and tell our constituents the IRS has been held at bay.●

THE LEGAL FEES EQUITY ACT

HON. THOMAS N. KINDNESS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KINDNESS. Mr. Speaker, today I have introduced a bill, to be known as the Legal Fees Equity Act, which I believe will help to correct some of the inequities that have arisen in the attorney compensation schemes created by Congress in more than 100 Federal statutes.

Although the bill as it is presently written may not be perfect and will most certainly be revised in some degree, it is a solid starting point that will provide Members with a vehicle with which to address the changes that are needed.

I look forward to working closely with my colleagues from both sides of the aisle on the Committee on the Judiciary as we address this most necessary area of reform and invite cosponsorship by all of our colleagues who believe that the Congress must bring order out of chaos in the matter of "fee shifting" provisions in our laws.●

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION 3

HON. BERKLEY BEDELL

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BEDELL. Mr. Speaker, on January 3, JIM LEACH and I reintroduced House Joint Resolution 3, a measure to prevent nuclear explosive testing. Since that time, House Joint Resolution 3 has gained the solid, bipartisan support of 196 of our colleagues.

Extensive hearings have been held on the merits of our proposal and I am pleased that the House Foreign Affairs Committee has reported House Joint Resolution 3 unamended for further consideration by the House when we return from the August recess. The committee filed its report on this measure on July 24 (Rept. 99-221) and I commend it to my colleagues' attention.

Because House rules preclude the addition of cosponsors after a committee has filed a report on pending legislation, I am, today, extending my remarks to add the cosponsorship of two other Members of the House who would like to associate their names with House Joint Resolution 3 and urge its passage. They are the Honorable SILVIO CONTE of Massachusetts and the Honorable DON FUQUA of Florida. Their support in this effort is deeply appreciated and raises the total number of cosponsors of House Joint Resolution 3 to 200.

Clearly, in light of recent events between the superpowers with respect to the issue of nuclear testing and in light of the 40th anniversary of the atomic bombing of Hiroshima and Nagasaki, I can think of no better action the Congress could take toward enhancing the prospects of ending the nuclear arms race than passage of House Joint Resolution 3.●

SUPPORT THE ITC FOOTWEAR DECISION

HON. WILLIAM W. COBEY, JR.

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. COBEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise in the hope of persuading my colleagues to support the International Trade Commission's recommendations on manufactured footwear goods. We must ensure that our domestic footwear industry is protected from further damage.

Our footwear industry has been devastated by the influx of imports: 105 factories closed in 1984; 13,300 jobs were lost; and 1984 production dropped 13.3 percent. In June, 77.7 million pairs of shoes entered the United States, compared to 57.8 million pairs in June 1984. Footwear imports now control over 75 percent of our domestic footwear market.

If the President upholds the ITC recommendations, our domestic footwear industry plans to embark on a massive 5-year modernization effort to become more competitive and productive. During the 5-year period, the U.S. footwear industry will adopt the technology that will lower its costs. This will make U.S.-made shoes price competitive with imports, which now have a price advantage because of lower wages overseas.

If the President fails to act, the results could be disastrous. In my district there is a good chance that additional footwear jobs will be lost at the Walker Shoe Co.'s Asheboro, NC, plant. The same result could occur at other footwear plants around the country.

The ITC recommendations were forwarded to the President on July 1. By law the President has 60 days to accept, modify, or reject the recommendations.

I urge my colleagues to express their support for the ITC ruling by contacting President Reagan. We must ensure that the President is aware of our strong resolve to prevent further footwear plant closings and job losses.●

NEW LEGISLATION

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, today I am privileged to introduce legislation to withdraw some 1,900 acres of public land located in Hungry Valley, NV, for use by the Reno-Sparks Tribal Colony.

The Reno-Sparks Indian Colony was established in 1917 through the purchase of a 20-acre tract of land by the Federal Government, for the amount of $6,000. This purchase was a direct result of the abolishment of certain treaties by the Congress in 1871, and the subsequent need to address various nonreservation Indian groups who had not been accommodated by the treaty allotment system.

The Reno-Sparks Tribal Colony's population has grown by more than 400 percent since that time, and for the past 15 years the colony has been working diligently to expand its land base for housing and economic development. Today's legislation is a balanced and well-planned culmination of these efforts.

Despite some initial misunderstandings about the colony's development intentions, this proposed withdrawal now has virtually unanimous support at the local level. Most importantly, enactment of this bill will trigger a contractual agreement between the colony and Washoe County, dated June 26, 1984, which provides for transfer to the county of 160 acres of colony lands located in nearby Lemmon Valley.

Finally, this bill provides for the cancellation of grazing privileges on only the 640 acres which the colony intends to develop for housing. It is my intention to cause as little disturbance as possible to the present grazing activities in Hungry Valley. I believe that this bill's grazing provisions will accomplish that goal.

I look forward to working with my colleagues toward this bill's swift enactment, and I ask unanimous consent that a copy of the bill, together with this statement, appear in the RECORD at this point.●

FLORIO BILL WOULD HONOR KOREAN WAR VETERANS

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of my colleagues to a recent news article which appeared in the Baltimore Sun newspaper. The article concerns a topic of great interest to the 1 million Americans who served in Korea during the Korean war.

My distinguished colleague from New Jersey, JIM FLORIO, is the principal sponsor of legislation which would establish a suitable memorial to the memory of those served in that brief yet brutal war. It is hard to believe that today, 35 years after the end of that war, there is no national memorial dedicated to those who fought and died in Korea.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to be a cosponsor of H.R. 2205, the Korean War Memorial Act. I am glad to see the importance which my colleagues have attached this bill by guaranteeing its quick passage.

The article follows:

VETERANS SEEK MEMORIAL FOR KOREAN WAR COLLEAGUES

(By Ernest B. Furgurson)

WASHINGTON.—A House task force heard bipartisan, often emotional support yesterday for construction of a federally funded Korean Was memorial in the capital.

Senator John H. Glenn (D. Ohio), a Marine fighter pilot in World War II and Korea, was momentarily overcome and had to interrupt his testimony while telling of a friend who tried to carry on his combat job after being shot through the throat. He said, "We are not here to honor ourselves, but out of very profound respect for their sacrifices."

Witness after witness recalled yesterday that 54,000 Americans lost their lives in the Korean War, which began 35 years ago last month and ended 32 years ago this month. Yet it lasted less than a third as long as the Vietnam War.

Each witness also echoed one congressman's opinion that it was an "outrage" that the Korean conflict was the only American war not memorialized here.

Other legislators and representatives of veterans' organizations were unanimous in backing the proposal sponsored by Representatives James Florio (D. N.J.) and H. V. (Sonny) Montgomery (D. Miss.), chairman of the House Veterans Affairs Committee.

The sponsors accepted an amendment to make their measure match another, put in by Representative Stan Parris (R. Va.), and authorize the American Battle Monuments Commission to oversee design and construction of a memorial. About half the House already has signed on to co-sponsor one or the other of the bills.

The proposal would make available up to $5 million for a memorial. But the commission also can accept tax-deductible private, corporate or foundation contributions to offset the cost to taxpayers.

Representative Mary Rose Oakar (D. Ohio), chair of the task force on libraries and memorials, said she expected the measure to be cleared by the House Administration Committee by early August, and then to move quickly to passage. Comparable legislation has been introduced in the Senate.

Ms. Oakar emphasized that this legislation was "absolutely divorced" from a controversy that had arisen among private organizations who began commercial fundraising for such a memorial. Several previous bills that would have approved building a memorial here were sidetracked by that controversy.●

A BILL TO REAUTHORIZE AND EXPAND THE REVENUE SOURCES FOR THE SUPERFUND PROGRAM

HON. BRIAN J. DONNELLY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, 2 months from today the 5-year Federal Superfund Program to cleanup hazardous waste sites will expire. There is broad, bipartisan consensus that Superfund must be reauthorized and strengthened. Abandoned toxic waste sites have been discovered in every region of our country. They pose a very real threat to the health of our citizens and to our environment. People in many communities across America are troubled that their drinking water supplies may have been, or are in danger of being, contaminated by mishandled hazardous substances. When Congress first enacted Superfund legislation in 1980 to respond to this environmental crisis, the enormous scope of the problem of abandoned toxic waste was unknown.

What has been learned over the last 5 years is that the problem is more widespread than was ever imagined. The Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] has listed 812 sites on the national priority list [NPL] because those sites pose the greatest degree of threat to human health and the environment. EPA has recently calculated that as many as 2,000 more sites could be added in the next few years to the national priority list. The General Accounting Office estimates that number could reach as high as 4,000. The Office of Technology Assessment suggests that as many as 10,000 additional sites around the country could qualify for national priority listing.

There is no disagreement that the present level of funding for Superfund is inadequate if we are to accomplish the intentions of the Superfund Program, and rid our environment of toxic waste. There are a number of proposals that have been discussed as mechanisms for insuring adequate resources for the successful implementation of the Superfund Program into the next decade.

The administration has proposed a bill that would provide $5.3 billion over the next 5 years. That plan would continue the existing system of taxing 42 chemical feedstocks and petroleum, and would implement a waste end tax.

Last year the House passed a bill, H.R. 5640, that significantly raised the feedstock taxes and expanded the list of taxable substances. The taxable chemicals are either themselves hazardous, or are the basic components of all other major inorganic and organic hazardous wastes and substances. The majority of toxic chemicals discovered at Superfund sites are on the feedstock list, or are derivatives of those chemical building blocks.

The waste end tax is an idea that makes sense. While it can provide a dependable, substantial revenue component for Superfund, it also serves the purpose of providing economic incentives for the most environmentally sound methods of disposing of hazardous wastes. A waste end tax is in harmony with the goal of allocating the cleanup costs for hazardous waste directly to those industries which use and produce those hazardous substances.

Proposals for implementation of another new revenue source, the so-called corporate broad-based or manufacturers excise tax, are less readily justifiable in terms of direct relation to the problem of improperly-managed hazardous waste.

The Superfund revenue bill I am introducing today calls for a 5-year $12.15 billion program. It would implement a waste-end tax on the disposal and storage of hazardous waste at RCRA-licensed facilities. Waste received at landfills, land treatment, waste piles, and disposal impoundments, would be taxed at $25 per wet-weight ton. Dilute waste received at injection wells would be taxed at $5 per wet-weight ton. Waste rendered nontoxic by treatment would not be taxed. Hopefully, this form of system will reward and encourage those users and generators of hazardous waste who conscientiously manage their waste.

The bill would expand the list of taxable feedstock chemicals to 56, and raise the rates in several stages. The tax on petroleum would be increased. General revenues of $250 million per year would be allocated to Superfund. The problem of abandoned hazardous waste is clearly a national concern. It demands a more extensive commitment of resources than currently provided. I look forward to working with my colleagues in the busy days ahead to enact a workable and responsive Superfund bill. We owe it to the people of our country.●

REPORT ON IMPUTED INTEREST NEEDED

HON. ROBIN TALLON

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. TALLON. Mr. Speaker, I am greatly troubled that once again in the rush of this Congress to adjourn, we are leaving behind in Washington a legislative task which is within a heartbeat of being concluded in a bipartisan and satisfactory manner. I am speaking of the need for this body to approve a conference report on imputed interest.

It is my understanding that, because of a concerted effort on the part of many on both sides of the aisle, all of the major areas of disagreement between the House and Senate imputed interest bills have been resolved. Only minor roadblocks stand in the way of Congress beginning the August recess with a solution in hand.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues are aware, stopgap legislation passed to temporarily specify the tax treatment of seller-financing expired on June 30. As each day passes, there is growing uncertainty in the marketplace over how to structure important real estate transactions.

As a strong supporter of the efforts made by so many in this body to achieve a solution to this problem, I urge my colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee to name conferees, resolve the differences which remain, and provide the homebuyers and sellers, agricultural interests, and small businesses who make frequent use of seller-financing with the directive necessary to conduct transactions of real property.●

CONGRESS MUST ACT TO HELP IN THE FIGHT AGAINST DRUGS

HON. JAMES A. TRAFICANT, JR.

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. TRAFICANT. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deep concern over the growing problem of drug abuse and the violence associated with international and domestic drug trafficking. The time has come for this Congress to take a firm stand to protect our youth from the devastating effects of drug abuse—and to protect our law enforcement officers in the field combating illicit drug trade.

I have introduced legislation, H.R. 2954, the Controlled Substances Penalties Act of 1985, that would address this problem head on. Most importantly, H.R. 2954 establishes a new, higher level of drug trafficking offenses. Stiffer penalties will be imposed in cases involving: 2 or more kilograms of cocaine; 1 kilogram or more of any other narcotic drug; 1 kilogram or more of PCP; and 25 grams or more of LSD. In all these cases, bond would automatically be denied—thus insuring that these offenders at least stand trial.

In these cases, first offenders would be subject to up to 30 years in prison and/or a maximum fine of $500,000. Second offenders would be subject to a maximum term of life imprisonment. In addition, those convicted would have to serve at least half of the imposed sentence before becoming eligible for parole.

When one examines the scope and nature of domestic and international drug trade, one will discover how large this problem has become. Drug abuse in this Nation continues to ravage our youth and drain our society. In addition to being a sheriff, I was also a drug counselor for 10 years. I have seen the tragic consequences of drug abuse. Those ultimately responsible for the poisoning of our youth and the ravaging of our way of life are the kingpin drug dealers who are responsible for the massive influx of narcotic drugs into this country.

In too many instances these drug kingpins—if apprehended—post bond, which is usually set quite high, and then flee the country. My bill would ensure that these drug kingpins stand trial and that, if convicted, they pay dearly for their crimes. Recent events have shown that these drug kingpins have openly declared war against our law enforcement officers in the field. We need to enact tougher laws to protect our law enforcement officers and to protect our society from poisonous drugs. We are in a war—whether we like it or not. It is a war we must win. Passage of H.R. 2954 would send a powerful message to the entire world that America has had enough and that we are serious about fighting drugs.

I urge all of my colleagues to take a good look at H.R. 2954 and lend it their full support.●

NASA'S NATIONAL SPACE TECHNOLOGY LABORATORIES IN THE BATTLE AGAINST WATER POLLUTION

HON. TRENT LOTT

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, in view of the recent House passage of H.R. 8, to renew the Federal Water Pollution Control Act. I think it timely to advise this Chamber of research activities undertaken by the National Space Technology Laboratories [NSTL] to assist in this Nation's efforts to assure a clean water supply. NSTL, located in Bay St. Louis in my district, has employed an unusual tool in the water pollution battle—the water hyacinth, long regarded as a weed that clogged streams and lakes.

Because of their beautiful lavender flowers, the water hyacinth was brought to this country by Japanese exhibitors in 1884, as part of the New Orleans Cotton States Exposition. The plants were given away as souvenirs and when many were thrown away in drainage canals, streams and swamps, the trouble soon began. Due to the lack of insects which controlled the water hyacinth's growth in its native environment, the plant grew at an explosive rate.

NASA studies now show that the water hyacinth, when used under controlled conditions, is ideally suited for purifying domestic as well as certain industrial wastewaters. They can be harvested and ground into fertilizers, used to produce biogas and fiber, and can be harnessed to produce large quantities of freshwater.

NASA's research into the potential benefits of the water hyacinth has been led by Dr. Billy C. Wolverton, Ph.D., a senior research scientist, and Rebecca C. McDonald, a research chemist, at NASA's National Space Technology Laboratories. The water hyacinth also shows promise for partially supplying life sustaining functions for space travel, including oxygen, food, pure water, and waste treatment. These functions of the water hyacinth could be useful on the NASA space station.

For the past 11 years, the water hyacinth has been tested at NASA's NSTL as an inexpensive method of treating wastewater. The vascular aquatic plants used in the early studies were floating species. This research led to the installation of a simple and cost effective wastewater treatment system at NSTL and development communities in Florida, Texas, and California.

NASA recently developed an advanced hybrid natural wastewater process that combines anerobic microbial filter technology with the vascular plant wastewater treatment technology; although this system was developed for domestic sewage, it has shown a potential for chemical waste and drinking water treatment.

One of the most important chemicals in use today is phenol; it is used to manufacture phenolic resins, epoxy resins, herbicides and nylon. It is also an important industrial and pharmaceutical solvent. Recent concerns about the discharge of large quantities of the chemical into the Mississippi River north of New Orleans and subsequent contamination of the city's drinking water demonstrated the need for efficient, inexpensive means of removing phenol and other toxic chemicals from contaminated drinking water. NASA's advanced natural wastewater treatment process was tested successfully in meeting this challenge.

Thanks to NASA research, the dreaded water hyacinth is forming a new image. Instead of the uncontrollable aquatic monster it has been for a hundred years, it is now emerging as an ideal candidate for large scale nutrient removal and water purification systems. The water hyacinth promises to aid mankind in meeting its most basic problems of sustaining an acceptable quality of life here on Earth and also in the remoteness of space.●

A TRIBUTE TO MRS. J.C. MONCIER

HON. JOHN J. DUNCAN

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DUNCAN. Mr. Speaker, each year high school students in Knoxville sponsor a walkathon for the St. Jude's Children's Hospital. These students will also collect money for the local empty stocking fund on weekends in the fall, and hand out food baskets, and toys for the needy before Christmas. These students are members of Knoxville's Teen Board, an organization of students from high schools throughout the city.

The force behind the teen board, and its founder was Mrs. J.C. Moncier. She died earlier this year, but left behind a legacy of good will, and young men and women more aware of the world and its needs.

She was a native of Knoxville, and the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Herbert C. Sanford. Throughout her life she was active in welfare, civic, and club work. She began working with children in the John Tarleton Home, and proceeded to involvement in the Boy and Girl Scouts, First Christian Church youth group, PTA, Daughters of the American Revolution, the Ossoli Circle, and the Knoxville Junior League, as well as many others.

Mrs. Moncier was honored for her work by the Sertoma Club and the Exchange Club. She was selected to receive the key to the city of Knoxville by four mayors.

Her lasting tribute to the city of Knoxville, however, will be the teen board, which she founded in 1960. The loss of her daughter, Marty, in a car accident led her to reach out to teenagers and bred a love which has endured for the past 25 years. She was affectionately known as "Mama Mon" to succeeding generations of teenage students. She would cajole, lecture, or enthuse her young followers with visions of their responsibilities to others.

The teen board attracted many of the more fortunate teenagers in the city. Mrs. Moncier always reminded the young people of their good fortune, and the need to share that good fortune with others. She made clear the responsibilities which lay ahead for the students, and used their enthusiasm and energy to help the poor and needy.

This month, as the teen board of Knoxville celebrates its 25th anniversary, a special ceremony will be held to dedicate the organization's facilities to "Mama Mon." Those youngsters she helped over the past 25 years have now attained positions of stature in the community, and throughout the country. They will return to the teen board house to remember the spirit and love of a very special friend.●

WOMEN WARRIORS

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to inform my colleagues of a film entitled "Women Warriors" which is being produced in my district. The film, produced by the Skill Development Institute in cooperation with the Maryland Nurses Association, Inc., is a 50-minute videotape about Army nurses who served in Vietnam.

This documentary will serve many purposes. First, it will provide the opportunity to portray women as decisive, independent leaders. Second, it will bring attention to the fact that women did, and continue to, serve this country in times of need. Third, it will show the vital contributions these brave women made under the demands of Vietnam. Finally, it will demonstrate the experiences of these nurses in Vietnam and how these experiences have affected their lives.

This program will enhance not only the image of the professional nurse but the image of women in general. For years, nurses have reacted negatively to their portrayals as dependent, nondecisive victims in movies and print media. This film will demonstrate the contribution these women have made thereby enlightening society to women's abilities, uniqueness, and professional commitment. This project provides an ideal medium for informing the public and other health care professionals of nurses' abilities to help create a more responsive health care system. Most of all, this production serves as valuable educational material to be included in teaching future nurses and health care professionals as well as Army, Navy, and Air Force trainees.

While infantry and other military personnel were fighting battles in Vietnam, the nurses were battling to save lives. These nurses were caregivers who received little caring. I am proud of these women and I am proud of the nurses in Maryland who are embarking on this project. I wish them great success and express my wholehearted support for this wonderful endeavor.●

SOUTH AFRICA

HON. CHARLES B. RANGEL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RANGEL. Mr. Speaker, I rise to ask President Reagan one simple question: Why, after so much bloodshed in South Africa, do you persistently defend massive American investment in that country?

There comes a time when a nation must take a principled stand for its own good. We are to closely allied to a nation which practices a racial hatred unprecedented since Nazi Germany. Our efforts under the doctrine of constructive engagement to bring about moderation in Pretoria have been futile. if anything, Pretoria has increased its repression of the black majority.

Our credibility is at stake. We can take no pride in how the Reagan administration has dealt with South Africa in the past. Nor can we take pride in how they have responded to the present crisis.

We are a nation founded upon the pillars of liberty, freedom, and equality. It is a shame, and downright hypocritical, for us to extend a helping hand to a regime based on intolerance, repression, and racial separation.

Mr. Speaker, how can we hope to win the hearts and minds of the poor in the Third World when we are supporting one of the worst regimes in history? If we are to defeat communism and dictatorship, we must present a higher moral alternative. The battle is not against some monolithic Marxist army, but against poverty and oppression in all guises and forms.

Now is the time, and South Africa is the place, to act. Let us more forward, before we lose yet another chance to prove that America is friend of those who cry out for freedom. Let us move forward, before extremists really do seize the opportunity to strike for their own narrow interests. We must do what is just.●

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce legislation of prime importance to the State of Nevada.

For over 80 years, Indian water rights and related water resources issues along the Truckee and Carson River systems have been the focus of conflict in northern Nevada. There are some 15 separate lawsuits, many of them still pending, which have involved every major holder of water rights along these rivers. The result of this conflict has generated a variety of controversies within the State, and despite years of legal maneuvering, the problems remain. For example, the Indians' needs had not been met. The farmers have spent tens of thousands of dollars in legal fees to little or no avail. Finally, the growth of the Reno-Sparks area has been literally halted. Even when decisions were finally reached regarding one aspect of the rivers' operation or management, the outstanding problems, due to the complexity of issues and crosscutting litigation, prevented any real action.

Since 1981, the Reagan administration has encouraged the settlement of Indian water rights claims through negotiation rather than litigation. In the arid West, where competition for water is intense, litigated solutions to water problems generally result in nothing more than further litigation. Through negotiation we can bring the interested parties together and reach a solution that is acceptable to all of the parties involved. We have seen the effectiveness of such approaches as demonstrated by the Papago and Ak-Chin settlements which were enacted by the last Congress.

In negotiating the Pyramid Lake and Truckee River Settlement Act, which I am introducing today, I am happy to say that all of the parties involved in the settlement were active participants. These participants, which I commend, include: the Pyramid Lake Paiute Tribe, the Truckee-Carson Irrigation District, the Sierra Pacific Power Co., the Carson-Truckee Conservancy District, the cities of Reno and Sparks, the Washoe County Conservancy District, the States of Nevada and California and the Department of the Interior.

Key issues during the negotiations included the operation of Stampede Reservoir, which is part of the Washoe reclamation project in California; diversions from the Truckee River to the Newlands reclamation project, which is operated by the Truckee-Carson Irrigation District in conjunction with the operating criteria of the Secretary of the Interior; and the maintenance of the Pyramid Lake fisheries.

The eight major points of the proposed settlement to resolve these issues are:

First, the termination of litigation.

Second, the development of a fish propagation program funded by a settlement fund. The settlement fund will involve a one-time Federal appropriation of $21 million, and an $8 million contribution from the State of Nevada in the form of an interest-accruing trust fund account.

Third, the establishment of a minimum level for Pyramid Lake.

Fourth, the adoption of a "menu approach" for providing additional water flows into Pyramid Lake to meet the minimum level requirements. This "menu approach" includes a process for executing Stampede Reservoir operating agreement.

Fifth, the negotiation of Truckee River diversion criteria by the irrigation district and the Department of the Interior. This criteria must be agreed to by the State of Nevada and the Paiute Tribe.

Sixth, the creation of a $10 million tribal trust fund.

Seventh, the establishment of maximum damages payments of $7 million to the tribe by the Federal Government should the Pyramid Lake criteria not be met.

Finally, the ratification of the California-Nevada compact, which was approved by then-Governors Reagan and Laxalt in 1969.

It is critical that Congress understand that the operating criteria for Stampede Reservoir and the Truckee-Carson Irrigation District's diversions, both of which are contained in various sections of the proposed agreement, are subject to multilateral agreements. The settlement provides for a 12-month negotiating period with the potential for a 6-month extension. The entire settlement package is conditioned upon the successful resolution of these two issues.

Fortunately, the agreement itself does not require major construction or Federal financing. Direct Federal contributions would total $31 million for the settlement fund and the tribal trust fund. The Federal Government would also forgive a $1.5 million repayment contract with the Truckee-Carson Irrigation District and assume liability for Pyramid Lake level damages. The State of Nevada would provide $8 million for the settlement fund, roughly one-fourth of the total cost for implementing this agreement. This compares most favorably with the levels of Federal financing that were provided to earlier water rights settlements approved by this body.

This agreement represents a reasonable approach to solving the problems which have been generating controversy in Nevada for far too many years. It also represents a fiscally responsible approach to the problem. With that and the resolution of a long-standing problem concerning Nevada in mind, I would urge my colleagues in the House to expeditiously consider and approve this proposed settlement.●

SOCIAL SECURITY'S 50TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. FRED J. ECKERT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ECKERT of New York. Mr. Speaker, on August 14 we will mark the 50th anniversary of the most successful and valuable social program in our Nation's history, the Social Security Program, or as it is officially titled, the Old Age, Survivors and Disability Insurance Program [OASDI]. The Social Security Act was signed into law on August 14, 1935.

When Social Security began, as a reaction to the widespread economic insecurity of the Great Depression, a little more than 27 million workers were covered and taxes and benefits were modest. The size and scope of the program have been expanded in all ways since then, encompassing most employee groups, adding benefits for dependents, survivors and disabled, and covering a share of medical and hospital costs. Now 119 million workers and their employers contributed $186 billion in Social Security payroll taxes to the program last year and 36 million persons received $180 billion in benefits. The medicare programs involved more than $64 billion additionally in contributions and benefits.

The great majority of America's retired people now count on Social Security as the foundation for their retirement and it has vastly improved conditions of their retirement years. Millions of elderly Americans bank on the program for protection against loss of income, and for meeting potentially overwhelming medical expenses.

Though benefits were not paid for the first 5 years of the program, Social Security has today become a currently-financed program with workers and employers paying taxes to finance current benefits. While the first year's tax rate was 1 percent levied on $3,000 of income, today's program is financed by a combined tax rate of 14.1 percent shared by employees and employers on up to $39,600 of income. Where the first year's workers could have paid a maximum of $30 a year, today an employee may pay as much as $2,790 a year, and the amount is matched by the employer.

The Social Security Program has been troubled by financial difficulties in recent years as benefits paid have exceeded income. The current tax rates finally produced a fund surplus for Social Security last year after the fund had incurred a deficit in 9 of the past 10 years. Changes made by the Social Security Amendments of 1977 and 1983 have restored the financial viability of the program and enabled experts to assure us that the financial condition of the program will remain healthy well into the next century. Congress must make certain it remains that way.

Cost-of-living increases in benefits were first provided in 1972 as a substitute for haphazard adjustments in benefits made by Congress to keep retirees abreast of the continuing inflation. In recent years the so-called COLA has been in controversy as part of the careful search for economies in all Government spending. I favor retaining the COLA as it is for Social Security retirees; it is a provision which should be preserved. Too many people depend upon Social Security benefits for their basic retirement income to tamper with this provision. There are many other areas of Government spending which can more properly bear reductions to meet the demands of our present serious efforts to reduce the ominous budget deficit. Cutting the deficit would be the most effective means of restraining inflation and the cost of living.

Social Security, during its short history, has brought a fundamental change to the outlook on aging for American families. They can plan and prepare with much greater confidence and feeling of security than in the past. Social Security, at 50, is a living monument to the best in partnership between the generations of our citizens, between workers and employers, between the people and their Government. It is a program truly of the people, by the people, and for the people.●

MEDICARE PAYMENT REFORM AND HEALTH CARE IMPROVED ACCESS ACT OF 1985

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce the Medicare Payment Reform and Health Care Improved Access Act of 1985. It is a series of initiatives Senator KENNEDY and I developed to ensure that adequate health care is made available to millions of Americans who are now denied it.

When Senator KENNEDY and I announced our plan earlier this year, I indicated that an attempt would be made to include some of the provisions in the Medicare budget legislation considered by the Ways and Means Committee. I am happy to report that several of these measures were endorsed by the Ways and Means Committee this week as part of H.R. 3128.

One of our goals is to make health insurance available to Americans who currently lack it. In that regard, we would allow laid off workers as well as widows and divorced spouses of workers to purchase insurance through the employer-sponsored plans they were once affiliated with. The employer would not have to, but could, make a contribution in such instances. We would also encourage States to create subsidized insurance pools, not unlike those that now exist for auto insurance, to make sure that coverage was available to all at a reasonable cost. These provisions alone could help nearly 10 million Americans.

We also ask the Department of Health and Human Services to conduct demonstrations on how small businesses could offer health insurance coverage more cheaply.

Our second goal is directed at guaranteeing that hospitals meet their obligations to those who are unable to pay. We require hospitals to treat emergency patients properly and prohibit transferring emergency patients who have not been stabilized or transferring them in a callous and inappropriate fashion. Hospitals who ignore this obligation can be barred from the Medicare Program. Physicians who act improperly may face jail terms.

We also want to provide a special Medicare payment to hospitals with an abnormally high percentage of patients who are poorer, and thus sicker, than average. This will help these hospitals that are assuming this special responsibility to stay afloat. Our legislation also requires the Department of Health and Human Services to collect data to insure that inner city hospitals are appropriately compensated for their high labor costs.

We recognize that older Americans are spending a growing portion of their budget on health care and want to do something to moderate this disturbing trend. To that end, we create some demonstration programs to determine whether Medicare should pay for preventive services. Such programs can save money and lives by dealing with problems before they become acute.

And we propose limiting the hospital and nursing home deductible payable by the patient by tying future increases to increases in the amount Medicare pays hospitals. That means when we act to hold the Government's costs down, we will also be protecting the patient in future budget debates.

Finally, we want to make the Medicare reimbursement system fairer. We would abolish special payments for return on equity that are now made to proprietary hospitals. These special payments have no place in a prospective payment system.

We recognize the need for a new way to pay physicians and create a new physician payment commission to examine the various alternatives and make a recommendation. This panel will specifically ask whether we should use a relative value scale or diagnostic related group system to pay our doctors.

About half of these provisions are also included in H.R. 3128, including the requirement that widows and divorced spouses be permitted to buy health insurance coverage offered by employers. Also included are the physician payment reform studies, the preventive services demonstrations and the special payments for hospitals with a disportionate share of poor patients. This bill also includes strong sanctions for hospitals that refuse emergency care to patients.

It may be overly optimistic to expect that the remainder of this bill will be enacted this year, but I hope we can move on it during this Congress. I believe it accurately outlines the additional changes needed in our system and provides a blueprint for needed reform. I solicit the support of my colleagues as I work to enact the Medicare Payment Reform and Health Care Improved Access Act of 1985.●

STALIN'S COMPAIGN TO ERADICATE JEWISH CULTURE

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, 33 years ago, on August 12, 1952, 24 leading Jewish writers, artists, and poets were executed by the Soviet Government. This was the ultimate horror in Stalin's campaign to eradicate Jewish culture and Jewish life in the Soviet Union. While we reflect upon the tragedy of the past, we must recognize its implications and impact on the lives of Jews today in the U.S.S.R.

The night of the murdered poets culminated months of torture and questioning during a secret trial in which the victims were charged with being rebels and agents of American imperialism who wanted to "establish their own bourgeois national Zionist republic." An estimated 400 intellectuals perished under Stalin's attempts to dismantle Jewish culture in Russia. In the years following the dictator's regime, the executions stopped, but the Stalinist elements of Jewish persecution and cultural oppression continue today in the Soviet Union.

The flow of Jewish emigration has come to a virtual standstill. Daily media attacks on Zionism and Israel create an atmosphere of tension and fear among Jews throughout the U.S.S.R. Unlike other national minorities in Russia, the Jews have no schools for their children and are prohibited from teaching their national language, Hebrew. Without adequate means of education, generations of Soviet Jewish children have grown up ignorant of their Jewish and Hebrew heritage.

Despite these obstacles, an intense desire for learning about their Jewish culture and Hebrew language persists. As education quotas, employment discrimination, and antisemitism increase, moves toward self-education make enormous strides amongst young people who have come to the conclusion that their only future as Jews is to live in Israel. Great pride in Israel and the hope of eventual freedom sustain the dedication of the emigration activists, or refuseniks.

Over the 33-year span since the night of the murdered poets the effects of August 12, 1952, live on in Soviet policy. May this date and the memory of the slain poets, writers, and intellectuals give emphasis and meaning to our efforts to help Soviet Jews today. We must let our friends in the U.S.S.R. know that we will not stand idly by while they face such oppressive conditions. So, let us not succumb to frustration or discouragement but rather find greater incentive to push yet further in our struggle on behalf of Soviet Jews.●

FRAMEWORK FOR BUSINESS INNOVATION

HON. BARBARA A. MIKULSKI

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, as chairwoman of the Oceanography Subcommittee, I've had the opportunity recently, along with my colleagues on the subcommittee, to begin exploring some of the new marine biotechnology industries that are emerging around the country.

I am convinced that many of the new jobs of the future will come from the hundreds of small, energetic companies that are incorporated each year.

Further, I am convinced that we in Government must play an active role in fostering the development of these new, growing companies that will be taking us into the future.

In the past, what we've had from the Federal Government is big-buck funding, big regulation, and no clear direction. What we need now, is for Government to set clear-cut national goals and make strategic use of capital and human resources. We need a framework for innovation.

One of today's magazines which is helping to identify some of these new companies along with ways in which we might fashion a private sector/public sector framework for innovation, is Venture magazine.

Venture is a magazine which all of my colleagues should read just as we read Time and Business Week. It's publisher, Mr. Arthur Lipper III, offers a number of new, thought-provoking ideas that merit our close attention and exploration.

For my colleagues' review and consideration, I am pleased to submit a recent editorial written by Mr. Arthur Lipper III.

CHAIRMAN'S COMMENT

The unemployment conundrum: It is generally accepted that one of America's most pressing problems is that of under- and unemployment. The problem is particularly acute because it affects both youth and minorities. Unemployment is at its most socially disruptive when found in combination, when minority youth are unsuccessful in their search for meaningful employment.

It is also generally recognized that our country's largest companies' primary management objective is increased productivity, which is reflected as an ongoing attempt to reduce the number of employees per unit produced. Only the most optimistic of future-tellers would predict that, in aggregate, the larger U.S. companies will ever again create a single net new job. At best, only replacement jobs will be created and their numbers, in the case of many companies, will decrease as managers allow attrition to function as the most painless and politically acceptable means of accomplishing their objective.

It is a fact that, of the net new jobs created, more than 66% will be created by companies employing fewer than 20 people. And more than 75% of net new jobs are created by companies that have been in business for less than five years.

It is broadly believed that most new companies fail during their first five years to achieve the financial predictions and objectives of their founders and frequently, particularly in their first year, fail financially. Further, it is known that most small companies are only marginally profitable after compensating their owner-managers.

Therefore, it can be observed that one of our country's major socioeconomic problems is being addressed, albeit inadequately, by companies that themselves are financially frail. Obviously, this is a dilemma of national significance.

Two questions arise: Is there anything the federal government can do to help? Should government even try to help? I am of the view that the government must attempt to help young businesses. The future economic, and perhaps social, stability of this country rests not only with small businesses, but even more so with young businesses. These young businesses usually start small but frequently do not remain so. These soon-to-be-not-so-small businesses are of special interest to our readers.

The federal government can assist in at least three areas. The first is by legislating that, in the first five years of a company's existence, retained earnings be tax free. The second is that the government adopt Venture Magazine's policy of sponsoring "profit education" by encouraging teacher training in free enterprise economics. The broader the understanding of the principles of profit making, the more positive will become the popular attitudes regarding free enterprise. The third area of assistance is a recognition of the essential role performed by entrepreneurial investors. In accepting the risk of total financial loss, they provide the fuel to set the process in motion. Such positive recognition could take the form of deferring a capital gains tax for funds reinvested in other new businesses within a specified period. A similar capital gains tax deferral is already available to homeowners purchasing a new home with proceeds from the sale of their former home. Certainly company formation, which is reflected in job creation, is as worthy of tax relief as individual residential upgrading.

To further induce owner-managers of businesses not only to hire but also to educate youth, particularly those who may be socioeconomically disadvantaged, tax incentives could be offered to companies for employees who can demonstrate significant skill enhancements, to the point that they are worth more to their employers and to themselves. In other words, a tax credit for promoting new workers on the basis of demonstrated merit and contribution specifically over those with greater seniority. This would create a significantly increased competition by entry-level employees in terms of striving for excellence, which can only benefit the enterprise and establish a continuing positive attitude by rewarding extra effort. Managers should be assisted in their need to continually improve the quality of available human resources.

The importance of investors: Finally, as readers of my book, Venture's Guide to Investing in Private Companies, know, I believe that in certain cases investors should be rewarded for their risk assumption by sharing in an investee company's revenues (rather than, or in addition to, profits) by holding a Revenue Participation Certificate. The Treasury could propose such payments be classified as long-term capital gains rather than income and yet still be deductible to the company. In this way companies could negotiate a lesser percentage payment due to the more favorable tax effect for the recipient. In any case, Congress should legislate quickly (an oxymoron) Small Business Participating Debentures. These instruments could provide lenders with a fixed return, plus profit participation, and a long-term capital gains tax result, while allowing the companies to deduct the payments.

If you believe some of the above thoughts could be constructive if enacted and applied, send a photocopy of this page (permission granted) to your representatives in Washington. Incidentally, the best description of Washington I've heard is, "a city of 35 sq. mi. surrounded by reality" and I should know; in 1945 I served as a U.S. Senate page and had a wonderful opportunity to learn the workings of a democracy that was designed to be, and once was, a meritocracy.●

HOME EQUITY CONVERSION—AN ESSENTIAL LOW-COST TAX REFORM TO AID CASH-POOR/HOUSE-RICH ELDERLY

HON. LAWRENCE J. SMITH

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SMITH of Florida. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Home

Equity Conversion Act of 1985 which would clear the way for thousands of older homeowners to safely and fairly tap the equity in their homes without moving or taking out a mortgage.

Much of our country's elderly population are "house-rich" and "cash-poor." It is estimated that more than 70 percent of older Americans own their own homes and nearly 84 percent of those homes are owned free and clear. At the same time, 50 percent of all persons 65 and older live in households with incomes of less than $1,180 per month. This bill would enable the elderly to safely draw upon their home equity without having to choose between a steady flow of income in their later years and their lifelong homes. This type of transaction could prove to be an important economic answer for large numbers of elderly homeowners in the coming decades. The proposal would remove the technical difficulties in the Internal Revenue Code that prevent widespread use of a technique called the residential sale-leaseback.

This concept allows the owner of a home to sell his or her property to a buyer who agrees to rent it back to the seller on reasonable terms for an extended period of time. Properly structured, the transaction would generate a steady cash flow to an elderly homeowner without forcing the homeowner to give up his or her home. The homeowner would pay the lease payments out of the proceeds of the sale which may be in the form of cash or a combination of other funding. In the event that one spouse dies, the surviving spouse would be able to continue to use the home under this arrangement.

The elderly homeowner in this transaction would still qualify for the one-time capital gains tax exemption that is available to homeowners over age 55, and the purchaser/lessor would take depreciation on the value of the property even though the sellers retain occupancy rights for their lifetime.

This proposal could and should be an important part of Congress' tax reform effort. This measure provides much-needed financial assistance to our elderly with only a small impact on revenue. The Home Equity Conversion Act is an innovative method of assisting low-income elderly retain financial independence and their homes.

INTRODUCTION OF THE "BLACK LUNG BENEFITS AMENDMENTS ACT OF 1985"

HON. AUSTIN J. MURPHY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to introduce legislation that will significantly contribute to the elimination of the massive backlog of black lung claims at the Department of Labor. Many of my colleagues and I have been deeply concerned with this mounting problem. Numerous letters have been written to the Department of Labor urging prompt and concerted action to restore due process and basic fairness to black lung claimants who have in many cases been forced to wait several years before the appeals on their claims may be heard.

The Labor Standards Subcommittee which I chair has already conducted several field hearings around the coal fields and subsequently heard testimony in Washington, DC, from Department of Labor officials. It is fairly obvious by now that despite considerable increases in productivity in recent years, the present budget and personnel practices in the Department's Office of Administrative Law Judges are inadequate to adjudicate the more than 21,000 cases backlogged at that office. In addition to the need for more administrative law judges and support staff, testimony has been received by the subcommittee indicating one of the primary obstacles to efficient use of the existing staff is the fact that black lung appeals have been unfairly classified as lower graded work. Consequently, the full compliment of ALJ's at the Department cannot devote the majority of their time to hearing black lung cases which make up the largest volume of cases awaiting a hearing on appeal.

The bill would simply correct an error in the original language of the act which stipulated that some, but not all, of the appeals from decisions under the act be heard by GS-16 judges. By eliminating the so called 15/16 split the OALJ will be better able to assign their existing judicial staff in the most efficient manner. It will also assist the OALJ in recruiting the most talented individuals to fill any existing vacancies or future openings.

I believe that the relegation of black lung claims to a lower status was never intended by the Congress. This bill makes congressional intent quite clear on this subject. Claims under all titles of the act would now be heard by higher graded judges. This will allow the OALJ to manage the overwhelming black lung case load in the most productive manner. Under this amendment the victims of black lung can expect to see their claims receiving the priority that they deserve. It will also hopefully insure that justice, previously delayed if not denied, will once again be restored to our afflicted miners.

I urge my colleagues to join me in support of this amendment, I plan to move this legislation quickly through the Labor Standards Subcommittee when the Congress returns in September and I am hopeful of early action by the House.●

TRIBUTE TO MARGO ALBERT

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, this month a distinguished American woman died. Margo Albert, a dear friend of mine and a friend to countless people in artistic endeavors succumbed after an illness of several months. Her departure leaves each of us saddened, for her life enriched us so deeply in spirit. She taught us that we could be proud of our cultural roots as Hispanics in America.

Margo brought a special brand of vision, zeal, and social conscience to the arts and corporate boardrooms. She was able to transfer this commitment of conscience into a living and functional center: Plaza de la Raza.

There at Plaza, children and adults can develop the sounds of music, the methodology of the dance, the spin of the potter's wheel, the preservation of the visual and plastic arts, and the characterization of the dramas that she loved so much. She so inspired people to visit and appreciate this culture center that they, too, became addicted to its captivating aura.

Mr. Speaker, from the very beginning, when a fledging group of community activists approached a number of us at TELACU to save the old Lincoln Park boathouse from destruction, Plaza took form as an expression of cultural rennaissance in east Los Angeles.

The very same Carlos Garcia who is now Plaza's executive director was then a young lawyer who drew up the first articles of incorporation. The bearded Edward Bonilla served as Plaza's first president. Francis Crisostomo, Amelia Chamacho Libart, Nick Lucero, John Horan, and others volunteered their time as officers.

From the labor movement, an idealistic and progressive organizer, Frank Lopez, fashioned a program of captivating personalities of prominence to give Plaza an injection of cultural and capital stock. To open the eyes of the greater Los Angeles community, Frank Lopez secured the attention of Ruben Salazar, an Los Angeles Times journalist, who wrote extensively about the plight of the boathouse in Lincoln Park. Salazar was later martyred. Frank then introduced Plaza's board to a beautiful lady.

She was Marie Marguerita Guadalupe Teresa Estela Bolando Castilla y O'Donnell, better known by her professional name as Margo. She appeared before us and ushered in an era of development that eventually put Plaza de la Raza on the arts map. She was a resourceful woman of unlimited talents and energies. She had remarkable connections to the world of corporate America, the entertainment industry, and the political leaders of this Nation. She was the catalyst that brought diverse people together as participants, with the Hispanic community, in building the Plaza de la Raza as a lasting monument to the creativity of the peoples of Hispanic origin, something that she herself manifested.

Mr. Speaker, many of us in this Chamber want to join the voices of praise and adulation for a true patron of the arts. We join her surviving husband, Eddie Albert, her son, Edward, and her daughter, Maria Carmen, in mourning the loss of all of us of Margo.●

YOICHI OKAMOTO

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to ask my colleagues to join with me in honoring the late Yoichi Okamoto, who was the official photographer of President Lyndon B. Johnson, and who redefined the role of the Presidential photojournalist.

Mr. Okamoto was an individual who was committed to excellence in his work and the remembrance of his heritage. He maintained a high standard in his work and urged his colleagues to do the same.

In a fitting testament to his friend, Howard Chapnick in Popular Photography magazine wrote of Mr. Okamoto, "The good photographers, the great photographers, have no final sense of self-importance. None of us is the repository of all journalistic wisdom. There's always something to learn. And, even in a position of awesome power, Oke sought and absorbed the opinions of his colleagues."

Michael Evans, the former photographer for President Reagan included a picture of Mr. Okamoto in his recent book, "People and Power, Portraits, from the Federal Village," writing, "Because of Okamoto, I got started in the presidential photography business." That is the sort of testament that Mr. Okamoto would be most proud of.

Mr. Speaker, I ask that you and our colleagues in the House of Representatives join with me in honoring the late Yoichi Okamoto for his contributions to our Nation's history and its preservation. I ask that Mr. Chapnick's fitting and poignant testament to his friend and colleague be inserted in the RECORD, and follow my remarks.

Thank you very much.

YOICHI OKAMOTO'S CAREER DEFINED THE QUALITIES NEEDED FOR SUCCESS BOTH AS PHOTOGRAPHER AND HUMAN BEING

(By Howard Chapnik)

My friend Yoichi Okamoto is dead at 69. Oke or Okie, as he was called by almost everyone who knew him, was an important figure in the short history of photojournalism. Perhaps young photojournalists can glean certain lessons from some of the reminiscences I will share with you about this remarkable man.

Yoichi Okamoto was not a giant in photography in the same sense as Kertész, Weston, Adams, or Penn. In photographic history, however, he will be remembered as the photographer who revolutionized photographic coverage of the American presidency.

It was Oke who seized the moment, the opportunity, and their challenge of visually documenting and making human and believable the larger-than-life figure of President Lyndon B. Johnson. No photojournalist before or since Okamoto has been able to produce a more complete historical photographic record of a president or a presidency.

In retrospect, I have been trying to sum up those of Oke's qualities, both as a human being and as a photographer, that contributed to his success. For one thing, Oke was a Renaissance Man, with a consuming interest in the world that surrounded him. Insatiable curiousity about people and places were intrinsic parts of his intellectual baggage. Music, art, literature, politics, sports, science, philosophy, and technology were his playing fields.

Inquisitiveness is indispensable to the photojournalist. It sharpens insight, gives depth and meaning to the photograph, and establishes a human communication bridge with the subject. This characteristic was what made Okamoto equally at home with the Indian elephant driver who came to the U.S. as President Johnson's guest, and with prime ministers, kings, and the world's political greats. Okamoto was genuinely interested to learn who people really were and what they believed, rather than to accept the facade they presented to the world.

Oke was meticulous and orderly in mind, body, and dress. Despite being a Nisei (a Japanese-born as a native of another country) in a Caucasian society, he was resolved to be more American than Mayflower descendants. He seemed to want to blend into the environment, to eliminate the apparent differences resulting from his Japanese ancestry.

The interment of Japanese Americans during World War II was a psychological scar that constantly impelled him to greater effort, greater concentration, greater accomplishment.

Oke blended so well that he reveled in telling the story of the time the President had important guests at the White House. Johnson sent his press secretary, George Reedy, to summon Oke for a photo session. Attesting to Okamoto's unobtrusiveness was his response to Reedy's call. "I've already been there," he said. Okamoto had taken his pictures, but had been the proverbial fly on the wall of the Oval Office. Nobody had noticed.

The lesson is clear. To penetrate beyond superficial, external levels, to reveal the complex real persona, a photographer must overcome his subject's camera-consciousness and become an accepted part of the environment.

I will never forget the day Oke was fired by President Johnson. I was in Washington visiting the U.S. Information Agency, where Okamoto had worked prior to becoming the presidential photographer. When I got to the picture department, I was surprised to find Oke putting his things into one of the desks.

"I've just been fired!" he said. The firing had been precipitated by a Newsweek article. The magazine had reported on Okamoto as the President's personal photographer who had shot 19,000 negatives over three months.

In the midst of an economic-austerity drive, the appearance of waste, combined with Johnson's mistaken feeling that Oke had generated a self-serving article, stimulated the rift.

Shortly thereafter, a guilt-ridden President reconsidered. The 19,000 negatives translated to five rolls of 35-mm film shot per day—hardly overshooting by any photojournalistic standard.

Oke became the only White House staffer to be fired and later rehired, demonstrating that resiliency is another prerequisite for the photojournalist.

John Durniak, former Time picture editor and Look managing editor, was a long-time friend and professional associate of Okamoto's. In recalling Okamoto's photographs of the Burger Supreme Court for Smithsonian magazine, Durniak said, "I can't think of anyone else who could have gotten that kind of cooperation. Oke had class. When he talked to people, they felt they were in the hands of a responsible individual, somebody who would not take advantage of them.

"I think that was one of the things that appealed to President Johnson. Oke was a student of human behavior. He understood President Johnson's moods. He knew where he should shoot and when it would be intrusive. He also knew that if Johnson read him out, it might be for five minutes, or five days, or five weeks. But it wasn't forever. They had one hell of a relationship, the depth of which only Johnson and Oke knew.

Class, depth, integrity, insight, human understanding, and sensitivity. These qualities are not required for every photo-journalistic assignment. Many successful people get along without them. But it surely helps when you're photographing on the Washington scene where political paranoia prevails and the photojournalist wants to be privy to moments of political history.

Durniak also remembers that Okamoto was never satisfied with his work. He always wanted to improve on what he was doing. Durniak remembers that "every six weeks during his White House stint, Okamoto would get together 25, 50, or 100 prints. he would send them out to four or five people he respected and ask, 'How am I doing? What did I miss?' "

According to Durniak, one of the people to whom Okamoto sent those prints was John Morris, former picture editor at The New York Times and the Washington Post, and Magnum picture-agency chief for several years.

"Morris would faithfully sit down and raise hell with his pictures," says Durniak. "As a result, Oke would push himself harder. And, never satisfed, he'd go the extra mile to keep himself sharp and make the most of the opportunities available to him." Another Okamoto lesson for us all.

The good photographers, the great photographers, have no final sense of self-importance. None of us is the repository of all journalistic wisdom. There's always something to learn. And, even in a position of awesome power, Oke sought and absorbed the opinions of his colleagues.

Lynn Johnson is a Black Star staff photographer who once worked as an assistant to Okamoto. Oke had followed her career with great interest. In one of his letters to her, he recounts a story which reflects his personal restraint and respect for individual privacy as being transcendent over professional photographic concerns. Getting the picture is not everything.

When Hubert H. Humphrey, the grand old man of liberalism, was dying of cancer, Oke was asked by a national magazine to photograph Humphrey in his final days. "I turned it down," he wrote to Lynn, "although it may have produced a great picture that left his image more indelible in the public mind. But it meant my asking Muriel (Mrs. Humphrey). I loved them, and I know they liked me. But just because she might have said 'yes,' I had to turn the assignment down."

Another letter to Lynn Johnson is worth quoting. Okamoto on female photographers: "Just remember—stay yourself and don't get tough! It happens to female photographers without their becoming aware of it."

For all his successes, Okamoto had two dreams that were never fulfilled before his death. One was the publication of a book including his landmark photographic work on the Johnson presidency.

The other was his energetic association with a Washington group of elder photographic statesmen called the "f65" group. Members included Life alumnus Bill Sumits, National Geographic's director of photography Bob Gilka, former Geographic photographer Volkmar Wentzel, and Washington photographer Fred Maroon. They had come together in the belief that there was a need for a Washington-based photographic museum. This would combine in one central repository the disparate and diffused collections of photographs now housed in diverse collections (i.e. the Smithsonian Institution, the Library of Congress, the National Archives, the U.S. Air Force, etc.).

Oke was a good friend, a patient golf partner, an inspiring companion, and an important photojournalist, Marty Forscher said to me, "I didn't think I could love anybody as much as I loved Oke." Many people share that emotion. We'll miss him.●

PRO-LIFE GUN CONTROL

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, gun control is one of the most agonizing issues facing our Nation today. In 1980, more than 40 times as many people were killed by handguns in the United States than in Japan, Great Britain, Switzerland, Canada, Israel, Sweden, and Australia combined.

Just recently, the Senate overwhelmingly passed legislation which would relax standards on owning and possessing guns and firearms. Now it is the House's turn to debate this same issue. Will we stand around and hand out guns to every maniac and killer on the streets to murder our children? Something must be done to combat this deadly arsenal. As we begin debate on this critical issue, I commend to my colleagues the following article which appeared in the St. Louis Review, July 26, 1985:

PRO-LIFE GUN CONTROL

"Guns don't kill people—people kill people." "Don't outlaw guns—outlaw criminals." This is just a portion of the bumper-sticker rhetoric that supports the "right" of citizens to own and bear firearms. Once again the dubious logic and half-truths contained in these slogans seem to lose whatever meaning they might have as St. Louisans witness the tragedy of three small children lying dead—victims of a .22 caliber rifle allegedly wielded by their own mother. This was not a gangland-style massacre or even homicide perpetrated by an outlaw. Would it have occurred had the gun not been so readily available? We will never know. But we could reasonably assume that it might not have happened had the weapon not been in the home.

The long and arduous effects of gun-control advocates in our country have been aimed at preventing, or at least lessening, the likelihood of this kind of tragedy. The United States Catholic Conference, the social action arm of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops, has long been supportive of gun-control legislation. But those efforts were forestalled—at least temporarily—when the U.S. Senate recently passed the Federal Firearm Owners' Protection Act by an overwhelming majority. Now the debate moves to the House of Representatives, where the proposed legislation is likely to find more opposition.

In our opinion the debate over gun control highlights the inconsistencies that still dominate the much larger pro-life issue. Gun control is advocated by those lawmakers termed "liberal." They are often the same ones who oppose restrictions on abortion. The opposite is the case among many who are called "conservative." Favoring greater restriction and elimination of abortion, they steadfastly oppose greater gun control. This opposition is founded, of course, on the questionable interpretation of the Second Amendment to the Constitution, which protects the right of a "well-regulated militia" to bear arms in order to insure the "security of a free state."

The Catholic bishops of the United States are to be applauded for their efforts toward unifying and making more consistent all life issues. Human life is a gift of God, and civilized society must protect the right to life whenever it is threatened, whether by abortion, euthanasia, war, or violence of any kind. In the face of what appears to be the inherent contradictions involved in so much of the debate of pro-life legislation, perhaps it is the Gospel which must be brought to bear on our thinking and actions to protect life.●

SPARE PARTS—AN OLD STORY

HON. JACK BROOKS

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, more than 2 years ago, the Committee on Government Operations first exposed the scandalous overpricing of military spare parts. Our investigation revealed that this situation was caused primarily by the lack of competition in the Defense Department's procurements. More often than not, the vendor with the best connections at the Pentagon received the awards rather than the ones with the best prices. The result is that unscrupulous contractors—aided and abetted by negligent, sometimes incompetent, procurement officials in the Department—gained windfall profits at the American taxpayer's expense.

Since our hearings on this issue, Congress has passed several important procurement reform measures, including the Competition in Contracting Act of 1984 (Public Law 98-369). We all sincerely hope that these efforts result in eliminating the waste, fraud and abuse that is plaguing DOD's procurement system. However, I want to caution my colleagues not to run home during the recess to tell their constituents that all of DOD's procurement problems have been solved. The Defense Department simply doesn't react quickly to procurement reform measures. Some say that DOD doesn't react at all.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to share with my colleagues a copy of an article sent to the committee by Mrs. Anna Hendrickson of Dyersburg, TN. The article was taken from the Commercial Appeal newspaper located in Memphis and was first printed on June 14, 1960, 25 years ago. Despite the date of the article, it could have been printed just this week because it is just as relevant now as then. The article follows:

25 YEARS AGO—JUNE 14, 1960

WASHINGTON.—The senator from Illinois, scholarly-looking Paul Douglas, held aloft a small lamp socket. He said it sold for 25 cents in retail stores but cost the Navy $21.10. There also was a set of wrenches. The Illinois Democrat told his colleagues the set cost the Army $29. Bought from a Washington tool company, he said, they cost $3.89. Douglas displayed eight small drill bushings which cost the Air Force $9.65 each. He said they were appraised for 25 to 50 cents. The items were among 10 which Douglas showed the Senate in attacking the military procurement system which he said sometimes pays six to 100 times the actual value of various equipment. He said he obtained the items in question from a state which received them as government surplus. He said they were accompanied by invoices showing their original purchase cost. He criticized the Defense Department for purchasing $19,700,000,000 or 86.4 percent, of its supplies last year by negotiated contracts instead of through competitive bids.

The above article refers to extensive hearings held by Senator Douglas on the spare parts procurement problems at DOD. Senator Douglas' Subcommittee on Defense Procurement of the Joint Economic Committee of Congress found that the lack of competition, poor procurement management, and a general disregard for the taxpayers money by DOD officials were the underlying causes of the problem. If that sounds a little familiar, it should. Twenty-five years later, the Congress has found that these same conditions still exist. All of us were horrified by the recent scandals of the $435 claw hammer. Can you imagine how much money has been wasted by DOD in those 25 years since Senator Douglas' hearings? Can you imagine how many defense contractors got fat and happy, with the help of their DOD friends, over that same period?

It should be clear that our recent efforts to reform DOD must only be considered a beginning. Keep in mind that for every reform measure we come up with, DOD will try to find at least two ways around it. As such, we must keep the pressure on the Department day-in and day-out with strong oversight, backed up by an effective authorization and appropriations process. In my view, if Congress is serious about reforming DOD procurement, it can forget about one more Presidential commission composed mainly of ex-DOD officials to study the problem. We already have an effective investigative function in the Government Operations Committee and the Authorization and Appropriations Committees. What we need is direct, forceful corrective action. Congress must force DOD to cancel costly and unjustified contracts, debar unethical contractors, and fire Government officials who allow waste, fraud, and abuse to flourish in the programs they are responsible for.

Surely, the American taxpayer is tired of the incessant talk of reform while continuing to read of new procurement scandals virtually every day. It is time for action, not dialog.●

IT'S TIME TO STOP FRAUDULENT TEXTILE IMPORTS

HON. TRENT LOTT

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LOTT. Mr. Speaker, in the last 5 years, 300,000 textile workers have lost their jobs because of imports that come to our shores virtually nonstop. And where there are laws and regulations intended to help manage imports, foreign producers ruthlessly ignore them.

I give you this example: On one day alone in May, the Customs Service seized more than $1 million in textile and apparel shipments that were believed to be fraudulent. Hong Kong, for example, shipped 439,000 dollars' worth of sweaters to New York but called them blouses. The surprises didn't stop there. Chinese ski pants were discovered in New Jersey, along with women's sweaters, girl's overalls, and even work gloves. the gloves were labeled "Made in Cyprus," but the Customs Service found that they were really made in Pakistan.

And these, Mr. Speaker, were only the illegally shipped imports that were discovered. One can only imagine how many fraudulent shipments find their way past inspectors and into stores.

Rigid enforcement of our trade rules is one of the objectives of the Textile and Apparel Trade Enforcement Act of 1985. We must ensure that foreign producers respect our laws as much as they cherish our market.●

RADON REDUCTION ACT OF 1985

HON. BOB EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation with my Pennsylvania colleague Representative GUS YATRON to address the problem of radon contamination facing thousands of families living in a part of Pennsylvania and New Jersey known as the "Reading Prong."

Radon, a colorless, odorless, and tasteless gas that is produced by the decay of naturally occurring uranium deposits, has collected in several hundred homes built over the Prong, a seam of uranium several hundred miles long. When inhaled by the people living in these homes, radon is extremely hazardous, drastically increasing the residents' risk of lung cancer.

As of May 23, 1985, the Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Resources [DER] had tested 1,745 homes in the Pennsylvania part of the Reading Prong. Forty percent of these—698 homes—had radon present in quantities above the 0.02 working levels considered "acceptable." Approximately 20,000 additional homeowners in the Reading Prong area have asked to have their residences tested.

Once you find radon in your home, what can you do? There are few options now other than venting the radon through fans, open windows—in short, any method possible. And there is no guarantee, after you spend several hundred or several thousand dollars installing fans and venting equipment, that it will work. Sometimes it does, sometimes it doesn't.

Last month I had an opportunity to spend a morning with the people of Boyertown, PA, where the radon contamination problem is most serious. Not only do some residents of Boyertown have levels of radon in their homes which exceed the 0.02 WL deemed dangerous, they have levels as high as 13.6 WL! The radon contamination problem was discovered late last year when Stanley Watras, a construction engineer at the Limerick nuclear powerplant and a resident of Boyertown, realized that radon from his home was so high that his contaminated clothing was setting off alarms at work!

The people of Boyertown are rightly worried about the high cost of remedial action and the continuing danger of exposure while corrective measures are contemplated. The people of Boyertown are rightly terrified about the effect on their children. One couple has been told that the radon level in their home means that their children—aged 13, 11, and 8—are breathing the equivalent of the smoke from 21 packs of cigarettes every day and that their chances of developing lung cancer are one in eight.

The DER and the Federal EPA have cooperated in the testing program and have tried to be helpful. Yet Government agencies have pointed fingers and avoided action when asked the questions: Who will take responsibility for the health of the people of Boyertown? Who will decide if an emergency exists? What do we do when winter comes and we can no longer open our windows to help vent the radon?

Mr. Speaker, I don't know the answers to all of these questions, either. But I do think that we need to get the experts working on the answers now. Someone must take responsibility. That's why I am introducing this bill today with Congressman YATRON.

The Radon Reduction Act of 1985 takes three important steps: first, it calls on the Environmental Protection Agency to conduct a national assessment of the radon problem. I don't think that we can put together a comprehensive solution until we know the magnitude of the problem we are facing. My bill directs the EPA Administrator to identify what populated areas in our country might be likely to suffer from radon contamination, assess the level, if any, of radon contamination, and determine the level of radon which poses a threat to human health.

Next, the bill would have the EPA Administrator conduct a demonstration program to test methods of reducing or eliminating the threat to public health of radon. In order to bring some immediate relief to the residents of the Reading Prong, the legislation directs that the Prong be one site of the demonstration, and it authorizes $4 million to carry out the project.

Finally, it is clear that an emergency response may be needed. We can't ask people to stay in heavily contaminated homes this winter. We must give them some alternative. Therefore, my bill would amend the Disaster Relief Act to make a release of radon gas a disaster eligible for assistance from the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA]. The bill would not supersede existing requirements for a State response prior to Federal involvement, but it would clarify the responsibility of the Federal Government should the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania decide to move in the crisis in the Reading Prong.

This situation will not go away if we ignore it, and we need to act with speed. I urge my colleagues to review and cosponsor this legislation, a balanced response to the radon crisis, so that we can move quickly to end this health threat to the people of the Reading Prong.●

NASA SPACE PROGRAM

HON. BERYL ANTHONY, JR.

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, the space program of NASA is a success story we have learned to accept as commonplace. The development of space exploration, space travel, and the militarization of space continue, but it does not make front-page news much anymore. Even a near failure of the space shuttle, such as recently occurred, only caused a brief blip in the news.

Despite the routine nature of today's space program, we should not lose sight of the fact that we are on the threshold of a major expansion of space flight into the public domain. In the latest edition of Omni magazine, Adm. Alan B. Shepard, who traveled into space in the old Mercury program almost a quarter of a century ago, notes that we are very close to new tourist industry—space travel. I urge my colleagues who want to visualize these expanded frontiers to reflect on Admiral Shepard's article:

FIRST WORD

(By Alan B. Shepard, Jr.)

Is the space program losing the support of the American people? I doubt it, but as we near the twenty-fifth anniversary of America's first manned space mission, the Mercury III mission on which I flew, the question seems worth asking.

If you are like many Americans these days, you may have almost forgotten the space program. It has becomes easy to lose track of it, save for a few moments when the evening news reports that a shuttle has put another satellite into orbit and returned safely to Earth. Even die-hard space enthusiasts have had little to fuel their ardor. It is sad to watch NASA's shuttle schedule slip from a forecast of 50 flights this year to a reality of 17, disheartening to see Washington's small, efficient cadre of warriors against new technology already sniping at budget requests for a space station not yet begun.

All this is in sharp contrast with the glory days of space. Some 25 years ago, Sputnik 1 caught the nation's attention as no technological event ever had. Suddenly, it seemed as if we were losing a race with the Soviet Union and would soon be dangerously far behind. Each manned Mercury flight brought hours of coverage on network television, followed closely by ticker-tape parades and endless interviews. The Gemini spacewalks continued the excitement. Then came the Apollo program, with its televised moonwalks—the ultimate in drama.

Then, suddenly, the fervor died. Perhaps in our eagerness to reach the moon we had forgotten that this was only part of a grander design. Perhaps it was just that Vietnam, oil shocks, and Mideast wars captured the attention of the nation at large. No matter. NASA's budget shrank, and following the end of the Apollo program, America's astronauts waited nearly six years for another flight.

Today it is easy to suspect that we have never fully recovered from the lean years of the early Seventies. The shuttle was at last finished, and it worked. In eight or nine years, the beginnings of our first permanent manned station will enter orbit, and the United States will finally have a base from which to work in space. Yet space seems to have taken on some of that characteristic dreariness that afflicts most government programs. Where is the old enthusiasm? Where are the banquets for shuttle crews returning from their journeys?

The answer is that they are in the romantic past—where they belong. Look at just one clue and it becomes easy to see the role of space in American society today. Many people deplore the idea of using space for military purposes. (Most seem to ignore the Soviet Union's primitive but functional space-based antisatellite system set up fully ten years ago.) Yet no one seems at all surprised that space should be seen as a battlefield. People easily accept this new technology as a logical source of weapons on which human survival could depend.

And that is the nature of space today. We have not lost interest in space, but it is no longer a crusade. It is a mature technology that earns its way by improving long-distance communications and weather reports. No one holds banquets for the phone company.

Several things convince me that this is not the whole story, however. Enthusiasm for space today is not lost or even obsolete; it merely awaits some new development, perhaps a major event, to focus on.

One bit of evidence is a movie. It seems these days that mass entertainment is dominated by the likes of Prince and Madonna, Hulk Hogan and Mr. T. Yet Hollywood's slick version of The Right Stuff managed to pack the movie houses for weeks. Clearly, the space program's early days remain good box-office material.

Another is SpaceWeek '85. In only six years, the national SpaceWeek activities have grown to include events in more than 100 cities. Between July 16 and July 24, each of these cities hosted lectures, parties, mall exhibits, science fairs—even an amateur rocket contest—all celebrating the wonder and value of manned spaceflight. More than a quarter million space enthusiasts were expected to attend.

Again, with encouragement from the White House, columnist Jack Anderson has established the Young Astronauts Council. Its goal: to recruit thousands of boys and girls between the ages of six and sixteen for future roles in space exploration. The program is sponsored by nearly a dozen major corporations.

Such programs are needed because it will be many years before another space spectacular galvanizes public awareness as Mercury, Gemini, and Apollo once did. But it will happen. In 15 or 20 years private enterprise will begin to carry private citizens into space, not to tinker with satellites but for vacations on the space station now being planned by NASA. Ten years or so later, we will finally send our first explorers toward Mars, on a mission as ground-breaking as the Apollo 11 flight was.

Enthusiasm will well up in us again. And this time it will not die out after a few short visits to the moon. Humanity is in space to stay. And once space travel becomes a common, if costly, form of tourism, everyone will know it.●

RIGHTS IN POLAND

HON. NANCY L. JOHNSON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of the House the recent, blatant repression of basic rights taking place in Poland.

In June of this year, the Polish Government announced its intention to withdraw many of the academic freedoms it granted to its colleges and universities in 1982.

At that time, it gave students the right to choose from different philosophy courses rather than requiring them to study Marxist-Leninism; it allowed them a choice of economics courses rather than forcing them to study the Socialist economic structure, and it allowed for some semblance of university self-management.

Recent actions make clear, however, that the Polish Government cannot tolerate academic freedom, for announced "reforms" will reclaim much of the power it granted to Polish universities 3 years ago.

The Polish Government has defended this reactionary move as a necessary retreat forced by the antistate and antisocialist tendencies of some university circles.

If the minimal academic freedoms granted to Polish students for 3 years have bred antistate and antisocialist tendencies in Poland's educational community, then isn't this simply more proof that the Soviet-sponsored system of Communist repression is morally and intellectually wrong for the people of Poland?

So let us not be misled. The Polish Government has little or no intention of granting any substantial freedoms to its citizens. We cannot allow ourselves to be distracted from the reality of oppression in Soviet dominated nations like Poland.●

TASK FORCE ON PLANT CLOSINGS AND WORKER DISLOCATION

HON. LYNN MARTIN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. MARTIN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, plant closings create tremendous economic and personal disruptions within our communities. Unfortunately, northern Illinois knows only too well the effects of layoffs and plant closings. Specific industries, steel, machine tool, and autos to name a few, have been particularly hard hit. And just recently 360 employees were laid off in Oregon and Mount Carroll, IL. It is imperative that we give special attention to worker dislocation that occurs as a result of plant closings.

I am pleased that Secretary of Labor Bill Brock has created a Task Force on Plant Closings and Worker Dislocation. This task force will be assigned to examine the issue of plant closings, and to evaluate current programs and policies at the State, local, and Federal level. The task force will also assess all new proposals including both policy recommendations and Federal legislation. Some of the critical elements the task force will be examining are: advance notice of plant closings, joint labor-management outplacement, job search training, skill retraining, and extension of benefits.

The task force will be composed of three representatives from Labor, three representatives from business, three Members of Congress, three Senators, one representative from the National Governors' Association, one representative from the U.S. Conference of Mayors, and two representatives from universities or private study groups.

There is no question in my mind that American technology can and will provide new designs, new industries, and new jobs for our workers. Adjustments and readjustments in the economy will not take place, however, without some dislocation of skilled workers. This task force will attempt to provide solutions by bringing together all existing programs to produce a comprehensive plan. While some dislocated worker problems are reduced by existing programs such as unemployment insurance, the Job Training Partnership Act, employment services, and trade adjustment assistance, these programs often provide only transitional assistance. We must seek solutions to ensure continuous long-term employment.

I am hopeful this panel can produce a meaningful report which can be used as the foundation for an effective response to the problems of plant closings.●

EPA INACTION ON ACID RAIN

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, a recent article in the New York Times reports on a court ruling that the Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] must immediately act to stop the pollution that causes acid rain. The article, which I commend to my colleagues' attention, explains that the Agency has thus far taken no effective action to curb the pollution that is resulting in severe acid rain problems, especially in Canada.

This court decision is but the latest in a series of rulings which are a direct result of EPA's failure to implement the Nation's major environmental laws. The Agency's failure to act forces resolution of this difficult and important public policy issues into the courts, where judges are compelled to resolve them.

The New York Times article follows:

EPA Weighing Appeal of Ruling Requiring Steps to Curb Acid Rain

(By Philip Shabecoff)

Washington.—The head of the Environmental Protection Agency today ordered his staff to study the implications of a Federal court ruling requiring the agency to order states to reduce pollution that causes acid rain.

Lee M. Thomas, the agency's administrator, asked his staff to look at all options, from complying with the court decision handed down Friday to appealing it to a higher court. Agency officials, who spoke on condition they not be identified, said they thought it most likely that the court ruling would be appealed.

The decision, by Federal District Judge Norma Holloway Johnson, ruled in favor of New York and several other states, which had sued to require the E.P.A. to act on pollution from seven Middle West and border states that is crossing state boundaries and into Canada as acidic rain, snow, fog or dust.

DECISION ON CANADA ONLY

Judge Johnson's decision dealt only with the request for action against pollution crossing into Canada. It said that the E.P.A. must identify states responsible for that pollution and then order them to curb any emissions that cause acid rain to fall in Canada. The issue of interstate pollution is now pending before the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia.

In a formal statement, the agency said that the Reagan Administration "has publicly recognized that acid rain is a serious environmental problem in the United States and Canada." The Administration has contended that more needs to be learned about acid rain before an expensive program to combat it is undertaken.

The E.P.A. said today that the states affected by the ruling are Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, West Virginia, Michigan and Tennessee.

The chief source of acid precipitation is the emission of oxides of sulfur and nitrogen from the burning of fossil fuels. Much of this pollution originates from coal-burning power plants, many of which are concentrated in the Middle West. The pollution is carried East and North by prevailing winds and falls on the Northeast and Canada, destroying life in vulnerable bodies of fresh water, and, some researchers say, damaging forests, man-made structures and endangering human health.

New York's Attorney General, Robert Abrams, as well as environmental groups, hailed the decision as a major step toward forcing the Administration to take action to reduce the pollution that causes acid rain.

But Joseph Dowd, general counsel of the American Electric Power Company, which operates large coal-fired power plants in the Middle West and would be heavily affected by Judge Johnson's decision, called the ruling a "shocker" and "very disturbing."

Mr. Dowd said he expected the E.P.A. to appeal the decision and that in any case, the nearly 80 utility companies that are party to the suit would appeal.

Mr. Abrams said that Judge Johnson's decision was "the most significant ruling yet in a four-year struggle to compel the Reagan Administration to curb sulfur dioxide emissions by midwestern power plants."

Richard Ayres, a lawyer for the Natural Resources Defense Council and chairman of the National Clean Air Coalition, an alliance of environmental, consumer and public health organizations, said the decision was another "tightening of the vice" on the Environmental Protection Agency to force it to act on acid rain.

Mr. Ayres said environmentals still believe legislation by Congress is needed to develop an effective program to curb acid rain.

Dr. Michael Oppenheimer, an astrophysicist for the Environmental Defense Fund, said the court decision would put pressure on Congress to shape an acid rain policy.

Bruce Jutzi, counselor for the environment at the Canadian Embassy here said: "Our first reaction was one of pleasure of having the court recognize that transboundary pollution is a matter of serious concern that should be dealt. We have been pressing that point for some time. In terms of what it means beyond that, we will have to read the decision very carefully." ●

WE SHELL OUT A PECK FOR THIS NUTTY PROGRAM

HON. STAN LUNDINE

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LUNDINE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to submit for the consideration of the House an article by James Bovard that was printed in the Wall Street Journal, Monday, July 29. I feel that this article gives a clear and insightful account of an obsolete peanut program that warrants revision.

I am in strong agreement with Mr. Bovard's accurate description of the absurdity of the present two-tier price system for peanuts, which drives up the price and limits supply. After reading this article, I am sure that my colleagues will recognize that this feudal program is not only unnecessary, but also very costly to the American consumer.

We Shell Out a Peck for This Nutty Program

(By James Bovard)

Amazingly, consumers may soon get a break on the 1985 farm bill. When the Senate considers the agricultural bill this week, Sen. Richard Lugar (R. Ind.) intends to offer an amendment to terminate the current peanut program. If Sen. Lugar's amendment passes, the farm lobby's phalanx will be broken, and other farm programs might be defeated.

Sen. Lugar is targeting perhaps the most obnoxious farm program around. It slashes productivity, boosts costs, inflates prices, and sacrifices some farmers to other farmers. If consumers are ever to make a stand in the farm bill fight, the peanut program is a good place to begin.

Farmers cannot grow peanuts for their fellow citizens without a federal license. Thirty-six years ago, to reduce budget outlays under a generous price-support program. Congress closed off the peanut industry, distributing licenses to grow peanuts to existing farmers and prohibiting anyone else from entering the business. Feudalism still reigns, and the farmer who violates the peanut proscription is subject to heavy fines and ensnarement in the Agriculture Department bureaucracy.

The peanut program is particularly perverse because Congress has piled on one restriction after another over the years. In 1977, Congress, in an attempt to reduce budget outlays caused by peanut surpluses, began restricting the amount of peanuts to be sold in the U.S. The domestic peanut supply has been nearly halved since 1975. Thus has created an artificial shortage and shifted the cost of the peanut program from the government to consumers.

The peanut program is replete with the usual as policy flim-flams. By law, peanut support prices must be based on cost of production (COP). The Agriculture Department gets this "fair price" by averaging costs of the most productive and least competent farmers. The implicit premise is that no matter how badly a farmer bungles his business, he is entitled to be reimbursed (in part) for his efforts.

In 1980, peanuts were hit by drought, which sharply reduced yields and thereby temporarily boosted per-pound production costs. Congress based its 1981 COP calculation on the 1980 drought year—which conveniently justified a 21% hike in price supports, from $440 to $555 a ton.

The COP figure is also a joke because the peanut program itself adds as much as 50% to a farmer's cost of production. Approximately half of all growers rent licenses to grow (called quota allotments) from outsiders, paying a tribute of up to $120 a ton for the right to grow goobers. The cost of renting allotments is added to the COP formula, which results in higher price supports, which drives up the rents for the privilege to grow peanuts, which results in higher COP . . . ad infinitum.

The quota system is also responsible for exhausting the soil and driving down peanut yields in many places. Quota allotments cannot be rented outside of the county they were originally allocated to in 1949. Peanut yields in parts of Texas have long been declining. While many acres with yields below 1,000 pounds have quotas, over a million acres with potential yields of 2,500 pounds or more are banned from producing for the domestic market.

The one good thing about the peanut program is also the element that proves that the whole shebang is unnecessary. As of 1981, any farmer could grow peanuts for export (called Additional Peanuts)—but with no real price guarantees from Uncle Sam. Peanut export sales are now far above mid-1970s levels. Georgia farmers are growing peanuts for export at $325 a ton—at the same time that Congress insists on paying farmers $555 a ton to produce for domestic consumption. Foreigners can buy U.S. peanuts much more cheaply than Americans can.

Though it is good that more farmers have finally been allowed to grow peanuts, the two-tier system sacrifices the newcomers to the old guard. By strictly limiting the domestic quota, the Agriculture Department reduces U.S. peanut consumption and thereby dumps a few hundred million tons of extra peanuts on the world market. This depresses prices received by American farmers growing peanuts for export.

The two-tier system is absurb. Peanut butter made from quota peanuts can be exported to Canada and Mexico, but peanut butter made from additional peanuts cannot. (The Agriculture Department fears the cheaper peanut butter made from additional peanuts could be reimported.) The additional peanuts themselves can be exported to Canada, and American peanut butter manufacturers are paranoid that canadian companies might be using cheap peanuts to make peanut butter and then sending it back across the border.

Congress gives peanut growers a far better deal than other farmers receive. An American Peanut Product Manufacturers Institute study estimated that peanut price supports "have been set 80 percent above USDA-defined production costs . . . when land costs are excluded, and 60 percent above when the inflated costs of land are included." The Institute differs with the Agriculture Department's method of calculating peanut production costs. APPMI estimates that net returns to peanut farmers are four to 10 times higher than returns from competing crops.

Consumers are, as usual, the victims of this farm program. The Agriculture Department estimates that the peanut program boosts peanut butter prices 13.5 percent. Public Voice for Food and Health Policy, a Washington consumer group, estimates that the peanut program mulcts consumers for $250 million to $300 million a year.

There is hope for reform. The peanut program was almost knocked off in 1981. That year, Rep. Stan Lundine (D., N.Y.) proposed terminating the program, and the House approved 250-159. Sen. Lugar proposed phasing it out, and the Senate initially approved, 56-42. (The Senate later reversed itself, 51-47, and Rep. Lundine's bill vanished in conference.) Now both Rep. Lundine and Sen. Lugar will try again. APPMI, other peanut-product manufacturers, and Public Voice are vigorously lobbying to persuade Congress to end the goober madness. The peanut program's opposition is stronger and better organized this year and appears to have a good chance of success. And if the peanut program can be knocked down, a domino effect could occur with the rapid demise of the honey, wool and sugar programs.

The peanut program artfully combines the worst traits of feudalism and central economic planning. Congress has a chance to end this program that makes a mockery of efficiency, fairness and property rights.

Mr. Bovard writes frequently on farm and other U.S. programs. ●

ANNUAL QUESTIONNAIRE

HON. NORMAN F. LENT

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LENT. Mr. Speaker, in May I mailed my 15th annual questionnaire to my entire Fourth Congressional District in Nassau County, NY. The questionnaire has been a tradition thoughout my years in Congress, because I find it provides me with an accurate and invaluable gauge of my constitutents' positions on important national issues. Knowing their thoughts and opinions helps me do a better job representing them in Congress.

This year, two of the most important issues facing Congress are tax reform and reducing the budget deficit, issues which will directly affect Long Island working families. Acordingly, the 1985 questionnaire was designed in a way to help me obtain my constituents' opinions on these critical and timely matters.

As in past years, I was very pleased with the overwhelming response; over 10,000 people participated in this year's poll. I'd like to take this opportunity to thank all those people who took the time to fill out the questionnaire and to let me know what they think about the problems facing our Nation today.

The strong response reconfirms my conviction that the residents of the Fourth Congressional District are concerned citizens working for a more responsive, effective democratic government. Long Islanders are active on all levels of government and take a special interest in Federal matters. I'd like now to share these poll results with my distinguished colleagues.

The poll's first section dealt with the various proposals to reduce the Federal budget deficit. A large majority, over 76.5 percent, were opposed to a tax increase as part of a plan to reduce the deficit. A somewhat smaller majority—70 percent—said they favored an across-the-board budget freeze on all spending, both domestic and military, to reduce the Federal deficit. But well over two-thirds—69.4 percent—said "No" to a freeze on Social Security cost-of-living increases.

Respondents were more evenly split on the question of restricting federally guaranteed student loans to students from families with annual gross incomes of $32,500. Support for such an initiative was 53.7 percent, with 46.3 percent opposed.

An important issue for New York and Long Island is funding for mass transit operations. A total of 43.4 percent said they favored reductions with 56.6 percent against lower funding levels for mass transit.

The second half of the questionnaire focused on tax reform. Among respondents, there was a sharp division on the question of replacing the current 14-bracket graduated income tax system with a flat-rate tax plan which would eliminate most deductions and tax according to a single three bracket system with tax rates set a 15 percent, 25 percent and 35 percent of taxable income. Respondents favored the flat-rate tax concept by 53.7 percent, while 43.6 percent rejected the plan.

However, Fourth Congressional District residents overwhelmingly opposed the flat-rate tax reform plan if it eliminated the deduction for State income and sales taxes—82.2 percent—and the deduction for real property taxes—school and town—89.3 percent.

Somewhat smaller, though significant, majorities of constituents objected to the flat-rate tax reform plan if it taxed employee fringe benefits, such as health insurance coverage paid by employers—78 percent; build-up of values in life-insurance—78.5 percent; and capital gains—58.7 percent.

Congress is now deadlocked in negotiations on a budget reduction package. Tax reform is an equally complex issue, and there is certain to be heated debate in Congress over some of the more controversial provisions. I will fight to protect my Long Island constituents from unjust taxation, and I am gratified to have their support in the coming struggle. I hope that by sharing this information, my colleagues have gained a better understanding and appreciation for the views of my Long Island constituents on these critical national issues. ●

NAA REPORT ON THE HELSINKI ACCORDS

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for my colleagues' perusal excerpts from a report published last November by the North Atlantic Assembly Committee on Civilian Affairs on the "Implementation of the Humanitarian Commitments Entered into at the CSCE." It was prepared by the Rapporteur of the Subcommittee on the Free Flow of Information and People, Mr. Frans Vangronsveld, a member of the Belgian Senate, and a good friend and colleague of mine at the Assembly.

Since this week marks the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords, I felt it appropriate to share this report from the Assembly. The Assembly also publishes, under the auspices of the Civilian Affairs Committee, a quarterly publication entitled the Bulletin, dealing the humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki accords.

I would like to add that I have been privileged to be a member of the House delegation to the Assembly since coming to Congress, and last November I was given the honor of being elected chairman of the Civilian Affairs Committee. The committee, and the entire Assembly, deals with a whole range of issues affecting the Atlantic Alliance. It is a first-class organization, and I am proud to be a part of it.

I can make available to my colleagues copies of the Bulletin and Mr. Vangronsveld's report.

SUMMARY

I. IMPLEMENTATION OF THE HUMAN RIGHTS COMMITMENTS ENTERED INTO AT THE CSCE

The Rapporteur sets out from the following observaion: the signatories of the Helsinki Final Act and its follow-up do not all show the same commitment to implementing their human rights undertakings. The so-called "socialist" countries are in many cases determined not to implement them. The draft report draws up a picture, for each type of undertaking, of the violations of the Final Act. It notes that the picture is varied. Certain countries, like Hungary, have progressed, while others decline to move forward at all. Some areas—like religious freedom—seem more susceptible to change, while in others—such as freedom of association—there seems to be little likelihood of the situation improving.

To induce the signatory states to keep their promises, the draft report proposes that Western diplomacy be "conditionalised", so as to avoid the drawbacks of "linkage". In order to do this, each of the Alliance countries should be encouraged to adopt a different approach, as the various Alliance countries maintain relations of differing degrees with each of the communist countries. Care should be taken to avoid these countries reacting as a bloc, and this calls for coordinated but diversified diplomacy.

Public means represent a vital supplement to diplomacy, especially in a field which affects relations between peoples. The draft report calls for a separation between such activity and the diplomatic approach, with states resorting to public means in the event of failure of diplomatic channels, and the rest being left to private initiative and international communication by means of orders and documents.

* * * * * *

I. IMPLEMENTATION OF THE HUMANITARIAN COMMITMENTS ENTERED INTO AT THE CSCE

1. By the time the Madrid Conference closed some progress had been made in the field of human rights, particularly in the areas of the press and trades union rights. Since the signing of the Helsinki Final Act, however, there have been constant violations of the human rights commitments contrived therein. One is entitled to wonder what point there is in progress on paper while the actual situation has not improved.

2. The CSCE process has reached a crucial juncture. If no real progress is made in the field of human rights, the forthcoming meetings of the Conference will lose all credibility, since the Western signatories will know in advance that the commitments given by the Eastern bloc will have no practical value. This would not only tend to make our diplomacy look ineffective, but would increase cynicism both on the part of the Eastern bloc countries and even more so on the part of public opinion in the West, for which the natural tendency would be to look on these developments as an abstract game of concern to governments for reasons that have very little to do with human solidarity. It is therefore our Sub-Committee's task to see what means would be likely to bring about fuller and more balanced application of the commitments entered into the course of the CSCE process. In order to do this, we must first take stock of the extent to which these commitments have been violated, then examine the paths, both public and diplomatic, which would make it possible to bring pressure to bear on the signatories who appear to attach scant importance to honouring their promises—or indeed appear to be determined not to honour them.

A. EXTENT OF THE VIOLATIONS OF THE HELSINKI COMMITMENTS

3. This is not the place to detail the multiple violations of the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Final Act (Principle VII and Basket III in particular). We must settle for a brief survey of recent developments, attempting to pick out the most significant features. The Bulletin published by the International Secretariat for our Sub-Committee constitutes a sad catalog of these multiple violations. Ninety to ninety-five per cent of them were perpetrated by governments of the Eastern bloc.

4. However if we look more closely at the events of recent years we can detect a real disparity first of all between the conditions prevailing in the various countries of the Eastern bloc, and secondly between each of these countries and the Soviet Union. These differences serve to define the subtly shaded framework within which our countries' policies should be shaped, if they are to be realistic and effective. Actual conditions and pressures differ noticeably from one country to another, resulting in some unevenness in the degree of application of the various types of Helsinki commitment.

G. ENCOURAGE CHANGES

66. The Helsinki process, continued in Belgrade and later in Madrid, represented an attempt to "Europeanise" human rights questions, giving each of the signatories a right to voice their views on the matters mentioned in the Final Act, and its follow-up, even in connection with affairs internal to another state. In other words, the principle of non-interference is retained, but it cannot be invoked by a signatory to the Act to stop its partners intervening in connection with specific instances on questions dealt with in the Act. Thus there is no longer any principle of non-intervention in Europe (Albania excepted). This is why it is indispensable for the governments of the Alliance to seize every opportunity to show their concern over the violations of the human rights provisions of the Final Act. Depending on the case, this should be done discreetly, by diplomatic methods, or else publicly. But it should never be forgotten that this is the major achievement of the CSCE process.

67. This opportunity opened up by the Final Act and its follow-up is rendered even more effective by the fact that societies of the Eastern countries differ widely from one another. The survey given above shows that there are now large discrepancies in governmental behaviour between countries of the Warsaw Pact, and, even more importantly, between the societies living under the "communists" regime. This variety is even more striking if one considers not only the human rights aspects of the internal situation of these countries, but on a more global level the societies taken as a whole. Their economic systems, their types of political organization and the power of the Communist parties, for example, also vary substantially from one country to another.

68. The CSCE process cannot claim any responsibility for this diversity, but, if it is used consistently, it indubitably represents a factor making for fluidity in relations between European States. Anything that can help to transform the societies dominated by the Communist States by moving them towards greater diversity must help to make the "bloc" a less monolithic unit grouping and therefore less a bloc than an alliance. It is obviously up to the citizens of these countries themselves to consolidate these changes, but Western nations must not and cannot stand idly by. Any movement in this direction represents an advance for European peace.

69. More formal consideration should however be given to the means which might make it possible to force the signatories of the Act to register some progress towards honouring their commitments. In this respect, the first principle must be precision. The Soviets and their satellites always prefer vague and "universally" applicable formulas to precise and concrete commitments. There is nothing surprising in this. The totalitarian regimes' "Newspeak" let them interpret general principles their own way: notions which for us have a precise meaning are so distorted as to become completely malleable, serving to say anything one likes and its precise opposite. This is why the constitutions of the Communist countries detail rights which are often nonexistent in practice.

70. The prime objective for the free nations must therefore be to secure commitments from the leaders of the Eastern bloc countries and the USSR that are as precise and as verifiable as possible. The objective must be a situation in which compliance with the commitments can be monitored in a manner that leaves no room for doubt. In this respect, some progress was made in Madrid. The fact, for example, that replies to requests for visas for potential emigrants must now given within six months (and no longer "within a reasonable time") represents a veritable commitment. In the same way the provisions relating to press correspondents will make it possible to arrive at an incontrovertible verdict on the extent to which the Madrid provisions are being faithfully applied. This must be the path taken by the forthcoming follow-up conferences on human rights. It is quite obvious today that global promises have no practical value. However we should not delude ourselves: the further the countries of the Alliance proceed along this path, the more difficult it will be to reach agreements. The Soviets and their allies will take shelter behind a restrictive interpretation of the principle of non-interference, although they themselves completely ignore this principle in waging their constant ideological war against the West.

71. If paralysis is to be avoided, the approach to these negotiations must be one that avoids confrontation between our Alliance and the Eastern bloc. We should make due allowance for the fact that the influence which the Alliance and each one of the countries of the Alliance can exert on each of the countries of the bloc varies considerably. Our influence on Soviet society is minimal, but this is not the case for all the societies of the satellite countries, with which we have economic and human relations that offer us broader scope for action. On the other hand the nations of the Alliance have more or less developed relations with the East, and any human rights policy must take account of the partners' capacity for influence. Policies that are too universal can be dangerous inasmuch as they run the risk of strengthening the solidarity between the leaders of the "brother countries", whereas the aim should be to weaken this solidarity. To make progress along this path, your Rapporteur suggest consideration, in turn, of diplomatic methods and public means. * * * * *

CONCLUSION

90. Your Rapporteur would like to add that in his opinion parliamentarians from the member countries of the Alliance should be involved in the negotiations for the follow-up to the Final Act, following the United States practice, in order to make the public more familiar with these matters, which concern not only the States, but the citizens too. National delegations to the forthcoming meetings should at the very least include parliamentary observers, or better still contain parliamentarians as members of the delegation. The North Atlantic Assembly should likewise be involved in the prior consultation procedures of the member countries of the Alliance. This would make for greater consistency in the stances adopted within each of our countries, and also between the countries themselves.

91. The purpose of this report is to think of ways of introducing human rights consideration into the framework of inter-state negotiations, in order to assure them of their rightful place. All too often, questions relating to the citizens themselves are looked on as external to the normal field of foreign policy: they are then used for informational purposes or even propaganda purposes, or else in illustration of political considerations.

92. It is your Rapporteur's view that morality must have an integral place in the international concerns of democratic states and societies. This is not a matter of lapsing into other worldliness, but of making our moral objectives an integral part of our diplomatic practice. Human rights are one of the objectives of the Atlantic Alliance's international action. To come close to this objective, our nations must shape their international policy within this framework. Moral pressure must be backed up by political pressure. This is the price of consistency between our countries' foreign policies and the principles they invoke.

SERGEANT YORK GUN

HON. DENNY SMITH

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DENNY SMITH. Mr. Speaker, as some of my colleagues are aware, I have been a strong proponent since coming to Congress of the need for our Armed Services and the Office of the Secretary of Defense to place more emphasis on the importance of rigorous operational testing of our proposed weapons systems.

In my mind, this is an issue that is second to none when it comes to solving procurement problems at the Pentagon. It would be criminal to send our young fighting men weapons that are ineffective or that would fail on the battlefield because of a failure to conduct tough, combat-like tests on them beforehand.

A weapon system under heavy scrutiny by the Department of Defense, the Sergeant York Gun System, has recently been put through a series of trials and demonstrations conducted by the Army in order to measure the weapons capabilities.

While the test reports on this set of trials have yet to be completed, I thought my colleagues would be interested in reading the comments recently directed at me by Gen. James Maloney, our Army's commanding officer at Ft. Bliss, TX and the Army's chief proponent of the Sergeant York gun. The following is an article published by the Gannett News Service on August 1 containing General Maloney's statements:

SERGEANT YORK GUN

EL PASO, TEXAS.—Fort Bliss commanding officer Maj. James Maloney said Wednesday he was "infuriated" by a congressman's statements that Army tests on the controversial DIVAD anti-aircraft gun were skewed to give the illusion that the weapon performed better that it actually did.

And officers who participated in recent tests on the DIVAD, also known as the Sgt. York gun said it performed according to Army specifications.

Rep. Denny Smith, R-Ore., said videotapes of tests showed unmanned aircraft, called drones, still flying after Sgt. York rounds burst nearby.

Instead of waiting to see whether the aircraft would crash, Smith said, the Army used remote control detonation signals to destroy the drones in the air.

Maloney called a press conference to show El Paso media a videotape made during the four-day tests at White Sands Missile Range during June and to defend the weapon against the statements, which Smith made in a letter to Jack Krings, head of the Pentagon's operational test and evaluation agency.

"He is not doing this for the good of the nation," Maloney said of Smith's criticism. "He is ill-informed, he is misinformed, he is uninformed."

The DIVAD shells use proximity fuses and explode near their targets and shower the targets with tungsten pellets, Maloney said. During the tests, drones made 32 passes by two DIVAD guns. By the end of the live-fire tests, six of the seven aircraft had been destroyed. The tests involved both fixed-wing aircraft and helicopters.

Maloney said target destruction on the first pass was not a realistic expectation during the tests, which were limited by safety regulations.

He said the drones were outside the radius of the guns because when the shells "score a kill," the drone loses control and could crash into the guns, test instruments and spectators at the test site.

In tests, he said, "the probability of a kill would be a good deal lower than in an actual tactical situation."

And Maloney said Smith's charges that the Army's use of remote control detonation to destroy the aircraft to make tests appear more spectacular were absolutely false.

With the loss of control after a Sgt. York strike, Maloney said, there is no way to manipulate the aircrafts' crash position.

"I suggest you talk to the people who push the buttons to see why they do that," he said. "We did our absolute best to make these tests objective."

Maloney noted that Smith's criticism came just before Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger makes a decision on whether to exercise an option to Order 117 additional Sgt. York units.

"He is in a position to do damage to the program," Maloney said, "because he has the immediate ear of the press."

But he said Smith had very little credibility in the Pentagon.

Maloney said the DIVAD system was not without its warts, but the problems were minor and could be corrected.

Lt. Joseph Pouliot, who was executive officer for the tests, and Lt Harry Pecotte, firing platoon leader, also defended the Sgt. York's effectiveness.

Pouliot said he was not a Sgt. York supporter before the tests, but now be considered it by far the best air defense gun in the world.

Each Sgt. York unit, which consists of two 10mm guns mounted on a chassis, costs $3.5 million, Maloney said, and the entire system, which inlcudes 614 units, would amount to $4.2 billion.●

THE SECRET AGENDA OF SUPPLY SIDE ECONOMICS

HON. GEORGE MILLER
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of California. Mr. Speaker, 4 years ago, this country embarked on one of the greatest fiscal experiments in history. The cure for huge deficits was a magical elixir called supply side economics.

Disbelievers warned that gigantic tax cuts—the key ingredient of the supply siders' recipe—would multiply the deficit, then in the $50 to $70 billion range. Supply siders, like Arthur Laffer, responded with a drawing on a napkin which proved their unorthodox theory.

In 1981, Congress passed President Reagan's tax bill, reducing Federal revenues by $750 billion. Over the course of the next 4 years, deficits have steadily increased, from about $70 billion when Mr. Reagan took office to deficits of $200 billion a year "as far as the eye can see," according to David Stockman.

The President continues to excoriate Congress as big spenders. But the exact opposite is true. In fact, Congress has appropriated less than the President has requested in every year but one.

Between 1982 and 1985, Congress cut nondefense spending by $176 billion to further reduce the deficit. But during the same period, at the insistence of the President, we increased military spending by $112 billion. Today, the Pentagon spends our tax money at the fantastic rate of $800 million every day of the year.

If Congress is not to blame, what is?

According to several reviews, it is supply side which has failed, and failed badly. The tax cuts of 1981 have added $115 billion to the current deficit, according to a study by the Federal Reserve Board.

During the period 1982-84, when the benefits of the supply side magic were supposed to appear, several of the leading economic indicators actually dropped, including personal savings rates, total savings, and gross private investment as a share of GNP.

Real GNP grew at a slower rate during the heyday of supply side economics than during the Carter administration.

There was a tiny increase in the share of GNP used for fixed nonresidential investment, but the increase was less than in the immediate pre-Reagan years.

And unemployment now seems permanently locked above 7 percent—a level which Mr. Reagan and the supply siders decried in 1980.

On the basis of this evidence, it would seem logical to conclude that supply side economics have failed to achieve its goals. But that would be an inaccurate assumption. For while supply side economics may have failed in its public purpose—to balance the budget and stimulate the economy—it has wildly succeeded in its private goal.

That secret agenda was to deplete the Federal Treasury through unsound tax policies in order to establish the political rationale and public mandate for slashing Federal spending for virtually every domestic program. Gone from the budget debates, for the most part, are serious discussions of the necessity or workability of specific programs. The budget battle is now only a race between Democrats and Republicans, Congress and the White House, to see who can cut more, regardless of the consequences and long-term costs.

This year, the House of Representatives made a very serious effort to reduce the deficit. We cut spending by $56 billion for next year, about equally from defense and from domestic programs. No one was spared except those few programs which serve the very poorest and neediest of our citizens. The House preserved Social Security and retirement plans. We did not raise taxes. And the President rejected not only the House plan, but multiple Senate deficit cutting initiatives as well.

Predictably, the President is now going to blame the Congress for the deficits which will continue to grow in 1986. That may be good campaign rhetoric, but it is simply not accurate. Responsibility lies solidly with the President and his economic strategists who have repeatedly rejected good faith efforts to cut the deficit.

It is important to remember that the President has had five opportunities to match his rhetoric with performance by sending a balanced budget to the Congress. Instead, he has submitted budgets with dramatically higher deficits every year he has served in office.

Vice President Bush was right in 1980 when he ridiculed supply side theory as "voodoo economics." We should have listened to him then, before the deficit was tripled under the supply side game plan.

A thoughtful analysis of the failure of supply side economics was published recently in the Washington Post by Dr. Robert M. Dunn, Jr., professor of economics at George Washington University.

I commend Professor Dunn's article to my colleagues.

The article follows:

BYE-BYE, SUPPLY SIDE—YOU NEVER DID MAKE MUCH SENSE, BUT THAT WASN'T THE POINT

(By Robert M. Dunn, Jr.)

Almost four years ago the Kemp-Roth tax cut became law with brave promises from supply-side economists that wonderful things were going to happen to the U.S. economy.

According to Arthur Laffer, a massive reduction in personal income taxes would produce such strong incentives to work, save and invest that the economy would almost explode with growth. The rapid increase in output and incomes would generate such an increase in tax revenues that all the losses from lowered tax rates would be recovered. Perhaps the economy might grow so rapidly that tax receipts would actually increase.

Even among supply-siders who doubted that quite all of the revenue losses could be recovered, there were confident predictions of more savings, more investment, faster growth and generally good times. The economy's increased capacity to produce was also supposed to make it possible to eliminate inflation without a recession.

It was a lovely vision, and because almost four years have passed since the tax cut was passed, and the rate reductions have long since been fully phased in, it now becomes possible to ask whether the vision has been realized. The answer is that it has not been, and that the supply-side arguments for personal income tax look rather silly.

Federal budget deficits of almost $200 billion make it obvious that the revenue losses have not been recovered. A recent econometric study by Henry Wallich and Darrel Cohen at the Federal Reserve Board concludes that the tax cuts of 1981 have contributed $115 billion to the current federal deficit, even after allowing for the small tax increases of succeeding years. Prof. Laffer's predictions that revenues would be fully recovered through more rapid economic growth can now be forgotten.

Comparing the performance of the U.S. economy during the three years after the tax cut with its performance during the four years of Jimmy Carter's administration provides little comfort for supply-side economics.

Personal savings rates actually declined slightly (from 6 percent to 5.8 percent) in 1982-84. The total savings rate for the economy fell sharply (from 15.8 percent of gross national product to 13.8 percent) because of massive federal government "dis-saving" in the form of huge budget deficits. Lower tax rates did not produce more savings.

Gross private investment also declined as a share of GNP after the tax cut (from 16.9 percent to 15.1), which hardly suggests an acceleration of capacity growth. There was a tiny increase—from 11 to 11.2 percent—in the share of GNP used for fixed nonresidential investment, which is mainly plant and equipment, but even that figure was lower in 1984 than in 1979 or 1980.

There apparently has been an increase in investment in equipment as a share of GNP, but that was caused by the combination of an investment tax credit and Accelerated Cost Recovery rather than personal income-tax cuts. In addition almost all of that growth was in computers, a form of investment that now seems to be flattening out.

Since there was no increase in savings or total investment as a share of GNP, it is not surprising that there was no acceleration of economic growth. Real GNP grew less rapidly in 1982-84 (2.8 percent a year) than in 1977-80 (3.3 percent a year). Although growth during 1984 was impressive, it has recently slowed, and the economy is now expected to grow by only about 2 percent during 1985. Inflation was reduced dramatically, but at the cost of a deep recession in 1982.

The supply-side revolution has been a flop. Almost four years after the passage of a massive tax cut, there has been a decline, in the savings rate, private investment has not increased as a share of GNP, growth of the economy has not accelerated and federal deficits have exploded, largely because of lost tax revenues.

If the promises of supply-side economics have failed so badly, why has the Reagan administration's management of the economy been so popular, and why did President Reagan enjoy such a landslide victory last November? The answer is that the claims of supply-side economics were never central to Reaganomics, and that on the issues about which his supporters really cared, he delivered.

First, people wanted inflation stopped. Price increases of 13.3 percent in 1979 were frightening, and Reagan presided over a sharp deceleration of that inflation. The fact that this was largely the work of a Federal Reserve chairman who was inherited from the Carter years is irrelevant. Reagan was in office when inflation slowed greatly, and he gets the credit.

Second, a large number of Americans wanted their taxes cut, and they didn't care greatly about the quality of arguments used to justify such a cut. For those who viewed April 15 as an annual financial mugging, the operative motto was, "Any port in a storm," and even a silly argument for tax cuts was a good argument.

Finally, many conservatives viewed a tax cut as a way to reduce government revenues and thereby to force Congress to cut spending for a variety of domestic programs. They would have been appalled if Laffer had been correct and Congress had had plently of money to spend on programs they despised.

Reagan did produce a large tax cut. Many domestic social programs have been cut. And Congress is under constant pressure to eliminate others. With inflation at about 4 percent the real economic goals of the Reagan revolution have been largely realized. Supply-side economics was only a fig leaf designed to give a modest intellectual respectability to a quite different agenda. It can now be viewed as a sideshow on which the curtain can be brought down. Goodby, supply side.●

STREAMLINE EXPORT LICENSING

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, our present system of export licensing is undermining the ability of U.S. firms to sell their products overseas and win against foreign competitors. It's costing them customers and profits abroad, and it's costing us jobs and payrolls at home.

We have a responsibility to protect our Nation's security by preventing the flow of critical military technologies to the Soviet bloc. But we also have a responsibility to this country's businesses to streamline a lengthy and cumbersome system and set reasonable control standards.

I understand that Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies will soon publish a study which will reveal that our export control system is hurting U.S. exporters, adding to the trade deficit and hindering high-technology innovation.

I look forward to reviewing this study. With a $130 billion trade deficit that's growing by the day, we must take steps to improve our export control policy. The recent passage of the Export Administration Act will help. Consideration of further reforms will also help. If there is one consistent concern I hear expressed from high-technology companies in my district, it is that the licensing process, in many ways, is neither sensible nor predictable. How can we expect our exporters to get to first base, if they can't even get up to bat?

Mr. Speaker, I hope Congress and the administration will take a close look at the Georgetown center's study when it's released. An article from the Washington Post on this subject follows:

STUDY RAPS EXPORT CONTROLS FOR DELAYS IN U.S. TECHNOLOGY

(By Michale Schrage)

A prominent conservative think tank plans to publish a report next month criticizing U.S. export controls and putting most of the blame for the narrowing defense technology lead over the Soviet Union on lengthy Pentagon procurement policies.

Entitled "Securing Technological Advantage: Balancing Export Controls and Innovation," the paper from Georgetown University's Center for Strategic and International Studies argues that the current list of militarily sensitive technologies is too broad and that "the present control system is overreaching in scope, inconsistent in application and overreliant on unilateral restrictions."

Primarily assembled by a panel of leading high-technology executives, the report further maintains that export controls have hurt U.S. companies abroad, exacerbated the trade deficit and had a chilling effect on high-technology innovation.

Export controls have proven to be one of the thornier policy issues faced by the Reagan administration. Defense hardliners, led by Richard Perle, undersecretary of Defense for international security policy, have aggressively pushed for tough export rules to minimize the chance of strategically important high technology falling into Soviet hands.

Commerce Department officials and representatives of leading U.S. technology companies insist that much of the regulated technology has marginal military importance and that the restrictions hurt U.S. companies competing with Japanese and European companies.

The Georgetown center's study, which has been circulating in both trade and defense circles, has drawn criticism from the Pentagon and cautious approval from a top Commerce Department official.

"It's tough, but we think it's wrong," said Stephen Bryen, an assistant to Perle. "It was put together by businessmen, and we made it very clear that we thought it was unbalanced."

"It's provocative," said William Archey, the Commerce Department's acting assistant secretary for trade adminstration. "It stresses the larger issues and points out that the cost of the controls has got to be looked at."

A major thrust of the report is that the Commerce Department's Commodity Control List, which enumerates some 150 categories that require specific export approval, and the Pentagon's semiclassified Militarily Critical Technologies List are simply too large and complex to be effectively implemented.

"Those lists are so extensive that they are very unwiedly to use," said CSIS panel chairman David Shore, RCA's staff vice president for the Strategic Defense Initiative. "There ought to be some prioritization."

Indeed, the panel pointed out that the larger question isn't purely export control, but encompasses technological application in defense systems. The report will say that the U.S. moves proven technologies to the field too slowly because of Pentagon acquisition policies that have long lead times.

The panelists, many of whom are defense contractors, argued that the U.S. habit of coupling new technology applications to the protracted acquisition cycle for major weapons systems discourages modernization of previously deployed equipment and allows it to become obsolete by the time it is replaced. Much of the difficulty experienced in preserving the U.S. technological edge is therefore of its own making."

The report called for the creation of a blue-ribbon panel to devise a new measure for strategically sensitive products emphasizing "process technologies" that enable high-technology components to be built, rather than the technological end products themselves. This recommendation is reminiscent of the "Bucy Report" on export controls issued a decade ago. Bucy, a former Texas Instruments executive, served on the Georgetown panel.

The CSIS paper also asserted that, despite multilateral efforts to define strategic technologies, foreign availability of high technology often undercut U.S. efforts to block Soviet access, and that assertion of "extraterritoriality" provisions has proven counterproductive.

For U.S. trade with allies, the panel recommended elimination of export licenses in exchange for a system of self-policing in compliance with the new regulations.●

NEVADA WILDERNESS

HON. BARBARA F. VUCANOVICH

OF NEVADA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. VUCANOVICH. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the comments of my colleague from Nevada regarding the myths and realities of wilderness provisions in Nevada. If I understand him correctly he is an advocate of ranching and mining interests who have existing operations, permits, or claims within designated wilderness areas and their continued road access, vehicle, and equipment use within these wilderness areas. I commend him on this point and I reaffirm my invitation to join the rest of Nevada's delegation in support of H.R. 1686 and S. 722.

These bills are the result of the Nevada peoples' call for a conservative wilderness bill. Already, at least half of Nevada's counties have adopted resolutions stating their opposition to wilderness within their jurisdictions. These are the people of Nevada voicing their desire for a designated wilderness that will not infringe upon the land they consider very special as is.

H.R. 1686 and S. 722 are reasonable proposals which seek to accommodate the interests of the people of our State. As their representatives in Congress we have an obligation and responsibility to listen to their message.●

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION ON SECTION 457 PENSION PLANS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing a bill to amend the IRC section 457 program which provides a deferred compensation pension option for State and local employees. This is a variation of a bill I introduced in the 98th Congress, H.R. 5178.

This year's bill would: First, raise the annual dollar limit on deferrals from $7,500 to $15,000; second, remove constructive receipt as an event causing an income inclusion for employees who have separated from service; and third, subject section 457 plans to the distribution rules generally applicable to qualified pension plans.

The section 457 program is not well known, but is described in the following material from the Library of Congress:

The ariticle follows:

Section 457 plans.—Section 457 of the Internal Revenue Code authorizes State governments (and their political subdivisions) to assist their employees in deferring compensation. Deferred compensation generally refers to wages earned in one period but not received until the worker has resigned, retired, or died. The wages that are deferred are not counted as taxable income until the employee received them (along with any accrued interest or earnings).

Section 457, created under the Revenue Act of 1978, was a response by the Congress to the IRS's intent to issue regulations that would have ended the favorable tax treatment of deferred compensation plans. Although deferred compensation plans have existed for at least 30 years, the first favorable ruling from the IRS did not come until 1960. The first favorable ruling on deferred compensation plans for public employees came in 1972. The IRS later determined that this ruling was incorrect. In January 1978, the IRS issued proposed regulations that would have ended the favorable tax treatment of deferred compensation plans—leading to the inclusion of Section 457 in the 1978 Revenue Act.

The following are the general requirements of Section 457 plans. Employees participate on a voluntary basis and up to 33⅓ percent of an employees "includible" income (up to $7,500) may be deferred. "Includible" income does not include amounts deferred under the plan (or other types of deferred compensation plans) or employer "pickup" plans. Thirty-three and one-third percent of "includible" income is equal to 25 percent of a nonparticipating employee's gross income. Employers may not make supplemental contributions to the plan. Distribution of the deferred compensation may only occur after separation from the employer or for unforeseeable emergencies. There is no penalty for distribution of funds before age 59½ (as is the case of IRAs). The full amount of the deferred compensation, including any earnings or property rights, must remain the property of the employer (State or local government) until distribution. The plan may provide employees with a range of investment options. Because of the property rights requirement necessary for favorable tax treatment, the plan may not be under obligation to transfer investments at an employee's request.

Several features of section 457 plans may make them less desirable to State employees than section 401(k) plans. Section 457 plans are less portable; they may only be rolled over into other section 457 plans within the same State. Section 401(k) plans may be rolled over into IRAs or other "qualified" plans. Because section 457 plans are not "qualified" plans they receive less favorable tax treatment at the time of distribution. Specifically, a lump sum distribution from a section 457 plan does not qualify for the special 10-year income averaging available to lump sum distribution from section 401(k) plans. Finally, the contribution limits for higher paid employees (generally those with gross income of over $30,000) are higher under section 401(k) plans.

Section 457 plans are, however, considered less difficult to administer. First, because they are not "qualified" plans, they do not have to conform to the rules governing such plans (such as the nondiscrimination provisions). Second, no employer matching is permitted under section 457 plans, while matching is permitted under section 401(k). Finally, the applicability (and, therefore, legality) of section 401(k) plans to State and local governments is more uncertain than 457 plans. Because 401(k) plans are essentially "profit sharing" plans, there is some question of their availability to the nonprofit public sector. A 1980 IRS General Counsel's memorandum does suggest, however, that tax exempt entities (including State and local governments) may be able to set up 401(k) plans.

The Council of State Governments report states that 30 of the 36 States which responded to their October, 1982 survey had set up deferred compensation plans for their employees. Three other States had passed enabling legislation but enrollment of employees had not begun at the time of the survey. The New York State study reports that about 80 percent of the States had implemented deferred compensation plans (the report was issued in November of 1983). The study also noted that, while comprehensive figures are not available on local governments, 700 counties have joined a deferred compensation plan offered by the National Association of Counties and the Conference of Mayors.

Data on participation in section 457 plans are limited. However, both of the studies reviewed for this discussion place participation at about 10 percent of eligible employees.

As the material indicates, the program has a number of shortcomings relative to other pension type plans. In particular, the $7,500 contribution level has become badly outdated since its 1978 enactment. The following comparisons, also from the Library, describe the contribution limits for various plans. Obviously, section 457 compares very poorly.

Plan type	Contribution limits
Qualified defined benefit plan	Employer may fund a pension benefit of up to 100 percent of employee's average compensation in highest 3 years not to exceed $90,000.
Qualified defined contribution plan.	Annual employer contribution, limited to lesser of 25 percent of employee's compensation or $30,000.
Profit-sharing and stock bonus plans.	15 percent of compensation for all participants in plan.
Section 401(k) salary reduction agreement.	Employee may elect to defer as much as 25 percent of pretax compensation up to $30,000 annually. (Employer usually provides a partial matching contribution.)
Section 457 salary reduction plan.	Employees may elect to defer receipt of up to 33⅓ percent of "includible income" (up to $7,500).
Section 403(b) tax-sheltered annuities.	Basic limit the same as for qualified defined contribution plans (discussed above) until year of retirement when more generous "catch up" contribution rules apply.
Simplified employee pension (SEP) plan.	15 percent of compensation up to $30,000 annually.

These shortcomings were brought to my attention by city officials in my congressional district. I hope that as the Congress rewrites the Internal Revenue Code of 1954, we will bring the State and local pension deferral program in line with other pension options.●

THE WORLD POLICE AND FIRE GAMES

HON. NORMAN Y. MINETA

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MINETA. Mr. Speaker, this weekend in San Jose, CA, over 6,000 police and firefighters from every State in the Union and over 23 other countries will compete in 44 sporting events at the First World Police and Fire Games.

These games will be an historic sporting event that will combine police officer and firefighter athletes from all over the world. They will promote and encourage physical training and fitness which will result in heightened physical preparedness, mental awareness, and professional service to the citizens they serve. This international event will also promote camaraderie among public safety personnel throughout the world through the fellowship of sporting competition.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud that the city of San Jose, and the personnel of the host organizations—the San Jose

Police Department, the Police Amateur Athletic Foundation, along with the support agencies; the San Jose Fire Department, the Santa Clara County Sheriff's Department, the Santa Clara Police Department, the Santa Clara County District Attorney's Office, the Capitola Police Department, the Milpitas Police Department, the Alameda County Sheriff's Department, and the San Mateo County Sheriff's Department—have been responsible for this world class sporting event.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask you and the rest of our colleagues in the U.S. House of Representatives to support the international spirit of the World Police and Fire Games next week, and commend the city of San Jose, the San Jose Police Department and its staff and volunteers for hosting the first such sporting event for police and fire athletes. Let us wish all the athletes welcome and good luck.

Let the games begin.●

LEASING OF BATHHOUSES AT HOT SPRINGS NATIONAL PARK

HON. BERYL ANTHONY, JR.

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to announce that the National Park Service at Hot Springs National Park, AR, has developed an historic property leasing program to begin the leasing of five historic bathhouses there. The historical, architectural, and esthetic entrepreneurs of the Nation should avail themselves of this opportunity.

The historic property leasing program has been established as a means to protect cultural resources while keeping direct Government expenses within reasonable limits. The National Park Service leases historic properties to individuals, groups, or organizations who assume the responsibility for rehabilitating and maintaining the property at little or no cost to the Government. Leasing historic property not only protects and preserves the property but also enhances scenic qualities and cultural resources. In addition, any proceeds from these leases are used to maintain, repair, and preserve National Park Service historic properties and to defray the costs of administering the program.

Under the auspices of this program, the National Park Service invites proposals from organizations, associations, or individuals to lease five historic bathhouses in Hot Springs National Park. These buildings reflect the eclectic architectural interests of the early 20 century and recall a period when the availability of leisure time and an interest in the therapeutic benefit of spas made Hot Springs a resort of national reputation. The bathhouses available for lease are the Hale, the Maurice, the Ozark, the Quapaw, and the Superior. Each building was exquisitely designed in either the Spanish or classical revival style. Proposals may address one bathhouse, a combination of several bathhouses, or the entire complex of five bathhouses. Proposals may involve for-profit or not-for-profit undertakings. The National Park Service will consider proposals on the basis of their effect on the historic character of both the bathhouses and the landscape of Bathhouse Row Historic District. To ensure that the property's historic and architectural values are respected, the National Park Service and the Secretary of the Interior have developed standards that the lessee must follow in carrying out preservation treatment and have specific requirements for construction and maintenance work. In addition, all proposals must be compatible with the National Park Service's mission to preserve our heritage and will be subject to the Service's planning and operational guidelines. The National Park Service shall retain approval authority over the preservation and maintenance of the grounds. The preservation work will be carried out and funded entirely by the lessee.

Under the provisions of the Economic Recovery Tax Act, a lessee who rehabilitates a National Register property to use for income-producing purposes and who leases the building for a minimum of 18 years may qualify for a tax credit of 25 percent of funds expended for rehabilitation. Proposers are advised that the President's tax reform proposal, introduced May 28, 1985, proposes repeal of the investment tax credits for rehabilitating historic structures, effective January 1, 1986.

If a proposal is accepted, the National Park Service will enter into a lease with the party involved under the authority of section 111 of the National Historic Preservation Act of 1966, as amended, and in accordance with 36 CFR 18, the regulations governing the historic property leasing program.

The five bathhouses available for lease are located on Central Avenue in downtown Hot Springs, AR. The city of Hot Springs, with a population of nearly 36,000, is located approximately 60 miles southwest of Little Rock. Potential lessees, including their architects and contractors, are encouraged to make a complete inspection of the properties available for lease in conjunction with the preparation of their proposals. Proposals will be accepted through September 20, 1985, at the Office of the Superintendent, P.O. Box 1860, Hot Springs National Park, AR 71902.

This is a very special project in the hearts of all Arkansans. One cannot ignore the fascinating past that surrounds the old bathhouses—always inviting the romance and excitement to be awakened once more out of the fading grandeur of those buildings. I am determined that the dignity and beauty of these treasures be restored, and I invite each of you to share in our pride as the era of greatness is restored to Bathhouse Row. It is a perfect opportunity to explore the creative and entrepreneurial side within yourself. I invite you to come visit bathhouses—and let your imagination run wild.●

NICARAGUA

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend to my colleagues the following remarks by Mr. Ruffin. Mr. Ruffin is the executive director of the World Without War Council of Greater Seattle, an organization which has sought over the years to advance the political development of the international community toward a world order in which conflicts may be resolved without resort to violence. Under Mr. Ruffins' direction, the council has provided a valuable service to the Seattle community by fostering open public debate on American policy in Central America.

Although the following remarks are not intended to represent the views of the council, I believe that they define a central framework on which many Members of Congress can agree, independently of their disagreements over the Contra aid controversy.

TWENTY-ONE POINTS ON NICARAGUA—WITH EMPHASIS ON FOURTEEN

(By Holt Ruffin [1])

THE PRIMARY FOCUS

1. The primary focus should be on what is causing the killing and violence in Nicaragua and what can be done to end it, consistent with the desire of all Nicaraguans to fashion their political future free from the intervention or domination of other nations.

ON UNITED STATES-NICARAGUAN RELATIONS

2. While the actions of the United States toward Nicaragua have often deserved (and often received) much criticism, our record does not deserve the characterization of "yanqui enemy of humanity," as the Sandinista national anthem has it. Whereas Americans were divided in assessing the implications of a Sandinista-dominated government after the revolution, they were virtually unanimous in acclaiming the fall of

[1] The author is executive director of the World Without War Council of Greater Seattle. The views expressed here are his only and are not limited to represent the views of the organization, or any other people associated with it.

Somoza. The roughly $120 million in assistance we provided to the Sandinista government in its first two years in power was a significant expression of support and was more than we had given Nicaragua under Anastasio Somoza Jr. during his thirteen years in power.

3. The question is much less whether we should be involved than how. What kind of relationship would most benefit the people of Nicaragua, is desired by them, and would also be acceptable to the American people? The best analysis to date of Central American problems remains that of the National Bipartisan Commission on Central America (the Kissinger Commission Report). The President and Congress should move rapidly to implement—and be open to Nicaraguan participation in—the Report's imaginative and comprehensive proposals.

4. Excessive neglect, as much as excessive meddling, can be said to have been the major flaw in U.S. policy toward Central America. Narrow approaches of the realist school, as expressed for example in the excerpt below from a recent article in The New York Times, wisely emphasize the virtues of restraint but fundamentally miss the point.

What we need is a hardheaded America-first policy that focuses less on domestic (Central American) politics and more on keeping Soviet and Cuban bases out. What happens inside Central America is of little interest to us, and we should avoid trying to force either the right or the left to undertake political reform.[2]

The problem with such an approach is that it has in fact characterized United States policy toward Latin America and has contributed to the charge that we are prepared to countenance dictatorships, torture, violence, and political repression—so long as there was no communist threat on the horizon. When communist forces did threaten to take over a government, we began to speak of the need for political reform. Even then our attitudes toward fundamental human rights violations often seemed determined by, and subordinated to, the requirements of effectively meeting the communist threat. The moral shortfalls of this approach have also had practical drawbacks—among which are anti-American feelings in much of Latin America, fueled by a sense of fundamental disinterest and neglect on the part of the United States.

5. The Administration's statements on Nicaragua will be most persuasive if they avoid exaggeration or misrepresentation and present a balanced picture of the situation. The American people know that foreign policy issues are complex and are suspicious of simplifiers, be they Sandinista apologists or members of our government. It would be salutary if the President, while drawing attention to aspects of Sandinista behavior that should concern us, could acknowledge some of their beneficial aspects—e.g., their accomplishments in the field of public health. The American people want to know that our policy is based on a balanced view of the situation; to the degree the President can convince the public of this, support for his policies will strengthen, not weaken.

6. The Administration should consult as closely as possible with leaders of friendly Nicaraguan political forces and leaders of other nations in the region before adopting new policies or measures. The conomic sanctions (which have been opposed by many non-Sandinista Nicaraguans, as well as 23 heads of state in Latin America) are an example of an ill-considered action which might have been averted with more regional consultation. Multilateral diplomacy is slower, can be more difficult, and may sometimes be ineffecive—yet it is essential to resolving problems in Central America. For this reason, the Administration should make every effort to strengthen—and not ignore or oppose—the joint diplomacy of the nations of the region, and especially the Contadora group.

7. Any notions of using Nicaragua to square accounts with the Soviet Union and Cuba for Vietnam, Angola, Ethiopia, or Afghanistan—to prove that "communist revolutions are reversible"—should be resisted. There is an East-West dimension to the conflict in Nicaragua, but it would be unfair to the suffering people of that nation—to say the least—to let a desire to "teach a lesson" to the Soviet Union or Cuba undermine our efforts to accomplish the central task: strengthening peace and freedom in Nicaragua and other nations of the region.

ON THE CAUSES OF THE KILLING IN NICARAGUA AND HOW TO END IT

8. A genuine political conflict underlines the violence and killing in Nicaragua today. It is false to characterize those in the armed opposition as "mercenaries." The tragedy is that, six years after the civil war that toppled Somoza, Nicaraguans are still killing Nicaraguans for political reasons. The Sandinistas who fought against Somoza were Nicaraguans, willing to fight, kill and be killed for their political aims. They obtained substantial amounts of weapons, funds and assistance from other countries. They were not mercenaries. For the same reasons, it is wrong to call members of the NDF (Nicaraguan Democratic Force) mercenaries simply because they received substantial funds, weapons and technical assistance from the U.S. (and other sources). Outside support for one or both of the warring parties is a common feature of all civil wars.

9. It is inconsistent and hypocritical of the Sandinistas constantly to point out the number of ex-National Guardsmen (members of the army under Somoza) who are in the forces of the contras when it is the Sandinistas who have prevented the normal reintegration of ex-Guardsmen into Nicaraguan society. To give two thousand National Guardsmen who were captured or surrendered after the fall of Somoza harsh prison sentences (up to thirty years in jail), after denying them due judicial process, was not an act of national reconciliation. When members of the losing side in a civil war are stripped of their political and civil rights and imprisoned for long times—essentially for having been members of the losing side—it should not be surprising if some decide not to lay down their arms but to continue the struggle. They may see it as their only hope of reclaiming their national rights and freedom.

10. Wars can be ended—and avoided—in two ways: by the capitulation of one party to the conflict, or through a political process (negotiations leading to a treaty or agreement, or elections). In Nicaragua today, the government is asking the contras to capitulate; the contras are asking for a political process that will lead to internationally supervised, free and fair elections.

WHY A POLITICAL PROCESS DIRECTED TOWARD DEMOCRACY DESERVES SUPPORT

11. In the Orwellian world of the twentieth century, where the worst tyrannies routinely employ political doublespeak, it is easy to become confused about democracy's true meaning. What distinguishes democracy from "peoples' democratic republics" is the postulate that the dignity and freedom of the individual are fundamental. The state exists to serve the person, not vice-versa. From this simple, core idea flows everything else: the importance of people periodically being able to choose a government, the principles of majority rule but protection for minority rights, etc.

12. The Leninist idea of a "vanguard party," or "democratic centralism," clearly underlies Sandinista political philosophy. It is a far more sophisticated rationale for dictatorship than rule by an individual, but it is no less anti-democratic. Indeed, it can be more tyrannical. For individuals die and, with them, so often do their dictatorships. Spain's Franco and Portugal's Salazar are recent examples. But a party in control of the state apparatus need not die. If it combines its rule with extensive repression, censorship, and doctrinaire economic policies, it can make life miserable for generations of citizens. Herein lies the fear many Nicaraguans have for the future of their country. It does not augur well that the Sandinistas espouse Leninism and identify so closely with political regimes that have caused (and still cause) so much suffering and oppression.

13. Apart from making a simple but profound statement about the worth of the individual, democracy is mainly a process. It is a process through which political programs are fashioned, and not the political programs themselves. One democracy may agree on free health care for all its citizens; another may not. The differences in programs among democratic systems reflect the differences in value and traditions in the respective societies—differences which vary over time as well as across nations. Democracy is simply a mechanism through which members of a political community can participate in resolving the inevitable dilemmas posed by competing social objectives in a way that achieves the highest possible degree of agreement.[3] This enhances the legitimacy of government and reduces the likelihood of political violence and disorder. In this way democracy is the connection between peace and freedom: it provides the process of periodically renewing consent that confers legitimacy on a government and narrows, or eliminates, the moral basis for violent challenges to its authority.

14. Besides insuring participation, democracy also stresses the importance of limits to power. It is assumed that political leadership, no matter how "progressive," will abuse its power if not limited. Even "vanguard" parties can become retrograde dicta-

[2] Alan Tonelson, "What Central American Democracy?", The New York Times, May 22, 1985. Tonelson is associate editor of Foreign Policy.

[3] An example of the dilemmas of government is the trade-off between liberty and equality. Adherence to egalitarian social principles requires those who have more than others to share their "surplus." If they balk at doing so (say, by under-reporting tax liabilities) sanctions must be used or threatened—which compromises principles of freedom and individual liberty. Other examples of conflicting yet simultaneously valued social objectives are: stimulating economic growth and controlling the environmental effects of industry; fighting crime effectively and protecting individual rights, such as the right to privacy or the right (as some see it) to own a handgun.

torships. Without limits on power, people cannot live in peace, free to pursue their interests, protected from unauthorized intrusions by political authority into their private lives. Democracy thus fulfills two needs: the need for participation, and the need for limits on state authority.

THE FUNDAMENTAL PROBLEM IN NICARAGUA

15. The fundamental problem in Nicaragua today is the absence of liberty and instead the creation of a de facto one-party state with few limits on its authority. In this sense, the Sandinistas have replaced a dictatorship of the right with a dictatorship of the left. They have ignored an important distinction: while Nicaraguans agreed overwhelmingly on the goal of overthrowing Somoza, there was no such broad agreement on what kind of government should replace him. That choice has indeed never been made by the Nicaraguan people. Precisely because Somoza denied democracy to the nation, Nicaraguans were willing to support the armed insurrection of the Sandinistas. But this did not give the nine leaders of the FSLN the right to install a "Sandinista democracy" which would deny the nation thereafter any effective political choice.

16. To call upon the Sandinistas to establish democratic government is only to hold them to pledges they themselves made—both to their own people and to the international community. The failure of the Sandinistas to fulfill expectations of freedom and democracy in Nicaragua is a major reason for the absence of peace in their country today. their betrayal of promises made before coming to power began almost immediately after taking power. As early as April 1980 Humberto Ortega, minister of defense and brother of President Daniel Ortega, stated that elections in Nicaragua would not be like elections in Costa Rica, Venezuela, the United States, or other "bourgeois countries." Sandinista-style elections would occur only "to select the best among the revolutionary vanguard . . . for power has been conquered for ever by the people and it shall never be gambled again." [4]

In an article in Le Monde (May 3, 1984), Tomas Borge, the sole surviving founder of the Sandinista Party and currently Minister of the Interior, stated: "Anyone who fails to understand that a revolutionary power is a single power understands nothing." Other Sandinista leaders are quoted as saying, "There's no question of our losing the elections. We came to power at the point of a gun. We're not going to lose it through an election."

There are also the telling statements of Bayardo Arce (see Appendix A), a member of the Sandinista Directorate, in a speech given in May 1984. According to Foreign Report (August 23, 1984), published by The Economist in London, Daniel Ortega confirmed the authenticity of the remarks, which were secretly taped and published by a Barcelona newspaper. Their significance is heightened by the fact that Arce is head of the FSLN's Political Committee and as such managed the 1984 elections.[5]

17. For those who support the aspirations for freedom of the Nicaraguan people and are opposed to violence and the use of armed force, the central challenge today is how to persuade leaders of the political movement that seized state power after the fall of Somoza to submit to a truly democratic process that would put at risk the paramountcy of their "revolutionary vanguard party." Acccomplishing this goal, short of reliance on military measures, clearly will require more imaginative and concerted approaches than those adopted to date.

THE ROLE OF AMERICAN CITIZENS

18. American citizens have an important role to play in shaping U.S. relations with Nicaragua. They should begin, however, by trying to understand better the situation in Nicaragua and the events that led up to it. This is not always easy. A great deal of misinformation is purveyed under the guise of "public education." Those who concern themselves with Central America issues at the community level often have strong emotional attachments to highly simplified, sometimes doctrinaire, views—usually covering a narrow range of the political spectrum. Programs they sponsor are often designed not to expose participants to the relevant range of facts and opinions, but instead to reinforce one particular interpretation of events and one particular, morally "correct" approach. Other concerned citizens, with a different point of view, stay away from such programs, knowing that their point of view will not be represented and that real debate will not be encouraged. As a result of these factors, citizen understanding of U.S. policy or of the situation in Nicaragua is rarely deepened or clarified by public debate and discussion—in contrast to the healthier pattern that prevails for domestic policy issues.

19. Although the American public generally appreciates the difference between open and closed societies, it is a curious paradox that many domestic critics of the "credibility gap" in our foreign policy often grant leaders of political systems that control their press, and make routine use of propaganda and repression, more credibility and respect than they do representatives of our own government. One explanation is that our press has a responsibility to expose the lies of the American government rather than those of police states abroad; and that it discharges this responsibility in ways that suggest to the unwitting that other governments, including police states, are no more deceitful than ours is. While there is something to this argument, it does not excuse (or fully explain) the inordinately uncritical attitude many domestic critics of U.S. policy applying to statements of the Sandinistas on the one hand, and the unshakeable cynicism they reserve, on the other hand, for statements from the Administration. The evidence simply does not exist to indicate that our government is less credible than any dictatorship, of the left or right, that controls the press, punishes dissent, and makes routine use of deception and "disinformation." It is a measure of the problem, however, that this argument even needs to be made.

20. Americans who believe in democratic values and basic human rights, yet dissent from Administration policy, should make special efforts to insure that the Sandinistas do not misinterpret opposition to our government's policy as support for Sandinista politics. They can do this by communicating to the government in Nicaragua their concern over the conditions of political prisoners and the lack of access by clergy and officials of human rights organizations to prisoners in all the jails; by declaring their support for a free press, an independent church, free trade unions, and the protection of national minorities; and by endorsing the appeal for peace through negotiations in Nicaragua.

21. Finally, Americans should learn more about the democratic political opposition to the Sandinistas. Instead of accepting the line that they are "mercenaries" and somocistas, they should verify for themselves the background and credentials of the Nicaraguan Democratic Resistance and become familiar with its program. (See Appendix B for the text of their "Call for National Dialogue" issued in Costa Rica in early March 1985.)●

THE HIGHER EDUCATION DISCLOSURE ACT

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today, the Higher Education Disclosure Act, which will require the public disclosure of gifts from foreign sources to American colleges and universities in excess of $100,000 in any 12-month period. This bill is an important step toward increasing public awareness of any conditions, implicit or explicit, attached to major gifts from foreign governments and other foreign sources to our institutions of higher education.

The Higher Education Disclosure Act is intended to promote academic freedom and avoid distortion of the educational process by requiring certain disclosures concerning large gifts to colleges and universities from foreign sources and large contracts between foreign sources and universities. In no way are gifts prohibited; the Act would simply establish a disclosure requirement which would promote academic freedom and the public's right to know.

Academic freedom is a basic principle which furthers liberty and justice in this country. Academic freedom is a necessary prerequisite to education, which in turn is vital to the development of an informed citizenry and the functioning of our democratic institutions.

Recent years have seen academic freedom and freedom in the educational process threatened, however, by financial arrangements with foreign sources which restrict what can be taught, who can teach and impose other conditions which distort the operation of the free marketplace of ideas at our universities by funding programs conditioned on the presentation of certain views. I am deeply troubled by this trend.

This legislation would not preclude universities from entering into such arrangements—that, too, would be contrary to academic freedom and would unreasonably stifle foreign contributions to U.S. educational institutions. This bill would merely require that universities which receive Federal financial assistance to disclose such arrangements with foreign sources. The act would promote academic freedom by ensuring that university communities and the public have full knowledge of the sources of all foreign grants or contracts and any conditions or restrictions, as to personnel or students to be benefited or viewpoints to be furthered, attached to such grants or contracts.

I greatly appreciate the leadership of the American Jewish Congress in the development of similar legislation in Statehouses across the country. Higher education disclosure statutes have been enacted in New York, Illinois and Florida. The Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Texas Legislatures are currently considering similar legislation. This admirable activity around the country underscores the value of a uniform, national statute.

I invite my colleagues to join me in supporting this necessary and important legislation.

H.R. 3190

BENIAMINO BUFANO COLLECTION OFFERED TO SAN MATEO COUNTY

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 15th anniversary of the death of Beniamino Bufano, an immigrant sculptor, and artistic trailblazer who is surely one of the great artists of the twentieth century. It gives me great pleasure to announce to my colleagues that my district, on the beautiful peninsula of San Mateo County, CA, has been offered the family collection of Bufano sculpture, paintings, and drawings. We are now searching for an appropriate setting in which to place these pieces to be enjoyed by all our citizens—young and old.

Let me tell you a little about Benny Bufano who may be seen as a citizen of the world, but who called California his home. Benny, though small in stature, was great in heart and talent. He created giant sculptures of steel and stone that tower above all who stop to contemplate them. One of his best known works, a statue of St. Francis of Assisi entitled "Peace," stands at the entrance to the San Francisco Airport greeting all travelers who pass through.

This statue, one of more than 150 Bufano made of St. Francis, is appropriately placed near the city named for the saint. As the statue of Peace it is characteristic of the guiding principle in Benny Bufano's life. He believed passionately in peace. He once said, "Peace is not something you shout from the rooftops. It's not something you preach. It's something you live. Peace is a fighting word. You have to believe in it hard enough to give your life for it."

And he did. He lived his life with the theme of peace touching everything he created from the first small mouse he carved when he was ten years old living in a New York railroad apartment, to the 12-ton, 17-foot figure of St. Francis carved in black marble now standing at the International Longshoremen's Hall near Fisherman's Wharf in San Francisco. His love of animals and nature was also exemplified through the hundreds of animals, sculpted in marble with simple, dramatic lines, rounded curves, and smooth surfaces. Children and adults alike are drawn to these seals, bears, cats, and birds. In the Hillsdale Shopping Mall in my district in San Mateo, CA, children climb and slide on the animals and hug or stroke them lovingly, as Mr. Bufano would have wished.

Benny Bufano, born in Italy, came to the United States as a 2 year old child—one of 15 children born to his immigrant parents, At 17, he won an art competition for submitting his concept of "The Immigrant in America."

After early years of neglect, the world came to recognize his genius. The 11th Congressional District hopes to give a permanent home to the Bufano collection offered to us by Benny Bufano's son, Erskine. This generous offer was made at a recent Congressional Arts Conference I held in my district bringing together business, government, and the arts. The placement of the collection in a Bufano Sculpture Park is dependent upon developing a teaching facility with modern equipment for casting sculpture molds. The project is an ambitious one, requiring resources and resourcefulness; but I am pleased to acknowledge this special offer to the peninsula by the Bufanos. I am confident we can bring the project to fruition, and provide a unique place of inspiration for artists, students, and visitors to San Mateo County, CA.●

A SALUTE TO THE PATRIOT AND MINUTEMAN OF THE YEAR IN THE FIFTH CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, "Only in America"—an often used phrase, but one that has never been more appropriate than it is today.

Today we honor two Horatio Algers, two men that have lived the American dream. One came to this land of liberty as a 16-year-old, not being able to speak a word of English, with his only assets being a capacity for hard work and a love of freedom. The other was born in this republic, but to a poor family not long removed from the old country. But he too had a capacity for hard work and he too loved freedom, in fact, he loved it so much that he dedicated many years of his life to government and politics.

These two men achieved success in different professions but their qualities of character were the same: a blind faith in America, a dedication to the free enterprise system, an enormous ability for hard work, imagination, and initiative found only in the American culture, a belief in their own ideas and plans, a dedication to their community, city, State, and country that manifested countless humanitarian, civic, and charitable endeavors to help mankind and make their neighborhood and Nation a better place to live.

Yes, truly, these two men we honored on July 13, 1985, are Americans who have given as much to their country as their country has given to them.

Nick Perrino is a classic American success story who epitomizes what's right with America. Coming to the United States from Italy, Nick quickly made himself a part of America and proudly served in the Army during World War II, from 1941 to 1946. Nick was initially assigned to the food service section as cook. During his military stint, Nick quickly rose from the rank of private to messhall sergeant. In 1943, he was promoted to master sergeant and placed in charge of all messhalls on his post.

With the knowledge gained from his service experience, Nick founded his own business in 1947. This business, which has become a Chicago landmark, has continually expanded through the years. However, the Home Run Inn Pizza Restaurant is still located on the same site as it was in 1947. In addition to the restaurant trade, Nick has established a thriving frozen pizza business.

Over the years, Nick Perrino has not forgotten his past and has been an active participant in numerous charitable activities. He has been honored by the Chicago Boys Club of America as Man of the Year and actively helps other organizations in Chicago, such as United Cerebral Palsy, to raise funds for the needy.

A native Chicagoan, John Waner as a young man became involved in the construction field. This interest led him to years of participation within labor organizations. His eventual involvement in various trade organizations led him to serve on the Board of the United Auto Workers, the Joint Arbitration Board of Sheet Metal Workers, and the Joint Apprenticeship Board.

To show his devotion to education, Mr. Waner served as a trustee for Lewis University where he received an honorary doctorate of humanities degree. He proceeded to sponsor scholarships and youth activities and became an honorary student of Kennedy High School. He was awarded a bachelors of engineering degree for setting up the heating and air-conditioning course at Allied Institute of Mechanical Trades.

A successful entrepreneur, John Waner's skills in mortgage leanding, real estate appraisal, and the construction field promoted him to serve in an advisory capacity to four U.S. Presidents. Waner has directed such governmental agencies as the Federal Housing Administration and Department of Housing and Urban Development. During his 10 years with the Federal Government, he was recognized for pioneering efforts in neighborhood conservation and was saluted by his contemporaries and media for his outstanding performance.

Mr. Waner's community involvement is legend. To his credit in the realm of civic activities, he was the founder and first president of the Midway Kiwanis Club, one of the primary organizers of the Garfield Ridge Chamber of Commerce, chairman of the board of Garfield Ridge Bank & Trust, director of the Time Savings & Loan, and was appointed by the Cook County Assessor's Office to revamp real estate concepts. There is hardly an area of concern where John Waner's keen interest has not aided in the growth of the Southwest Side of Chicago. Mr. Waner for many years was the Republican ward comitteeman of the 23d ward, and had the great honor of running for mayor of Chicago against the legendary Richard J. Daley.

No recipients of the Patriot of the Year Award and Minuteman Award have been more deserving.●

OBSERVATIONS OF THE TEACHING PROFESSION

HON. GEORGE E. BROWN, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BROWN of California. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss the current teacher crisis facing our Nation's schools. By 1990, an estimated 1 million new teachers will be needed in our elementary and secondary schools. However, at present, less than 5 percent of the Nation's college freshmen plan to enter the education field. Not only is the quantity of our teachers dwindling, but also the quality of our teaching force has declined. On such measures as the Scholastic Aptitude Test, students going into education rank last in performance in every ethnic group surveyed nationally. As stated in the national report on the state of schools, "A Nation At Risk," public education is a "rising tide of mediocrity."

Although some action has been taken, we must do more to improve the status of the teaching profession in order to attract high quality instructors. Public Law 98-377 is an example of legislation aimed at improving math and science education. This bill provides Congressional Merit Scholarships for those interested in a career in teaching, a program of grant to State and local educational agencies for improvement of precollege science and math education, and Presidential awards for excellence in education. This legislaiton is only a beginning, however. The teaching crisis will effect all courses of study, and similar programs should be developed for teachers in other disciplines.

According to national surveys, the most academically capable students tend to leave teaching within 5-7 years to enter the private business sector. This "brain drain," however, should not necessarily be considered a crisis. On the contrary, it can be used to the advantage of the teaching profession. If recent college graduates considered teaching a "stepping stone" toward a business career, we would have a continual supply of high quality, energetic teachers. These teachers would not make up the entire teaching force, but they could provide a strong supplemental supply.

When asked why they left the academic world and entered private business, respondents listed personal/professional growth and greater opportunity to use abilities as more important than increased wages. This information shows that the teaching profession may not be challenging enough for many of the highly qualified people we would like to see in our public schools. Classroom teaching is often a flat, undifferentiated career without the variation in duties, responsibilities and advancement found in other professions. Simply increasing teaching salaries, a commonly prescribed solution, may not be enough to keep these qualtiy people in education. A sequence of career steps should be made available to teachers to provide both challenge and opportunity.

At present, schools of education are completely dependent on public schools as the job market for their graduates. If the demand for teachers is up, education schools lower their standards to attract students. With a continually fluctuating teacher demand, the quality of teacher credential programs is unstable and constantly changing. A solution to this problem is to teach generic teaching skills that apply to all learning environments, in and out of the public school room.

The art of teaching is no longer required solely in our schools. In 1982, Training magazine estimated that U.S. corporations were spending roughly $3 billion on training programs and providing 790,000 jobs in this area. There is a need for teachers outside of the education field, but current education programs do not cater to them. By diversifying the education of teachers, the teaching profession would gain more prestige and attract high caliber people. Although all skills required by schoolteachers and corporate trainers do not overlap, there is a body of knowledge that the professions find mutually beneficial. Instructional processes, learning theories, the development of instructional material, and counseling skills are all examples of such information.

Mr. Speaker, above all the teaching profession needs to be regarded with the same respect granted other professions, such as medicine and law, in order to attract and keep good teachers. By providing incentives for effective teachers and by diversifying and improving teacher education, I feel this goal will be attained. Our education system in the United States lies at the base of our democracy. The young minds of today will be the leaders of tomorrow, and we must take action now to guarantee the best education possible for future generations to come.●

ESPIONAGE AGAINST OUR OWN UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

HON. JOSEPH M. McDADE

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. McDADE. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that addresses what is perhaps the most abhorrent of all crimes—espionage against our own United States of America.

The crime of espionage touches the lives and the liberties of every man, woman, and child in this country. The act of betraying one's friends and neighbors is so grotesque it demands the most severe penalty a society can offer. As a country, we must take all reasonable and prudent actions to prevent and deter those few of our citizenry who participate in this ultimate of crimes.

The headlines in recent newspapers told of the treason of the Walker family; Chris Boyce is called to testify to Congress about his act of betrayal and Hollywood makes another movie. Now is the time for us to stop talking about crime and to take positive action.

The legislation I am introducing today strengthens our national security in four ways:

First, it creates a Presidential commission to examine the impact on national security of our programs and policies related to the dissemination of information especially the Freedom of Information Act. This commission, made up of a major cross-section of individuals in this country, should have representatives of Aviation Week and the Washington Post to discuss their reporting and editorial policies; it should have representatives of the defense industry and the Government to examine their internal security controls; it should include the scientific community to discuss technological transfers.

The commission's job is to make recommendations for changes that would ensure our domestic security while not infringing upon our citizens' right to know, and always, of course, respecting the tenets of the first amendment.

Second, the bill places a one-for-one limit on foreign diplomats and agents in this country vis-a-vis our representatives in their country. No more can the Soviet Union station 3,000 agents within our borders while we have only a handful within theirs. We cannot continue to allow the Eastern bloc to station individuals within our borders whose sole purpose is to infiltrate our national security apparatus.

Third, to help deter and prevent future acts such as those committed by Chris Boyce and Robert Walker, my bill institutes random polygraph testing for individuals who have, and seek, access to highly classified material. This polygraph testing is specifically limited to the scope of security information—no lifestyle questioning would be allowed. The testimony before the Congress, Chris Boyce stated that polygraph testing would have prevented him from committing treason.

Fourth, to put teeth into our espionage laws, my bill would mandate a determinant sentence of life imprisonment or the death penalty be imposed for those individuals, both military and civilian, who are convicted of espionage for the Soviet Union, or other Communist countries as determined by the President. My bill would also include technology transfers to the list of treasonable offenses.

This legislation is needed as a quick response to the growing manace of espionage. I strongly urge passage of this legislation before additional aspects of our national security are compromised.

I include a brief seciton-by-section analysis of my bill in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD following my remarks:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

SEC. 1 Short Title

SEC. 2 Creation of a Presidential Commission

This section creates a commission made up of representatives of the communications, scientific, business, Government and the intelligence community to study the FOIA, how it impacts on the national security and to report to Congress within 90 days on what changes need to be made.

SEC. 3 Limitation on Foreign Diplomats and agents

This section limits the number of foreign diplomats and agents in the United States from any country to the same number of United States diplomats and agents within that particular foreign country.

SEC. 4 Polygraph Examinations

This section provides for random polygraph tests for individuals who seek access to classified information. Lifestyle questions are prohibited and $5,000,000 is authorized to DOD to upgrade its polygraph program.

SEC. 5, SEC. 6, SEC. 7. Legal Amendments

These three sections amend the UMCJ and the USC to provide mandatory life sentences, or the death sentence, for espionage with the Soviet Union or any other Communist country as declared by the President. Technology transfers are included as a new espionage offense.

SEC. 8. Effective Date

Upon enactment.●

CENSORSHIP—BRITISH STYLE

HON. MARIO BIAGGI
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, over the course of the past 2 days the British Government has again demonstrated to the world that when it comes to Northern Ireland—they are comfortable with a policy of selective morality and have no qualms about resorting to repressive measures unusual for a democracy.

The issue at this time involves an extraordinary intervention on the part of the British Government over a BBC documentary that was to be shown entitled "At the Edge of the Union." It was a program which among its content included an interview with one Martin McGuinness, an individual elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly in 1982 but who refused to take his seat. In addition the London Sunday Times had identified McGuinness as the chief of staff for the Provisional Irish Republican Army.

One of the purposes of the program was to compare the political philosophies of Sinn Fein and the Democratic Unionist Party, the political party associated with the militant Rev. Ian Paisy. On July 29, it was reported that the British Government had made a formal request of the BBC not to air the program on the grounds that it was against the national interest and worked to promote terrorism. The board of governors of the BBC elected to cancel a documentary on Northern Ireland. This decision overruled the position of BBC management which supported airing the program.

The British Home Secretary Leon Brittan was quick to say that he "does not wish to exercise powers of censorship" according to a Washington Post article of July 30 but "left open the possibility that he would use authority to do so granted to him in the license of the state-owned corporation.

As chairman of the bipartisan Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs I am astounded by the British Government's action in this matter. Freedom of the press is considered a fundamental freedom in any democracy—yet we have a dramatic disregard for that freedom being practiced by a leading democratic nation.

There has been outrage registered in many quarters over the British Government's actions. According to an article in today's New York Times, the Association of British Editors called the BBC's action in canceling the program "a betrayal of its own best traditions." A spokesman for the Labor Party accused the BBC of acting as "Britian's thought police."

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert four news articles, two from the Washington Post and two from the New York Times which chronicle the events just discussed.

Northern Ireland has suffered through a decade long state of emergency—civil liberties have been trampled on, human rights violated. We have political prisoners in Northern Ireland for as long as 15 years, and now we have censorship over programs that deal with the very basic political questions in Northern Ireland. Is there no limit to the evils of British direct rule over Northern Ireland?

BBC CANCELS DOCUMENTARY—NETWORK BOWS TO GOVERNMENT IN UNPRECEDENTED ACTION

(By Karen DeYoung)

LONDON.—The board of governors of the British Broadcasting Corp. today canceled a documentary on Northern Ireland, scheduled to be aired next week, after the government asked for its withdrawal on grounds that it was "against the national interest."

The government-appointed board overrode approval of the program by the BBC management, saying it would be "unwise" for it to be "transmitted in its present form." The program, entitled "At the Edge of the Union," includes an interveiw with a man it says is believed to be chief of staff of the outlawed Irish Republican Army.

The board called for "further discussions" with the government, and Home Secretary Leon Brittan said he would be happy to meet on "the issue of terrorism and the way it is handled on television." Brittan has acknowledged that he has not seen the program, but was relying on "press reports" of its contents.

Both the government's public request and the board's acquiescence were unprecedented in the history of the corporation. Although state-owned, the BBC has prided itself on independence and has a reputation for objectivity. The government's power to stop a BBC broadcast has never been used.

Today's decision provoked an immediate outcry by opposition politicians as well as outside commentators, and expressions of shock from BBC staff members. They charged political interference and censorship, and journalists at the corporation met to consider union action.

Asked tonight if the government had influenced the board's decision, Chairman Stuart Young said, "Categorically no." The program "is not going to be transmitted," Young said in a televised BBC interview, "because the climate is not right . . . and that is vital, and that's what the decision was all about."

The incident marks the first government-media controversy here since Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher two weeks ago, in the wake of the TWA hijacking, called for voluntary media cooperation in limiting coverage of terrorist actions. She said the media encouraged terrorism by publicizing it.

In a previously scheduled live television interview tonight, Thatcher drew a direct parallel between those comments and the Northern Ireland documentary. "I do not believe that any great organization like the BBC should do anything which might be construed as furthering the objectives of the terrorists and I feel extremely strongly about it."

Recounting numerous IRA attacks, Thatcher acknowledged she had not seen the program, but said, "Anything which is shown which seems to help terrorists seems to me to be totally and utterly wrong."

"We don't censor," Thatcher said. "We never do. We request." But she said she was "very pleased" with the board's response to the government's request, "And I believe that most people will applaud it."

Critics of both the government and the board insisted today, however, that the canceled program was a questionable example of what Thatcher called "terrorist publicity."

Intending to highlight the seemingly irreconcilable differences in the British-ruled province, it features interviews with principals on the two sides of the controversy. One is a hard-line Loyalist, or Protestant supporter of British rule in the troubled province.

The other is Martin McGuiness, allegedly chief of staff of the IRA, the illegal armed wing of the Roman Catholic opposition, and an elected member of the province's assembly.

BRITAIN WANTS TV SHOW WITHHELD

LONDON.—The government has asked the British Broadcasting Corp. not to air a television program on Northern Ireland on grounds that it gives "succor to terrorist organizations" and is "against the national interest."

Home Secretary Leon Brittan said that he "does not wish to exercise powers to censorship" but left open the possibility that he would use authority to do so granted to him in the license of the state-owned corporation.

Two weeks ago, Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher called on the media to adopt a "voluntary code of conduct" to starve terrorists of the "oxygen of publicity," and government officials today made clear that they consider the BBC program, scheduled to air in 10 days, a test of media good will.

The program, entitled "At the Edge of the Union," contains a lengthy interview with Martin McGuiness, an elected member of the Northern Ireland Assembly who also is believed to be chief of staff of the Irish Republican Army.

The BBC governing board scheduled an emergency meeting Tuesday to discuss how to respond to the request. BBC managers defended the program as "responsible and balanced" and said it had gone through mandated screening procedures for documentaries dealing with the sensitive Northern Ireland issue.

A decision to withdraw the program would be likely to cause extreme protest from reporters and producers, many of whom feel they have fought a constant battle against various British governments, in particular Thatcher's, to present what they consider fair coverage of Northern Ireland.

Although none would speak for attribution, one called it a "litmus test" of the government-appointed board's independence. "It is a very, very important case," he said. "The issues are clear-cut, and there's no possibility of fudging on it."

The program counterpoints McGuinness with Gregory Campbell, described as a "hard-line Loyalist," a member of the largely Protestant majority in Northern Ireland that favors British rule.

Controversy over the BBC broadcast began indirectly, during a press conference Thatcher held in Washington Friday. A reporter for The Sunday Times of London asked her if she would disapprove of a supposedly hypothetical program in which such an interview were featured.

Thatcher said she would "utterly condemn" it.

Once Thatcher found out that the "hypothetical" program was in fact on the BBC schedule, she ordered Brittan to investigate.

In a statement issued by the Home Office in his name today, Brittan said he "fully recognizes the freedom of the BBC in this matter; the government does not wish to exercise powers of censorship."

However, Brittan said he had "conveyed to the BBC in the strongest terms that . . . the program appeared to be giving succor to terrorist organizations by the opportunity for public advocacy of terrorist methods by the prominent member of the IRA. . . . It is contrary to the national interest that a program of the kind apparently envisaged should be broadcast" and Brittan "asked the BBC not to do so."

A Home Office spokesman said that neither Thatcher nor Brittan had seen the documentary.

The BBC is funded by a licensing fee charged all television owners. Although the BBC is operated under Royal Charter and theoretically immune from direct government interference, the government sets the level of the fee, and licensing legislation allows the Home secretary to "require the corporation to refrain" from broadcasting anything deemed inappropriate. That power, however, never has been used.

BBC DECIDES NOT TO SHOW PROGRAM ON ULSTER

(By Jo Thomas)

LONDON.—The British Broadcasting Corporation announced tonight that it had decided against showing "in its present form" a television program including an interview with a man said to be the chief of staff of the outlawed Irish Republican Army.

The decision was made by the BBC's board of governors, which viewed the program for the first time at a seven-hour meeting today, in response to a request from Leon Brittan, the Home Secretary. He asked the BBC on Monday to withdraw the program.

The interview is with Martin McGuinness, who was elected to the Northern Ireland Assembly in 1982 but refused to take his seat. The Sunday Times of London identified him this week as the I.R.A. chief of staff. Mr. McGuinness, 35 years old, has denied that he holds the post.

Although some viewed the BBC decision as yielding to Government pressure, Stuart Young, the BBC chairman, declared, "We have not yielded to pressure from any quarter whatsoever."

A political battle has been going on since it was announced that Mr. McGuinness was to be featured in a 45-minute documentary on the program "Real Lives" on Aug. 7. The debate has called into question the independence of the BBC, whose finances are under Government review, and the integrity of is coverage of Northern Ireland.

Will Wyatt, the BBC's head of documentary features, had defended the documentary as "careful, thoughtful and informative" and "not supportive of terrorists."

It compared Mr. McGuinness, a member of Sinn Fein, the political arm of the I.R.A. to Gregory Campbell, a leading member of the Democratic Unionist Party, led by the Rev. Ian Paisley.

Mr. Brittan, who as Home Secretary is responsible both for law and order and for broadcasting, said that he had not seen the program but that press reports indicated it lent "spurious legitimacy to the use of violence for political ends" and would be contrary to the national interest.

Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, the target of an I.R.A. bombing in Brighton last year, said last week that she would "condemn them utterly" if BBC officials broadcast such a program. Earlier this month, the Prime Minister suggested that terrorists be starved "of the oxygen of publicity."

BBC DECISION ON INTERVIEW STIRS PROTEST

LONDON.—A political storm erupted today over a decision by the BBC to cancel the scheduled broadcast of a television documentary featuring a purported Irish Republican Army guerrilla leader.

The cancellation, which had been had been formally requested by the Home Secretary, Leon Brittan, at the direction of Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, sparked a staff rebellion at the British Broadcasting Corporation today and searching questions in Parliament and elsewhere about the BBC's independence from Government control.

The Prime Minister, who told The Sunday Times of London last week that she would "utterly condemn" the BBC for showing such a program, said she was "very pleased" by the BBC's decision, which was announced Tuesday night by the BBC board of governors.

"I do not believe that any great body like the BBC should do anything which might be construed as furthering the objectives of terrorists," she said. "I feel extremely strongly about it."

"NOT THAT KIND OF PARTY"

But she added, "I'm never going to put censorship on—we are not that kind of party."

The Association of British Editors called the BBC's action in canceling the program "a betrayal of its own best traditions," and said it had handed the Irish Republican Army "one more victory in the propaganda war."

A parliamentary spokesman for the Labor Party, Robin Corbett, accused the BBC's board of governors of "acting as Britain's thought police." adding: "The problems of Northern Ireland cannot be hidden from people behind a blank TV screen. This is a disservice to democracy."

James Hawthorne, the controller of programs in Northern Ireland, said today that he would reign unless he received assurances that the decision by the BBC board of governors would not lead to further Government interference. Late this afternoon, he said he had been assured that "nothing has fundamentally changed."

PROTEST STRIKE PLANNED

Meanwhile, the union representing 2,000 BBC television journalists voted unanimously to hold a 24-hour protest strike on Aug. 7.

The 45-minute program, "At The Edge of the Union," is a portrait of two men at the extremes of the political divide in Northern Ireland, Gregory Campbell, a Loyalist politician, and Martin McGuinness, an elected member of the Northern Ireland Assembly who belongs to Sinn Fein, the political arm of the I.R.A.

The uproar began after a BBC publication, Radio Times, ran a three-page article about the program, with pictures of both men, extensive quotes from the interviews, and a mention that Mr. McGuinness was widely thought to be the chief of staff of the I.R.A., an assertion that has been denied by Mr. McGuinness. The assertion was repeated in a front-page story in The Sunday Times of London.

Mr. Brittan, the Cabinet Minister, chiefly responsible for both law and order and broadcasting, said today that it would be "an absurd form of muzzling," if he alone could not exercise the right of any citizen to say what he thought was in the public interest.

"THAT AMOUNTS TO CENSORSHIP"

Stuart Young, chairman of the BBC and a Thatcher appointee, denied that the BBC had bowed to pressure. But in an interview late Tuesday night, he said, "When the Home Secretary says that any program that deals with terrorist organizations should not be permitted to be broadcast, that amounts to censorship.

"There are well-tried and well-tested procedures adopted by the BBC of how the very difficult subject of terrorists should be handled," he said.

It was the bypassing of such procedures that outraged the BBC staff.

A statement issued today by the National Union of Journalists, which represents the journalists at the BBC, said, "We deplore the decision to override—apparently for the first time—the accepted procedure of the corporation whereby the responsibility for editorial decisions lies in the hands of the Director General.

"It is particularly dangerous in that it was a decision made as a direct result of Government pressure," the statement said.

The procedures for handling programs about terrorism, it added, "are designed to protect the BBC's independence and integrity. They should not be overridden."

"The Prime Minister has claimed that publicity is like oxygen for terrorists," said Clive Soley, a Member of Parliament and Labor Party spokesman. "The Provisional I.R.A. and the Protestant paramilitaries have had a massive amount of publicity out of this episode."

Neither of the two people interviewed is wanted for any offense, he said, and "they are entitled to stand for election under British law and have done so. But they are not allowed to be interviewed by the BBC. That is a clear example of censorship.

"Mrs. Thatcher made her statement on terrorism after the hijack a few weeks ago and felt she had to slow some form of reaction," Mr. Soley said, referring to the hijacking of an American airliner to Beirut last month.

Clement Freud, the Liberal Party spokesman on broadcasting, said: "The Government has powers under the Broadcasting Act to order the corporation not to publish certain material, but it has not had the courage to use these legal powers. Instead, it has chosen to lean on the relative of a member of the Cabinet. This is quite monstrous."

Mr. Young, the BBC chairman, is the brother of Lord Young, Minister without Portfolio and one of Mrs. Thatcher's closest advisers.●

TRIBUTE TO REV. EDWARD J. MAXA

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to take a moment to recognize and honor Rev. Edward J. Maxa, the recipient of the Ray McDonald Community Achievement Award for the month of July 1985.

Father Maxa, born in Oak Park Hospital, is a native of the Chicago area. He attended grammar school at Our Lady of the Mount School in Cicero and St. Odilo School in Berwyn. He began his preparation for the priesthood at Quigley Preparatory Seminary and was ordained at St. Mary of the Lake Seminary at Mudelein, IL, in 1959. Since then Father Maxa has served three parishes in the Lawndale and Little Village communities; Our Lady of Lourdes Church at 15th and Keeler, Epiphany Parish at 25th and Keeler, and Blessed Sacrament Parish at Cermak and Central Park Avenue. In 1969 Father Maxa became associate pastor at Blessed Sacrament Parish. When the Rev. Edmund Burke was transferred from the pastorate of blessed Sacrament to that of St. Francis Xavier Parish in Wilmette, Father Maxa was first made the acting pastor of Blessed Sacrament, and then in 1974 he was appointed pastor by Cardinal Cody.

During his years at Blessed Sacrament, Father Maxa worked to maintain and improve the program and buildings of the church and school. He taught religion and counseled the students as well as the adults of the parish. Father Maxa promoted the establishment of the Boy Scout and Cub Scout programs at the parish.

Learning that services in Spanish to Spanish-speaking members of the community were initiated in 1967 but terminated when the Spanish-speaking priest returned to Colombia, Father Maxa undertook the study of Spanish. Due to his tireless efforts, a weekly Spanish Mass and other Spanish services to the community began in January 1970.

During his service at the Epiphany Parish, Father Maxa was introduced to and became a member of the Kiwanis Club of Little Village. At various times he has served as club secretary, vice president, and twice as president. During these years Father Maxa was active in promoting the annual free community health fair, which the Little Village Kiwanis Club sponsored together with the Lawndale Clinic and the Chicago Board of Health. For the past several years, this health fair used the buildings and facilities of Blessed Sacrament Parish to provide examinations, tests, innoculations, and other health services to not only the students, but also to the adults and preschool youngsters of the parish.

Blessed Sacrament Parish is currently in a year-long celebration of the centennial of its beginning as a mission of St. Pius V Parish at Ashland Avenue and 19th Street. And with the assistance of Sister Suzanne Doolin, the School's new principal, a campaign to increase the community's awareness and use of the school is underway.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank Father Maxa for the unselfish dedication of his time and concern for the betterment of the southwest side community. He has truly earned the Ray McDonald Community Achievement Award for the month of July 1985.●

A TRIBUTE TO DR. CAROLYNE K. DAVIS

SPEECH OF

HON. CARL D. PURSELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 30, 1985

● Mr. PURSELL. Mr. Speaker, on August 9, Dr. Carolyne K. Davis will step down as Administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration. Dr. Davis has served in that post 4½ years, longer than any other Administrator. I would like to congratulate her on her tenure and highlight some of her major accomplishments.

There is no question that under Dr. Davis' administration Medicare and Medicaid have become more efficient and more solvent. In 1981, when Dr. Davis began her career at HCFA, everyone predicted Medicare would be bankrupt by 1986. Here we are, 1 year from that deadline and Medicare is strong and healthy—and expected to remain that way until the mid-1990's.

In 1982, Dr. Davis put into effect changes which revolutionized health care reimbursement charges for Medicare. Under her administration, HCFA launched the prospective payment system, which replaced the hospital cost reimbursement system with a system of flat payments called DRG's. Those reforms have been instrumental in bringing down national health care costs.

In spite of the fact Dr. Davis daily managed over 4,100 agency employees and last year implemented a budget of $99 billion, 10 percent of the total Federal budget, she still managed to maintain her ties to the medical community. During her tenure at HCFA, Dr. Davis published 37 articles, bringing her total career of publications to 51. Truly an impressive record.

In conclusion, I would like to say it has been my privilege to know and work with Dr. Davis. Prior to coming to HCFA, Dr. Davis served as an associate vice president for academic affairs at the University of Michigan. In addition, she was dean of the University's School of Nursing for 2 years. It was her outstanding work there not only in nursing but in the area of finance and budget reform that led to her appointment at HCFA. It is obvious today from her accomplishments at HCFA during the past 4½ years, that this Nation had benefited greatly from her background and leadership.

I wish her well in the future and hope that she will someday return to public service for this great Nation.●

"OUR LITTLE MISS"

HON. RALPH M. HALL

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HALL of Texas. Mr. Speaker, beauty and fine fiddle playing are two of the good things we brag about in the 4th Congressional District of Texas; and Jonna Fitzgerald handles them both with style. For this reason, Jonna has been added to our list of bragging rights as Miss Texas 1985.

Since she entered her first "Our Little Miss" Pageant as a 9-year-old, Jonna has dedicated herself to a pageant competition every year. After representing Mineola-Lake Country, Arlington, and Duncanville, the Tyler native was crowned Miss Greenville for her fourth year of competition in the Miss Texas pageant. The perseverance she claims as her best asset—and 12 years of experience—have brought Jonna to the realization of a dream.

An outstanding fiddle player, Jonna has selected her role models from the same field of music. Miss Texas 1973, Judy Mallett, inspired Jonna to begin playing the fiddle; another Tyler native, Texas fiddle player Johnny Gimble, is her hero.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to have Jonna Fitzgerald as a representative of my district and the State of Texas. Her talents, beauty, and personal integrity exhibit the best our State has to offer. As she travels to the Miss America pageant in Atlantic City, NJ, this September, we Texans will be able to hold our heads high and brag on another native product of our great State—Miss Texas 1985, Jonna Fitzgerald.●

PUBLIC BROADCASTING AUTHORIZATION ACT

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the Public Broadcasting Authorization Act of 1985 which will authorize appropriations for the Corporation for Public Broadcasting [CPB] for fiscal years 1988, 1989, and 1990, at $220 million, $246 million and $283 million respectively. This legislation also authorize funds for the Public Telecommunications Facilities Program [PTFP], administered by the Department of Commerce at $24 million for each of fiscal years 1986, 1987, and 1988.

As my colleagues recall, two public broadcasting authorization bills passed the House and the Senate during the last session of Congress. Both were vetoed by the President. Yet, despite these vetoes, the Corporation for Public Broadcasting was appropriated $200 million for fiscal year 1987, and the PTFP program was funded at $24 million for fiscal year 1985—nearly identical to funding as contained in the bill vetoed last October. Clearly, Congress has and will continue to support adequate funding for our excellent public broadcasting system.

In 1981, Congress cut funding for public broadcasting over 40 percent, and established a bipartisan commission to study alternative financing for public broadcasting. The Temporary Commission on Alternative Financing [TCAF] concluded its study in 1983 and reported to Congress that in the forseeable future, there exists no alternative to a strong base of Federal support of the public broadcasting system.

Federal support of public broadcasting comprise less than 20 percent of funds raised by the system. Other support comes from States and cities, foundations and corporations, and millions of satisfied listeners and viewers across the country. Yet, the Federal support provides a critical base from which other funds can be raised.

Public television and radio provide invaluable educational, cultural, and entertainment services not provided by commercial broadcasters. Public broadcasting, for example, is the only regular source of educational programming for our children. A generation of children have learned and excelled in school because Sesame Street, The Electric Company, and 3-2-1 Contact have given them the zest for learning. The Chemical People, The Brain, National Geographic, and NOVA series have allowed children and adults to explore critical issues in challenging new ways. Great Performances, Frontline, and Playhouse, have brought cultural enrichment to millions of Americans which they otherwise could not have afforded. Public broadcasting brings our Nation together by bridging cultural and economic gaps with diverse and excellent programming. Yet, many of these programs have been forced to cut planned productions and staff. The very existence of some is threatened.

We must put public broadcasting back on a sound financial footing; at the same time we must do all we can to reduce the massive Federal deficit. This legislation recognizes and incorporates both of these realities. The bill thus freezes the Facilities Program at the fiscal year 1985 level appropriated by Congress for the next 3 fiscal years. I know of no other Federal program that will be frozen for 4 years in a row. Incidentally, PTFP was authorized at this same level over a decade ago in 1974.

Moreover, as to CPB the legislation adopts the President's budget request of $246 million and $283 million for fiscal years 1989 and 1990 respectively. In order to make slightly more funds available to public broadcasting in the near future, the legislation adopts a funding level of $220 million for fiscal year 1988, only $6 million above the administration's request. This bill's fiscal year 1988 level is identical to that proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. OXLEY] who has not only strongly advocated the need for restraint in public broadcasting over the last few years, but who has also recognized the need to make some additional funding available for public broadcasting in the near term, above the administration's recommendation. While this additional $6 million is a minute amount in the context of the Federal budget, it is money that is critically necessary for the short term viability of the Nation's excellent public broadcasting system. It is worth noting that the $220 million proposed for fiscal year 1988 in this bill is the same level of funding that was authorized for CPB in fiscal year 1983.

This legislation meets our twin goals of providing realistic funding to preserve our public broadcasting system while being fiscally prudent. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting this bill.●

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HONORABLE CHARLES H. WEBER

HON. WILLIAM O. LIPINSKI

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LIPINSKI. Mr. Speaker, August 16, 1985, marks the 25th anniversary of the death of the Honorable Charles H. Weber, a dedicated public servant from the northside of the city of Chicago.

Charles Weber was a distinguished public servant for over 40 years. He was a member of the Illinois State Legislature for 32 years, a member of the Chicago City Council for 12 years, a Cook County commissioner for 4 years, and for 40 years the Democratic ward committeeman of Chicago's old 45th ward. Charles Weber was also a successful businessman as a real estate broker, tavern owner, ice cream parlor owner, gas station operator, and insurance broker.

Charles Weber also initiated many worthwhile community activities. He sponsored the first community-wide cleanup campaign, and he was responsible for the first Kid's Day back-to-school parties at Riverview Park for as many as 100,000 children. The Charles H. Weber Memorial Commission, made up of many of Mr. Weber's friends and former colleagues, exists for the purpose of reviving many of the fine community programs that he established.

Mr. Speaker, the 25th anniversary of the death of this legendary public servant is truly deserving of public recognition. His distinguished career is one in which we should all take notice of.●

PORTER PROTESTS ARREST OF ROALD ZELICHONOK

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, on June 11, 1985, Roald Zelichonok of Leningrad was arrested and accused of preparing slanderous material.

I believe his arrest stems from his 7-year quest to emigrate from the Soviet Union, during which time he and his wife have suffered greatly. When they originally applied to emigrate in 1978, Alec's scientific work was greatly restricted. Optimistic that he might receive permission to live in Israel, he studied and taught Hebrew to others. This led to searches of his apartment and the confiscation of his teaching materials.

In May, my staff assistant, Nancy Kohn, had the opportunity to visit Leningrad and meet with Mr. Zelichonok. In August 1982, I also visited Leningrad and had the opportunity to meet Mr. Zelichonok. Both Nancy and I were very impressed by our meetings, and felt that Mr. Zelichonok was a dedicated and intelligent man who was obviously deepy committed to his goal of living in Israel. We were deeply sadded to learn of his arrest last June.

Earlier this year, the postal authorities had withheld five letters Mr. Zelichonok had written to friends living abroad. His arrest was based on information contained in these letters. In addition, two other Leningrad citizens, Semion Borovinsky and Vladimir Lifshitz, had their apartments searched on similar charges.

It appears that the Soviet authorities are attempting to curtail communication between the refusenik community and the free world. It is part of an overall strategy to destroy Jewish culture by inducing fear and discouraging their activities to practice their religion.

Over 100 Members of the House have joined my colleague TOM LANTOS and I in sending a letter to the Procurator General of Leningrad expressing our concerns over the treatment of Roald Zelichonok. I too thank my colleagues for joining me in expressing their concern over this situation. I would like to include for the RECORD a copy of this letter.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, DC, August 1, 1985.

PROKURORU PNOMARYOVU (the Leningrad City Procurator),
Gorodsykaya Prokuratura, ul. Belinskogo 13, g. Leningrad, U.S.S.R., RSFSR.

SIR: We deplore the arrest of Roald Zelichonok on June 11, 1985.

As you know, Mr. Zelichonok has been charged with preparing slanderous material (Article 190-1 of the Criminal Code of the RSFSR). We have been informed that Soviet authorities confiscated five letters Mr. Zelichonok wrote to friends abroad and that his personal correspondence is being used against him.

In 1978 Mr. Zelichonok and his wife, Galina, applied for permission to emigrate to Israel. Following their application, the Zelichonok's apartment was searched and many of their books were confiscated. Mr. Zelichonok's professional contacts were severely restricted and his salary was frozen.

It appears that the recent arrest of Mr. Zelichonok is part of a campaign to harrass and intimidate Soviet citizens who have expressed a desire to emigrate.

We are particularly concerned that by interfering with mail communication, the Soviet authorities are attempting to curtail contacts between Soviet citizens and the West.

We urge you to drop the charges against Mr. Zelichonok, and to recognize his right to emigrate. The right to free emigration is guaranteed under the Helsinki Accords, the Universal Declaration on Human Rights and other international agreements to which the U.S.S.R. is a signator.

Sincerely,

HONORING RABBI HENRY E. KRAUS, OF TEMPLE BETH AMI

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, I ask my colleagues join me in honoring my friend Rabbi Henry E. Kraus on the occasion of his becoming Rabbi Emeritus.

Since coming to Congress I have had the pleasure of knowing Rabbi Kraus of Temple Beth Ami, West Covina, CA. He is well respected and admired by the community and the people of Temple Beth Ami.

Rabbi Kraus was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary at Budapest, Hungary, and received his Ph.D. from the University of Budapest. During the Second World War, after the Germans occupied Hungary in March, 1944, he was deported with his congregation by the Nazis to Auschwitz and later, Buchenwald. Although he was exempt from the anti-Jewish laws because of his father's extensive military service, he chose to go and be with his congregants. He was liberated from the German concentration camp in 1945 by the American Third Army.

After the war, Rabbi Kraus became Chief Rabbi of Western Hungary. He was a member of the governing body of Hungarian Jews and also a member of the Board of Governors of the Jewish Theological Seminary of Budapest where he lectured on Practical Rabbinate. Prior to Communist control and the Hungarian revolution he also lectured at the University of Budapest on philosophy and ancient history as well as serving as Army chaplain.

Mr. Speaker, in January of 1957 he came to this country to escape the Hungarian revolution. Since that time Rabbi Kraus has served with distinction as a member of the Rabbinical Assembly and served the western region as a vice president. He also served as president of the Los Angeles Eastern Area Board of Rabbis.

In 1975, in honor of his 35th anniversary of his ordination, 30 year liberation from the Nazi death camps and 18 years following the escape from behind the Iron Curtain, Israel honored him with the Ben Gurion Award. He became the first recipient of this award in California and the U.S. Congress honored him with a congressional tribute.

In 1978, on the 34th anniversary of his deportation to Auschwitz, he was honored by opening the session of the House of Representatives with a prayer.

Following 16 years of service to Temple Beth Ami and 46 years on the pulpit on June 1, 1985, he became Rabbi Emeritus. He currently serves as chaplain to the City of Hope Medical Center and the Los Angeles County Sheriff's Department, San Dimas station.

Mr. Speaker, I rise today on the floor of the House to honor Rabbi Henry Kraus on his becoming rabbi emeritus.●

INTERNATIONAL FAMILY PLANNING FUNDS IN DANGER OF BEING CUT

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the long and difficult process toward settling the role of the United States in international family planning is nearing completion for this year.

The House and Senate salvaged the authorization of funding for two of the most important international family planning organizations—the International Planned Parenthood Federation [IPPF] and the United Nations Fund for Population Activities [UNFPA]. On July 10, the House eliminated the 16-percent earmark of the U.S. international population account for UNFPA and the House-Senate conference on the foreign aid authorization last week stripped the Kassebaum amendment which would have reversed the administration's cutoff of all U.S. funding to the IPPF.

All of this has occurred despite the fact that for more than a decade, U.S. law has prohibited the expenditure of all U.S. foreign aid funds for abortions or abortion-related activities. But abortion isn't the issue now; U.S. support for family planning may now be on the verge of being effectively terminated.

On July 8, the Agency for International Development reversed longstanding policy by declaring that recipients of AID funds advocating "natural" family planning no longer need inform their clients of the full range of family planning methods available. In effect, the U.S. Government will now provide scarce family planning funds to groups that advise people of the developing world to simply abstain in order to prevent unplanned pregnancies. And as an editorial from the July Washington Post states:

The most vocal groups advocating these restrictions make no bones about the fact that they oppose all "artificial" birth control.

The full Appropriations Committee recently made a 10-percent cut in the authorized total for the international population account—from $290 million—the fiscal year 1985 level—to $261 million. The committee also added language which says:

None of the funds made available in this bill nor any unobligated balances from prior appropriations may be made available to any organization or program which, as determined by the President of the United States, supports or participates in the management of a program of coercive or involuntary sterilization.

This measure is severe and restrictive, but it places the ultimate decision on who and how much to fund international family planning programs with the President. Any attempt by the Congress to push through an automatic termination of funding of the UNFPA and other family planning organizations would be irresponsible and potentially disastrous. Such a cutoff would severely cripple voluntary family planning in Mexico, Brazil, Ethiopia and 100 other countries and should be vigorously opposed.●

TRIBUTE TO CHARLES SUMNER HIGH SCHOOL

HON. WILLIAM (BILL) CLAY

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. CLAY. Mr. Speaker, on August 16, 1985, hundreds of graduates of the Charles Sumner High School from the years 1946-51 will gather in St. Louis, MO, from across our great Nation and from around the world for their reunion and to celebrate the 110th anniversary of their alma mater.

To most of us, when city of St. Louis is mentioned, we immediately think of the arch, beer, the place where the first ice cream cone and the hot dog orginated or of the football and baseball Cardinals. But, to many of us, especially blacks in these United States, it is the city that is home to the Charles Sumner High School.

Sumner High School was established in 1875 as the first formal attempt at education on the secondary level for black children in this country and has for 110 years stood straight and strong in providing service to a proud community buoyed up by her unique and significant black heritage, encircled by parents and relatives who have demanded leadership, cultural enrichment, and academic excellence from the onset and who have fought for and supported the highest standards and aspirations for the student body at this school, and supported by a totally dedicated faculty that has always been sensitive to the needs of the youth in our central city.

Sumner High School continues to strive for academic excellence, community leadership, and to further her traditional commitment to cultural enrichment.

In behalf of the thousands of students whose lives have been enriched by the Sumner tradition, I would like to compliment and praise those past and present faculty members and administrators of the Charles Sumner High School for the outstanding service that they have given not only to the city of St. Louis but to the Nation in general. I would also like to thank and acknowledge those thousands of graduates who have contributed so much not only to the St. Louis community but to the Nation as a whole.

I am sure that all of my colleagues join me in conveying my best wishes to this pillar of the St. Louis community and pray for its continued success.●

CHILDREN'S TELEVISION EDUCATION ACT OF 1985

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing the "Children's Television Education Act of 1985," which is intended to advance the use of television as a positive educational investment for our future in our most precious national resource—our children. Senator LAUTENBERG today is introducing companion legislation in the Senate.

All television is educational—but the question is, what does it teach? For children, television is a powerful teacher of intellectual and cognitive skills as well as a teacher of social information. It is a young child's window on the world, providing a wealth of information about the world, its people, places, and events.

But television's primary role has evolved as one of entertainer, not educator. Despite television's tremendous educational potential, commercial concerns and appeals to mass audiences have become paramount. It is very important that each child have access to positive, age-appropriate educational programing over the public airwaves. The legislation which I am introducing today is one way to achieve this goal.

Recent reports, including that of the National Commission on Excellence in Education, have focused attention on some extremely troubling problems facing our educational institutions. These reports have called for a variety of solutions aimed at improving the quality of education, as well as the educational performance of our Nation's children. Certainly much can and should be done to improve education, but we have often overlooked the potential role of television as educator, both by itself and in coordination with our schools.

By the time an average child finishes formal education in this country, he or she has spent an astonishing 15,000 hours in front of the television set—significantly more time than is spent in the classroom. Television has become an integral part of everyday life for our younger generation—almost 4 hours of each waking day is spent learning from the television "curriculum."

Research demonstrates the power of television to teach. Programs such as Sesame Street have been instrumental in giving children greater reading and mathematical proficiency at an early age. 3-2-1 Contact has inspired a better understanding and appreciation of science and scientific concepts in young teenagers. Freestyle has taught children that their career choices need not be bounded by stereotypes based on gender. Programs such as Mister Rogers' Neighborhood and Fat Albert and the Cosby Kids have taught altruism, cooperation, and kindness toward others. CBS Storybreak and Reading Rainbow have revealed the wonders and treasures that books and the local public libraries hold for us all.

Research also shows that television can motivate children to learn about the world around them. At a very early age, a child's fascination with television can be effectively channeled into positive educational experiences. Yet for the most part, television's potential in this area is unrealized.

The Federal Communications Commission [FCC] has been involved in issues relating to children and television for over two decades, but has accomplished nothing. The FCC's failure to ensure that television broadcasters adequately meet the needs of the child audience is extremely disappointing to me and to all of those interested in the welfare of children.

In 1960, the Commission first determined that one way in which broadcast stations must meet their public interest obligation was to provide programming specifically designed for child audiences. Almost 15 years later, in its 1974 Children's Television Report and Policy Statement, the FCC reaffirmed its conclusion that broadcasters have a special obligation to serve children as a substantial and important community group. The FCC at that time issued a policy statement that instructed television stations to make a meaningful effort to increase the amount of programming for children, and to air informational programing for child audiences. However, the implementation of this policy was voluntary, and no specific requirements in terms of amount of programming necessary to achieve this goal were specified.

In 1978, after results of a survey indicated that the television broadcasters were not meeting the needs of children, the FCC initiated a rulemaking to address the dearth of programming for children. Despite the fact that the Commission's staff report on the matter clearly indicated that television broadcasters were not complying with the 1974 policy statement, the FCC continued to procrastinate without taking any action that would effectively address this problem. In December 1983, the rulemaking was finally concluded only because of a court ruling. Unfortunately, its conclusion was all too predictable—again, the FCC did nothing.

In abrogating its responsibility to protect the public and the public interest, the Commission stated that available alternative programming services in media markets may be taken into account when broadcasters are determining the programming needs of children. This means that broadcasters may further minimize their programming aimed at children by simply pointing to the availability of such programming over nonbroadcast services, such as cable, or even to what is available through video disks.

This shortsighted ruling ignores the fact that close to half of all American homes still lack access to cable. Some homes will probably never have access to cable television. And the cost involved with cable and other new communication technologies ensures that these sources of programming will be available only to those families who can afford them—not to those who are having difficulty simply putting food on the table each day. Many children—the poor and the culturally disadvantaged, the very population who have least access to alternative sources of information—will never experience the luxury of alternative programming provided by new video sources.

There may, of course, be other ways to solve this problem. To their credit, the National Association of Broadcasters and its president, Edward O. Fritts, have indicated a willingness to work with me in order to devise ways in which commercial broadcasters might foster the development of alternative programming, including programming designed to meet the educational needs of children. To the extent that the marketplace provides adequate educational programming for children, a legislative solution may not be necessary. However, until that day is reached, we must do all that we can to ensure that children are served by the licensees of the public airwaves.

The "Children's Television Education Act of 1985" sets forth a series of findings concerning the tremendous educational potential of television and requires that rules be developed to maximize the use of television in educating children, and to increase the amount of educational programming specifically designed for children. The bill requires that each broadcaster provide a substantial amount of educational programming for children, specifying that amount as a minimum of 7 hours per week, at least 5 of which must air Monday through Friday.

The legislation specifically identifies the petition to deny procedure as the appropriate process for ensuring broadcasters' compliance with provisions of the bill. It therefore provides a method for local community groups to ensure that their children are being served by their local broadcasters.

The bill also directs the FCC to conduct an inquiry into the implications of programs created to promote toys or other products popular with children—the so-called program-length commercials. In the past, it was not unusual for toys based on characters featured in children's programs to be developed after a program attained "hit" status. Recently, however, a new trend has evolved in which a television series is released at the same time as a line of toys associated with the program theme or characters. Although these programs are entertaining to children, the program content itself—not just the commercials—is specifically designed to promote products to children. This trend is growing so fast that, according to one estimate, as many as 20 Saturday morning programs this fall will feature this approach. Many believe this trend is the direct result of the FCC's 1984 television deregulation order which freed broadcasters from any limitation on the number of commercial minutes that could be run per hour.

There are several concerns raised by program-length commercials. The first is the effect on a child's ability to tell the difference between programs and commercial content. The FCC had for many years held that a clear separation must be maintained between programs and commercials so that children can more easily discriminate between them. In its 1974 policy statement on children's television, the FCC also prohibited broadcasters from engaging in host-selling, whereby popular characters featured in program content also engage in commercial pitches during program breaks. Both of these requirements are designed to help children recognize the distinction between programs and advertisements, an ability which helps child viewers defend against the persuasive appeals in commercials. yet many charge that this new type of commercialization of program content further confuses the distinction between programs and advertisements for young children. Only a full inquiry will clarify the extent of the confusion such programming creates in young children, but so far the FCC has refused to conduct such an inquiry.

A second issue raised in the manner in which this trend will affect the future of children's programming in general. When this type of programming is purchased by television stations, an arrangement is typically included which allows the broadcaster to share in the profits generated from the sales of toys and other related products. I am concerned, as are many others, that the financial incentives offered by such programs may override other factors that should be weighed in a broadcaster's decision regarding selection of children's program content. A broadcaster's primary responsibility under the provisions of the Communications Act is to serve the public interest. It is not clear to me how the public interest is served by having such financial incentives weigh so heavily.

The inquiry mandated by this bill will establish a record for assessing these questions and others related to the program-length commercial format.

The bill directs the FCC to promulgate all other necessary rules within 180 days of enactment of the legislation. I urge my colleagues to join me in cosponsoring this important piece of legislation.●

GOLD AND SILVER COINS

HON. RICHARD STALLINGS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. STALLINGS. Mr. Speaker, I have introduced today two bills, the first of which would provide for the minting of gold and silver bullion coins, and the second of which would provide for the minting of gold and silver coins commemorating outstanding American scientists.

Americans have never had the opportunity to buy gold and silver bullion coins produced by the U.S. mint. Instead, investors in precious metals purchase South African Krugerrands, Canadian Maple Leafs, and Mexican Libertads in great numbers. American purchases of these coins contribute to our staggering balance-of-trade deficit.

At the same time, we continue to discuss the imposition of trade sanctions against the government of South Africa because of its policy of apartheid. Producing American-made bullion coins would offer a product to the world that would compete directly and effectively with bullion coins of other countries. The world would be offered legal tender U.S. bullion coins.

Because these coins would be legal tender currency of the United States, I expect that their sales would exceed the gold and silver bullion coin sales of all other producers combined.

The second bill I have introduced would provide for the issuance of gold and silver coins over the next 5 years which commemorate outstanding American scientists. These coins, unlike bullion coins, would appeal primarily to coin collectors instead of investors in precious metals. Only one other American coin has been produced in recognition of the accomplishments of an American scientist. That coin, a silver half dollar, was issued in 1952 in recognition of the noted agricultural chemist, George Washington Carver.

A series of commemorative coins honoring outstanding American scientists is long overdue, because their accomplishments have been so many and so great.

The wonderous feats being achieved in medicine, the marvels of outer space exploration, the power and speed of today's computers, and the wonders of the atom are but a few of the areas in which American scientists have played, and are continuing to play, such an important leadership role. I look back in history to the days when current day technologies were not even dreamed of, much less realized, and see how great an impact American scientists have made on the world. Scientists, and American scientists in particular, deserve some long overdue recognition for their astonishing accomplishments. The production of commemorative coins would be one means of recognizing their many fine accomplishments.

Enactment of these bills would carry a number of other advantages. First, it would provide some much needed relief to the American gold and silver mining industries, which are today facing serious problems, through no fault of their own. For example, silver mining interests in this country, including those in the State of Idaho, are threatened by the mere presence of the approximately 138 million ounces of surplus silver held by the U.S. Government in the National Defense Stockpile. Previous Government attempts to auction this surplus silver were unsuccessful and unduly disrupted the U.S. silver market. One significant advantage of using this silver in coins in that undue market disruptions are not created by use of the silver in this manner. Of course, the U.S. Government also owns large stocks of surplus gold which could likewise be put to advantage by its use to mint bullion and commemorative coins. Long term production and sales of silver and gold coins would add to the stability of market prices and would encourage more explorations and mining of American resources.

To the extent that surplus silver and gold is used in the production of these coins, the Treasury would realize a net income. In view of our current budgetary problems, the net income realized from the sale of precious metals in the form of coins would be indeed welcome. For example, based on discussions with Government officials and coin experts. I expect that sales of surplus silver from the National Defense Stockpile, even at today's depressed prices of about $6.25/troy ounce, would result in an income of some $862 million over a period of approximately 4 years. Over a comparable period of coin production—both bullion and commemorative—gold coin sales would result in income of about $8.6 billion to the Treasury.

In addition, American Scientists Commemorative Coins would have a surcharge of $7.00 for each silver coin sold, and a surcharge of $35 for each gold coin sold. Since about 4 million silver and 800,000 gold commemorative coins would be sold annually, a total of $56 million would be raised annually in surcharges, to be used for the sole purpose of retiring the national debt.

I urge my colleagues' consideration of these two measures.●

COMMEMORATING CHARTER DAY—THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE UAW

HON. ESTEBAN EDWARD TORRES

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. TORRES. Mr. Speaker, around the Nation and in many international circles workers will celebrate the 50th anniversary of the United Auto Workers of America. Historically the UAW has stood for those principles of social and economic justice that have made this country's labor movement a beacon of hope to those not fortunate enough to live under a banner of freedom and democracy.

The early ideals of the UAW's founders continue to transcend American political changes and the advent of a new technological-industrial revolution. The Reuther brothers, Walter, Roy, and Victor pioneered the many contractual provisions that give auto and aerospace workers a significant share in the economic gains of this country in return for their skills and work productivity. More than material gain, however, the UAW gives a worker something called dignity.

The succeeding battles by other UAW leaders like Leonard Woodcock, Doug Fraser and today's Owen Bieber continue to keep alive the hard-won gains made by UAW workers and their families.

Mr. Speaker, in region 6 those gains were won with the hard struggle and sacrifice of early UAW militants who stood up to the police clubs, death threats and jailings. Bill Goldman, John Allard, Noah Tanscher are among many I knew who paid that bitter price. They imbued into new young workers the fortitude of pride, hope and leadership that allowed them to carry the torch of solidarity into the ranks of men and women in the West.

Mr. Speaker, today this new breed of leaders continue to build on these traditions so typical of the UAW. Regional Director Bruce Lee epitomizes these very same values. I am proud to have been a colleague of his in our early organization career days. Further, I am honored that on this UAW Charter Day, region 6 will commemorate the 50th anniversary in my 34th Congressional District in the city of South El Monte.●

THE RIBBON—AN APPROPRIATE SYMBOL OF PEACE

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, this Sunday August 4, thousands of Americans from all parts of our country will participate in a massive symbolic gesture of peace. On the 40th anniversary of the destruction of Hiroshima and Nagasaki by nuclear weapons, these Americans will tie a massive "ribbon" around the Pentagon.

This ribbon is actually thousands of 18-inch by 36-inch cloth panels with embroidery, applique, batik, quilting, knitting, silk screen, needlepoint, weaving, and many other mediums with a message based on the theme "What I cannot bear to think of as lost forever in a nuclear war." Some 17,000 panels—by individuals and groups throughout our country—will be tied together on Sunday as this symbol of peace—the ribbon—envelopes and surrounds a symbol of war—the Pentagon.

I am delighted that a number of groups and individuals from the peninsula are participating in this demonstration of the desire for peace. Four in particular have caught my attention.

The Morning Glory Montessori School of Burlingame has a wonderful panel with the handprints of 21 of the children at the school. The caption reads, "Today's Children—America's Future."

Another from Burlingame is by sister Mirian Moroney, S.M. Her beautiful applique of people with sun, trees, sky, and hills proclaims, "The Glory of God is a Human Being Fully Alive."

From Redwood City is a delightful colorful applique panel with the faces of six children and the names "Hanabal and Syracuse and Sarah and Mike." The title is simply, "People. . . ."

Laura M. Taylor, of San Carlos, has done an outstanding chain stich embroidery in red on white with the quotation of Edward Arlington Robinson:

"No there is not a glimmer nor a call,
For one that welcomes, welcomes when he fears,
The black and awful chaos of the night;
"But through it all beyond, above it all
I know the far-sent message of the years.
I feel the coming of the glory of the Light!"

Mr. Speaker, I commend the thousands of Americans—in my congressional district and throughout the Nation—who have taken the time to share their skills in giving us this message. This is a gentle reminder that peace must triumph over war, that the avoidance of nuclear holocaust must be our principal concern. When this message is emblazoned in the minds of all of us who share this planet—whatever our nationality—then we will indeed be able to "feel the coming of the glory of the Light."●

SALUTE TO PUBLISHERS PAPER

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, before we adjourn for the summer recess, I'm hopeful we will see a budget agreement between the House and the Senate that significantly reduces the deficit. I'd like to be able to bring the good news home to my constituents. Because they are deeply concerned by the state of our economy. They see, as I do, that failure to act now to control our budget, coupled with high deficits, and the serious competitive challenge we face in international trade, pose an extremely dangerous threat to the future growth of the U.S. economy.

In Oregon, we have to stabilize our base industries such as timber and agriculture while we at the same time move forward to encourage and develop new growth industries such as high technology. Private businesses, sometimes working alone, but often in a partnership with local, State, and Federal governments, have made and must continue to make investments in productivity, in competitiveness, in our resources, and ultimately in our most important asset—the well-being of our citizens.

I can think of many examples in my own district where these kinds of gains are being made. In new industries, and in old industries; our State depends on the health of its traditional timber and wood products industry. These areas have employed a huge portion of our population even when we were not in the best of economic times. And despite being old many of these industries have shown impressive competitiveness and innovative drive.

One of the best examples of a company that has changed and evolved and innovated is Publishers Paper in Newberg.

Publishers has 325 employees—a large number for a town the size of Newberg—with a payroll in 1984 of more than $23 million. These are high quality jobs that provide a good standard of living for those who hold them. The community of Newberg relies on this industry not only for jobs, but for the support of its infrastructure.

The mill runs 24 hours a day, 7 days a week and produces about 1,000 pounds of paper per day which is delivered to papers as far apart as the Oregonian, the Los Angeles Times and the Denver Post. It has become, with the hard work and dedication of its employees and management, one of the most efficient paper mills in the world.

It stands as an example of how capital investment in existing plants can make our traditional industry more competitive and efficient. In 1980 Publishers received the largest single manufacturing capital expansion in Oregon's history—$127 million was invested in new machinery that doubled the newsprint production.

Publishers has also focused significant attention on the area of recycling. Using 550 tons of recycled newspapers, a facility at the Newberg plant produces 475 tons of pulp per day making Publishers the largest user of recycled paper on the west coast. This has led to reduced costs and conservation of the resource—timber—that has made this industry such an important part of our State economy.

I salute the president of Publishers Paper, Mr. Web Ross, for his success in making this a model company for Oregon and for the country. And I salute all those who over the years have labored at the plant, who suffered through a rough recession, and who gave their all day in and day out—for without them, it could have been a much different situation than it is today.●

ELIMINATE QUOTA SYSTEM FOR PEANUTS

HON. MARGE ROUKEMA

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. ROUKEMA. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to join today with my colleague, Congressman STAN LUNDINE, in introducing legislation to eliminate the current system of poundage quotas for peanuts. The present Government peanut program is nothing less than a Government-mandated monopoly in peanuts, which rewards a privileged few while stifling productivity and inflating consumer prices. I believe it is past time for Congress to allow a freer, more competitive market in peanuts to develop without the constraints of poundage quotas. This can only lead to significantly reduced prices to the consumer.

Peanuts are today the only food crop which still depends on rigid production restrictions and marketing controls to support its prices. Under the current program, the U.S. Government determines where peanuts are produced, who can produce them, and what amount is to be produced and marketed. I can find no justification for continuing this restrictive system, which is so much more preferential than any other crop program. While such a program may have been justified 40 years ago, it is plainly unacceptable under present economic conditions.

I believe that today's bill is necessary both for consumers who purchase peanut products, and for those farmers who wish to grow peanuts but are prevented from doing so by the current quota system. The Department of Agriculture estimates that the current peanut program adds an additional 13 percent to the cost of every jar of peanut butter. Consumers should not have to pay this significant subsidy solely for the enrichment of current growers.

In addition, farmers who wish to grow peanuts but are now prevented from doing so by the quota system would no longer be barred from planting their crop. Those areas of the country which efficiently produced peanuts in the 1930's, when quotas were handed out, may be less competitive as peanut-growing areas today. because of the quota system, however, farmers in areas which could now effectively grow peanuts as a rotation crop are unable to do so because they have no quota allotment. Farmers should be permitted to grow any crop which they believe will be profitable, and not have their options limited by 50-year-old Government quotas.

The bill we are introducing today would eliminate the artificial distinction between peanuts for domestic consumption and those for export. It would replace the outdated quota support system with a straightforward loan support program like those in place for corn, wheat, soybeans, rice, and other crops. One level of price support would apply to all peanuts, and would be set by the Secretary of Agriculture after considering production costs, world market prices, and the supply and demand for peanuts.

Let me make clear that the price support program included in today's bill is designed to operate at no cost to the American taxpayer. Loan rates under this program are to be set at a rate below world market prices, so that they function only as a safety net to guard against unexpected market conditions. These price supports will not increase the Federal deficit in any way.

You will recall that Congressman LUNDINE offered an amendment to the Food and Agriculture Act of 1981 which essentially made the same changes we hope to make with today's bill. In 1981 this amendment passed the House by a 91-vote margin, only to fail by 4 votes in the other body. Now is the time to end this outdated and costly support program. I urge my colleagues to support this important legislation.●

ALEXANDER LYAKOV

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to call my colleagues attention to the plight of Lyudmila Nemseva and Dmitry Marchenko of Leningrad.

Their situation is one that is all too familiar to my colleagues, they have been denied permission to emigrate. In fact, on June 7, 1985, they were summoned to the Leningrad OVIR office and ordered to sign a paper stating that they would no longer be able to file applications to emigrate. They refused to sign the form, but an OVIR official signed the form for them. As a result, it appears that they will not be allowed to emigrate from the U.S.S.R. and join their family and friends living abroad.

Yesterday, I met with Alexander Lyakov who is currently on a hunger strike in solidarity with Lyudmila and Dmitry. All three of them have begun an open-ended hunger strike out of their frustration regarding the Soviet Government's policy to refuse them permission to emigrate. Although I do not support their plan to fast till death, I understand and sympathize with their serious situation.

The Soviet Government's callous attitude toward Lyudmila and Dmitry serves as a harsh reminder of their failure to respect basic human rights. This week marks the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords. These accords, which the Soviet Government voluntarily signed, commit that Government to allowing its citizens to emigrate. Thus it is particularly timely for the U.S. Congress to voice our concerns regarding the Soviet Government's failure to live up to the Helsinki accords, and to call upon them to stop their harrassment of citizens like Lyudmila and Dmitry.

I would like to submit for the RECORD a letter Alexander Lyakhov received from Lyudmila which reflects her feelings on her difficult situation.

LENINGRAD,
March 1984.

MY DEAR, ALEX: Hello! On March 20 I and Dima (the husband. A.L.) received another refusal in response to our application. (Application to leave the U.S.S.R. A.L.). There was no reason given—the same as the last time. Also they did not see the principle of family reunification in our case. (They only "see the principle" when the vyzov—invitation is from either children or parents. I assume this is the way it is put in the Declaration of Human Rights and The Helsinki Accord. I received my own vyzov from a cousin which did not stop me from leaving. But times change. And "Soviet Weekly" maintains that the procedures for those wishing to leave have been simplified! A.L.). And I am afraid it will be this way forever. 1978 will not come again. Then they obviously did not care about this "principle". Now the State decided to assume the role of our shepherd—of the ignorant children of it! The authorities have boldness to decide people's fates as they please even when the citizens have settled all their affairs as to property, money, etc. We are being treated like slaves, and indeed slaves we are! The Motherland becomes a jail, and the authorities—jailers. I curse my jailers. But unfortunately the curses are futile. This is like a prison wall and it is useless to throw oneself against it. Maybe it is possible to go around it? Or maybe there is a hole in it? I know that so many people have written to so many places, beginning with the OVIR (Department of Visas and Registrations. A.L.) and up to the United Nations, but never achieved anything. I understand that in a greater sense these letters are not at all without meaning since they open the world's eyes on truth as well as the lies and hypocricy. As for the authors of the letters they remain where they are with their rights existing on paper only. Slavery—this is the only definition for this State with its false liberties!

We will certainly fight for our right to live where we want to, will protest against lawlessness. I am not yet sure how, but we will. This uninvited guardian infuriates me. The Soviet Power tries to make us feel inferior, subnormal, or babies. Please give our gratitude to Mr. Porter for his support. (U.S. Congressman J. Porter, the Head of Congressional Human Rights Caucus. A.L.) On March 23 another family of 11 people was denied the same right. They are probably also "of great value" to the Soviet State although in their case the principle of family reunification can not be questioned even by those "standards". They would like their names to be known. Here they are: Kleiman Nina, her mother—Kleiman Lubov (85 years old), her mother-in-law Peisin Dveira (93 years old) (The authorities probably hope that while all this drags along the old gals may die out and leave them less insubordinate slaves to deal with! A.L.) Her husband—Peisin Daniil (65 years old), their daughter Novikova Elena (34 years old), the daughter's husband—Gorodnitsky Vladimir, their son—Peisin Boris (27 years old), the son's wife Bogolepova Irina, children Eugeny and Ilia 9 months old.

They have received refusals three times already: in 1981, 1982, and 1983. This is the fourth—1984. (Addresses follow).

These people are not under investigation, have no debts, and never had anything to do with anything secret—just as ourselves.

Myself and Dima (the husband. A.L.) are only interested in one and only thing, and the only thing we want is—to leave, just like all the refusniks. We do not want to get involved in politics, but it looks as if we were already involved in it. Our natural right to chose where we want to live has been made a political issue of here. The right to chose has been intirely usurped by the State. We are forced to struggle instead of living normal human lives.

Refusniks are people with no future in this country. We can only plan not farther than 6 month ahead in the hope that someone up there will have some mercy. Alex, it is so terrifying, I wonder if you can imagine!

Collecting numerous sparravkas (verifictions. The Number of those "has been cut down" if one is to believe "Soviet Weekly". A.L.) is a humiliating and exhaustive procedure. When I came to a Notary Public with my parents to verify their signatures on the paper stating that our mutual affairs were settled as to money and property (what property?!), the Notary Public began trying to convince my parents not to sign anything. Can you imagine such a "Notary Public" taking upon herself such a role?! My mother then became hysterical the way I had never seen before. She was told "she was destroying her daughter". I have already written to you about the scene at the Regional Komsomol Committee office. (She was summoned there to be told that she must be a fascist to want to go to a fascist country (the "fascist country" being Israel) and that she and her husband and future children would be first mercilessly exploited and then inevitably killed there. A.L.)

Absence of information turns people into walking mannequins. They will all sound the way they are being tuned. Propaganda is called here—anti-propaganda directed against some imperialist propaganda which does not exist for soviet people as it is jammed, confiscated, etc. We only know about psychological war of imperialism against us because of this counterwar conducted here—in the name of people. And this counterwar has increased extremely. Uncountable political briefings, books, newspaper and magazine articles, TV, and radio are telling us daily about ideological sabotage, psychological attacks, etc. conducted against us by some radiovoices that can not be heard (jammed. A.L.), books and papers that can not be seen (confiscated. A.L.). I am only surprised why people do not become eager to read, hear, and see all this they are daily told about so bountifully. Maybe it is because they also do not want to get mixed up in this dirty mess and hurry to get away from it by just doing exactly the way they are told to. All for the sake of undisturbed lives and being able to persue their own affairs. Trouble only comes when those personal affairs tend to disagree with what is called—State Interests. Many refusnics do not refile their applications to leave simply because they are afraid of losing their jobs. This is why the number of such applications has really decreased.

All this, naturally, is the way I see it and think about it. Foregive me for such a wild letter. I am exasperated really. My life is the same way it was. I work so far (Temporary job at a library. A.L.). My life is a shambles and it will be this way until I leave here. You know all the reasons.

Yours,

LOU.

(I have to explain here about the loss of jobs mentioned above. If people lose their jobs, it does not mean they are going to be unemployed. But having lost their jobs as doctors, lawers, teachers, etc. they would have to take jobs as unqualified help, low level and low income. Unemployment for any considerable period of time is in the USSR punishable by either exile with forced labour for up to 5 years, or imprisonment for up to 3 years). Footnote mine—A.L.●

HAPPY BIRTHDAY, EAST HAVEN

HON. BRUCE A. MORRISON

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MORRISON of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, today I would like to pay tribute to the town of East Haven, CT, in my Third Congressional District, which is celebrating its 200th birthday this year.

I would also like to extend my congratulations to East Haven's distinguished Mayor, Anthony Proto Jr., and all the members of the East Haven Bicentennial Commission—Joan Lindsay, Marie Cavallaro, Tess Farat, Patrick O'Leary, Charles Schegel, Jr., Michael Lawlor, Norman DeMartino, and Chairman John Brereton—for their hard work in planning and preparing for a year of celebration of East Haven's history.

I also want to congratulate the Ball Committee—Tess Farat, Marge Mitchell, Lois Amatruda, and Bill Cummings, the Parade Committee—Lee Mattei, Joan Lindsay, Jack Leary, and Bill Zampa, and Miss Bicentennial, Deborah Lynn Bast.

Mr. Speaker, East Haven has a long and proud history. The first settlers in what is now East Haven County, led by the Reverend John Davenport and Theopolius Eaton, purchased a tract of land there from Chief Momauguin and his sister Shaumpishuh in 1638. In 1639, the settlers held a convention and signed the constitution of the colony of East Haven.

As the area grew, East Haveners sought to become independent from New Haven, and finally achieved this goal when East Haven became a town in 1785.

Since that time, East Haven has undergone many changes, but has kept its historic character—not only in historic places like the East Haven Green, where Lafayette camped on his way to join Washington, the Old Stone Church, and Fort Nathan Hale, but in its citizens' special sense of independence and individualism.

Today East Haven has grown into a prosperous town of over 25,000. A new industrial park has brought in more light industry. Redevelopment in the town's center has spurred new investment and brings in shoppers from all over the area. The town is planning new efforts to take advantage of its greatest asset, its beautiful shoreline. East Haven's citizens face the future with confidence that their town will remain a very special place to live.

Mr. Speaker, and distinguished colleagues, please join me in wishing for East Haven and its citizens continued prosperity and progress in the centuries ahead.●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. WILLIAM F. GOODLING

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GOODLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to explain my vote against the Treasury, Postal Service and General Government Appropriation Act on July 30.

My position has been that, no matter how good certain provisions may be in authorization or appropriation legislation, I am committed to voting against any bills that provide amounts that are above a freeze at the 1985 level of funding, since all of these votes are taking place during a period when we don't have a budget finalized.

I support revenue foregone funding for the Postal Service and increased funding for the Customs Service, particularly for drug control. However, I have a difficult time believing that, after spending millions to modernize the IRS computer system, we need more employees. Unfortunately, some of them presently do not understand that they are, like I, public servants and have my staff spending hours helping people who should have been helped by employees of the IRS.

Although I supported the Frenzel amendment as amended by Congressman COLEMAN since it provided a reduction in funding, I could not support final passage of this bill as it still provided a total funding amount in excess of 1985 spending levels.●

GINETTA SAGAN—CHAMPION OF HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. TOM LANTOS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LANTOS. Mr. Speaker, today is the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Final Act of the Conference of Security and Cooperation in Europe—popularly known as "The Helsinki Final Act." It is a most appropriate time to recognize individuals who have been champions of human rights around the globe.

I wish to pay tribute to a friend of mine, who has suffered first-hand for her convictions, a woman whose commitment to human rights is an inspiration to all who have been touched by her. It is a personal pleasure for me, especially today as the world's attention is focused on the Helsinki Final Act and on the need for an active representation for human rights, to pay a special tribute to Ginetta Sagan.

Ginetta is among those who experienced unimaginable pain and suffering, both mentally and physically, in the Fascists' inferno during World War II. The Italian Fascists attempted to kill her soul and her body, but she survived, never to forget the ordeals she endured.

When the Fascist secret police caught her in February 1945, her parents were already long dead at the hands of the Mussolini regime. Day after day, she was subjected to electric shocks, near drownings, and burnings. Worst of all, they tried to destroy her spirit: "you are alone; you are dead for the world; nobody cares about you," her captors often told her.

After 45 days of torture, just before her scheduled execution, Ginetta was saved by a near-miracle. Two German officers arrived, informing the Italians that she was being taken for further questioning. But the officers proved to be anti-Nazi Germans, who drove her to safety with friends in the Italian resistance.

Following the war, Ginetta worked tirelessly in the defense of human rights—for those who have suffered torture in Iran; held without charge in Chile or Cuba or Ethiopia; worked slowly to death in a Soviet gulag. Ginetta has been one of the driving forces behind the phenomenal growth of Amnesty International, the London-based human rights group, in the United States.

One thing must be understood, Ginetta said recently, whether it's a right-wing government or a leftwing one—a concentration camp is a concentration camp, and torture is torture.

Most notably, she turned her attention to the victims of Communist Vietnam's concentration camps, where prisoners are shackled inside of shipping containers for days in their own waste, many dying as the Sun turned the boxes into ovens; others suspended and swung to and from, beaten by guards as they choked on their own vomit and blood.

To further investigate the excesses of the Vietnamese Government, Ginetta formed her own human rights organization, the Aurora Foundation. Using funds from her family and a few close friends, she has undertaken the immense task of detailing the full dimensions of the crimes of the Vietnamese Communists. The Aurora Foundation's investigative work indicates that more than half a million people have passed through the concentration camps; between 25,000 and 40,000 are still there today.

Ten years ago today, President Ford stated after signing the Helsinki Final Act for the United States: "History will judge this conference not by what we say here today, but by what we do tomorrow—not by the promises we make, but by the promises we keep."

In her work and personal commitment to human rights, Ginetta Sagan is a powerful advocate for nations to uphold the promises they have made. Her courageous efforts turn the light of international publicity on outlaw nations so that individuals are not persecuted in the dark. I hope that all Members will join me in saluting her today, for her courage, her perseverance, and most importantly, her compassion.●

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE HELSINKI ACCORDS

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, August 1, marks the 10th anniversary of the signing in Helsinki, Finland of the Final Act of the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe.

This week, Secretary of State Shultz led an American delegation to Helsinki to commemorate the signing of the Final Act 10 years ago.

Although the promise of the Helsinki accords has not been realized in the first decade of their existence, Secretary Shultz points out, "that the goals and principles that we set down here were worth striving for."

I would like to share Secretary Shultz' remarks on the Helsinki accords' 10th anniversary with my colleagues in the belief that we must use the principles set forth to continue to work to bring human rights, cooperation and freedom to all of the peoples and nations of Europe.

SECRETARY OF STATE GEORGE SHULTZ' CSCE 10TH ANNIVERSARY COMMEMORATION ADDRESS, HELSINKI, JULY 30, 1985

Europe, let us not forget, has been divided before, though never so starkly. Vastly different political systems have lived side by side on this continent for hundreds of years. Empires, constitutional monarchies, and dictatorships have stood beside republics and democracies. Religious wars over the centuries, have caused the deaths of countless innocents. And in this century alone, the people of Europe have endured two world wars that ravaged their continent. Only the heroic efforts of the Western democracies and the Soviet Union saved Europe from Hitler's tyranny. Yet Europe has outlived even these times of trouble.

And the modern idea of liberty, since the eighteenth century, has continued to grow and flourish. It has survived all the historic conflicts and divisions of Europe because, even in the dark moments, the aspiration of individuals to speak, think, and travel freely—throughout the continent—was never extinguished. Belief in the rights of man has deep roots in European philosophy and history.

For now, we all live uneasily with the brutal and artificial division of this continent, even as we search for ways to end it. But nothing in human history has proven irreversible.

Perhaps no one here of my generation can confidently expect that the walls and the barbed wire will magically disappear in our lifetime, but surely the division must be altered within the lifetimes of many who are alive today.

And yet there are some things for which we can hope, now: that the idea of liberty in Europe may continue to grow, even in those areas of darkness behind the walls, and that peace may reign over this continent, despite persistent confrontation between East and West. Today competing powers and political values are arrayed against each other in Europe. Their differences may be ultimately irreconcilable. We hope not. But tensions will exist so long as some persist in violating the most funadmental human rights. Yet can we not reduce the threat of armed conflict? Can we not achieve some greater measure of freedom for all Europeans, for all individuals? We, the inheritors of the European spirit, must keep it alive for future generations all across the continent.

These are the hopes that inspired the Helsinki Conference a decade ago. The statesmen at Helsinki understood that the twin goals of peace and greater freedom are intimately connected in Europe. They understood that we owed it to ourselves and to our children to keep the great European tradition alive, even in these difficult times.

Today we mark the tenth anniversary of the Helsinki Final Act. If any single lesson emerges from the history of the Final Act's first ten years, it is precisely that the interests of individual human beings are a fundamental part of security and stability in Europe. Greater security and a more stable peace among our nations depend on greater freedom for the people of Europe.

The Final Act was an expression of the humane European tradition. It affirmed the most basic human rights and fundamental freedoms. It called for a freer flow of information, ideas, and people. It offered the possibility for greater cooperation among states and peoples. It reaffirmed the basic principles of relations among states. And it recognized, it its structure and in its purpose, that security, economic ties, human rights, and contacts among people are all equally important—and related to each other. Peace encompasses the totality of our relations.

In signing the Final Act ten years ago, we recognized as governments that if we were to make progress toward greater security and more stable peace, we would have to go beyond the traditional agenda of govenments. We recognized that our security requirements must extend beyond walls and weapons, that they had to include finding ways to lessen suspicion, reduce obstacles, instill greater confidence, and increase contacts among the peoples of Europe.

And we recognized that these could only be achieved if commitments extended beyond our governments, to engage the hopes, good will, and efforts of our peoples, too.

And in fact, the Helsinki Final Act did engage the attention and enthusiasm of our peoples, because it appealed to all that has bound European civilization together over the centuries, and because it opened the door to a better future. The Final Act described ways to span the gulfs, to break down at least some of the walls that had been put in place since 1945. It offered a definition of our common security that was both comprehensive and precise. It gave the citizens of all participating states the hope that they could develop their full potential and contribute to a better, safer world. But above all it sought to preserve the rights of individuals.

The message of the Final Act was that we can reduce the divisions in Europe, that we can ease the sufferings they have caused, and that we can someday hope to see an undivided peaceful continent, if we are wise enough, practical enough, dedicated enough.

We all knew that it would not be easy to turn our hopes into reality. We knew that our expectations about what could be would have to be tempered by realism that progress might come slowly.

And we knew that, as President Ford said, "History will judge this Conference not by what we say here today, but by what we do tomorrow—not by the promises we make, but by the promises we keep." But we also knew that the goals and principles we set down here were worth striving for.

The genius of the Final Act was that it was not merely an expression of goals and principles; it was also a program of practical steps for turning our hopes into reality. It provided a standard toward which to strive and against which to measure our behavior. Perhaps we shall not soon see the day when all nations meet that standard, but the effort, in and of itself, could lead to a more secure peace, greater individual freedom, and thus a greater fulfillment of Europe's vast potential.

Can we look back over the past ten years and see some limited progress? I believe the answer is yes, though the reality of Europe's division remains. Let us review these past ten years, and, in keeping with the wisdom of the Final Act, let us judge the progress in the most practical, concrete terms. Pious declarations are cheap. Real progress can only be seen in its effect on human beings.

The Final Act has had some practical effect.

Today, journalists travel more easily between our countries. Large numbers of citizens in some East European countries have been reunited with their families in the West. By recalling what had been hoped for and what had seemed possible when the Final Act was signed, our review conferences at Belgrade and Madrid helped keep those hopes and possibilities alive. So, too, our recent meetings in Ottawa and our current negotiations in Stockholm keep our aspirations alive.

These achievements are not negligible. They have pointed the way we must take if we are to put our relations on a better and more stable basis in the future, and if we are to open up the possibility of freedom for all Europeans.

And yet, ten years after the signing of the Final Act, no one can deny the gap between hope and performance. Despite the real value of the Final Act as a standard of conduct, the most important promises of a decade ago have not been kept.

Let's look at the specifics.

In the Final Act, we all committed ourselves to treat in a positive and humanitarian way the applications of persons who wish to be reunited with members of their family. Yet, over the past five years, the number of Soviet citizens of Jewish nationality permitted to emigrate, mainly for family reunification, fell from over 51,000 to 896. The regrettable trend is the same for Soviet citizens of German and Armenian nationality.

There are over twenty cases of American/Soviet marriages in which the Soviet spouse has been denied exit permission two or more times, in spite of specific provisions of the Helsinki Final Act. Yury Balovlenkov, who married an American citizen in 1978, was on a hunger strike from March 25 to July 4 protesting six years of continued denial. He has seen only one of his two daughters and is in terribly weakened health.

The Final Act confirms the right of the individual to know and act upon the provisions of the agreement. Yet the citizens' group set up in Moscow to monitor implementation of the Final Act in the Soviet Union disbanded in September 1982 for fear of further persecution. Here is a group of enthusiastic Soviet citizens who were pleased and proud of the decision of their government to sign the Helsinki Final Act. Yet today, Yuriy Orlov, the group's founder, languishes in remote Siberian exile after seven years in a labor camp. Founding member Anatoly Shcharansky, imprisoned on a false charge in 1977, has completed his term in the notorious Chistopol prison and is now serving out the rest of his thirteen-year sentence in one of the most brutal of Soviet labor camps. Imprisoned group member Anatoly Marchenko, currently serving a twelve-year sentence, has been permitted no correspondence with his family for more than a year. Group member Ivan Kovalyov's health has reportedly deteriorated badly since his transfer to labor camp. His wife and fellow group member Tatyana Osipova recently had her own five-year labor camp sentence extended by two years.

The founder of a peace group in Moscow, Sergei Batovrin, was first harassed, then put in a psychiatric ward, and then, when he persisted in advocating peace the way so many thousands of young people do in other countries, he was thrown out of his native land altogether. Other peace activists have met similar fates, as have those struggling for womens' rights and free trade unions. The founders of a Social Democratic party in Moscow were jailed in January of this year.

On June 14, Bogdan Lis, Adam Michnik, and Wladyslaw Frasyniuk were sentenced in Gdansk to terms ranging from two-and-a-half to three-and-a-half years on charges having nothing ostensibly to do with their real "crime" of leading the fight for free trade unionism—a right recognized in the Concluding Document of the Madrid Review meeting. In the Soviet Union, Vladimir Klebanov's efforts to found a free trade union put him in a psychiatric hospital for four years.

Nor has abuse of psychiatric treatment been limited to trade unionists and peace activists. In the Ukraine, Vladimir Khailo, an Evangelical Baptist, has been interned in psychiatric hospitals since 1980 for his faith and his efforts to emigrate with his wife and fifteen children. He has refused an offer of freedom in exchange for renunciation of his faith.

All who would live an active religious life according to their faith, whether Christian, Jewish, or Muslim, risk harassment, imprisonment, or confinement in psychiatric institutions. Baptists, Ukrainian and Lithuanian Catholics, Russian Orthodox, Seventh Day Adventists, and Pentacostals have all been increasingly subject to repression. Dina Shvedsova, Vasyl Kobrin, Father Alfonsas Svarinskas, Father Gleb Yakunin, Pastor Nikolai Goretoi, and Pastor Viktor Valter are only a few of the Christians currently serving sentences of up to twelve years in prison or exile in the Soviet Union because of their faith. A small community of Pentacostals from the village of Chuguevka in the Soviet Far East has suffered grievously in the past several months. Ten community elders have been sentenced to up to five years in labor camp and the rest fired from their jobs. Six families have been threatened with losing custody of their children.

At least sixteen Jewish cultural activists, including nine teachers of the Hebrew language, have been arrested in the Soviet Union since last July, and many have been convicted on obviously trumped-up criminal charges to three to four years of imprisonment and labor camp. Iosif Berenshtein, currently serving a four-year term, was savagely beaten and stabbed while in prison, and lost most of his vision. Yuly Edelshtein, who is serving a three-year term, is reportedly undergoing repeated beatings in his labor camp in Siberia, as part of an effort "to exorcise his religious fanaticism," according to camp authorities.

Abuzakar Rahimov, a Muslim from Tashkent in Soviet Central Asia, was sentenced to seven years in a strict regime labor camp in 1982 for distributing material about the Islamic faith, including translations from the Koran.

Last year in Czechoslovakia, seven priests and nuns were arrested for "obstructing state supervision over churches and religious orders."

Finally, the man who more than any other represents the ideals enshrined in the Final Act—Andrei Sakharov—remains totally isolated from the outside world—in exile, probably still in Gorky. Even as I speak, he may be in a hospital following his most recent hunger strike on behalf of decent medical treatment for his beloved wife. We have reason to believe he was force-fed to break his hunger strike.

We cannot talk about the Helsinki process without talking about human beings, for they are supposed to be the true beneficiaries of the Helsinki Final Act. The fate of these individuals, moreover, affects the actions of thousands, maybe millions, by showing what happens to those who dare exercise their rights and freedoms.

My country and most other countries represented here remain committed to the goal of putting the program of the Final Act into practice in all of its provisions. We know that hard work and patience are needed. We believe that the truest tests of political intentions are actual steps to improve cooperation among states, to enhance contacts among people, and to strengthen respect for individual rights. The provisions of the Final Act are indivisible. We must see progress in all areas. At next year's Vienna Review conference, we will have a chance to measure that progress again.

We are convinced that the future need not be as bleak as the recent past. As we look ahead toward the next decade of the CSCE process, we should also look back to the kinds of beneficial practical actions we listed then, and measure ourselves against the standards we set.

We have an opportunity at the Stockholm Conference to find concrete ways to increase confidence and security in the military field. The package of specified measures proposed by the Western participants in Stockholm addresses some of the causes of war—miscalculation and misinterpretation. These measures can help ensure that existing forces are never used. They encourage greater openness about military forces and exchanges of information that would increase mutual understanding and reduce the risk of surprise attack. As President Reagan stated in Dublin over a year ago, and more recently in Strasbourg, we are prepared to discuss the principle of non-use of force, a principle to which the United States is committed, if this will bring the Soviet Union to negotiate agreements that give concrete meaning to that principle. A solution should be possible that adds to our security and contributes to peace in Europe, and thereby, ultimately, to a better life for our peoples. We are prepared to move ahead in all areas in Stockholm.

We can contribute to our common security, to a more stable peace, and to the future vitality of European civilization by steps directly affecting people's lives. The freedom of individuals to determine their own destinies is not only a good ultimate objective; it is also a good place to start. Sustained improvements are vital; but concrete steps—to improve emigration, to allow spouses and dual nationals to unite with loved ones, to release human rights activities and religious teachers—these concrete steps are also important.

Each of us has the obligation to press forward wherever we can. One particularly urgent task is to stop the spread of chemical weapons. Too many times in recent years, these weapons have been brutally employed, not only against military forces, but against innocent civilians. The proliferation and use of these weapons represent an ominous warning that long-accepted constraints are breaking down. We must all look to the steps we can take to halt the use of these weapons now, to prevent further proliferation, and to invigorate the effort in Geneva to move towards a verifiable treaty that would genuinely ban these weapons forever.

The United States and the Soviet Union have an opportunity to help build a more secure world in the arms control negotiations currently underway in Geneva.

And in November our leaders will meet to examine the whole spectrum of issues before us. We are ready and willing to seize the opportunity. Let our two countries begin the patient, serious work of resolving problems and reaching agreements of benefit to us both, and to other countries as well.

Steps to reduce weapons and enhance security, steps to enhance economic and other exchanges, and steps to relieve the suffering and enrich the lives of individuals—all these reinforce each other. They are part of the same broad program of security and cooperation enshrined in the Helsinki Final Act. Taken together, they could lead us toward a new era in relations in Europe—one that could bring alive once again the promise of Helsinki and the larger promise of European history.

They are not massive or difficult steps to take. But they are important; they have a larger meaning. They require only courage and political will on the part of all of us.

I have been informed that the House and the Senate of the United States today passed a joint resolution commemorating the tenth anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki Final Act. This resolution expressed the strong support of the Congress for the human rights principles and humanitarian provisions of the Helsinki Final Act, condemned East Bloc violations of the Final Act and other international instruments, and stressed the inherent link between respect for human rights and the achievement of lasting peace. Concern for human rights is a common value shared by all Americans. This concern reflects the basic principles upon which our nation was founded and by which we live on a daily basis.●

PODHORETZ ON SOVIET TRAFFICKING IN HUMAN BEINGS

HON. JIM COURTER

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. COURTER. Mr. Speaker, because Marxist-Leninist governments see themselves as the virtual owners of the human "resources" living within their national borders, they make no distinction between emigres and traitors. Both are in some way dissatisfied with the state, and both are therefore taken to be enemies of the state.

Communist bureaucracies deal with requests to emigrate in many different ways. One of the common ones is acceding to the request and charging a bounty in cash. Vietnam made several billion dollars, by some accounts, in the course of arranging the departure of nearly 1 million unwanted ethnic Chinese. East Germany has sold thousands of political prisoners to West German relief organizations. Before American pressures brought about change in 1974, the Soviet Government charged an "education tax" on emigres which was as high as $26,400 for someone holding a doctorate.

Avital Shcharansky, the wife of the imprisoned dissident, now believes that the U.S.S.R. may propose—quietly of course—what would amount to a trade: the 400,000 would-be Jewish emigres for most favored nation tariff privileges from the United States. An account of the interview she gave Norman Podhoretz, the distinguished editor of Commentary magazine, has appeared in the New York Post together with his own remarks, and I recommend the article to my colleagues.

The article follows:

[From the New York Post, July 30, 1985]

CYNICAL SOVIET TRADE IN JEWS

(By Norman Podhoretz)

The other day I received a visit from Avital Shcharansky, whose efforts to free her husband Anatoly from the Gulag to which the Soviet authorities consigned him seven years ago have given a new dimension to the word indefatigable.

This was not the first time Mrs. Shcharansky had come to see me, but this time there was a difference. In previous visits she mainly had appealed for help in getting her husband out of prison. On this occasion, however, her emphasis fell on getting the 400,000 Jews waiting for permission to emigrate out of that larger prison known as the Soviet Union.

Mrs. Shcharansky thinks that a special opportunity to press the issue of Jewish emigration is provided by the meeting this week in Helsinki to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the agreement that was signed there by the Soviet Union, the United States and 33 other nations on Aug. 1, 1975.

More generally, she believes that the Soviets are now in such desperate economic straits that they would be willing to trade 400,000 troublesome Jews for the most-favored-nation (MFN) status to which a liberalized emigration policy might technically qualify them under the Jackson-Vanik Amendment.

Is she right? Are the Soviets now prepared to bargain in the currency of what are for all practical purposes Jewish hostages?

Perhaps. In the reports that have circulated recently of Soviet moves toward the restoration of diplomatic relations with Israel, which were broken off during the Six-Day War of 1967, mention has been made of offers to pay for certain political concessions by Israel with an increase in the number of Jews who would be allowed to emigrate.

Some who follow these matters closely think that the Soviets are also trying to wring political concessions, and not just MFN status, out of the United States in exchange for allowing larger numbers of Jews to leave.

The Soviets have been playing a similar game with the West Germans for some years now, exacting both hard cash and political accommodation for permitting a negotiated quota of East Germans to emigrate to the Federal Republic. Why then should they not try to open up a trade in Jews as well? So many Jews for the return of the Golan Heights to Syria, so many for MFN, so many for the cancellation of Star Wars.

Yet even if the Soviets are now ready to deal in this repulsive fashion, the United States should refuse to go along.

In Helsinki 10 years ago, the Soviets promised, among other things, to allow much freer emigration in exchange for what amounted to recognition by the West of their hegemony over East Europe. In restricting Jewish emigration so harshly (from 51,000 in 1979 to about 900 in 1984), the Soviets are thus brazenly violating the Helsinki accords. Thus too, in offering to exchange a higher emigration quota for economic or political concessions, they are demanding yet another quid for a quo they have never paid and are at best still unwilling to pay in full.

It is because the Soviets have refused to keep their part of the Helsinki bargain in general that a large group of Soviet dissidents living in exile recently issued a statement calling for its nullification by the West.

Not only, say these exiled dissidents, has the accord failed in its "initial goal" of promoting human rights in the Soviet Union and its East European satellites. It has "failed even to protect the Helsinki monitors" in those countries who have been imprisoned precisely for calling on the Communist authorities to observe its provisions. Among these monitors is Anatoly Shcharansky.

In English prose that touchingly bears the traces of their native Russian, the exiled dissidents go on:

"We tried to persuade Western governments to make release of these people a necessary condition to continue Helsinki process. It was not done in time and the situation is irreversible now. Irreversible are the deaths of imprisoned Helsinki monitors Oleska Tikhy, Valery Marchenko and Yuri Letvin from the Ukraine and Eduard Arutyunyan from Armenia. Irreversible are the many years spent in prisons and labor camps by the founders of the Helsinki Movement Yuri Orlov, Anatoly Shcharansky and other prisoners of conscience."

But the fate of the 400,000 Soviet Jews who have applied for permission to emigrate may not be irreversible. Instead of offering the Soviet Union rewards for letting some of them go—rewards, in other words, for partially keeping commitments for which it has already been exorbitantly paid—the United States ought to be threatening a cancellation of the Helsinki agreement unless the Soviets immediately begin living up to its provisions.

That would mean, as the exiled dissidents say, the release of Shcharansky and the other prisoners of conscience; and, as Avital Shcharansky adds, it would also mean the simultaneous granting of exit visas to the 400,000 Jews wishing to emigrate.

Mrs. Shcharansky thinks that the Soviets would give in to pressure of this kind; the exiled dissidents seem to be more skeptical. But we are not about to find out this week which of them is right. For the brutal and heartbreaking truth is that the chances of an American threat to nullify the Helsinki accord are almost nil.

What is most heartbreaking, however, is that even if such a threat were made, it would be no more credible than the empty threats we have repeatedly made to nullify all the other agreements, from the ABM treaty to the treaty banning the use of chemical weapons, that the Soviets have violated just as brazenly as they have done with the accord whose 10th anniversary is so farcically being celebrated in Helsinki this week. ●

NATIONAL FISH HATCHERY SYSTEM ACT

HON. JOHN B. BREAUX

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BREAUX. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a bill to establish a national fish hatchery system to be administered by the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service within the Department of the Interior. Mr. YOUNG of Alaska has joined me as a cosponsor of this legislation.

Federal hatchery programs have been in a state of flux for the past several years. A number of facilities have been closed, and others have been proposed for closure by the administration. The type and level of production at many Federal hatcheries have been subject to change by the administration with little or no meaningful consultation with the States and other affected interests. The driving force for these closures and other changes has been the preception on the part of the administration that Federal fish hatchery programs have not necessarily been addressing priority Federal responsibilites. In some cases, I agree. However, I must take exception to the administration's approach to changing these hatchery programs, an approach in which decisions have been made unilaterally by the Federal Government without a conscientious and open attempt to review alternatives or to involve the States, Indian tribes, environmental community, commercial and recreational fishery interests, or others in the process. Unfortunately, I think that the Congress must share the blame for this confused state of affairs since the Congress has made little effort to provide explicit policy directives for operation and management of federally funded fish hatchery facilities.

As the Members may be aware, the Fish and Wildlife Service currently operates 73 hatchery facilities. In addition, a variety of other agencies, including the Corps of Engineers, the National Marine Fisheries Service, and a number of State fish and wildlife departments either own or operate hatcheries to produce fish for the Federal Government. The legislation that I am introducing today attempts to provide clear congressional guidance for the operation of these many facilities. The bill outlines specific objectives for federally funded fish production activities, and provides a mechanism for the coordinated planning and implementation of these objectives with the active involvement of interested parties.

Mr. Speaker, the legislation I am introducing would identify hatchery responsibilities of the Federal Government in five primary areas: First, mitigation for impacts of Federal water projects; second, restoration of depeleted fish stocks of particular national significance; third, research and development related to fish culture; fourth, recovery of federally listed endangered or threatened species; and five, support for international and Indian treaty responsibilities. In addition, fish production for stocking waters on other Federal and Indian lands would be permitted if such production would not interfere with achievement of the above-mentioned primary responsibilities.

An important feature of the bill involves recovery of fish production costs associated with various objectives. Perhaps the most notable cost recovery aspect is the requirement in the bill that the beneficiaries of Federal projects which produce negative impacts on fishery resources be required to reimburse the costs of mitigating these fishery damages. This is a fiscally responsible approach which assures that those who benefit from Federal water projects have the opportunity to directly contribute to the mitigation of damages resulting from such Federal projects. I believe that this is in keeping with the user pay concept so commonly espoused by the administration.

Mr. Speaker, Mr. YOUNG and I introduced a similar bill in the 98th Congress for discussion purposes. The Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, which I chair, held a hearing on that bill last fall, and the subcommittee benefited greatly from the many comments we received. Discussions on this legislation have been ongoing with the various agencies and interests since that time, and the bill I am introducing today reflects many long hours of work in revision of that initial legislation. I believe that today's bill includes substantial improvements in our approach to developing a comprehensive Federal fish hatchery policy. I am certain that this bill will generate further needed discussion of the Federal hatchery program, and I am anxious to continue our dialog with all of the various concerned parties as we move forward to provide long-term stability and guidance for Federal fish production activities.●

UNFINISHED BUSINESS

HON. DEAN A. GALLO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GALLO. Mr. Speaker, we all share a sense of satisfaction and relief over the safe return of the remaining 39 passengers of TWA flight 847 after 17 agonizing days of imprisonment. Yet, as we watched our fellow Americans pass unharmed out of the volatile Middle East, we must not lose sight of the unfinished business left behind.

The brutal beating and murder of Navy diver Robert Dean Stethem is a tragic event which will not be forgotten. Over 40 individuals witnessed this savage crime. We must support every reasonable effort to bring the murderers to justice. Moreover, we do not forget that there are still seven Americans—Rev. Benjamin Weir, Rev. Lawrence Jenco, William Buckley, Thomas Sutherland, Peter Kilburn, Terry Anderson, and David Jacobsen held captive in Lebanon.

I support President Reagan's notion which the State Department continues to convey—that Syrian President Hafez Assad and Amal leader Nabih Berri should work as hard to secure the release of the remaining seven Americans as they did, with extensive media attention, to "negotiate," the freedom of the 39 TWA hostages.

Today marks the 32d day that has passed since the release of the TWA hostages. While we must not be deterred from strengthening our efforts to correct past injustices, we can take immediate action to diminish the possibility of future terrorist acts against innocent Americans.

I have cosponsored two pieces of legislation which I believe accomplish these goals. H.R. 2827, the Anti-Hijacking Act of 1985, which has been introduced by my distinguished colleague, Congressman HOWARD, chairman of the Public Works and Transportation Committee, would call for important measures to improve the safety and security of individuals using international aviation.

House Concurrent Resolution 170, which I am an a original cosponsor of, goes beyond the condemnation of the unlawful hijacking and the savage murder of Robert Stethem by confirming the President's policy of not capitulating to international terrorist demands. The resolution introduced by my distinguished colleague, Congressman SILJANDER, also expresses our hope for the safe return of all the American hostages in Lebanon and just compensation for their suffering. In conclusion, the legislation calls for the proper punishment and retribution for the crimes and atrocities committed by the terrorists.

President Reagan must be commended for his swift actions to strengthen security at U.S. airports and aboard American carriers. Among the steps taken by the President which I strongly support are enhancing the Federal Air Marshals Program and new baggage security rules for checked and carry-on items.

International cooperation in combating terrorism is the foundation of a successful preventive security program. A concerted effort must be made throughout the civilized world to send international terrorists and their sponsors a clear message that we will never accede to them.●

SOVIET TECHNOLOGY AND HUMAN RIGHTS

HON. JOHN EDWARD PORTER

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, as cochairman of the congressional human rights caucus, I would like to call my colleagues' attention to an article from the Wall Street Journal, titled "Russian Campaign: Moscow's Bid To Close Its Technology Gap Will Test Gorbachev."

In this article, the author, Fredrick Kempe, discusses Soviet difficulties in dealing with the burgeoning computer industry. An initial fear of losing control of information left them far behind. With the ascent of Mikhail Gorbachev, however, a desire to catch up with the West has arisen among the top leaders.

Buying Western technology figures prominently in their plans to modernize. But, as the author notes, the Soviets are concerned with the negative impact their failure to live up to the Helsinki accords has had on trade relations. And they ought to be concerned. Our message to the Soviets must state that unless they grant their citizens basic human rights—including the right to emigrate and practice their religious beliefs—we will be less likely to assist them in any area, including technological innovation and growth.

The Soviets have recently been suffering from a decline in technological development, and they will continue to look to the United States to help support their continued economic growth. But until the Soviets make progress on the issue of respect for human rights, there is little hope that the United States will ever consider sharing important technological advancements.

At this point, I would like to submit the article for inclusion in the RECORD:

[From the Wall Street Journal, June 6, 1985]

MOSCOW'S BID TO CLOSE ITS TECHNOLOGY GAP WILL TEST GORBACHEV

(By Frederick Kempe)

VIENNA, AUSTRIA.—The computer's birth was the answer to Communist dreams: at last, a giant machine at party headquarters that could refine and guide Soviet central planners' commands.

Then the nightmares began. Entrepreneurs with blood new ideas, a suspect breed in Moscow, became the indispensable fonts of future technologies. Desktop computers replaced mainframe machines, raising questions about how the Soviets could continue to control information with so many potential printing presses around. For a long time, Soviet leaders wondered what to do, and in their wondering fell further behind. The military superpower was becoming a technological also-ran, and that frightened both army and industrial generals.

Now, under their new leader, Mikhail Gorbachev, the Soviets have conceded their inferiority and are combining a novel Western buying strategy with a crash internal development and educational program to try to close the gap.

A TOUGH RACE

"They have awakened to the fact that they have a major challenge on their hands," says Loren Graham of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. "It is the toughest race they have been in for a long time. The problem is that the terms of competition are against them. They want to have the economic efficiency of the computer without losing control of information."

CENTRAL COMMITTEE ADVICE

A trade group within the Communist Party's central committee recently advised Soviet trade organizations to reduce business with companies that too strictly abide by Western technology restrictions, says Paul Zieber of the Institute for Eastern Markets Research in Hamburg. He says that this isn't an edict and probably won't affect large companies but that it is a general suggestion to avoid such companies "where it is reasonable."

The Soviets are generally skeptical about relying on U.S. companies. Nevertheless, the U.S. and the Soviet Union recently agreed to make it easier to trade between the two countries, and the Politburo has called for a revival of detente. In addition, a U.S. Jewish leader says he was recently contacted by a Soviet diplomat for a meeting about "reducing tension." The Soviets believe Jewish-American unhappiness with greatly reduced Jewish emigration is a major impediment to better relations.

Another part of the Soviet technology campaign is ensuring that contracted Western deliveries won't be interrupted. The Soviets want to avoid another embargo like the one that followed their invasion of Afghanistan. Hence, they increasingly demand that contracts with Western companies include provisions for heavy fines for nonfulfillment of deliveries. During recent U.S.-Soviet trade talks, the Soviets expressly said they wanted guarantees that contracts signed by U.S. companies would be honored.

Moscow also appears to be offering the inducement of more turnkey projects. Such projects—in which the contractor assumes responsibility for all phases of the job—would be less likely to be cut off by Western companies, could provide the Soviets with their own manufacturing capability and would help Moscow overcome local inefficiency that has caused millions of dollars of Western equipment to be wasted.

ERODED CAPABILITY

The third focus of the Soviet campaign is promoting internal technology progress. Increasing numbers of Soviet experts are calling for fewer Western imports. They advocate better education and the establishment of more scientific centers at regional levels to more speedily implement Soviet research findings. According to Philip Hanson, a Soviet technology expert at England's Univeristy of Birmingham, many of these Russians believe that importing Western technology has led to a decline in domestic research and development capabilities.

Radio Moscow's North American service recently said that although 60% of world steel output is made by the continuous casting process, a method developed in the Soviet Union, the Soviets themselves haven't made full use of the technique because of the improper application of inventions.

Moscow also wants to channel more than one million personal computers into education and to retrain "the vast army of teachers and organizers," Pravda said recently. One of the Politburo's first acts under Mr. Gorbachev was to order high schools to start training students in the use of computers beginning next fall.

"We must build a program somewhat like the one we developed to eliminate illiteracy after the October Revolution," A.P. Alexandrov, the president of the Soviet Academy of Sciences, said recently. It is "a program that is probably no less important in today's world."

But the Soviets have much to undo. Statistics that indicate technological progress have declined in recent years, according to Ron Amann, the director of the Center for Russian and East European Studies at the University of Birmingham. The number of new patents registered has been falling, and a recent article in Pravda says that only a third of the new patents are ever used in the economy at all. Another important indicator, the number of prototypes of new machines being put into operation, has been declining for five years at an average annual rate of 1.5% to 2%.

The Soviets face practical barriers as well. The quality of their telephone lines is generally too poor for computer networking, and their centralized economy isn't organized to provide the spare parts or services that any new computer customer needs.

The country also lost 50,000 programmers and data processors between 1972 and 1982, a brain drain caused by emigration to the U.S. and Israel, according to Mr. Hanson, who talked to 20 Soviet programmers now living in the West.

Moreover, the information that can be fed into computers is substandard. Health planners don't have sufficient information about infant mortality. Social planners don't know enough about average life expectancy. And economists complain that even the country's grain output is a state secret.

At the core of the problem is the system itself. The Soviets have indicated they will stop short of selling computers to the public, the only way Western experts believe they can create the intellectual ferment that would prevent the technological gap from increasing. Official publications have said that the Soviets' personal computer, the Agat, is intended for rental instead of sale, a practice that would ensure strict control over who has the machines.

"Every single word processor is a potential printing press," says Mr. Graham of MIT. "The day they accept computers into society is the day they are going to give up censorship."

Soviet central authorities even debate the minutiae of the technological age, such as whether computer games have a role under communism. Academician A. Yershov warned in Pravda that the country must overcome "excessive fascination with games." But Valentin Mikhailovich Ponomaryov, the director of the Leningrad Computer Center, bubbled in a Soviet interview that "games are not the privilege of children alone" and that they "can take away the fatigue one gets from hard work."

SOVIET HOTEL ROOMS

Until the Soviets can sort out their approach at home, their priority is making purchases abroad. They have already made their buying intentions so clear that 26 Western computer and electronics firms have opened offices or are operating out of hotel rooms in the Soviet Union, and twice as many are believed to be waiting. They are partially responding to the easing of restrictions by Cocom, a 15-nation group, including Japan, that monitors members' exports to Communist countries. Since the change, members are allowed to sell the Communists smaller capacity personal computers.

One of the tantalizing carrots being dangled by Moscow is construction of an advanced microcomputer factory in the Soviet Union. During Mr. Gorbachev's visit to Britain in mid-December, Ivan Velikhov, the director of a Soviet electronics company, met with representatives of ICL and other British computer companies.

The U.S. Export Administration Act has prohibited the sale of computer factories to the Soviet Union since 1981, and Cocom regulations would prohibit the turnkey project without unanimous approval of all members. A West European diplomat believes the Soviets know this but approached several Western companies anyway, hoping to divide the West over controls if they couldn't get the plant.

During his visit to England, Mr. Gorbachev warned British businessmen that Washington is their common enemy. "The policy of embargoes and sanctions to which some people resort from time to time is, frankly, aimed not only against the socialist countries." he said. "It is also intended to weaken competitors, including some in Western Europe."

West European businessmen's complaints are increasing with each Soviet offer of contracts they can't fulfill. They say that they suffer in order to protect technologies that are available through non-Cocom countries, through unscrupulous companies or through countries that enforce the restrictions less strictly, such as Italy and Belgium.

"We are complying to an extent that really hurts," says Heinrich Vogel, the director of Cologne's Institute for Eastern and International Studies, which is sponsored by the West German government. "Many people are increasingly unhappy and fear that the U.S. is drifting into technology imperialism."

A West German executive says the Soviets took a new approach recently when he said he couldn't sell the high-tech energy-recovery gear Moscow wanted. "It is not interesting to me why you cannot sell. It is only of interest that you cannot sell," the businessman paraphrases a Soviet official as replying. The Soviet said he was confident he could find the equipment elsewhere, mentioned competing companies in Finland and Japan and suggested that the West German company's failure to deliver might cause it to lose less sensitive Soviet business.

WORRISOME STATISTICS

West Germans, the Soviets' largest Western trade partner, are particularly worried by statistics that show their exports to the Soviet Union fell by nearly 10% last year. At the same time, the Soviets increased trade with countries that don't have Cocom technology restraints. Austria's exports to the Soviet Union swelled by some 30%.

Concom technology-sale restrictions aren't the only factor in the trade decline, but West German officials fear the Soviets are increasingly picking the least risky supplier possible.

Mr. Vogel believes Soviet efforts to improve trade relations with Washington are aimed less at significantly increasing technology trade with the U.S. and more at removing U.S. barriers to the trade that Europe does with the Soviets.

"The lessons of the last 50 years," he says, "have led the Soviet Union to doubt how reliable a partner the U.S. will be even in the best political circumstances."●

THE EMPLOYEE STOCK OWNERSHIP PLAN IMPROVEMENTS ACT OF 1985

HON. EDWARD R. ROYBAL

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ROYBAL. Mr. Speaker, while much attention has been focused on hostile corporate takeover attempts in recent months, a particularly detrimental effect of this takeover mania has received little or no scrutiny by the Congress or the media. It involves the conversion of defined benefit pension plans into employee stock ownership plans [ESOP's] during or after hostile corporate takeover attempts.

This practice is part of a larger, accelerating trend among corporations terminating overfunded pension plans to recapture the excess assets remaining after a plan's liabilities have been satisfied. I introduced "The Plan Termination and Reversion Control Act of 1985"—H.R. 2701—on June 6 to protect employees and retirees from the adverse impact of these terminations. However, the particular dangers inherent in the conversion of pension plans into employee stock ownership plans in the context of hostile takeovers calls for additional legislation.

The problem in question has two principal forms. First, several employers have terminated their pension plans and used a replacement ESOP as a defensive tool to entrench management and fend off a hostile takeover attempt. Second, successful corporate takeovers have been followed by the termination of the target company's overfunded defined benefit pension plan and its replacement by an ESOP.

WHAT IS THE ROLE OF AN ESOP IN A HOSTILE TAKEOVER

ESOP's have become tools in boardroom acquisition strategies. They can be used as a poison pill to discourage hostile takeovers. Typically the corporation solicits proxies from its shareholders seeking to terminate its defined benefit pension plan, recapture excess assets from the terminated plan, and use the reversion of excess assets to buy back company stock and defeat the takeover attempt.

Since the employer will accumulate a large block of its own stock and will no longer have a defined benefit pension plan in place, a successor ESOP is usually created to serve as a reservoir for the repurchases stock and the principal retirement vehicle for workers. A large—if not controlling—block of stock is thus taken off the market—where it could be acquired by parties hostile to current management—and is instead placed in friendly hands, to be voted by plan trustees who are frequently corporate officers as well.

ESOP's are also becoming popular devices for companies which successfully complete a hostile acquisition of a target corporation. Many such takeovers are financed by the assumption of debt obligations. When the target corporation is acquired, some of its assets—or subsidiaries—may be sold to help pay off the debt assumed in the leveraged buy-out. In several recent cases, the target company's overfunded pension plan was terminated, and the reversion used to pay down the acquiring company's debt service.

As before, the target company's workers will now be without a pension plan, so a successor ESOP is often put in its place. Stock purchased during the takeover may be contributed to the plan. In many cases the ESOP uses a bank loan to purchase employer stock and the employer promises to make annual contributions to the plan to the ESOP can pay off the loan. In effect, the employer uses the ESOP as collateral to raise cash, with plan participants bearing the financial burden of the leverage.

HOW ARE WORKERS HARMED?

In both these cases employees and retirees are forced to suffer a loss of retirement income security so that management can manipulate the form of the company's pension arrangements to management's own advantage. Stocks purchased by or for an ESOP during a hostile takeover attempt are typically bought at substantially inflated prices, which usually decline immediately after the completion or failure of the takeover attempt. The loss of benefits and detrimental impact on worker's retirement income security can be severe.

Although ESOP's are regulated under the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 [ERISA], they were originally intended to encourage stock ownership, corporate participation and capital accumulation by employees. They are generally ill-suited to serve as an employee's sole retirement plan. An ESOP does not guarantee employees a specific benefit at retirement, as does a defined benefit plan. Nor is an ESOP funded by a diversified investment portfolio. ESOP's invest almost entirely in a single stock—the employer's—making workers extremely vulnerable to fluctuations in the stock's market price.

WHY IS CURRENT LAW INSUFFICIENT TO PROTECT WORKER INTERESTS?

Although the purchase of employer stock by an ESOP during a takeover battle represents a clear conflict in interest for plan trustees who are also corporate officials, judicial rules governing such fiduciary decisions are not uniform. Whether the adequate consideration paid for shares purchased by an ESOP may include a control premium—for a controlling block of shares—above their ordinary market trading price is a subject of controversy. Further, current law does not require full voting rights to be passed through to ESOP participants. If plan trustees who are also management officials retain the right to vote ESOP shares, employees are denied the ownership interests ESOP's were meant to create, and the employer can again take advantage of a clear conflict in interest.

HOW DO THE PROVISIONS OF THE BILL ADDRESS THIS ISSUE?

The bill I have introduced today would place the following four limits on the use of ESOP's during hostile takeover attempts:

First, the adoption of an ESOP would be subject to the vote of an absolute majority of employees in addition to any vote of shareholders;

Second, all benefits accrued by workers under the ESOP would have to vest immediately;

Third, voting rights for stock held by the ESOP would have to be passed through to employees, and any unallocated shares would have to be voted by plan trustees in the same proportion as those actually voted by employees; and Fourth, an ESOP could not be created within 1 year of the termination of a defined benefit pension plan whose participants were workers covered by the new ESOP.

IN CONCLUSION

I urge my colleagues to consider the merits of this legislation, whether or not they have examined the larger questions surrounding the epidemic of hostile takeover activity.

Defined benefit pension plans are being held hostage by corporations threatened with hostile takeovers. Afraid that corporate raiders will mount a successful takeover attempt and use a pension-to-ESOP conversion to help finance the acquisiton, many target companies are inflicting precisely the same harm on their workers by using a pension-to-ESOP conversion as an antitakeover tool.

The Congress must not allow pension plans to continue as pawns in corporate acquisition strategies, nor tolerate the misuse of ESOP's for management purposes. Absent congressional action we will witness the steady erosion of retirement income security for thousands of American workers, and forfeit the integrity of ESOP's as a means to encourage individual capital accumulation and employee ownership.●

GOVERNMENT'S STOCK IN CONRAIL

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, one of the issues that still must be resolved by the House and the Senate is the future of the Federal Government's 85 percent stock interest in Conrail.

A sale of Conrail would have massive implications for Pennsylvania's Eighth Congressional District, and for the entire Commonwealth.

While I respect Transportation Secretary Dole's recommendation on February 8, 1985, that Norfolk Southern Corp. be given the opportunity to purchase the Government's 85 percent share, I cannot support it. This week, I became a cosponsor of a bill introduced by my colleague, Mr. ECKART of Ohio, which would allow a group of investors organized by Morgan Stanley and Co. to purchase the Government's stock interest in Conrail and return it to the private sector as a viable, independent railroad through a series of public offerings.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the Morgan Stanley public ownership proposal offers a number of important advantages over Norfolk Southern's offer:

First, the Morgan Stanley proposal would provide a better financial return to taxpayers. This proposal exceeds the Norfolk Southern offer by approximately $600 million because of the elimination of the tax losses to the Government which would result from a sale to Norfolk Southern.

Second, the Morgan Stanley proposal will preserve rail competition. This is very important to the steel industry as evidenced by the endorsement of the proposal by the American Iron and Steel Institute. I am concerned that facilities such as United States Steel's Fairless Works in my district would be negatively affected by a sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern because less competition among railroads results in higher shipping costs.

Last, but certainly not least, the Morgan Stanley public sale proposal will provide better treatment for Conrail employees. I believe this proposal more adequately recognizes the significant sacrifices made by Conrail employees in returning the railroad to profitability. As I have already written to Transportation Secretary Dole on January 30, 1985, the disposition of the railroad raises significant economic issues for the region I represent. Philadelphia is the corporate headquarters for Conrail and my district is the home of a key switching yard which handles significant amounts of intermodal traffic. Many of my constituents work at these sites and the futures of these Conrail employees are terribly important to me and to the economy of my district. These employees have overwhelmingly expressed to me their support of the public sale proposal. Last week, members of the Railway Labor Executives' Association representing members of 19 rail labor unions endorsed the Morgan Stanley public sale option.

Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that a public offering of Conrail stock will leave the railroad in a questionable financial posture or recreate the situation which resulted in the bankruptcy of the Penn Central system. I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 2873, the Conrail Public Sale Act of 1985, and return the Federal Government's 85 percent share of stock to the public.

Mr. Speaker, I would like at this time to share with my colleagues the following editorial which appeared in the Bucks County Courier Times on May 17, 1985 on the subject of the Conrail sale.

[From the Bucks County Courier Times (Levittown, PA), May 17, 1985]

CONRAIL DEAL OFF TRACK

If the government truly wants to get out of the railroad business, it ought to get the most for its money.

Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole, with the backing of the Reagan administration, wants to sell Conrail, the government-subsidized freight rail line, to the Norfolk Southern Corp., a competing railroad operating out of Norfolk, Va.

Norfolk Southern is offering the government $1.2 billion for Conrail. Critics suggest that's not a fair asking price, but the Reagan administration continues to defend Mrs. Dole's choice. Thus far, the administration has done a poor job of defending that position.

From the Pennsylvania perspective, the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would result in the closing of Conrail's headquarters in Philadelphia, and in Blair County, the line's maintenance yard, triggering both a local loss of jobs and revenue. Furthermore, a Conrail-Norfolk Southern merger would virtually eliminate competition for freight rail business along the East Coast. That would drive smaller lines out of business and drive up freight rail rates.

Finally, the sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern would result in substantial tax advantages for the combined rail business, which would cost the United States government—and all taxpayers—even more money.

There is an alternative. That's the public sale of Conrail stock by Morgan Stanley & Co., a New York investment group. According to Morgan Stanley and its backers in Congress—including Conrail Chairman L. Stanley Crane and Sen. H. John Heinz, R-Pa.—the proposal would bring in $600 million more in revenues than the Norfolk Southern offer.

Without going into specifics, Mrs. Dole pooh-poohed Morgan Stanley's proposal as "not fundamentally different from some we have reviewed in the past." She went on to say that she thought the Norfolk Southern offer was still the best, though she did not say why.

According to Conrail's Crane, the Morgan Stanley proposal would have several advantages, including a continuation of fair competition for rail freight business, the most jobs and the best profit for the government.

What do Heinz and Crane know that the transportation secretary does not? Perhaps the question is best phrased the other way around. Obviously, the administration is bent on selling Conrail at a bargain-basement price to a rail line that is bound to take advantage of tax breaks to deprive the government of even more money.

If the administration can come up with a reason why it makes better business sense to lose $600 million, jobs and local revenue, now is the time. As matters now stand, the proposed sale of Conrail to Norfolk Southern ought to be derailed.●

A TRIBUTE TO OSCAR DE LA RENTA

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, much is said today about the problems of successfully mainstreaming Hispanics into the American way of life. We spend a great deal of time worrying about the high dropout rate of Hispanic students, about quality of education our children receive, about the health and housing of Hispanics, about our immigration problems and about under-representation of Hispanics in government.

The positive influence of Hispanics is not often brought to the forefront, and I think the time has come to point with pride to the many contributions Hispanics are making to American culture and business. The distinguished gentleman I stand to recognize today, Oscar de la Renta, is one example of the singular success stories Hispanics are creating for themselves in America.

When Mr. de la Renta left his home in the Dominican Republic 36 years ago, he planned to become an abstract painter. Instead, he discovered his talent for fashion design, and from the moment of that discovery started to build his extraordinarily successful career. After working in some of the most famous fashion houses of Europe, he came to the United States in 1963. Since that time, he has carved a truly unique niche in the industry as a leader of American fashion design. And although he has risen to the height of his profession, he has not forgotten the role of charity in the quality of life: He is the major patron of an orphanage for 270 children in Santa Domingo, Dominican Republic, and has recently taken into his own home a child found abandoned in the streets of that city.

Studies indicate that one cause for the high rate of high school dropouts among Hispanics is the lack of positive role models. Mr. de la Renta is among those all Hispanics can look to with pride as one who has seen the American dream and made it his own.

This year, during National Hispanic Heritage Week, Mr. de la Renta will participate in the first annual Hispanic Designers Fashion Show and Benefit, an event developed to spotlight the enormous influence Hispanic designers have in shaping the trends of the fashion industry. During that event, he will receive an award, not only for his outstanding achievements as a fashion leader, but for his place as a role model for all Hispanics.

Mr. Speaker, I am proud to add my voice in thanking Mr. de la Renta for his great contributions to the modern American culture.●

GOOD SAMARITANS MARVIN VERSCHURE AND BENJAMIN PAONI CITED FOR THEIR HEROISM

HON. GEORGE C. WORTLEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WORTLEY. Mr. Speaker, each new day brings something new, frequently the unexpected, sometimes opportunities to help another human being.

Last month, Monday, July 15, was a day three of my constituents will long remember.

In morning traffic, William Schultz of Lysander, NY, his seatbelt fastened, was driving east on U.S. Route 690 in his sturdy 1974 Volvo near the Jones Road exit when he braked to a stop in a construction area. Driving a large Buick behind Schultz was Marvin VerSchure of Baldwinsville, NY. As VerSchure approached a rise in the highway, he was unable to see the halted line of cars ahead. He slammed into the rear end of Schultz's Volvo, causing the Volvo to collide with the car in front of it.

Schultz's car burst into flames. Fire spread to VerSchure's car but he was able to escape and go to the aid of Schultz whose shirt and beard were afire.

A worker on the construction site, Benjamin Paoni of Canastota, NY, and VerSchure pulled Schultz, a big man who is six feet four and weighs 250 pounds and then in shock, from his burning car. The rescuers dragged Schultz away to safety from the burning wrecks, smothered the flames burning his clothing and beard and placed him on an embankment to await the arrival of medics.

Schultz sustained burns and a whiplash. The seatbelt probably saved him from suffering more serious injuries. He was treated in a hospital emergency room and released, and is recovering from his injuries.

He has no memory of his rescue and events immediately following his accident. But he will always remember the Good Samaritans who saved his life.

Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, August 17, during the forthcoming recess, I will have the privilege of participating in a ceremony to honor the two heroes, Marvin VerSchure and Benjamin Paoni. The ceremony is being sponsored by the Vietnam Veterans of America, Central New York Chapter 103, of which William Schultz is a member.

With pride, I commend the deeds of these brave constituents of mine to the attention of our colleagues in the Congress of the United States.●

WARREN BROOKES OUTLINES WHY INTEREST RATES ARE HIGHER THAN THEY NEED BE

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, this article by Warren Brookes is one of the best and most persuasive arguments for a fresh look at monetary policy as a key to the interest rate dilemma.

It is must reading for Members who question how interest rates can be so high when inflation is so low.

Mr. Speaker, we owe Mr. Brookes, a debt of gratitude for his lucid style and remarkable insights into this complex issue.

WHAT'S KEEPING THOSE INTEREST RATES HIGH?

(By Warren Brookes)

With inflation rates now at mid-1960s levels of 1-3 percent, Americans are entitled to wonder why mortgages are still at 12 percent, and consumer loans at 18-21 percent.

Or why it is that when the interest rates banks pay for money (certificates of deposit—CDs) have fallen nearly 35 percent in the last eight months, the average loan rates banks are charging have fallen less than 15 percent?

The answers to these thorny questions are at the heart of the chasmic rupture that finally broke into the open June 20, between Federal Reserve Chairman Paul Volcker and Reagan-appointed Vice Chairman Preston Martin.

Superficially, the dispute was over Mr. Martin's curious decision to "go public" with his support for "a new look" at the way we are now handling the international debt crisis, and, by inference, his gentle knocking of the present "crisis management" approach of Mr. Volcker and the International Monetary Fund.

But the dispute is more fundamental: Mr. Martin (along with most classic free-market economists) believes the money and banking system exist to serve the economy—while Mr. Volcker and the Fed bureaucracy believe the economy must be manipulated to preserve the soundness of the money and banking system.

One sees money as merely a medium of exchange, a purely technical instrument to improve the efficiency of the real market for goods and services—the other sees it as the fundamental lever by which the economy is to be controlled—by banks.

Mr. Martin knows from firsthand experience that under Paul Volcker the U.S. economy has been made more fully hostage to the banking system than at any time in its history. Just read the minutes of the Fed's 1984 Open Market Committee (FOMC) meetings, when the board deliberately pushed the economy back toward the brink of recession.

For example, back on Aug. 21, 1984, with the recovery already showing signs of serious faltering because of the Fed's excessive tightening, "some members continue[d] to view the risks mainly in the direction of more rapid expansion . . .," and they voted to keep interest rates high deliberately to hold the recovery down.

On October 2, 1984, with the economy demonstrably falling flat on its face, the FOMC worried that "appreciably lesser restraint [of credit] might well induce a sharp decline in interest rates . . . and an unsustainably strong rebound in economic activity."

The net result of this kind of secret economic policy-making by unelected and unaccountable central bankers has been a combination of excessively high real interest rates and an excessively strong dollar, whose unprecedented 67 percent rise under Mr. Volcker was at least in part engineered to help debtor-nations compete more favorably against U.S. producers, and pay off their bad debts to the big banks at the expense of U.S. workers and farmers.

It is no coincidence that the moment Mr. Martin chose to speak out, Mr. Volcker was in Tokyo where, under his leadership, the Group of 10 nations gave their ringing continued endorsement to the present floating rate exchange system. This system has been in existence since 1971-72 when the Nixon administration abandoned the Bretton Woods Agreement which had kept the world's money and banking system on a loose tether to gold since 1945.

That decision wiped out money's final connection to real goods and services through gold, and made it necessary for the Fed to attempt to give paper money the value it doesn't intrinsically have, by periodic bouts of scarcity and tight money recessions.

The overall effects of the 1970's worldwide drift to fiat money controlled by central banks were both disastrously obvious (soaring inflation and interest rates) and institutionally dangerous, as the power and focus of the world economy shifted from goods producers to money manipulators, i.e. central bankers.

No wonder that even as industrial productivity and profitability began to sputter, the paper profitability of the nation's and the world's banking systems began to soar, even in the midst of more and more problems of credit-worthiness.

The primary focus of the Fed is not, after all, the economy's health, but banking profitability. And with its ascendancy over the last 15 years, not only have interest rates soared to unprecedented levels but the "spread" between the rate at which banks borrow money from us and the rate at which they lend it rose 300 percent, from 80 basis points (0.8 percentage points) in the mid-1960s to 340 basis points (3.4 percentage points) in the 1980s.

As a result, the financial industry's share of total profits in the U.S. economy has increased nearly 30 percent, while at the same time, through the so-called deregulation of 1980, the Federal Reserve banking system's share of financial profits has tripled.

Last month, Citicorp, Manufacturers Hanover, and Mellon Bank reported huge first-half profit increases of 23 to 51 percent, when most major industrial firms (like IBM) were reporting declines.

This is why the greatest impediment to monetary reform, (making money subordinate to economic policy, instead of its governing instrument), is the Fed, and its big-bank members.●

THE FEDERAL COUNCIL ON THE AGING

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to amend the authority for the Federal Council on the Aging. This bill would restore prior law under which the entire membership of the Federal Council on the Aging was appointed by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate and, thereby, avoid a possible constitutional conflict over the appointment of the membership of this Council.

Since 1974, the Federal Council on the Aging has functioned as a 15-member body whose members serve staggered 3-year terms. The duties of the Council are to:

First, advise and assist the President on matters relating to the special needs of older Americans;

Second, review and evaluate, on a continuing basis, Federal policies regarding the aging and programs and other activities affecting the aging conducted or assisted by all Federal departments and agencies for the purpose of appraising their value and their impact on the lives of older Americans;

Third, serve as a spokesman on behalf of older Americans by making recommendations to the President, to the Secretary, the Commissioner, and to the Congress with respect to Federal policies regarding the aging and federally conducted or assisted programs and other activities relating to or affecting them;

Fourth, inform the public about the problems and needs of the aging by collecting and disseminating information, conducting or commissioning studies and publishing the results thereof, and by issuing publications and reports; and

Fifth, provide public forums for discussing and publicizing the problems and needs of the aging and obtaining information relating thereto by conducting public hearings, and by conducting or sponsoring conferences, workshops, and other such meetings.

The Council also submits reports to the President, who must transmit the reports to Congress with his comments and recommendations under section 204(f) of the Older Americans Act.

Section 204 of the Older Americans Act of 1984-(Public Law 98-459—however, changed the procedure for appointing members to the Council. The new procedure provides for the appointment of one-third of the Council membership by the President, one-third by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and one-third by the President pro tempore of the Senate. In addition, Senate confirmation is no longer required. I believe this new procedure may raise some difficult constitutional issues.

Upon signing the Older Americans Act Amendments of 1984 into law, President Reagan stated:

> But in signing this important piece of legislation, I must note my strong constitutional reservations regarding the provisions that give the President pro tempore of the Senate and Speaker of the House the power to appoint two-thirds of the members of the Federal Council on the Aging. Under this legislation, the Council clearly remains within the executive branch. Under the Constitution, therefore, members of the Council should not be appointed by officers of the Congress. And, accordingly, I strongly urge the Congress to enact legislation to repeal these new appointment provisions before June 5, 1985.

Pursuant to the terms of the Older Americans Act, the Council assists, gives advice and reports to the President. Such activities have been held by the courts to be purely executive functions, and thus should not appropriately be performed by persons appointed by officers of Congress. The appointment of members of the Council by officers of the Congress, therefore, may conflict with the Appointments Clause of the Constitution—article II, section 2.

It should be noted that one individual has been appointed to Council membership under the congressional appointment authorities contained in the 1984 amendments to the Older Americans Act. While the bill that I am introducing today would nullify that individual's appointment, I have been assured by the White House Congressional Liaison Office that the Council member in question will be reappointed by the President.

I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this measure that is designed to restore prior law under which the Council successfully operated for 10 years, and eliminate any questions as to the constitutionality of the methods of appointment of members to serve on this important body.●

THE UPWARD BOUND PROGRAM AT CASE WESTERN RESERVE UNIVERSITY

HON. LOUIS STOKES

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. STOKES. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues some information on the Upward Bound Program at Case Western Reserve University in Cleveland, OH.

The program at Case Western Reserve University is part of the Federal program funded through the U.S. Department of Education. For 20 years, Upward Bound, through academic instruction and counseling, has provided incentive and assistance to disadvantaged students who are interested in attending college. Students in the program are from low-income families. In many of the families, neither parent attended college. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, the Upward Bound Program gives its students the motivation and support they might need to succeed. Without reservation, the Upward Bound Program has been successful.

Mr. Speaker, the program at Case Western Reserve University has been a model program. Since the program was initiated at Case Western Reserve University in 1966, the college placement rate of Upward Bound students has been 100 percent. The college graduation rate of its alumni is 98 percent.

I am pleased, today, to salute the Upward Bound Program and particularly to honor the staff and students associated in the Upward Bound Program at Case Western Reserve University. At this time, I would like to insert for the RECORD an article which appeared in the Cleveland Plain Dealer on the Upward Bound Program at Case Western Reserve University.

TEENS BOUND TO SUCCEED—PROGRAM GIVES EXTRA PUSH TOWARD COLLEGE ADMISSIONS

(By John Alden)

Steve Waite, a 1985 graduate of John F. Kennedy High School and president of the Upward Bound Program at Case Western Reserve University, spoke with pride about where he would be going to college next year.

"That's right," he said, "Oberlin College, the first school to admit women and blacks in the country."

This truth seemed important to him, seemed to give his goals an indentity, give all his work in the Cleveland schools and Upward Bound a touch of gilt trim. You could see a seriousness in his eyes, hear it in his voice, and tell it even from where he was sitting, on a couch in a dormitory at CWRU.

While other Cleveland 17-year-olds were out looking for fun or trouble, Steve was sitting in a stuffy dormitory room, talking about Upward Bound, a program that has him working eight hours a day, five days a week, on his future. He is attending college-level classes in physics, chemistry and natural sciences in preparation for a career in medicine.

The program's purpose is to give Steve and other Cleveland-area pupils an extra push, an extra bit of preparation, to help them get into the colleges they want. He said the program had extended his education beyond what he could have learned in public school. He is ready for college, he said.

"I have concepts in college physics," he said, "and it's like wracking my brain, so I know I'll be ready."

Upward Bound is a federal program funded by the U.S. Department of Education to enrich the education of students who show promise and desire to go to college. The program, more than 20 years old, mandates that two-thirds of its students must come from low-income families and families where neither parent went to college. The remaining third of the students must meet one of the other of the requirements, but not necessarily both.

The program is one of the few in the country to specialize in health sciences. Carrie Johnson is director of the program at CWRU. She said the 118 students from grades 9 throught 12 from Cleveland, Warrensville Heights, East Cleveland and Shaker Heights represented the most serious, goal-oriented students in the area. They have to be, she said, because the program demands a lot.

"It's not for everybody," Johnson said. "It's for someone who wants to learn, one who wants to go to college and get an education. That kind of kid will go far here." Last year, more than 400 applied for only 38 openings in the program. Students must have at least a C average even to be considered.

The program has two parts, the summer program on the CWRU campus and the school-year program at each student's high school. The summer program began June 23 and will last until Aug. 2. During this time, the pupils live in Tippit House at CWRU, except on weekends. In the mornings, they attend classes just like college students. In the afternoons, Johnson said, most students have paid internships at the Cleveland Clinic, Rainbow Babies' and Children's Hospital, the Cleveland Veterans Hospital or other medical institutions near University Circle.

The students are graded for their classwork, take mid-term and final examinations and must carry at least a C average to remain in the program.

During the school year, the students participate in after-school tutoring and counseling four days a week.

In addition, every Saturday morning they take three hours of extra schoolwork at their high schools. Throughout the process, counselors are always available to help with students' academic, social and personal problems. The students also go on field trips and cultural events such as plays and concerts.

Teachers for the summer program are provided from various sources, including Cleveland public schools, CWRU and the Ohio College of Podiatric Medicine. The teachers instruct pupils at the grade level they will be entering in the fall.

Selina Louie, a ninth-grader at the Cleveland School of Science said, "When I go to school again in September, I'll feel stronger, because I'll have an introduction to what I want to take."

And it's that feeling of control Johnson said, that makes the pupils try harder, try to get that edge, try to see what's ahead of them and not just the vagaries of being a teen-ager in Cleveland. It gives them a sense of pride, a taste of success, a willingness to accept challenges.

You cannot argue with success. Since the program was inaugurated in 1966, it has had a college placement rate of 100 percent. And once there, 98 pecent of the alumni have graduated in four years.

"I have them believing," Johnson said, "and I believe it, too. They're a special group of people.●

A CONGRESSIONAL TRIBUTE TO DOROTHY AND ALLAN JONAS

HON. GLENN M. ANDERSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to two dear friends of mine, Dorothy and Allan Jonas, on the occasion of their 25th wedding anniversary. It is not ususual to celebrate a 25th anniversary, however, this anniversary is a celebration of true achievement.

Twenty-five years ago, these two people brought their families together, and united these two families have made a tremendous difference in the quality of the world in which we live. I must say that I am truly proud to know and be associated with these two giants for more than these 25 years.

Although no statement can adequately relate the remarkable achievements of these two people, I shall attempt to do just that. For purposes of clarity, I will describe their accomplishments separately. However, it must be understood that these two people have been equal partners and participants in each others activities.

A graduate of the Wharton School of Finance, and a torpedo officer in World War II, Allan Jonas moved to California in 1948. Allan has been a pioneer real estate developer, and he owns and operates his own company, Jonas & Associates, and is a general partner of Kibel, Jonas & Associates. He is a cofounder of the American Industrial Real Estate Association of Los Angeles, an organization designed to raise standards in that field. In addition to his tremendous achievements in business, Allan has taken the time to share his skills with young people. He created a course outline to assist young real estate specialists in the industrial area, which serves as the basis for a course at UCLA's Extension Program, for which he has served as both instructor and lecturer.

Although Allan's achievements in business are extremely impressive, his achievements in community and civic service have been extraordinary. For the past 30 years, Allan has devoted a great deal of time and expertise to civic and community entities. Allan's most devoted voluntary service has been with the American Cancer Society. He has served as the chairman of their national board of directors, as well as in a variety of other positions, traveling throughout the United States and the world working to seek a means to control cancer. In 1977, Allan toured the People's Republic of China at the request of its Government to exchange information with Chinese doctors and health officials on cancer research and tobacco abuse. Annually, the American Cancer Society presents the Allan K. Jonas Lifetime Achievement Award at its annual banquet to the civic leader who has demonstrated a commitment to the volunteer sector.

Allan's wife Dorothy has shared in all of their accomplishments. Through the years, in spite of her vast personal achievements, she has remained extremely humble. However, I should like to mention just a few of the activities in which her devoted work has enhanced the quality of many lives. Dorothy has worked with the League of Women Voters, and has served as chair of the California Commission on the Status of Women; president of the advisory board of the rape treatment center at Santa Monica Hospital; chair of the education fund of the Los Angeles NOW Chapter; and founder and coordinator of the Los Angeles Women's Leadership Network. This short list of activities is hardly sufficient to reflect the extraordinary achievements of this truly remarkable woman.

It is with great pride that my wife, Lee, joins me in this celebration and tribute to this unusual couple who have given so much to us all. Our wishes are that they will continue for many years to give each other the happiness and fulfillment that they have given to so many. We also wish their family—Tony, Janet, Andy, Sheila, Bonnie, Doug, Larry, Sandra, Michelle, Amanda, Heather, Melinda and Scott—all the best in the years ahead.●

CURRENT ISSUE OF ARMED FORCES

HON. ROBERT J. LAGOMARSINO

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LAGOMARSINO. Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article in the current issue of Armed Forces Journal which recounts the dramatic success of two former members of the Delta Force unit in helping to prevent the overthrow of President Suazo of Honduras. As you know, Delta Force is the Pentagon's elite counterterrorist unit. The two former Delta Force personnel played pivotal roles in uncovering the plot against President Suazo as well as uncovering the evidence on an international drug-trafficking ring operating to finance the overthrow plot. These two individuals, retired Army Col. Charles Beckwith and retired Army Maj. Charles D. Odorizzi deserve tremendous credit and praise for their courage and for the effectiveness of their operation:

[From Armed Forces Journal International/ August 1985]

TWO DELTA FORCE VETERANS LED FBI BUST OF ASSASSINATION/DRUG RING

(By Benjamin F. Schemmer)

Two former members of "Delta Force," the Pentagon's elite counterterrorist unit, played pivotal roles in an FBI undercover operation that thwarted a massive, drug-financed plot to assassinate the President of Honduras last fall and overthrow his government.

The operation resulted in the seizure of 660 pounds of pure cocaine worth about $96 million on the street. The drugs were to help finance the coup d'état and pay off the "hit team," which one of the Delta Force veterans, retired Army Maj. Charles D. Odorizzi, was recruited to lead.

The operation yielded the most convincing "hard evidence" the United States has yet obtained directly linking international terrorism and large-scale drug trafficking. Heretofore, the US has not been able to publicly demonstrate that connection persuasively or show hard evidence of it to foreign governments whose help it needs to interdict the flow of narcotics.

The second Delta Force member involved was retired Army Col. Charles A. Beckwith, who created the unit and led it on the 1980 Iranian hostage rescue attempt. Odorizzi was in the unit during its formative years and retired in 1979. Heretofore, Odorizzi and Beckwith had been identified by the FBI only as "a private citizen," in Odorizzi's case, and "an informer" who told FBI agents in July of 1984 that he had just been asked to assassinate the President of Honduras. The two have been partners in a Texas-based security consulting firm, S.A.S. of Texas, Ltd.

Beckwith's and Odorizzi's identities had been carefully protected until the Miami Herald revealed their roles on January 10th, the day after a 33-count indictment against the 10 conspirators was entered in U.S. District Court in Miami, where the assassination and coup d'état were planned. Odorizzi was identified in the indictment only as "Jack," described as a "private citizen" who assisted an FBI undercover agent and the Bureau "during the course of the investigation." The 27-page indictment noted that Odorizzi met with the drug dealers behind the assassination plot at least 13 times between July 21st, 1984, and the time they were arrested last November 1st. One of the Assistant U.S. Attorneys prosecuting the case, Michael Runowicz, told AFJ that Odorizzi enticed the plotters to meet him in hotel rooms or on a yacht where their conversations could be recorded by the FBI. He said there are videotapes of several of the more "colorful" meetings in which Odorizzi was "persuaded" top handle the assassination.

Asked more about Odorizzi's role in the case, Runowicz told AFJ, "Chuck was magnificent; he assisted in the investigation of this operation at tremendous personal sacrifice." Runowicz said Odorizzi "volunteered. There was no arrangement [for him to work as a] paid informer—no payment."

Odorizzi has been reimbursed for his out-of-pocket expenses and, since the arrests, has earned the standard federal fee of $30 a day for the times he has testified before grand juries. Stanley Marcus, the U.S. Attorney for the Southern District of Florida, presented Odorizzi a U.S. Attorney's "Outstanding Law Enforcement Officer" award on July 18th, even though Odorizzi is not a law enforcement officer.

In addition to 300 kilos of cocaine, DEA, FBI, Customs, and Coast Guard personnel seized "in excess of 40,000 pounds of marijuana" during the operation, hundreds of thousands of dollars in cash, two aircraft and two ships used to smuggle other shipments or that were to be used during the assassination and coup d'état. The defendants had arranged to supply Odorizzi and an FBI undercover agent, "Carlos," with "submachine guns with silencers," "infrared aiming devices," "night vision goggles," "explosives," "aircraft," and "any other weapons and vehicles necessary to carry out the assassination of President Robert Suazo-Cordova," according to the indictment.

Elected in November of 1981, Suazo is the first democratically elected leader of Honduras in more than a decade. He became President in January of 1982 and is generally considered the "US' staunchest ally" in Central America. The US informed Suazo of the assassination plot soon after Beckwith and Odorizzi contacted federal authorities.

A key figure in the conspiracy was former Honduran Chief of Staff Maj. Gen. José Bueso-Rosa. He was ousted in March of 1984 in a shake-up of Honduras' military hierarchy and, while the assassination and coup were being plotted, was posted as Honduras' military attaché in Chile. The United States has requested his extradition. Newspaper reports say the request has been denied, but Runowicz told AFJ there "has been no official word of that." Bueso is charged with traveling to Miami several times to meet with Odorizzi to plot his government's overthrow.

The five-month-long FBI undercover operation tracked drug shipments involved in the plot into Florida, Tennessee, and Louisiana from at least six countries—Colombia, Panama, Belize, Haiti, Honduras, and Mexico. The indictment charges the defendants with racketeering, attempt to murder, conspiracy, and a host of drug-trafficking offenses; the first two go to trial August 26th.

The roles played by Odorizzi and Beckwith were so tightly held until the Miami Herald story broke that, AFJ has learned, not even the most senior Members of the Senate Intelligence Committee were told how the FBI broke the case. Because of its international and intelligence implications, the Committee's chairman and cochairman would normally be briefed on such an operation.

Until now, Odorizzi and Beckwith have declined comment on the case. Beckwith told AFJ, "Odorizzi did all the work. He's the one who deserves the thanks—him and the FBI. He can tell you, [the FBI] ran a textbook operation." Odorizzi told AFJ that he'd "just as soon not say anything until the trials are over."●

DAY OF COMMEMORATION FOR SENATOR JOHN C. STENNIS

HON. WAYNE DOWDY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues a special day of commemoration for one of Mississippi's best known and most respected statesmen, Senator JOHN C. STEN-

NIS. On Saturday, August 3, the people of Senator STENNIS' hometown, DeKalb, MS, will host a day-long tribute to the Senator for his great service to Mississippi and to our Nation.

We in Mississippi have always been proud of Senator STENNIS for his distinguished and consistent leadership, his tenacity in the face of adversity, and his statesmanship in the Halls of the U.S. Congress. I personally have great admiration and regard for Senator STENNIS for his help and advice when I entered the public service. But we in Mississippi no longer have sole claim to the Senator. His long tenure and dedicated service to our country have made him equally special to citizens all across the Nation. He has been a trusted adviser to eight Presidents during his 38 years as a U.S. Senator. His work and outstanding career have gained him great respect and admiration from those who have served with him and those who have known him.

Yet, despite his many years in Washington, Senator STENNIS has never neglected nor forgotten his old friends and neighbors. He has always relied on them for support and advice. That his hometown neighbors are sponsoring this special day is a tribute to that fact.

On Saturday I will be in DeKalb, along with many of his friends and colleagues from around the country, to honor Senator JOHN C. STENNIS. I know my colleagues here join me in extending best wishes to this man who has served our Nation so well.●

A TRIBUTE TO CALVIN W. ROLARK

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, I rise today on behalf of Calvin W. Rolark, a constituent of the District of Columbia, who deserves to be recognized for his distinguished record of public service to our community.

Calvin W. Rolark is the founder and president of the United Black Fund [UBF], an organization that for 16 years has provided financial support to numerous educational, social, health, and community programs throughout the metropolitan area. Under his capable leadership, the UBF has met the needs of thousands of youth, senior citizens, disabled persons, and others with special needs.

Mr. Rolark is also the editor and publisher of the Washington Informer newspaper and hosts the radio talk show, "Sound-Off" on WYCB-AM. In addition, he serves on the Mayor's committee for the handicapped, the Anacostia Economic Development Corp., the Board of the District of Columbia Development Corp., and is cochairman of the police chief's advisory council.

On Saturday, August 10, 1985, at the Bible Way Church, the Shaw Community Center Food Committee will present Mr. Rolark with the "1985 Humanitarian of the Year" award at their annual prayer breakfast. It is an honor well deserved and one given to an individual who has dedicated his life to helping the poor and disadvantaged.

As a member of the Shaw Community Center Food Committee, I am pleased to salute Calvin W. Rolark for his many contributions to the Washington community.●

LEGISLATION TO AMEND SECTION 607 OF THE MERCHANT MARINE ACT OF 1936

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing legislation today to ensure that the Government's interest is protected when a change in control occurs in a U.S. corporation that has established a Capital Construction Fund [CCF] under the Merchant Marine Act of 1936. The chairman of the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee, WALTER JONES, and the ranking member of the committee, NORMAN LENT, join me in introducing this legislation.

The Capital Construction Fund was established in 1970 to promote the replacement and acquisition of U.S.-built vessels for the U.S. Merchant Marine. A company that contracts with the Government to set up a CCF deposits earnings into a tax-deferred CCF account. The money accumulated in the account must then be used to purchase U.S.-built vessels that are registered under the laws of the United States.

The legislation introduced today protects the Government's interest in seeing that the purposes of the CCF Program are not undermined when a corporate takeover occurs. As a tax-deferral program, the Government has a strong interest in ensuring that a CCF is used for the promotional purpose of replacing U.S. vessels and is not used as a source of readily available cash for a new management group.

This legislation requires the Secretary of Transportation to hold a hearing if the Secretary believes that the change in control of a corporation owning a CCF is contrary to the public interest. If, as a result of the hearing, the Secretary determines that the change in control is contrary to the public interest and will be used to loot the CCF, the Secretary may terminate the agreement. Moreover, even if the Secretary does terminate the agreement, if a nonqualified withdrawal—a withdrawal for purposes other than those qualified for tax deferral—occurs within 3 years after the takeover, another hearing shall be held to determine if the withdrawal is contrary to the public interest. If so, the CCF agreement must be terminated. When a CCF agreement is terminated by the Secretary, a penalty is imposed on the corporation. The penalty is a maximum of 50 percent of the withdrawal, net of taxes and interest imposed by other provisions of the CCF program.

I believe this legislation is necessary to deter targeting a corporation because it owns a valuable CCF account. At the present time a takeover of one of the U.S. largest and most profitable shipping companies is in progress. There is reason to suspect that a significant factor in this takeover attempt is the target corporation's CCF. A Government-sponsored and regulated promotional program should not act as an incentive to raid a corporation in order to drain its CCF account. Under this legislation, a full and fair hearing is required to protect the Government's interest in ensuring that the CCF Program is used for the proper purposes.

I believe that timely action on this legislation is necessary, and I urge my colleagues to join me and the cosponsors in supporting this legislation.

The text of the bill follows:

That section 607(i) of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936 (46 App. U.S.C. 1177(i)) is amended—

(1) by inserting "(1)" immediately before "Under";

(2) by redesignating paragraphs (1) and (2) as subparagraphs (A) and (B), respectively; and

(3) by adding at the end of the subsection the following:

"(2)(A) For purposes of this paragraph, the term 'control' means the power, directly or indirectly, to direct the management or policies of a corporation.

"(B) The existence of control of a corporation and of a change in control of a corporation that is contrary to the public interest is determined by the Secretary. The Secretary is not required to consider minimum stock ownership in making that determination. Any director of the corporation in office before a change in control may request that the Secretary implement the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph. The Secretary has sole discretion to implement subparagraph (C). Trusts or other similar arrangements established or used to circumvent the purposes of this section are part of a change in control that is contrary to the public interest.

"(C) Notwithstanding another law, if a change in control contrary to the public interest occurs after July 31, 1985 in a corporation that has entered into an agreement under this section, the Secretary shall hold a hearing on the record to determine if the change in control is consistent with the purposes of the agreement (as provided in subsection (a) of this section) or with the purposes of this Act. The provisions of title 5, United States Code apply to the hearing.

"(D) If the Secretary determines, as a result of the hearing, that the change in control is not consistent with the purpose of the agreement or with the purposes of this Act, the Secretary may terminate the agreement.

"(E) Notwithstanding the provisions of subparagraph (D) of this paragraph, if a nonqualified withdrawal under subsection (h) of this section is made or requested within three years after the date on which the change in control occurs, the Secretary shall hold a hearing under the provisions of subparagraph (C) of this paragraph.

"(F) If the Secretary determines, as a result of the hearing, that the nonqualified withdrawal is not consistent with the purpose of the agreement of with the purposes of this Act, the Secretary shall terminate the agreement.

"(G) If the Secretary terminates an agreement under subparagraphs (D) or (F) of this paragraph, a penalty of not more than 50 percent of the amount of the net nonqualified withdrawal after calculation of taxes and interest shall be imposed. This penalty is in addition to any taxes and interest that may otherwise be applicable under this section.".●

THE 20TH ANNIVERSARY OF VISTA

HON. AUGUSTUS F. HAWKINS

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HAWKINS. Mr. Speaker, throughout the United States there are over 2,400 volunteers working full time to help the poor help themselves. They are working in inner city ghettos, in rural Appalachia, in decaying neighborhoods and in isolated underserved areas of the United States. Quietly and without fanfare, they are finding jobs for underemployed and unemployed teenagers and single heads of households; they are recruiting and training hundreds of neighborhood residents to tutor illiterate adults; they are developing shelters for the homeless; and they are forming food pantries for the hungry.

Today's VISTA volunteers are not all cut from one mold. They come in all sizes and ages. Their backgrounds are as diverse as the communities to which they are assigned. Today's VISTA volunteer may be a welfare mother active in her community and willing to commit a year of her time and energy to help her peers. He or she may be a retired teacher or carpenter, looking for a new challenge. Or, he may be an unemployed factory worker who needs to make a career change. Today's VISTA volunteers usually serve in their home communities, where their knowledge of local needs and problems makes them especially valuable.

So VISTA has evolved over the last two decades. The program continues to serve poor people, but it also attracts as volunteers many poor people. A year of VISTA service at a local nonprofit organization can provide much needed work experience and training for an underprivileged individual. Many volunteers go on to paid staff positions at the nonprofit agency where they worked. Others find related jobs at social service agencies, where they can use the skills and expertise acquired in VISTA.

However, I am disturbed that neither VISTA or its parent agency, ACTION, is conducting any recruitment or public awareness efforts to attract persons with the broadest range of skills and experience to serve in the program. The current administration has limited opportunities for VISTA service to the local communities in which the applicant resides. In my view, ACTION's current policy is penalizing the poorest and neediest populations and denying many citizens the opportunity to serve the poor of this nation as VISTA volunteers.

So often, the poorest communities such as those in my district in south central Los Angeles are the least able to find individuals within the community who are willing to serve as VISTA volunteers and have the skills and resources essential to helping in the fight against poverty. These communities would greatly benefit from VISTA volunteers coming into the community from outside and working with local residents to find solutions to problems such as decaying neighborhoods, homelessness, unemployment, crime, drugs, inadequate health facilities, gang violence, dropouts and illiteracy.

Despite this administration's efforts to dismantle VISTA, the program has survived and has been an invaluable resource to the poor and disadvantaged. I am particularly impressed by VISTA's work in the fight against illiteracy. Experts estimate there are some 40 million Americans who are functional illiterates. Completing a job application, obtaining a driver's license, signing a rental lease, and many other routine tasks that we take for granted, are fraught with problems for the illiterate adult.

This year there are some 500 VISTA volunteers working in the area of literacy in 100 communities around the country. Through cooperative efforts with two national literacy organizations—Laubach Literacy and Literacy Volunteers of America—VISTA has made combating literacy a priority. According to Peter Waite, director of Laubach Literacy, "VISTA has been the single greatest resource to literacy programs over the last 10 years." Waite himself is a former VISTA volunteer.

But we still have a long way to go if we are to significantly impact on the myriad of problems facing America's poor. VISTA is national program, but its budget has been emasculated in recent years, leaving only enough money for 2,400 volunteers currently, compared with 5,000 in 1980.

Throughout the State of California the number of VISTA projects and volunteers has been slashed. In 1979, there were 250 VISTA volunteers assigned to 40 different projects in California. Today, there are only 15 projects and fewer than 80 volunteers. For instance, in the many migrant workers camps in California and around the country, where VISTA workers are desperately needed, there are only a handful of volunteers. VISTA is an invaluable resource, but it cannot begin to address the pressing needs of the poor in America with only 2,400 volunteers nationwide.

When President Lyndon Johnson launched the VISTA Program 20 years ago, he told the first group of new volunteers: "No aspect of the war on poverty will be more important than the work you do." His words are just as true today. As we honor VISTA and the more than 80,000 former VISTA volunteers let us pledge our continued support for the program.

We need VISTA's to provide the legal services so desperately needed by our elderly and indigent Americans. We need VISTA volunteers to help the growing number of "new poor" to become self-sufficient again. We need VISTA's to combat the tragic problem of infant mortality among the poor. We need VISTA's to find jobs for the millions of unemployed Americans.

Now, more than ever, we need the VISTA Program and the dedicated services its full-time volunteers provide. It costs only $7,600 to support one VISTA volunteer for 1 year. Let us allow this program to remain viable and to expand to meet the growing needs of our Nation's less fortunate citizens. It is a cost we can surely afford. It is a resource we cannot afford to lose.●

FAIR BANKING LEGISLATION

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I received a copy of a July 2, 1985, letter from Thomas C. Simons, CLU, chairman and chief executive officer of Capital Holding Corp. of Louisville, KY, which was sent to each member of the Kentucky delegation.

H.R. 20, the Financial Institutions Equity Act of 1985, is of great concern to Capital Holding Corp. Tom Simons contacted all of the U.S. Representatives from Kentucky, wanting to alert us to his concerns and opposition to the legislation.

I would like to share his July 2 letter to the Members of Congress from Kentucky. I urge my colleagues to consider his views. The letter follows:

CAPITAL HOLDING CORP.,
Louisville, KY, July 2, 1985.

Re: H.R. 20.

DEAR KENTUCKY DELEGATION: As Chairman of Capital Holding Corporation, I am writing to you to ask that you oppose H.R. 20, the recently reported "non-bank" bill, when this measure comes before the House.

As you know, Capital Holding is one of Kentucky's larger corporate citizens, employing about 2,800 people throughout this state. We seek to provide for the financial services needs of middle income America. In order to do so, we acquired a Savings and Loan and a Consumer Bank from Parker Pen Company in 1984. In our view, this bill could severely restrict our capacity to provide competitive financial services to our market, and I strongly urge you to oppose it when it comes up for a vote.

We oppose this bill for several reasons. First, because the public in general and the business community in particular were not given a fair opportunity to provide input to the legislative process. Second, the grandfather provision and the tandem operations (cross marketing) prohibitions can seriously limit our marketing operations which we believe will, in turn, be harmful to our consumers, our employees and our shareholders.

Basically, H.R. 20 tries to solve problems that do not exist and ignores the real and pressing problems facing the nation's financial institutions. I will not expand this letter to list all of our objections to H.R. 20. Rather, I am enclosing a brief analysis which highlights the bill's inherent faults.

It will take only five or six minutes to read our analysis to see why we are concerned. I ask that you do so, and then that you vote against H.R. 20. Your vote will not only help ensure Capital Holding's continued growth, but it will also be in the best interests of Kentucky's consumers.

If you have any questions or would like more information, please give me a call. With my very best wishes,

Sincerely,

THOMAS C. SIMONS, C.L.U.,
Chairman and Chief Executive Officer.●

ROOSEVELT WRITES ABOUT SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, on August 14 the Nation will celebrate the 50th anniversary of its Social Security program. As we contemplate this forthcoming event, it is appropriate that we review the conditions which impelled its enactment, and examine both its present status and its future.

Few Americans are as competent to provide that information as is former Congressman James Roosevelt, who was secretary to his father, President Franklin D. Roosevelt, and closely associated with him at about the time Social Security came into being. Mr. Roosevelt has written an inspired essay, which is being widely distributed for publication during the anniversary period. I would like at this point to insert the article into the RECORD and commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

SOCIAL SECURITY BANISHES FEAR: THE GREAT LEGACY OF FDR

(By James Roosevelt)

On August 14th we Americans join in observing the golden anniversary of our nation's great Social Security program. I look forward to that day with a real swelling of pride in my heart. My father regarded Social Security as one of the most important and far-reaching achievements of his Presidency. Fifty years of Social Security and twenty years of Medicare have allowed our nation to make great strides in rolling back the frontier of insecurity experienced by many of our nation's elderly.

Our celebration of the 50th anniversary of Social Security is a fitting occasion both to remember our past, and to renew our commitment for the future. There are few among us who cannot remember, either from first-hand experience or the accounts of family members and friends, the dire circumstances facing all our nation's people when the Social Security program was first conceived in the mid-1930's.

I was a young man just under 30 at the time, when this great nation was engulfed in the worst economic depression it has ever known. Nearly a third of our workers were in very desperate financial straits. Across this nation, people were extremely worried about their day-to-day security, and they were particularly worried about what would be their lot in life when they became old.

This we should keep foremost in our memories on the golden anniversary of Social Security—that virtually in the midst of a grave national economic crisis, the Social Security program laid the "cornerstone" for a new era in which millions of Americans would be able to live more decently, securely and independently than ever before in our country.

Today over 35 million Americans, young and old, receive retirement, disability or survivors benefits from Social Security. Today's Seniors are no longer as dependent on their children for financial support as they were fifty years ago. The Social Security cost-of-living adjustment (COLA) is credited with substantially reducing poverty among the nations's elderly and other vulnerable groups in society.

Over 118 million American workers now contribute to the system. The promise of a Social Security benefit in the future serves as the foundation upon which individuals and families across the nation plan for their long-term income security needs for themselves and their children.

To my mind, one of Social Security's greatest achievements to be honored this month is that it has actually kept its promise, month after month over five decades, to pay its beneficiaries. It is an amazing accomplishment that in these few decades since the Great Depression—when absolutely nothing in life was certain—older people as well as widows, survivors and the disabled now feel that their Social Security program can be counted on to pay benefits as a matter of rights, based on their past earnings and contributions.

The golden anniversary of Social Security is also a time to renew our commitment for the future. Today, Americans can look forward to a healthier and more prosperous retirement than at any other time in history. But it is up to us to preserve Social Security and Medicare so that these benefits may be enjoyed by our children and our grandchildren.

To preserve Social Security and Medicare for future generations we must reject misguided attempts to balance the budget with Social Security and Medicare savings. Well-meaning proposals to protect only the poor from Social Security and Medicare cuts would destroy public trust that these programs are fair and equitable.

Millions of Americans have made contributions into the system during their entire working lives. They believe that one day they would receive benefits in return which would be fair and stable. We must adequately finance Social Security and Medicare in the future to avoid new opportunities for those who would cut benefits or fundamentally change Social Security and Medicare.

Social Security has already been cut three times in the last nine years and Medicare three times since 1981. These recent short sighted attacks on Social Security and Medicare sometimes discourage me. But when I think of the past sacrifices of millions of Americans who built today's Social Security program, I know that we have to continue to fight against Social Security and Medicare benefits cuts. Working together, we will turn back those who would destroy Social Security and Medicare.

So we have much to be grateful for on this golden anniversary, and much work to commit ourselves to in the days ahead. On the 100th anniversary of Social Security in the year 2035, our grandchildren will thank us for what we do today.●

POLITICAL AND RELIGIOUS FREEDOM IN HAITI

HON. MICHAEL D. BARNES

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BARNES. Mr. Speaker, I am deeply concerned about the human rights situation in Haiti. Haiti is not only the poorest country in the hemisphere, it is a country in which political freedom is severely limited. During the last several years, U.S. aid programs to Haiti have been increasing. At the same time, however, many Members of Congress have been concerned that progress toward political reforms in Haiti have been extremely limited. In an effort to make clear congressional concern over the human rights situation in Haiti, when the House passed the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985 it made U.S. assistance to Haiti subject to an improvement on human and political rights. Yesterday, we sent that bill to the President and it makes U.S. aid dependent upon a determination by the President that the Government of Haiti is making progress toward improving the human rights situation in Haiti and progress toward implementing political reforms which are essential to the development of democracy in Haiti, such as progress toward the establishment of political parties, free elections, free labor unions, and freedom of the press.

Mr. Speaker, it has come to my attention that the Government of Haiti has just recently taken an action which brings into question its commitment to improving human and political rights. I have just received a copy of a protest issued by the Haitian Catholic Church. All seven of the bishops of the Episcopal Conference of Haiti issued a rare protest over the expulsion of three missionaries. In their statement, the bishops voice the concern that the Government of Haiti may be embarking upon an effort to persecute the Catholic Church. If these fears are realized, it will be an ominous sign for the future of freedom in Haiti.

So that all of my colleagues will have the opportunity to read the statement of the bishops of Haiti, I am enclosing the complete text in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The material follows:

PROTEST BY THE HAITIAN BISHOPS

The Episcopal Conference of Haiti raises the strongest protest against the expulsion of the three Belgian missionaries from the Missionhurst congregation: Fathers Hugo Triest, Director of Radio Soleil, Jan Hostens, the rector of Port-a-Racquettes (La Gonave) and Yvon Pollefeyt, the rector of Montrouis.

A communique dated July 24, 1985, released by the State Ministers of the Interior and National Defense, Justice, and the Minister of Cults, read over national television at 9:30 a.m., informed the public of the revocation of their residency permits. Father Hugo Triest had 24 hours to leave the national territory, and the others 48 hours.

The Episcopal Conference of Haiti affirms complete disaccord with the expedited procedure used and the total lack of dialogue with the people concerned: the religious superiors and bishops of Haiti.

On July 22, 1985, Father Hugo Triest was physically harassed by police on the street on the pretext that he had a car accident. Taken in a military manner to the Department of Traffic Control, he was humiliated and then released without having been informed of the reason for his arrest. The next day, ordered to the Department of the Interior, he excused himself for not being able to come because his superiors were not informed beforehand, according to the rules of canonical law.

Concerning Father Jan Hostens, accusations were brought against him in a letter of April 8, 1985, signed by the Minister of Cults. The local Ordinary met with Father Hostens twice: on April 30 and June 24, 1985. The priest had declared with proof that these accusations were pure inventions of the head of the local tax collection agency who is at the same time Chief of the Volunteers for National Security of Port-a-Racquettes. The local Ordinary gave the priest the usual recommendations for avoiding any conflict.

Father Yvon Pollefeyt was reproached for his homily of April 25, 1985 on the Feast of St. Marc. The local Ordinary, after having complaints formulated against him by the Minister of Cults, took the measures specified in the code of the canonical law. The Minister of Cults was informed; the case was considered closed.

A mixed commission, established between the Episcopal Conference of Haiti and the Haitian Chancellory—composed of 2 Bishops, the Minister of Cults, and another Minister appointed according to the subject in question—charged with overseeing the church-state relationship, was not called together to study the reasons for revoking the priests' residency permits and the accusations brought against them. All the inquiries of the Episcopal Conference of Haiti, and the interventions of the Holy See, were in vain.

We ask ourselves why these exceptional means were used? We ask ourselves, why the malicious editorials of Radio National and the noxious articles in the governmental daily paper against the Catholic Church, while the same media often expresses hope for good relations between the Church and the State.

Faced with this state of affairs, the Episcopal Conference of Haiti asks itself perplexedly if the Church of Haiti is not confronted with a situation of persecution. Faced with this, we invite the people of God to observe a day of fasting and prayer Friday, August 2, 1985, for the intentions of the Church of Haiti.

With the release of this note, the Episcopal Conference of Haiti has decided, in conformity with the spirit of liturgical renewal, that the rectors and parish administrators in all the dioceses of Haiti, will celebrate TE DEUM and thanksgiving mass and requiem only on such occasions: Independence Day, Agriculture and Labor Day, Flag and University Day, the anniversary of the death of Dessalines, the anniversary of the Battle of Vertieres, and the anniversary of the day of the President's inauguration.

Released at the headquarters of the Episcopal Conference of Haiti on the Feast of Saint Anne and Saint Joachim.

Signed: Monsignor Francois Gayot, Bishop of Cap-Haitien, President of the Episcopal Conference of Haiti; Monsignor Francois Wolf Ligonde, Archbishop of Port-au-Prince; Monsignor Claudius Angenor, Bishop of Les Cayes; Monsignor Frantz Colimon, Bishop of Port-de-Paix; Monsignor Emmanuel Constant, Bishop of Gonaives; Monsignor Willy Romelus, Bishop of Jeremie; and Monsignor Leonard Laroche, Bishop of Hinche.

N.B.—This note will be read in all the churches and chapels of Haiti on the Sunday following its reception. ●

SUMMER CAMP EMPLOYMENT

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, today, Mr. RUSSO, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. ARCHER, Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. COOPER, Mr. DAUB, Mr. DOWNEY, Mr. DUNCAN, Mr. GREGG, Mr. HEFTEL, Mr. JENKINS, Mr. MATSUI, Mr. MCGRATH, Mr. PICKLE, Mr. ROBERT C. SMITH (NH), Mrs. SNOWE, Mr. VANDER JAGT, and I are introducing a very simple measure to correct an inequity in the Federal Unemployment Compensation Tax Act [FUTA], while at the same time helping to reduce the high rate of youth unemployment throughout the Nation.

This bill would provide summer camps an exemption from paying the Federal unemployment compensation tax on the full-time students they employ—the majority of whom are camp counselors. Currently, tens of thousands of full-time students take temporary positions with camps during their summer vacations, and return to classes in the fall without qualifying for unemployment compensation benefits. Nonetheless, the camps which employ these young men and women are required to pay the full unemployment compensation tax for them.

With these considerations in mind, Congress in 1982 passed a temporary summer camp student employee FUTA exemption as part of the Tax Equity and Fiscal Responsibility Act [TEFRA]. The temporary exemption proved to be very successful. The American Camping Association, a national camping service and accreditation organization, last year completed a cost/benefit survey of the effect of the FUTA exemption during the 1983 summer season. This survey is of particular interest as it concluded that well over half of the estimated $1.7 million saved by the camps went right back into employing more summer youth counselors. The study also found that an additional $300,000 was used by camps to advance public service programs, such as providing scholarships to enable over 2,300 youngsters from low-income backgrounds to go to summer camp.

The bill we are introducing today provides for a permanent summer camp counselors exemption. A permanent exemption would bring the treatment of camps employing student counselors in line with the treatment under current law afforded other institutions similarly situated, such as schools employing full-time students, hospitals employing student nurses, and newspapers employing newspaper boys and girls.

Under current law, the existing exemptions involve full-time students, seasonal workers, educational activities, or some combination of these three. The exemption created by this bill meets all of these qualifications. By definition, the bill addresses only the employment of full-time students, on a temporary basis, by seasonal summer camps. Furthermore, almost all modern summer camps are in some respect educational as seen in programs such as Red Cross health and safety training, physical education, the arts, et cetera. In short, we feel that a particularly strong case can be made in support of the camp counselor exemption. This bill represents a modest yet positive improvement—in terms of both equity and effect—in the administration of the Federal Unemployment Compensation Tax Act, and I urge the full support of our colleagues for its passage and implementation.●

REGARDING SELLER FINANCING

HON. ROBERT T. MATSUI

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MATSUI. Mr. Speaker, for the past year and a half, I have been actively trying to achieve a fair and reasonable solution to the imputed interest issue. I have done so because thousands of homebuyers and sellers need legislative relief from the unintended effects of certain provisions of the 1984 Tax Act. Those provisions were never intended to apply to buyers and sellers of small properties such as homes, farms, and small businesses.

An interim law expired on June 30. We are now under the onerous provisions of the 1984 Tax Act. Seller financing of homes, farms, and other small properties will become increasingly confused, difficult, and near impossible under current law.

Congress promised a permanent solution by June 30. The House and Senate have passed bills. As a member of the Ways and Means Committee, I have taken a special interest in this legislation and have endeavored to enact reasonable and responsible legislation. We are very near final agreement. While the hour is late I hope we can reach a solution today. Our constituents expect the help we promised over a year ago.●

BILL INTRODUCED TO AMEND COPYRIGHT ACT OF 1976

HON. HOWARD L. BERMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BERMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill to amend the Copyright Act of 1976 in order to clarify the intent of Congress when it adopted the "derivative works exception" to the termination provisions of sections 203 and 304 of the Copyright Act.

I approach this matter with great seriousness. When Congress legislates in the area of copyright, we are exercising a responsibility explicitly charged to us by the Founding Fathers. Equally important, I well understand the years of painstaking effort and compromise that produced the landmark Copyright Act of 1976.

But it is for those very reasons that I introduce this legislation and urge its speedy consideration and passage by this body. For in January of this year, the Supreme Court in a closely divided 5-4 decision misconstrued the intent of Congress with respect to a key provision of the act, and thereby deprived authors, songwriters, and other creators of important benefits Congress meant them to have.

In the Supreme Court decision to which I refer, Mills Music, Inc. against Snyder, the Court interpreted the "derivative works exception" to the "termination of transfer and licenses" provision in section 304(c). Section 304 extended the duration of subsisting copyrights from 56 to 75 years, but also gave authors or certain of their heirs the right to terminate any of the author's grants of rights and to reclaim full copyright ownership during the 19-year extension of the term. In so doing, Congress determined that authors who struck unremunerative bargains with publishers when their works were in their infancy should have the opportunity to renegotiate their old contracts.

However, Congress crafted the derivative works exception to carve out a right of continued utilization of derivative works, such as motion pictures and sound recordings. The derivative works exception was designed, it is commonly agreed, to protect the owners of such derivative works from having to renegotiate their rights, and thereby to protect the public which, after all, has an interest in the continued enjoyment of the derivative works.

When an author or his heirs exercise this termination right, the copyright reverts from the publisher to the persons filing the termination, but the privilege of utilizing derivative works is retained by the producer, manufacturer, or distributor—as the case may be—of the derivative work. The question addressed by the Court in Mills Music was to whom the owners of the derivative work must pay royalties. The amount of royalties is not in question; that amount is provided for in their licenses. Five members of the Supreme Court held that the publisher was still entitled to its share of the royalties; four members strenuously dissented that such a conclusion would render meaningless the termination right granted by the 1976 act, and that instead, all royalties should go to the author or his heirs.

Justice White's dissent bears quoting because of its clear explanation of the policy questions at stake:

> The derivative works clause reflects an accommodation between two competing concerns: that of providing compensation to authors, and that of promoting public access to derivative works. The majority apparently concludes that its interpretation of the Exception does justice to both of these concerns. But to promote public access to existing derivative works, it is necessary to go no further than to allow the owners of these works to continue to disseminate them. The rights of middlemen to receive royalties under terminated grants do not enter into the balance; regardless of who receives the royalties, the owner of the derivative work may continue to pay the same rate, and public access to the work will be unimpeded.
> By going further than necessary to effect the goal of promoting access to the arts, the majority frustrates the congressional purpose of compensating authors who, when their works were in their infancy, struck unremunerative bargains * * *

Shortly after the Mills Music decision, no less an authority than Barbara Ringer, Register of Copyrights at the time of the drafting and enactment of the Copyright Act of 1976, voiced her dismay at the Mills Music decision. In testimony delivered in April of this year before the Senate Subcommittee on Patents, Copyrights and Trademarks, Ms. Ringer stated that "The Mills case is not what Congress intended, and * * * it represents a windfall for publishers at the expense of authors and their families." Pointing out that she drafted the provision in question, she asserts that "The Supreme Court decision seriously undercuts what Congress intended and deprives authors of benefits that are rightfully theirs."

Ms. Ringer also notes that the 1976 act contains a second provision that parallels section 304, namely, section 203 establishing that authors and their heirs may terminate grants made after January 1, 1978, at the end of a prescribed period of years, but subject to the identical "derivative works exception" construed by the Court in the Mills decision. She points out that "Unless the Supreme Court's ruling is changed by Congress, its impact will continue into the indefinite future."

The bill I introduce today addresses both section 304 and section 203. It clarifies the intent of Congress when it enacted the Copyright Act of 1976, and properly restores to the creators who enrich our cultural life the benefits we meant for them to have.

H.R.—

A bill to amend title 17, United States Code, to clarify the derivative works exception to the termination of a copyright grant

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

CLARIFICATION OF DERIVATIVE WORKS EXCEPTION TO TERMINATION OF COPYRIGHT GRANT

(a) SECTION 203 GRANT TERMINATION.—Section 203(b)(1) of title 17, United States Code (relating to effect of termination of transfers and licenses granted by author), is amended to read as follows:

"(1) A derivative work prepared under authority of the grant before its termination may, after the effective date of termination, continue to be utilized under the terms of the license or other contract which authorizes the use of such derivative work. After the effective date of termination, all rights to enforce the terms of any such license or other contract and to receive royalties or other monies from any such continued utilization shall become the property of, and such royalties or other monies shall be payable to, the person or persons in whom the reversion of rights are vested under this section. The privilege of continued utilization of a derivative work does not extend to the preparation after the termination of other derivative works based upon the copyrighted work covered by the terminated grant.".

(b) SECTION 304 GRANT TERMINATION.—Section 304(c)(6)(A) of such title (relating to termination of transfers and licenses covering extended renewal term) is amended to read as follows:

"(A) A derivative work prepared under authority of the grant before its termination may, after the effective date of termination, continue to be utilized under the terms of license or other contract which authorizes the use of such derivative work. After the effective date of termination, all rights to enforce the terms of any such license or other contract and to receive royalties or other monies from any such continued utilization shall become the property of, and such royalties or other monies shall be payable to, the person or persons in whom the reversion of rights are vested under this subsection. The privilege of continued utilization of a derivative work does not extend to the preparation after the termination of other derivative works based upon the copyrighted work covered by the terminated grant.".●

THE DISASTROUS BILINGUAL COUNCIL APPOINTEES

HON. HENRY B. GONZALEZ

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Speaker, together with nine of my colleagues, I am introducing a resolution expressing Congress' disapproval of the Secretary of Education's recent appointments to the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education.

Congress last year reauthorized and substantially revised the Bilingual Education Act of 1968 through enactment of Public Law 98-511. This law was developed on the basis of congressional hearings on the existing Bilingual Education Act and the educational needs of limited English proficient Americans.

Section 752 of Public Law 98-511 requires the Secretary of Education to appoint a 20-member National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education. The purpose of this Council is to advise the Secretary, the Congress, and the President with respect to the condition of bilingual education in the Nation. The Council also advises on the administration and the operation of programs assisted under the Bilingual Education Act as well as other Federal programs for persons of limited English proficiency.

Last week, the Secretary of Education formally announced the appointment of 19 members to the National Advisory and Coordinating Council.

At least three of the appointees including the Chairman are vocal critics of bilingual education and publicly oppose the very existence of the law under which they were appointed. The appointment of these three individuals, and quite possibly others, calls into question the Secretary's repeated denials of an intention to dismantle the Department of Education and programs to assist disadvantaged persons.

The individuals to which I refer are Dr. Anthony Torres, Howard Hurwitz, and Robert Rossier. Mr. Torres, who served as last year's Council Chairman, is the newly appointed Chair of this year's Council. During a recent presentation, Mr. Torres announced the direction of the Council: "Our thrust is to get the Federal Government out of education, I admit it. The Federal Government never should have been in education."

When an incredulous member of the audience asked Mr. Torres why he would accept appointment to the Council if he opposes Federal education programs, Mr. Torres responded: "I thought it was obvious; because I want to dismantle the program as it exists. My philosophy is, my belief system, is that the Federal Government should not be in the funding of education programs."

How can Mr. Torres provide objective advice to the Secretary of Education to President Reagan, or to us, the Congress, about bilingual education programs for limited English proficient Americans when he wants to abolish all Federal education programs?

Howard Hurwitz has also been named by the Secretary as a member of the new Advisory and Coordinating Council. As with Mr. Torres, Mr. Hurwitz served last year on the Advisory Council authorized under the prior law. In fact, Mr. Hurwitz is reputed to be the author of the Advisory Council's annual report to Congress and the President issued last March. This report inexplicably reached conclusions and recommendations contrary to the overwhelming weight of evidence gathered during the course of the Council's hearings and throughout years of experience in bilingual education programs.

For example, the report's authors ignored the copious evidence presented in testimony before the Council by recommending a reduction in funding for bilingual education programs notwithstanding that the testimony clearly revealed a significant growth in the population of students in need of bilingual education and the State directors of bilingual programs testified to the need for increased, not decreased, funding.

Oddly enough, Mr. Hurwitz recommends less Federal assistance for limited English proficient students, yet increased Federal per diem money for himself and his colleagues on the Advisory and Coordinating Council. Its second major recommendation was: "Increase funding for the National Advisory and Coordinating Council."

Mr. Hurwitz holds such extreme views that he even championed the retention of two recent Secretarial appointees whose ideas on educational opportunities for the handicapped were so radical that they were forced to resign following an unprecedented outcry of public and congressional concern.

Mr. Speaker, I refer to an article by Mr. Hurwitz published in the May 18, 1985, issue of Human Events. The article, "Critics of Aid to the Handicapped are Correct," admonishes the Secretary of Education for accepting the resignations of two newly appointed Education Department officials—Eileen Gardner and Lawrence Uzell—who embarrassed the Secretary by publicly expressing their hostility to helping handicapped students. Specifically, referring to Mr. Uzell, Mr. Hurwitz writes: "He opposes the fed program, along with about everything else that ED does because he believes along with me and the President (at least until 1985) that the Department of Education should be abolished. Bennett believed that, too; but it's hard to refuse so schmaltzy a job. Even I take a little per diem from ED, as an adviser on bilingual education. I advise that the program be abolished." It is hard to imagine a more synical comment.

Like Mr. Torres and Mr. Hurwitz, the third appointee, Robert Rossier, is an outspoken opponent of the entire concept of bilingual education.

In a June 14, 1985 Washington Times article, Mr. Rossier describes bilingual education as "the new Latin Hustle". Mr. Rossier states:

> The ethnic politician in many cases does not care whether bilingual instruction is a valid method of teaching English. In fact, it may be politically advantageous for him if immigrants continue to rely on their native language instead of perfecting their English; since dependence on the home language tends to isolate the group and make it more manipulable.

Quite clearly, Mr. Rossier brings insensitivity and disrespect to his position on the Council.

The appointment of Mr. Torres, Mr. Hurwitz, and Mr. Rossier to the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education clearly reflect an indefensible politicization in the Department of Education. These individuals who hold such hostile and extreme views on bilingual education have absolutely no place on a counsel whose purpose is to provide reasoned and objective advice to the Secretary, the President, and to us, the Members of Congress.

Ultimately, these individuals victimize the nearly 4 million children whose home language background are other than English and who are limited in the speaking, understanding, and writing skills in English needed to succeed in the English-medium school.

Mr. Chairman, in realizing the inevitable consequences of these politically-motivated appointees, we might consider the thoughts of George Beredy on the relationship between education policy and the national interest:

Education is a mirror held up against the fact of a people; nations may put on blustering shows of strength to conceal political weakness, erect grand facades to conceal shabby backyards and profess peace while secretly arming for conquest, but how they take care of their children tells unerringly who they are.

The recent appointments of Mr. Anthony Torres, Mr. Howard Hurwitz, and Mr. Robert Rossier demands our immediate attention and concern. They represent a destructive, cynical, and absurd political view. Worse, they seek more to disrupt and destroy education programs—precisely the opposite of congressional intent, and wholly contrary to the explicit purpose of the Council to which they have been named. The least Congress can do is express concern and disapproval, and on behalf of myself and my colleagues cosponsoring the resolution we are offering today, I urge the House to denounce these utterly indefensible appointments.●

TIBOR RUBIN NOMINATED FOR CONGRESSIONAL MEDAL OF HONOR

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, the Congressional Medal of Honor is the highest award of valor our great Nation can bestow. It is awarded for acts of courage above and beyond the call of duty. There are countless numbers of instances where American men have selfishly risked their lives and never received recognition for their heroism. But when such heroism is brought to our attention, we should not hestitate to honor it.

At the outbreak of the Korean Conflict, Tibor Rubin volunteered to serve his new found homeland. Rubin was born in Hungary and spent 14 months in a Nazi concentration camp during World War II. After the war he emigrated to the United States and began his studies to become a citizen.

During the Korean Conflict, Cpl. Tibor Rubin served his chosen country and his fellow soldiers well. In the field, Corporal Rubin distinguished himself with valor on more than one occasion. But it wasn't until he was wounded, and then captured by the North Korean forces, that his exemplary conduct earned him the undying respect of those who served with him. It was for his courage and his dedication to the United States and his fellow soldiers during his ordeal in a North Korean POW camp that I now nominate Tibor Rubin for the Congressional Medal of Honor.

Mr. Rubin spent 44 months as a prisoner of war in Korea. Though suffering innumerable indignities himself, Mr. Rubin assisted other prisoners—often risking his own life well beyond the normal call of duty. He attended wounded men by cleansing their wounds to keep infection down; he fed the men who were unable to feed themselves. Often Mr. Rubin has jeopardized his own life by stealing food from the North Koreans, not for himself, but for those who were too weak, too infirm, to care for themselves. Stealing food was a "capital crime" if caught. Upon his release from the prison camp he hid the names of the men who were not yet released in his leg cast. Had this list been discovered, his own release would have been forfeited and his life imperiled. Once back in the United States, at his own expense and initiative, he personally contacted the families of those on his list. In many instances he was giving many of them their first information of the whereabouts and condition of their loved ones.

His unselfish acts were witnessed by many and only recently have their eyewitness accounts come forward. Each man believed that Corporal Rubin had already been recognized by his country for his acts of courage. It wasn't until many years later, at a gathering of ex-POW's that Rubin's former comrades learned that his deeds had gone unnoticed by all but those fortunate enough to have served with him.

Tibor Rubin received his U.S. citizenship in 1953. He is proud to be an American, and proud that he could serve his country. Tibor Rubin, without a doubt, clearly distinguished himself with gallantry and uncommon valor, at the risk of his life well above and beyond the call of duty, not once but many times over. He never asked for anything in return; he never sought recognition.

For his selfless acts of valor and risking his life of his fellow man beyond the call of duty, I nominate Tibor Rubin for our highest award of valor—the Congressional Medal of Honor.●

SOCIAL SECURITY—PARTNERSHIP WITH TOMORROW

HON. WAYNE DOWDY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DOWDY of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, on August 14 we will commemorate the 50th anniversary of the signing of the Social Security Act. In signing that act, President Franklin Roosevelt made a commitment of economic support to America's workers and their families. It is a commitment that has been upheld over the years by successive Presidents and the U.S. Congress. It is a commitment that I am proud to be a part of.

The Social Security System has provided many men and women with needed economic protection that is now almost taken for granted. Today the program is strong and in good shape to continue its work into the future. It is fitting that the theme for the 50th anniversary is "Social Security—Partnership With Tomorrow."

There are also unsung heros of the Social Security System who should be recognized on this occasion. I am speaking of the many men and women who make sure that the system functions properly and effectively: The Social Security workers and administrators. Particularly, I would like to commend Mississippi's district manager, Marvin P. Tatum. Mr. Tatum has been an energetic and committed employee of the Social Security System. He has conducted himself in a manner that has won him praise and respect from those who have worked with him. In my own dealings with Mr. Tatum, I have admired the efficient and helpful way in which he has conducted the Social Security Program in Mississippi.

On this occasion of Social Security's 50th anniversary, I salute Mr. Tatum and the many men and women across this country who have served so well and have contributed so much to the Social Security System.●

SUPPLEMENTAL RETIREMENT BENEFITS

HON. BARBARA B. KENNELLY

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. KENNELLY. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to introduce, along with Mr. PICKLE and Mr. ARCHER, legislation which will strengthen the Nation's private pension system by making it easier for employers and employees to protect their pension benefits from being eroded by inflation. Our bill does this by permitting employers and employees to purchase, through their defined benefit plans, supplemental retirement benefits.

The problem our bill addresses is simple. Even a modest rate of inflation can have a serious impact on retirees whose pensions, although based on perhaps the final 3 years of pay, are normally fixed at a flat rate upon retirement. Having concluded that automatic inflation adjustments are too costly, many companies have attempted to address this erosion problem by granting periodic ad hoc pension benefit increases. However, such increases have been irregular, providing employees with little means of planning for their future economic security. Despite these problems, many companies and employees would like to see something done to protect the value of private pensions.

The legislation we are introducing today addresses this problem with a simple, voluntary solution. Basically, it permits employers and employees to jointly fund what we call supplemental retirement benefits through an employer's existing tax qualified pension plan or plans using employer contributions and employee accumulations in company savings-type programs (or defined contribution plans). More specifically, our bill allows:

Employer and employee cost sharing in providing supplemental retirement benefits;

An employer to condition its contribution for supplemental retirement benefits on the employee's agreement to share a portion of the cost;

Assurance that the employer's contribution to provide supplemental retirement benefits will not result in taxable income to the employee until benefits are received;

An employer to fund its contribution for supplemental retirement benefits over the employee's career through its established defined benefit pension plan; and,

Benefits to be subject to the joint and survivor protection of current law.

Virtually all of the recent tax reform proposals, including that of the Reagan administration, have recognized the need to encourage continuation of a sound private pension system. The supplemental retirement benefit proposal we are introducing does precisely that. It permits and encourages employers and employees to jointly look to the future and to devote company contributions and personal savings toward the purchase of inflation protection for their pensions.

Mr. Speaker, we believe this bill to be an important step in helping protect the real purchasing power of retirees living on private pensions, and hope it will be considered in this Congress.●

1985 CONGRESSIONAL CALL TO CONSCIENCE

HON. JAMES L. OBERSTAR

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. OBERSTAR. Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my indignation over the Soviet Union's systematic and blatant discrimination against and persecution of its Jewish citizens.

As a signatory of the Helsinki Accord's Final Act, signed 10 years ago this week, the Soviet Union has openly violated the spirit and intent of the accords time and time again. This disregard for human rights and fundamental freedoms has rightfully stirred outrage among this Congress and among all people who respect the theme of the Helsinki Final Act—to promote and protect a sense of dignity and equality among all citizens.

Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to join the 1985 Congressional Call to Conscience and I call my colleagues' attention to the plight of Vladimir Livshitz.

Vladimir Livshitz is a hardworking, honest man who seeks nothing more than to provide for himself and his family that which we take for granted—freedom. Living in Leningrad with his wife and two children, Mr. Livshitz filed his family's first visa application for emigration to join family members in Israel in September 1981. The Soviet Government rejected that application in December 1981.

Since that time, the family has been refused permission to emigrate at least four times. Mr. Livshitz, a scientist of economics and applied mathematics, lost his job when he first applied for a visa in 1981 and has since been threatened with the charge of parasitism, which can carry a sentence of 1 year in prison. When Mr. Livshitz was sent by Soviet authorities to another plant, he was predictably told that "there was no work for him." On another occasion, Mr. Livshitz was asked by the employer to "retract this request for a visa to emigrate"—obviously meant as a condition for employment.

In November 1983, deprived of the right to support his family and denied a visa to join them in Israel, he resorted to a 3-week hunger strike. This fast ended when Mr. Livshitz was given low-level menial employment.

Recent reports offer even more discouraging news of the Livshitz' plight and the Soviet Government's shame. Three letters sent by Mr. Livshitz to friends in the United States, England, and Israel were stopped by the Leningrad City Post Office, sent to Soviet Customs, and held there because they "contained material harmful to the State." When Vladimir Livshitz complained of censorship and interference with individual liberty, he was informed by the procurator's office that this confiscation was in accordance with Soviet law and, therefore, he had no legal recourse.

As a result, Vladimir Livshitz, a refusnik for 4 years, sent the following telegram to Mr. Mikhail Gorbachev:

Repressions, threats, acts of reprisal and a demonstrative censorship of my letters forced me to declare on April 22 a 20-day hunger strike as a sign of protest against censorship of private correspondence and against other forms of persecution directed against Jews wishing to repatriate to Israel.

Mr. Livshitz' home was raided on June 11, at which time papers and letters were confiscated. After hours of questioning, Mr. Livshitz and several other Jewish detainees were released, but remain under KGB surveillance. His phone was then disconnected, clearly as a reprisal for his protest against the illegal confiscation of his mail by postal authorities.

Sadly, the tale of Soviet oppression goes on. As recently as July 9, Mr. Livshitz was taken to a police station at the main post office in Leningrad for questioning. He was told a telephone conversation with a friend in the West had been monitored and recorded. Again, books and docments in his possession were confiscated and forwarded to the Jewish Affairs Department of the KGB.

Mr. Speaker, I am outraged at the treatment Vladimir Livshitz has received. As representatives of the greatest democratic body in the world and as citizens of a free nation, we must continue to speak out against such heinous violations of human rights by the Soviet Union. We must impress upon the Soviet Government our commitment to basic human rights guaranteed in the Final Act of the Helsinki accords.

I am moved by the strength and conviction of the Vladimir Livshitz family and I am thankful for this opportunity to pay tribute to their struggle and the struggle of hundreds of thousands of other families in the U.S.S.R. suffering similar plights.●

PRODIGAL TAXPAYER ACT OF 1985

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation that I believe will help eliminate tax evasion and reduce the budget deficit.

The Prodigal Taxpayer Act of 1985 provides for a 1-year, nationwide amnesty for taxpayers who have failed to file or report their income accurately for all tax years prior to 1985—except in certain cases. Under the provisions of the prodigal taxpayer bill, delinquent taxpayers would be granted immunity from civil/criminal penalties, provided they file a statement with the Treasury Department, agreeing to pay their back taxes plus any interest that has accrued.

Revenues generated from the amnesty would be earmarked for a special account that would be used exclusively to reduce the deficit—no money generated would be available for increased spending.

Tax amnesty programs have been tried in Massachusetts, Illinois, and my home State of California, with successful results. In California, for instance, $144 million was raised in a 3-month amnesty. I firmly believe that an amnesty at the Federal level would be a bonanza, and that there is no good reason not to try it, especially with $200 billion deficits.

It has been estimated that anywhere from $90 to $120 billion in revenue due the Government was not paid last year. If the reaction to the State amnesties is any guide, then a reasonable revenue figure for a 1-year Federal tax amnesty is in the neighborhood of $25 to $35 billion. Such a revenue windfall would undoubtedly go a long way toward making our job of reducing the deficit much easier. I urge my colleagues to support this bill.●

NATIONAL POW/MIA RECOGNITION DAY

HON. MARILYN LLOYD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. LLOYD. Mr. Speaker, I recently attended a ceremony in Chattanooga, TN, commemorating July 19 as "National POW/MIA Recognition Day." This eloquent ceremony, not unlike those held in countless cities nationwide, was attended by veterans, their families, the families and friends of servicemen still unaccounted for, and many distinguished officials.

This resolution underscores our Nation's debt to all those men and women who have served to defend our freedom. It also recognizes the unique sacrifice of the families of unaccounted for Americans, and our Nation's debt to these brave men, women, and children. "National POW/MIA Recognition Day" serves to increase public awareness in the United States and throughout the world that there remain over 2,478 Americans still unaccounted for in Indochina.

I believe as long as there is the slightest chance that even one American may still be held captive, as long as there is even one American whose whereabouts is still unaccounted for, then the Congress must continue to press for a complete resolution of this issue. We must remain involved in POW/MIA accountability until every case is resolved and every family is relieved of the anguish and pain of uncertainty about the fate of their loved ones. As a nation, we must stand behind our fighting men and women. We must also keep faith with them and their families. I, personally, will continue my efforts to see that an accounting is made.●

HON. WILLIAM J. HUGHES

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HUGHES. Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to join the very distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, Mr. RODINO, and other distinguished Members of the House, in a major bipartisan initiative to strengthen our law enforcement respone to violent crime and racketeering.

The polls show us that the No. 1 domestic concern of the American people is the problem of violent crime and drug trafficking.

It is time to ban the sale of machine guns and silencers, the basic tools of racketeers, drug traffickers, and professional killers,

It is time to effectively prevent criminals from buying handguns, the No. 1 weapon of street criminals in America.

The bill we are introducing today is a reasonable, modest and balanced approach to the problem of violent crime and reform of our Federal firearms laws.

In recent years we have seen a dramatic increase in the use of machine guns by drug traffickers and terrorists. We have seen waves of gangland murders and assassinations by contract killers who use silencers.

Machine guns and silencers do not have a sporting purpose. The machine gun, fitted with a silencer, is the weapon of choice for the "narcoterrorists" on the American scene, the cocaine cowboys of south Florida. A silencer is an essential tool of professional killers.

Despite the spread of machine guns throughout the underworld, the abuse of handguns causes more deaths in America than any other weapon. Roughly 10,000 Americans are killed by handgun wielding criminals every year.

We need a better method to keep handguns out of the hands of criminals. It is time to require a short waiting period for the purchase of handguns to prevent criminals from buying a handgun without any check at all. It's my longstanding position that the burden of fighting firearm related crime must be placed on the criminals, not on law abiding citizens. Last fall, as we put together the Comprehensive Crime Control Act of 1984, we made sure that it included a 5-year mandatory prison sentence for criminals who carry firearms in the commission of a violent crime. Of course no law is a panacea, and some criminals will always be able to buy guns illegally. This bill, however, will be an important aid to law enforcement, and will help to prevent crime.

There is no doubt that a short waiting period to check the available records could help reduce crime and prevent people with criminal records or with a dangerous mental illness from acquiring handguns, without any impact on sportsmen. In fact, even the National Rifle Association took such a position a few years ago.

This bill differs significantly from other firearm reform legislation because it is designed both to strengthen law enforcement and to significantly reduce the regulatory burden on the Nation's sportsmen and firearms dealers. For too long the effort to fight violent crime has been polarized. It is time to cool down the rhetoric and move ahead in a practical, balanced and reasonable way to fight crime.

The sportsmen in my district support effective law enforcement. They resent the bum rap they are tarred with when extreme measures that would destroy effective law enforcement are advanced in their name. My constituents support a reasonable waiting period for handgun purchases. They know that machine guns and silencers are not used by sportsmen. They know that weapons must be kept out of the hands of the racketeers and professional killers.

Today, we are reaching out to the Nation's sportsmen to join us in modernizing our firearms laws to prevent crime and to advance equity for lawful firearms users.

We are going to work with the millions of gunowners and firearms dealers who share our concerns about crime, and who don't want unfair regulatory penalties or unnecessary record keeping.

For effective crime fighting measures like this to pass Congress we need the support of citizens everywhere. We need support from the city and from the country, from gunowners and sportsmen, from all Americans who are tired of violent crime, who want to be left alone, and who are tired of seeing the debate about firearms go nowhere.

Almost every law enforcement officer in America, and Americans from all walks of life, have been revulsed by the recent movement of legislation that would undermine effective firearms law enforcement. This action has brought the question of firearms back to the top of the congressional agenda. I am pleased to join Chairman RODINO and my colleagues today in this watershed initiative. I urge my colleagues to join us in cosponsoring this bill.

This is not the time for a retreat in the fight against crime. This is not the time to focus on what we can do to make America safe again.

As Chairman of the Subcommittee on Crime, I want to assure my colleagues and the American people that soon after Congress returns from the Labor Day recess, the subcommittee will hold hearings on firearms legislation—on this bill, and on other pending measures, including the McClure-Volkmer bills. With responsible leadership, we can forge consensus legislation that will make American streets safer for everyone.

51-059 O-86-49 (Pt. 16)

SUMMARY AND SECTION BY SECTION ANALYSIS

Racketeer Weapons and Violent Crime Control Act of 1985

SUMMARY

This bill significantly strengthens the Gun Control Act in three major areas, makes a number of other modernizations in the act and provides regulatory relief to the firearms owners and dealers in a number of areas.

First, it requires a 15-day waiting period to provide a record check of prospective handgun purchasers to determine if there is a criminal conviction, adjudication of mental incompetence or other disqualifying circumstance.

Second, it prohibits the transfer and possession of machine guns used by racketeers and drug traffickers to intimidation, murder and protection of drugs and the proceeds of crime.

Third, it prohibits the transfer and possession of silencers used in assassinations and contract murders.

Fourth, the bill eliminates a loophole in the licensing of firearms dealers by allowing the Secretary to consider whether applicable State law would bar a prospective licensee from any conduct required to carry out the business of the Federal licensee.

Fifth, the bill closes a number of loopholes concerning possession of firearms by illegal users of drugs.

Sixth, the bill also provides a number of "regulatory reforms" that the NRA and the Nation's gun owners, sportsmen, and licensed firearms dealers have long desired which will not compromise BATF's law enforcement capabilities.

(a) The bill allows licensed dealers to sell firearms at gunshows.

(b) It eliminates record keeping requirements for the sale of ammunition, except for large quantities, and eliminates record keeping requirements for transfers of curios between licensed collectors.

(c) It provides the Secretary, in cases of violations of the regulations of the GCA an alternative penalty, license suspension, as alternative to the only penalty currently available, license revocation.

(d) The bill expands the class of persons eligible to obtain relief from the disabilities imposed under the Act who have been convicted of a crime or who having once been mentally incompetent, have subsequently been adjudicated as restored to mental competence.

The bill also raises the annual license fees of licensed dealers, pawnbrokers, manufacturers and importers from $10, $25, $50 and $50 per year, respectively, to $200 per year.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1 is the short title.

CRIMINAL RECORDS CHECK

Section 2 creates a waiting period of up to 15 days for a record check before a handgun purchaser is able to obtain possession of the handgun.

The record check is based on a sworn statement made by the prospective handgun purchaser on a form at the initiation of the purchase.

The licensee is required to mail the form to the "chief law enforcement officer" of the place of residence of the purchaser notifying the chief of the transaction, requesting the chief to confirm the address of the transferee, and requesting the chief to examine State and local official records of criminal convictions and adjudications of mental incompetency, readily available to such officer, and to report to the licensee whether any such records show any conviction or adjudication for the transferee.

The licensee is also required to mail the form to the FBI which shall examine Federal official records which may reveal any circumstance making illegal the receipt or possession of the handgun by the transferee and report to the licensee whether such records show any such circumstance.

The licensee may transfer the handgun as soon as he receives replies from the police chief and the FBI that they have no record of circumstances which would disqualify the prospective purchaser. If 15 days elapse and reports have not been received, the licensee may transfer the handgun. However, if at any time before delivery the licensee has received the reports and received information from the police chief or the FBI that receipt or possession by the transferee would be in violation of the law, the licensee may not transfer possession of the handgun. If, after transferring the handgun, the licensee receives the reports and they contain information that would disqualify the purchaser from legally purchasing the firearm, the licensee is required to notify the police immediately.

MACHINE GUNS

Section 3 prohibits the transfer and possession of machine guns.

The bill allows possessers of lawfully registered machine guns to continue their legal possession.

The bill enables a person to dispose of an unwanted legally registered machine gun by permitting the Secretary to buy a machine gun from such person.

SILENCERS

Section 4 prohibits the transfer and possession of silencers in the same manner as machine guns.

PREMISES OF SALE

Section 5 amends the GCA provisions permitting the sale of a firearm to a person who does not appear in person at the licensee's business premises to permit sale in person at a gun show (the premises of an organized event, open to the public, the principal purpose of which is the display, sale or trade of firearms and related items) in the state in which the licensee's business premises are located.

LICENSEES

Section 6. Subsection (a) aids law enforcement by broadening the circumstances to be reviewed by the Secretary in approving applications for a license under the GCA. Currently applicants for a license cannot be prohibited from transporting, shipping, or receiving firearms or ammunition under Federal law. The bill adds a requirement that applicants not be "prohibited by applicable State law from engaging in conduct necessarily incident to business subject to license" under the GCA (such as receiving or possessing firearms).

Subsection (b) would benefit the GCA licensees, It gives the Secretary an alternative sanction for violations of the GCA by licensees. It would allow the Secretary to suspend a license as an alternative to the sole penalty now available of revocation of the license. Revocation would remain an available sanction where appropriate.

RECORDKEEPING

Section 7 benefits GCA licensees. It would eliminate record-keeping requirements by licensed collectors with respect to transfers of curios to other licensed collectors.

This section would also eliminate record keeping in the sale of ammunition in quantities of less than 1,000 rounds. This would eliminate an enormous quantity of record keeping now required of licensed dealers which serves no law enforcement purpose.

RELIEF FROM DISABILITIES

Section 8 contains further benefits for the gun using public.

Subsection (a) contains two important reforms in the provisions of the GCA providing relief from its legal disabilities.

First, while the current law provides persons who have been convicted of a felony with the opportunity to apply to the Secretary for relief from the disabilities imposed by Federal law with respect to acquisition, receipt, transfer, shipment, or possession of firearms, current law denies that opportunity to persons who violated the GCA or the National Firearms Act. Many of the offenses under those acts are of an administrative nature. This subsection eliminates that limitation.

Second, the subsection recognizes that in the evolution of State law there are often provisions expunging criminal convictions for conduct that is no longer deemed criminal or felonious. The subsection directs the Secretary to make an annual review of State laws regarding expungement, and the elimination of disabilities arising from such convictions. The Secretary is then empowered, if consistent with the purposes of the GCA, to declare that each person obtaining relief under such State law is relieved from disability under Federal law.

Subsection (b) provides an opportunity to lawfully receive and possess firearms for a person who, having been adjudicated as mentally incompetent, has been subsequently adjudicated as restored to mental competency, if the court specifically finds that the possession of a firearm by the individual would not pose a danger to the individual or to the safety of the community. Such persons shall be relieved from the disabilities of the GCA incurred because of the original adjudication of mental incompetence.

LICENSE FEES

Section 9 raises the annual license fee for licensed firearms dealers, pawnbrokers, importers and manufacturers from $10.00, $25.00, $50.00 and $50.00 respectively, per year to $200.00 per year.

Subsection (b) would create a fund from the license fees received under the GCA to be used for "grants . . . to State and local governmental agencies for the purposes of providing assistance in enforcing this chapter or the operation of firearm safety programs operated under State or local law."

RECEIPT OF FIREARMS BY DRUG ADDICTS

Section 10 replaces and modernizes the prohibition on receiving firearms or ammuniton by a person "who is an unlawful user of or addicted to marihuana or any depressant or stimulant drug (as defined in section 201(v) of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act) or narcotic drug (as defined in section 4731(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954)" by substituting "who is an unlawful user of or addicted to a controlled substance as defined in the Controlled Substances Act".

Current law does not include hallucinogenic drugs that were controlled by the Controlled Substances Act, PCP, various tranquilizers, designer drugs or other substances that are added to the schedules of controlled substances by administrative action.

Section 11 contains the effective dates for the various sections.●

AT LONG LAST, A BREAKTHROUGH ON WATER PROJECTS

HON. RON WYDEN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate and express my admiration and appreciation for the key members of the Public Works and Appropriations Committees who—literally overnight—were able to roll up their sleeves and hammer out an acceptable compromise on the funding of critically needed port and waterway development projects in the supplemental appropriations bill.

Congratulations are also clearly in order for Senator HATFIELD, chairman of the Senate Appropriations Committee, who has worked tirelessly for months to devise a cost-sharing arrangement acceptable to the administration and Budget Director Stockman—and one that local sponsors and waterway users could live with. Senator HATFIELD then spent many more hours convincing his colleagues in the Senate and colleagues on the supplemental appropriations conference committee to support the essence of this agreement.

Thanks to the tireless efforts of these distinguished Members of both bodies—and their willingness to compromise local and institutional concerns in the interest of economic development, jobs and new trade opportunities—we can finally start work on essential infrastructure development and modernization projects in many areas of this country. These include the Pacific Northwest, where—at long last—work can begin on a replacement of the antiquated lock at the Bonneville Dam on the Columbia River. Replacement and modernization of this lock is absolutely essential to our efforts in the Northwest to increase our stature as an international trade center and generate more economic growth. That's why I've introduced legislation in each of the last three Congresses to authorize a new lock—and that's why I'm so delighted that the logjam on this and other needed projects has finally been broken and construction can soon begin.

Finally, I want to reiterate my pledge to Chairman ROE—who, as usual, was a pleasure to work with—to do whatever I can to help him pass a comprehensive omnibus water resources bill this year. Today's developments are a critical step—but are far from being the final step—in our efforts in the Congress to ensure that the Federal Government plays a responsible role in contributing to this Nation's infrastructure development needs. We must continue the journey we started today.●

THE HISTORIC REHABILITATION TAX CREDIT ACT

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, the U.S. tax system has, by nearly unanimous agreement, accumulated many inefficient and unfair programs over the years. There is, however, one program which has enjoyed bipartisan support for its effectiveness. That program is the Historic Rehabilitation Tax Credit Act.

The Historic Rehabilitation Tax Credit Act provides for a 25-percent investment credit for the rehabilitation of a commercial or residential building listed in the National Register of Historic Places or located within a historic district. President Reagan, in his latest tax reform package, now proposes to eliminate the rehabilitation credits despite the unqualified success with which their application has been met.

As a measure of their effectiveness, consider the following:

Directly attributable to the incentive created by the rehabilitation credits in the 3 years following its enactment are the creation of 180,000 new jobs, a $4 billion increase in wages in local economies, and nearly $5½ billion in increased local retail sales and business activity.

Furthermore, the historic rehabilitation tax credit has contributed to the revitalization of countless communities which otherwise would have languished, unproductive and decaying.

According to the National Trust for Historic Preservation, 36,000 housing units have been rehabilitated since the tax credits were first enacted.

In my own district, in Bristol Borough, the waterfront area is the focus of a planned rehabilitation effort which promises to bring new life to an area which clearly has great potential but which needs a boost to successfully compete in today's real estate markets where profit maximizing investors are more inclined to finance the new and the modern.

The historic rehabilitation tax credit gives Bristol Borough just such a boost. Without it the waterfront would remain underutilized and underproductive.

And the the Bristol Borough waterfront is only one of thousands of similar sites around the Nation whose best, most realistic hope for recovery lies with the historic rehabilitation tax credits.

Among the proponents of the credits are the mayors of many of our Nation's largest cities. In June of this year the U.S. Conference of Mayors formally recommended to Congress that the rehabilitation tax credits be retained.

Ironically, just last fall, President Reagan himself hailed the rehabilitation credits for making the "preservation of our older buildings not only a matter of respect for beauty and history, but also of good economic sense."

Mr. Speaker, while I wholeheartedly believe that reform of our tax system is necessary and prudent, I believe that it is incumbent upon Congress to make sure that the reform itself is also prudent. The historic rehabilitation tax credits have proven their effectiveness and should be retained.●

S. 1147, THE ORPHAN DRUG AMENDMENTS OF 1985

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed S. 1147, the Orphan Drug Amendments of 1985, and sent the bill to the President for his signature. During our consideration of the bill, I failed to explain the significance of one of the sections of the bill.

Section 3 of S. 1147 concerns orphan drugs that are antibiotics. The amendments made by the section are technical in nature and were included in both the House-passed bill, H.R. 2290, and the Senate bill. They clarify the authority of the Food and Drug Administration [FDA] under the Orphan Drug Act of designate antibiotics as orphan drugs and to offer to the manufacturers of those antibiotics all the benefits of the act.

The technical changes in section 3 are necessary because the original drafting of the Orphan Drug Act made specific references to biologics approved under section 351 of the Public Health Service Act and to drugs approved under section 505 of the Federal Food, Drug, and Cosmetic Act. Unfortunately, these references left some confusion about coverage of antibiotics. There is no doubt that Congress intended for the original Orphan Drug Act to cover all drugs for rare diseases and conditions, regardless of whether the drugs are biologics, antibiotics, or other drugs. The goal of the act is to make effective products for rare diseases and conditions available to the public.

Section 3 will clarify for the FDA that it has followed congressional intent by covering antibiotics in implementing the act.●

LOUIS O. (JEFF) GIUFFRIDA

HON. LINDY (MRS. HALE) BOGGS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. BOGGS. Mr. Speaker, since 1981, Louis O. "Jeff" Giuffrida has served the Nation as the Director of the Federal Emergency Management Agency [FEMA]. His stewardship has been marked with several substantial improvements in the operations of this important agency. As of September 1, 1985, Jeff will leave FEMA and I think his decision to resign provides an opportunity to look at the positive results that have ensued from his work.

When Director Giuffrida came to FEMA, it was in its fledgling state. Its functions were scattered over many different sites. It had problems, as any new agency does and these were compounded by lack of coordination between many divergent views and different responsibilities and disciplines. During his tenure great progress has been made in several areas. The very first thing that Jeff set out to do was to have a baseline audit done by the GAO to provide guidance in addressing the challenges of understaffing and underfunding. He has put the FEMA house in order, has housed FEMA in one location and has led the Agency with very positive results in many areas.

Because the district I represent is often besieged by natural disasters, I have been especially interested in the emergency response to disasters. I have been extraordinarily pleased, not only with the kind of responses that have been put into effect, but also with the training capabilities that have been initiated. In short, through tireless service, Director Giuffrida has succeeded in making FEMA a viable and responsible member of the community of Federal agencies. I am most appreciative of his success and extend my personal thanks for his commitment, dedication, and hard work. Best wishes to him and his family in all their future endeavors.●

CSCE IN RETROSPECT

HON. ROBERT GARCIA

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GARCIA. Mr. Speaker, today marks the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Final Act on the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe [CSCE], more commonly known as the Helsinki accords.

The success of the Final Act cannot be measured by traditional criteria. It is not a formal treaty; it is a statement of principles intended to facilitate East-West cooperation. It is also a by-product of détente, but its purpose goes beyond that much maligned description of United States-Soviet relations in the seventies. The Helsinki accords have forced Soviet and Eastern European governments to recognize a Western interpretation of human rights. They have also offered hope to the people of those nations. Yet, even this glimmer of hope was not achieved without exacting a significant cost both from the West and from Eastern bloc dissidents.

One of the costs was Western acceptance of present Eastern European borders, as well as providing the Soviets with an arena in which to call for European disarmament and more open trade. Initially characterized by its critics as a "sellout" to the Soviets, the successes and failures of the Final Act have largely been a reflection of the fluctuations of East-West relations.

Prior to the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, the accords could be viewed as playing a role in the liberalization of the Soviet Government's attitude toward dissent. Conditions became even worse after 1979 and the freezing of United States-Soviet relations. Nonetheless, a welcome side effect of the accords was the spawning of human rights organizations in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Groups such as Charter 77 in Czechoslovakia and Solidarity in Poland look to the Final Act as a source of inspiration.

Unfortunately, many of the individuals who took up the banner of the Final Act in Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union have been made to suffer for their efforts. Still, the Helsinki accords have offered hope and international recognition of the plight of these individuals where there had previously been very little. It is important to remember that the increase in human rights abuses in the East is not a reflection of the failure of the Helsinki accords. It is a reflection of increased East-West tension. The fact that the Soviets continue to criticize the accords is a sign that they must be having some effect, if only to remind the Soviets that they can no longer treat human rights violations as domestic policy.

It is also important to remember that only basket III of the accords deals directly with human rights. The other two baskets deal with such issues as cooperation in economic, science, and the environment, and there has been some improvement in these areas. Of course, basket I does contain the reference to the acceptance of existing frontiers in Eastern Europe. Yet, even this provision is not simply an acquiescence to Soviet hegemony in Eastern Europe. The accords also state that borders can be changed—peacefully—by mutual consent.

Another measurable benefit of the Final Act has been the review process, including conferences in Belgrade and Madrid, and more recently the human rights conference in Ottawa. The accords have forced the Soviet Union and the United States to talk to each other at a time when there was very little contact between the two nations.

In addition, the accords have helped foster an enhanced sense of unity among NATO nations. The monitoring of the accords, indeed the unanimous concern of NATO allies over human rights abuses, has built bridges not only among alliance nations but between NATO and organizations whose function it is to monitor compliance with the accords. This, in turn, has facilitated contact with individuals and groups in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, letting them know that the people and governments of the West have not forgotten their struggle.

As Chairman of the North Atlantic Assembly [NAA] Committee on Civilian Affairs, I can personally attest to the work being done by that organization to carefully scrutinize the implementation of basket III of the Final Act. Both in report form and through a quarterly publication entitled "The Bulletin," the NAA has continued to monitor Soviet and East European adherence to the accords. In fact, when I first began attending NAA meetings as a member of the House delegation, I was somewhat skeptical of the usefulness for someone like me becoming involved with an organization that is philosophically tied to a defense-oriented organization. I have found out since then that the NAA is much more than a rubberstamp organization for NATO defense policy. It is also concerned with human rights and peaceful cooperation between East and West.

Finally, when considering the usefulness of the Helsinki accords, it is important to remember that they in themselves cannot change policy. They have been and can continue to be a useful tool for forcing the Soviets to acknowledge at least some of their human rights abuses and, at best, to offer hope and recognition to the struggling people of Eastern Europe.●

WE MUST NOT ALLOW INSTITUTIONS TO BECOME THE PERMANENT PRISONS OF OUR NATION'S SENIOR CITIZENS AND HANDICAPPED INDIVIDUALS

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, July 23, 1985, I introduced legislation to amend title XIX of the Social Security Act to require States to provide for payment for reservation of nursing home beds under the Medicaid Program.

Current Federal regulations allow States to pay nursing homes for reserving a bed during a recipient's temporary absence from the facility if: one, the recipient's plan of care provides for absences other than for hospitalization; and two, the State's Medicaid plan provides for such payments and describes any limitations on the reserved bed policy. In other words, Federal regulation provides States discretion as to whether they wish to reserve nursing home beds for program beneficiaries and discretion as to the circumstances under which beds can be reserved.

Unfortunately, many States do not choose to provide the security that this option would provide. In many cases, a patient is forced to forgo the opportunity to participate in therapeutic recreation outside the home or even family visits because there is always the chance that the nursing home would have given someone their bed during their absence. At a time when we in Congress, and society as a whole, are advocating family and community participation in the care and welfare of our Nation's senior and handicapped citizens, this is a tragic occurrence. In my belief, it is also a contradiction to the original intent of Congress.

In an effort to correct this abhorrent situation, H.R. 3062 would make the reservation of nursing home beds for up to 15 days in any 12-month period a provision of the regulations—not an option to the States. Furthermore, a nursing home's ability to participate in the Medicaid Program would be contingent on its agreement to allow patients this 15-day period of flexibility.

Realizing the possible cost of this type of measure, I have included a provision which clearly states that the State plan under this title need not provide for payment to a skilled nursing or intermediate care facility for the reservation of a bed for any days on which the facility cannot demonstrate that there is an individual waiting for the use of that bed. This provision should prove to be quite a cost-saving measure and an improvement on the existing law.

H.R. 3062 is designed to reaffirm the commitment of Congress to the well-being and humanitarian treatment of our Nation's institutionalized citizens. I hope that my colleagues will realize the need for this legislation and join me in this effort; 15 days for every 12-month period is all this bill is asking; 15 days to visit one's family; to participate in therapeutic recreation; to have some sort of social interaction in other than a hospital setting. Can we justify denying senior citizens and handicapped individuals this small period of time outside an institution? In all good conscience, I cannot. I hope that my colleagues will feel as I do and lend their strong support to this legislation. ●

SECRETARY OF EDUCATION'S APPOINTMENT OF ROBERT ROSSIER

HON. MICKEY LELAND

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LELAND. Mr. Speaker, the Reagan administration has again shown its insensitivity to the concerns of the minority communities of this country. From the beginning, this administration has consistently made appointments detrimental to the interests and needs of our minority communities.

Today I find myself, once again, having to vehmently speak out against another Reagan administration appointee. President Reagan's Secretary of Education, William Bennett, has chosen to reappoint, to the National Advisory and Coordinating Council on Bilingual Education [NACCBE], Robert Rossier. Mr. Rossier has, through an article published in the Washington Times on June 14, 1983, shown himself to be insensitive and callous to the concerns of the Hispanic community. The NACCBE, the central advisory panel on bilingual education, is charged with the momentous responsibility of guiding and directing the Department of Education's policy for the education of Hispanic children in this country. To allow Mr. Rossier, whose article was entitled, "Bilingual Education: The New Latin Hustle," the opportunity to play a significant role in policymaking, is an affront to all the people who have worked diligently and tirelessly in an effort to secure equal educational opportunity for all children. Mr. Rossier states, "the ethnic politician in many cases does not care whether bilingual instruction is a valid method of teaching English," and that this program was maintained only to help bureaucrats, administrators and "power-seeking politicians." It is unconscionable that someone who holds such an extreme opinion of the Hispanic community, and its leadership, would be allowed to participate on a council, charged with serving the interests of that very community. His participation on the Council will only serve as an opportunity to dispense inflamatory rhetoric when, what is most needed, is thoughtful and objective analysis of the most effective methods of educating these children. The education of these children is the central issue. Mr. Rossier's comments only serve to divert us from our main objective.

Though I am a strong advocate of bilingual education, and frankly, am concerned about the recent policy direction this adminstration has taken, my objection to the appointment of Mr. Rossier is based, not only on his position on bilingual education, but, more importantly, on has slanderous and degrading attacks on the leadership of the minority community. Suggesting that people who have dedicated their lives to developing and refining methods of educating Hispanic children, are doing so simply to achieve some measure of political power, is deplorable. It is appalling that this administration would even consider, for appointment, someone who so openly insults and debases the integrity of the Hispanic community and its leadership. Mr. Rossier's appointment underscores the lack of sensitivity this administration has toward the Hispanic population of this country.

When will this administration learn that they cannot continue to blantantly ignore the needs and concerns of the minorities of this country. Appointments, such as Mr. Rossier's, only reinforces the ever-growing impression that this administration has a callous disregard for the needs and interests of the minority communities in this country. I call upon the Secretary of Education, Mr. Bennett, to withdraw this disgraceful appointment.●

UNITED STATES-SOVIET ARMS REDUCTION TALKS

HON. HAROLD E. FORD

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FORD of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, earlier this week, the United States and the Soviet Union traded proposals which each felt would be a step toward reducing the threat of nuclear war. While the Soviets offered the administraton a 5-month moratorium on the testing of nuclear weapons, the United States invited the Soviets to monitor a nuclear test in Nevada.

Ordinarily, these proposals might be considered as a new beginning to arms reduction possibilities. In reality, it is unfortunate that neither side has begun to bargain seriously at this late date. These proposals have obviously been floated to try and win world opinion, and has failed at the very least to accomplish that. Let's at least give the American public and the international community credit for recognizing that.

It is time that both the United States and the Soviets get down to the hard decisions that need to be made. Our negotiators have been meeting with the Soviets for some time without results. Neither side has felt compelled to do anything about the current state of affairs. Although the time for game playing has ended, the two sides continue to go through the motions of arms reductions. If the current atmosphere surrounding United States-Soviet arms reduction talks continue, we can expect similar propaganda when Mr. Reagan faces off with Mr. Gorbachev in November. Unless the groundwork is laid now, the opportunities for a breakthrough in arms reduction will be lost for another 3 years.

Mr. Speaker, I call upon my colleagues at this time to once again consider the possibility of a mutual and verifiable freeze on, and reductions in, nuclear weapons. I do not accept the notion that such an agreement with the Soviets is impossible. Last week, I joined with many of my friends from both side of the aisle in cosponsoring the Comprehensive Nuclear Weapons Freeze and Reductions Act of 1985. Passage of this legislation would again express to the President how serious both the Congress and the American people feel about the arms race.

Mr. Speaker, I appeal to the President: Let's not let arms reduction slide for another 3 years. The freeze proposal is a serious alternative to what will otherwise be a never ending battle for nuclear stockpiles. ●

TREASURY-POSTAL APPROPRIATIONS BILL FOR 1986

HON. LES AuCOIN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. AuCOIN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to commend the chairman of the subcommittee, Mr. ROYBAL and the ranking minority member, Mr. SKEEN, for their attention to the Customs issues in this bill.

Nothing could be more important as we battle a rising trade deficit of record magnitude. An effective and efficient Customs system is essential to exporters who are trying to move goods overseas in an increasingly competitive world marketplace.

The Columbia/Snake Customs District was just formed last year and its viability is critical to meet the current and future needs of a growing trade community. We, in Oregon, share the committee's support for adequate Customs staffing as a key element in maintaining critical services.

However, of paramount concern to me and the Columbia/Snake District is that the Customs Service not interpret the committee's action to provide additional personnel in certain areas of the country as justification to consolidate other districts, including the new Columbia/Snake District.

I appreciate the chairman's assurance that the additional personnel called for in this bill in no way signals support for district consolidations.

At a time when we should be doing all we can to expedite and promote trade, we cannot afford to be shortsighted in our approach to Customs Services and the important role they play in the international trade economy.●

GRACE UNDER PRESSURE

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, I believe that there is little doubt that the budget deficit is our No. 1 economic problem and must be dealt with swiftly and surely. In my view, the best way to deal with the deficit is to cut wasteful and extravagant Government spending—and there is a lot of it to cut.

One man who has taken the lead in bringing the deficit problem and solutions to it to the limelight has been J. Peter Grace, the 72-year-old chairman and chief executive officer of W.R. Grace & Co. His Commission's report on waste, fraud, and abuse in Government spending has rallied scores of Americans who are demanding that we, as representatives of the people, look into his Commission's findings and act on them. Mr. Grace has also inspired many of us here in Congress, resulting in the formation of the bipartisan Grace Commission caucus, on which I proudly serve.

To date, the overall response to the Grace Commission report by Congress has been woefully inadequate; indeed, it has been downright negligent. This is truly a shame because Mr. Grace and his colleagues have discovered countless legitimate initiatives to increase efficiency in Government. It is my contention that the Commission's recommendations are being overlooked either out of stupidity or liberal heavy handedness. In fact, precisely because the liberals have been such obstructionists in this matter, it has become necessary to introduce a resolution to force each committee to look into the Commission's findings and enact feasible recommendations, of which there are many.

Nobody likes to have an outsider tell them how to run their operation—least of all the liberal busybodies that control the House. However, when it comes to Government spending, it is obvious that we need some help. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, in support of the efforts of that fine gentleman, J. Peter Grace, I would like to submit for the historical record the following recent article on Mr. Grace and his Commission that appeared in the July edition of TWA Ambassador magazine:

[From TWA Ambassador, July 1985]

GRACE UNDER PRESSURE

(By D.J. Tice)

One day not long ago, J. Peter Grace was cooling his heels, waiting to appear on a radio talk show. An aide stepped into the room hoping to placate his impatient boss.

"You'll be on the air in five or ten minutes, Mr. Grace."

"Five or ten minutes!?" Grace snapped back. "That's a 100-percent variance!"

Peter Grace is a numbers man—a brilliant, single-minded, obsessive, or maniacal numbers man, depending on whom you talk to, but a numbers man in everyone's estimation, including Peter Grace's. "I just feel that numbers are the only game in town," says the 72-year-old chairman and chief executive officer of W.R. Grace & Company. "The numbers tell you exactly what the situation is. The only way you're going to find out about something is to look at the facts; and the facts are the numbers."

Like many things Peter Grace says, this is hard to disagree with and hard to believe all at once. "There's a lot more to running a business than numbers," insists Smith Barney analyst Jim Wilbur, one of Grace's numerous Wall Street critics. "If he's spending all that time with the numbers, maybe he's not spending the time he should with other aspects of the business."

The dean of America's corporate executives, who this September will celebrate his 40th anniversary at the helm of W.R. Grace (a tenure unmatched in the Fortune 500), is having none of it. He hasn't found any "aspects" of business that aren't questions of facts, and therefore best understood by the numbers. "In business, you have to understand what you're in, and what the categories are of the environment that you're in, and what the measuring yards are of what you're in, and then you can see whether within that environment you can meet certain goals. There are some people who are successful because they have great instincts, but it's all numbers, basically."

Managers at W.R. Grace, a $7-billion conglomerate spread-eagled across the economic landscape in a wondrous and bewildering tangle of businesses ("They're in tennis rackets, tacos, ammonia, and oil," snipes Wilbur) learn quickly to respect their chief's passion for the numbers. They learn, for example, to banish adjectives and adverbs from their reports and presentations, in accordance with an unwritten but entirely serious company rule. ("Mr. Grace says there's not an adjective or adverb in the world that can't be replaced by a number," said an aide. "He doesn't want to know that something's 'bad.' He wants you to define bad.") They learn that results that conform to projections are preferred to results that exceed them. They learn that anything faintly resembling a major decision will require analysis on a "spreadsheet" of hundreds, sometimes thousands, of columns—spreadsheets that on occasion have stretched to 60 and 90 feet in length and have been tacked up on hotel-corridor walls so that Peter Grace could stroll along, contemplating every ratio and every trend line, like a salty old general inspecting his troops. And they learn to emulate their septugenarian boss's extraordinarily long workweeks at winter budget-review time, during which they are summoned, one by one, to a small oval meeting room on the Grace building's 48th floor, there to sit at a front table like a prisoner in the dock and endure Peter Grace's adversarial, excruciatingly detailed cross-examinations. Graphs, charts, and other illustrations are rarely welcomed. Grace takes his numbers straight.

"Overkill" concedes a close aide to Grace, "is a word you hear pretty often around here." It's also a word, or at least a sentiment, that's been heard pretty often of late in Washington, D.C., when the subject is Peter Grace. Grace was chairman of the President's Private Sector Survey on Cost Control, commonly known as the Grace Commission. During Ronald Reagan's first term, the Commission took a long, hard look at the federal government's numbers and last year produced a 21,000-page horror story, not counting 1.5 million pages of supporting documentation. In essence, the Grace Commission concluded that Washington's profligate spending habits are leading the nation down a short road to catastrophe. ("What does it mean? The end of freedom as we, our parents, and our grandparents have known it," writes Grace in his book about the Commission's findings, Burning Money.) Grace's most startling and galling contention is that the government's runaway deficits are entirely the result of waste, fraud, and Washington's utter disregard of elementary management principles. The Commission identified $424.4 billion that its says the federal government "burns" every three years—spending that could be cut, Grace argues, without sacrificing a single welfare program, a single weapons system, or anything else of importance, except to pork-barrel politicians.

"And we've just scratched the surface," Grace says. "We were only down there part-time. Put the same team down there full time and you'd increase that by 50 percent, easy."

Initial reaction to the Grace Commission report ranged from faint praise, accompanied by the conclusions that most of its 2,478 recommendations are politically impossible and that Grace himself is "one of the most radical fellows in or around government" (this from columnist George F. Will, not Jesse Jackson); to a detailed and impressive study of the study by the Congressional Budget Office and the General Accounting Office, which found Grace's numbers exaggerated (Grace in turn produced a study of the study of the study, which, not surprisingly, disagreed); to charges that Grace's report is "the most outrageous piece of statistical sleight of hand I have encountered" (from Democratic Congressman William Ford of Michigan), "on the verge of ridiculousness" (from former Democratic Congressman Richard Bolling), and "bordering on fraud" (from a spokesman for the Center for the Study of Responsive Law, a Ralph Nader offspring).

Peter Grace, who has launched an exhausting personal and corporate crusade to sell his view of Washington to the American people is, to put it mildly, unimpressed with his critics. To Representative Ford he responded, "When you stick a pig, it squeals." In Burning Money he writes: "When you speak of [cutting waste], you're threatening the mother lode of Congressional patronage, and all but the most rare and eccentric Congressmen will wail and fight against such a radical proposal like a cross, sleepy baby holding on to her Cabbage Patch doll."

This is not the sort of talk that gets one invited to a lot of Georgetown parties, but Grace doesn't seem to mind.

"I don't think anybody has any friends in Washington," he says.

Peter Grace carries a gun. That irresistibly curious fact has been reported so many times in business journals and elsewhere that Grace's .38 Cobra Special revolver must by now be the most conspicuous concealed weapon in New York City. Yet there may be more to Grace's pistol-packing than an elderly gentleman's eccentricity, more even than the official explanation of it—that Grace's name has appeared on several terrorist "hit lists." To study Peter Grace's past and to hear his thoughts on the present and the future is to detect a profound and consistent sense of vulnerability, of urgency. The world according to Grace—whether the business world or the political world—is a dangerous, unpredictable, even capricious place, where those who would endure had best be vigilant. Five years ago, in an interview with an internal company publication, Grace was served up the customary fat pitches. What did he consider his most important achievement in 35 years of leadership? "Surviving." What goal had motivated him to work so hard over the years? "Not to lose."

Such unduluted gravity would have been hard to predict from Joseph Peter Grace, who was born just prior to World War I into a life of fabulous wealth and unrelieved leisure. The Grace family's rise from poverty—closer to a Pershing II launch than a Horatio Alger tale—had been engineered by Peter's grandfather William Russell Grace. W.R. fled Ireland's 1846 potato famine as a teenager, established himself in Peru as a ship chandler, parlayed a small fertilizer business into a major international trading company, and became a tycoon and twice mayor of New York before his death in 1904.

W.R.'s son, Joseph Peter Grace, Sr., greatly expanded the company's textile and commodity operations in South America. He also founded the Grace Line steamship company, an airline, and a bank. By the time his son was born, J.P. had turned W.R. Grace & Company into a robust behemoth drawing some 92 percent of its earnings from Latin American operations. J.P., meantime, was drawing a salary equivalent to about $10 million a year in today's dollars.

"Nobody makes that kind of money anymore," says Peter Grace, who earned $868,000 last year.

At the tender age of eight, Grace got his first lesson in the vagaries of the marketplace and the indispensability of caution. In 1921, Warren Harding entered the White House promising a "return to normalcy," but "normalcy" proved not all that it was cracked up to be. The end of the war-inspired, worldwide economic boom sent commodity prices plummeting. W.R. Grace, then deeply invested in the commodities-trading business, was trapped, and gravely wounded. J.P.'s frenzy and anguish as he struggled to resuscitate his company made a lasting impression on his young son. A decade ago, Grace told The Wall Street Journal: "It's always been in the back of my mind that if my father, who was much more conservative than I am, almost went broke, then I have to be terribly careful."

Nevertheless, "playboy" is the word almost universally used to describe the young Peter Grace. It is, to be sure, a difficult image to reconcile with this balding, paunchy, slightly hard-of-hearing curmudgeon, known for his grueling, 80- to 100-hour workweeks (Grace reportedly shaves while using the toilet and has installed fluorescent reading lights in his limousines—all to make more time for work) and his just-the-facts-please sensibilities.

"Well," says Grace, "we had 60 servants on our place. I had 28 polo ponies, a yacht, and a place in Scotland where we went shooting every summer. So I guess you'd have to call that being a playboy. I played polo, I played hockey, I played golf. I didn't do any work. I just laid around. . . . I went through all the leading preparatory schools . . . the leading snot schools, and then I went to Yale."

A disdainful edge in Grace's voice tempts one to observe that such a youth couldn't have been all bad. "It was a disadvantage," he says, saving you the trouble. "The only thing that saved me was sports. When you live like that you don't learn how to live, how to sacrifice, how to suffer, determination. You don't learn any of those things in a life like that, but you do learn them in sports. Sudden-death overtime periods in hockey—you learn something about giving that extra amount."

Grace, married 44 years to his wife, Margaret, a former W.R. Grace secretary, has not seen fit to raise his own nine children in similarity lavish fashion. A devout Catholic who says without hesitation or embarrassment that his faith is the most important thing in his life, Grace sent his five sons, two of whom work at the company, and four daughters to parochial schools, and only to Catholic universities. "Most of the people who lived in my building at Yale were screwing girls three nights a week," he says. "I didn't think that was the best atmosphere to send my children to."

Grace himself escaped the disadvantages of privilege, somewhat reluctantly, upon his graduation from Yale in 1936, when his father ceremoniously put him to work as a lowly W.R. Grace mail clerk. To this day Grace recalls his feelings of frustration and loss at being forced to abandon his hockey, his polo, and his girlfriends (he had dated, among others, Kathleen Kennedy), and is still capable of expressing bitterness over the distasteful mixture of resentment and brown-nosing that greeted him in the mail room. In 1938, Grace's father dispatched his son to Peru, where W.R. Grace did nearly 70 percent of its business. There Grace was fully awakened to the enormity of his own naiveté and to the harsher realities of life by a cold shower of urine.

"I think it was the first night I was in South America. I was sent up to a 15,000-acre sugar estate, with 10,000 workers on one plantation and another 10,000 on another one, and as I walked down the street someone threw a pot of piss out the window and I got hit. They didn't even have sanitary facilities. Twenty-thousand people throwing their piss out the windows. So I wondered, 'How long are we gonna be able to sit in New York clipping coupons, taking dividends out of these properties, when the people working here are living like this?' It scared the hell out of me."

Not everyone shared Grace's trepidations. W.R. Grace was prosperous and growing in the late 1930s; its profits quadrupled between 1935 and 1945. But Grace, with the guidance of Chilean economist Raul Simón ("The smartest man I ever met," Grace says), looked out across the Latin American landscape, and saw change fast approaching—disastrous change for an American company "sitting in New York clipping coupons."

"In Peru," Grace says, "about a third of the people were living [in the mountains], just cutting cocoa leaves. They didn't even speak Spanish, and everybody was wondering how soon they'd be absorbed into the economy. And, of course, they weren't going to be absorbed. [Simón] predicted, 'You'll never be able to borrow anything. The economies are going to go to hell, and you won't be able to get working-capital loans because they'll cut you off and only give it to local, national businesses. And then the currencies will go to hell. And then they'll expropriate your assets.' Well, I became convinced that he was right, and he was."

Thus began one of the extraordinary corporate transformations, and one of the extraordinary management careers, in American business history. The W.R. Grace & Company for which Peter Grace was working that first soggy night in Peru has vanished. Not a single sugar refinery, not a single paper or textile mill, not a single shipping route, not a single banking or insurance operation remains. In their place, Grace has tried just about everything, buying some 130 businesses and selling off perhaps half that many in the last 40 years.

If all that restless, not to say frantic, searching for the right business recipe has left Wall Street confused, if it has produced erratic and by some measures mediocre profits, it has also produced remarkable overall growth, with total assets climbing 39-fold in Grace's four decades, and has earned Grace the businessman's supreme accolade: most observers agree that Peter Grace saved his company from certain oblivion.

He began the remaking of W.R. Grace in 1945, when he became president after his father suffered a stroke. It took him six years to chose among oil, electronics, and chemicals as the new major trust for W.R. Grace. He chose chemicals in the end largely because he thought the price of oil too low and the technological requirements of the fast-changing electronics industry too great. Grace's blitzlike entry into the chemicals field in the early Fifties was almost certainly the most brilliant move of his career, yet it very nearly cost him his job in a 1952 "vote of confidence" before the board of directors—a year before W.R. Grace went public. The board had cause enough for concern: in his first seven years at the helm, Peter Grace had managed to reduce the company's earnings by more than half.

Things got better in a hurry, despite a disastrous failure in plastics. By 1962, chemicals accounted for well over 50 percent of W.R. Grace's sales—sales that had nearly tripled since 1950. (Today, W.R. Grace is the nation's sixth-largest chemicals producer). But the company's metamorphosis had only begun. In the early 1960s, Grace became enamoured of the idea of establishing a "General Foods of Europe," and hungrily began buying up Dutch chocolate makers, Italian pasta manufacturers, French restaurant chains, and the like. Most of those acquisitions faltered, as did others in footwear, office supplies, auto parts, and a host of other consumer businesses. By the early Seventies, Grace had undeniably succeeded in diversifying his company and severing it from its old Latin American roots, but what he held in his had looked a little like weed. Tangled and overgrown, W.R. Grace's consumer operations earned barely one percent on $1.6 billion in sales in 1974—although the chemicals business was churning along, making the company's overall numbers far more palatable.

A major international reassessment over the past decade, leading to dozens of divestitures, has made a good deal more sense of W.R. Grace's consumer division, now concentrated in specialty retailing (Herman's Sporting Goods, home-improvement stores, and Berman's leather outlets, among others) and restaurants (including El Torito's, T. J. Applebee's, and Del Taco). Consumer operations accounted for 36 percent of the corporation's sales and 14 percent of its earnings in 1983.

So much for the ammonia, the tennis rackets, and the tacos. W.R. Grace is also in the oil (and coal and gas) business—an ingredient Peter Grace added to his business mix in 1973, at the height of the energy crisis. There can be no doubting the short-term wisdom of that move, as Grace's natural resource division enjoyed an exhilarating run from its founding through 1981, when it turned in a tidy $182-million profit. Since then, the division has looked, at least to outsiders, like another candidate for divestiture. Natural resource earnings plummeted to $23 million in 1983, and recovered somewhat, to $44 million, last year. For his part, Grace concedes that the recent drop in energy prices and demand has "knocked the hell out of our earnings" (1984 corporate earnings were barely more than half the 1981 figure), but he remains confident that the business will rebound, and that his natural resource venture was "a good decision."

To the tastes of many on Wall Street, Grace's business recipe has always contained too many unpleasant surprises, of which the oil downturn is merely the latest. Analyst Wilbur complains that despite his relentless rushing about, Grace is "overly cautious." Offering the theory that Grace has welcomed the heavy investments of Germany's Friedrich Flick group, W.R. Grace's largest single stockholder, as a hedge against takeover bids or internal revolts, Wilbur adds, "He's run that company like he's managing his own portfolio. Most investors like to do their own diversifying."

Grace is not disposed to deny the latter charge, nor to significantly differ with Wilbur's analysis of W.R. Grace's so-so reputation on Wall Street. But where analysts detect weakness, Grace sees virtue: "The disadvantage of [diversification]," he says, "is that you can't specialize in one thing. You're never as good at any one thing as you'd be if you did nothing else. The advantage is that no one thing lasts very long—and they last less and less long [nowadays]. When one business goes down, another goes up, and that gives you a stability. We feel that that has helped us greatly over the last fifteen years.

"Now, when you get more stability downside, you get more stability upside, . . . so you get less growth possibility. But today, in the 1980s, I think most businesses are trying to retain earning power rather than trying to explosively add to it. Do you know many companies that are growing at fifteen or twenty percent per year? No, I don't either. I think there are more that are declining at fifteen percent a year. . . .

"I don't know of one stockbroker who doesn't recommend a diversified portfolio to his investors. We feel that we have the same obligation to our stockholders. Now that there are more and more institutional investors, they control the [stock market], and they care less about that. They do it all on computers. We had a big mutual fund sell out on our stock. We asked them why, and they said, "The computers showed that you were slightly overvalued."

"So the more you have completely disloyal investors, . . . the less [stability] matters to them. But if you were appealing, as we were when we started, to family investors, and individual investors who wanted to put their money away in a safe place, the diversification that we had definitely suited their books."

Grace utters these words in the W.R. Grace board room, high above Times Square on 42nd Street, but he couldn't be further removed from the "pure play" mentality of Wall Street if he were still in Peru. In this stubborn, fiercely self-certain defense of the pursuit of stability lies the essential, defining paradox of Peter Grace. He is indeed, as George Will suggests, one of the most radical fellows around. But he is a radical proponent of security, willing to go to any length—to transform his company and keep it in a state of turmoil for four decades, to confidently challenge the awesome inertia and entrenched traditions of Washington—just to keep the important things the way they are.

James Watt and Raymond Donovan notwithstanding, even hardened critics of the Reagan Administration are apt to grant it a knack for politicaly savvy, and thereby effective, appointments—Lane Kirkland and Claude Pepper to the Social Security commission, for example, Henry Kissinger to chair the Central America commission, William Ruckelshaus to head the EPA after its reputation became hazardous to the administration's heath, and more recently, Bill Brock, a fierce but respected foe of the AFL-CIO, to replace Donovan at Labor. The choice of Peter Grace as point man in the assault on federal waste demonstrated the same sort of mastery, or mischief if you prefer, as Grace brought to his assignment the qualifications Reagan values most in a tight spot—unassailable credentials and the kind of personality that can divert attention and criticism from Ronald Reagan.

Literally no one in America can match Grace's experience in managing a large bureaucratic organization. His demonstrated passions for diversification and precision accounting also recommended him highly as an advisor to Washington, the world's most diverse and unwieldy spender. What probably clinched Grace's appointment were his long-time criticism of government mismanagement (as a lifelong Democrat, no less), his reputation for tireless, even obsessive commitment to the tasks he undertakes, and a special talent for rough and tumble debate.

Despite Grace's impressive credentials, and despite the dearness of the waste issue to the president's heart, few had high hopes for the privately financed task force of corporate executives that Peter Grace was named to lead early in 1982. Many remembered the futility of the Hoover Commission of the late Forties and early Fifties, which correctly identified billions in waste but eliminated very little, blocked at every turn by special-interest patronage. Many others pointed to the Reagan Administration's own energetic but largely ineffective assaults on waste in 1981 and 1982 and saw the Grace Commission as an attempt to cover a lack of fire with additional smoke. (No one, it appears, thought to turn one of the president's favorite anecdotes against him—the one about the politician who became so exasperated with government duplication that he appointed two task forces to study the problem.)

In any case, the Grace Commission report has proved a good deal more durable and influential than its supporters had expected and its critics had hoped. It's worth remembering that the Commission's intitial findings were made public not at the White House but, rather more inconspicuously, at the Commerce Department. Nonetheless, Reagan has, not for the first time, confounded Washington wisdom by doing exactly what he said he was going to do—deliver not just words but action on the Commission's report. Grace Commission recommendations worth $112 billion in three-year savings, by Grace's reckoning, were implemented in the 1985 budget or through direct administrative action. In his 1986 budget, Reagan has proposed somewhat more controversial Grace recommendations worth $128 billion in three-year savings—all of which require congressional approval. The administration is still studying Grace's remaining recommendations, worth a whopping $184 billion over three years. Although it is by no means clear that Congress will be receptive to Grace's notions of good government, the Commission has already accomplished more than most government-reform task forces, and has almost certainly set a record among endeavors of its kind for inspiring press attention, public outrage, and congressional protests.

And small wonder. The Grace Commission report is a government baiter's dream—literally thousands of pages of deliciously absurd examples of bureaucratic bungling and procedural paralysis. The national press had a jolly time in 1983 when the Commission leaked word of the $436 Pentagon hammer (see chart), yet the pricey hand tool is just one of hundreds of similar follies the Commission exposed. One Californian, reading of the Pentagon's hammer prices, mailed the IRS six hammers in lieu of the $2,400 he owed in back taxes. Grace swiftly advised him that he could have saved postage by mailing in 26 three-penny screws, for which Uncle Sam routinely pays $91 each. Other lowlights of the Grace report:

At the Department of Health and Human Services, a single letter requiring the Secretary's signature involves up to 60 people and takes, on average, 47 days to finish.

The Veterans Administration spends between $100 and $140 processing each medical claim. Private insurance companies average between $3 and $6 per claim.

In 1980, Congress appropriated $946 million in disaster-relief funds for victims of the Mount St. Helens eruption, and $386 million was spent on such relief. The remaining $560 million cannot be precisely traced.

In 1981, the average occupancy rate in military hospitals was 46 percent, compared with 80 percent in private hospitals. Meantime, the government paid private hospitals $550 million to care for military personnel.

On average, federal employees take 40 percent more vacation days and 60 percent more sick days than private workers. They retire earlier and draw penisons 200 to 500 percent larger than the best available in the private sector.

The federal government occupies four times all the office space in America's ten largest cities—approximately. In fact, the government doesn't know exactly how much office space it has, or where it is, or how much it is paying for it.

On average, it takes the government 366 days to negotiate an office-space-lease. The General Services Administration has announced the objective of reducing that to 238 days.

The Administrator of the Veterans Administration, the head of a $26-billion operation with 200,000 employees, must seek congressional approval and endure an eight-month wait for any reorganization he wants to implement—if it affects more than two employees.

On average, the federal government pays its bills 10.2 days before they are due, costing taxpayers, on average, $2.3 billion per year.

Here's a glimpse of how the government budgets: If a federal loan program lends $100 million this year, and collects, $50 million in repayments on previous years' loans, it will report just $50 million in outlays for this year. Don't try this at home.

The Department of Energy employs one supervisor for every three employees.

"It could not be more outrageous," says Grace of federal management. "Couldn't be more outrageous! . . . One of the first things the president asked me was to find out how many federal employees there are in California. [Reagan has long claimed that federal employees outnumber state employees in his home state, a claim critics have challenged.] I went to [Ed] Meese, who said he'd get [that information], but he's never gotten it. Noody can get it. Nobody has that kind of information. . . . There are no records! The OMB [Office of Management and Budget] didn't even know how many social programs there are. They told me there were 110 to 130. There are 963."

The federal government, as portrayed by Grace, is less a devouring beast than a dithering buffoon—utterly lacking in the most rudimentary information about its own operations (the army, Grace writes in Burning Money, "not only doesn't know how many computers it has, it doesn't know where they are, how much has been spent on them, and whether they should be maintained, upgraded, or replaced . . ."); utterly paralyzed by nonsensical rules and regulations that proliferate because federal managers, lacking information, have no other way to "control" their operations (for some bewildering reason, the military is prohibited from taking competitive bids when moving personnel to Alaska or Hawaii); and utterly stymied at every economizing turn by special-interest pressures (for six years, the National Weather Service has been trying to close 38 unneeded local weather stations—not one closing has been approved).

Such revelations, of course, are not exactly new. It was the enormity of Grace's numbers—far outstripping even Reagan's earlier estimates of government waste—that attracted attention. The most formidable challenge to those numbers, the CBO-GAO study, has pretty well withered away in the face of Grace's blistering, numerically daunting counterattack, which suggested that once all errors and artificial limitations in the CBO-GAO study are accounted for, it actually documents higher, not lower, savings from the Grace Commission's recommendations. In February of this year, CBO-GAO issued a second, and far friendlier, analysis of the Grace report.

Still, Grace's contention that fully sixteen percent of federal spending is waste (this would include the additional waste that he is sure would be uncovered if efforts like his are continued) barely begins to express the radicalism of his views, and the radical implications of the Grace Commission report. To begin with, Grace's prognosis for the future if nothing is done to control federal spending is, well, dire—a $2 trillion yearly deficit by the year 2000, a $13 trillion national debt ($169,000 per current taxpayer), and "the end of freedom as we know it." And even those disheartening numbers are understated, Grace insists, because they conform to the government's "bewildering" and "incomprehensible" accounting system. Unlike private businesses and smaller units of government, the federal government is not required to pay as it goes—to set aside funds this year for future obligations incurred this year. If we add in, as we must in reality, the obligations the government is incurring for future Social Security and federal pension payments, Grace's projected deficit for the year 2000 becomes $3.8 trillion. "Intergenerational rape," Grace calls it.

Grace, nevertheless, is by no means entirely gloomy about the future. He does not see the government's problems as insurmountable. Nothing to it, really—just rewrite the Constitution a bit. Although he never says as much, we can probably count on Grace's vote should the abolition of Congress ever come to a referendum. When he approaches the matter of congressional meddling in Burning Money, the normally blunt and earthy Grace betrays his earnestness by taking this side trip into abstract euphemism: "While the [Commission's] Survey certainly has no competence or desire to argue constitutional issues, still it appeared to us as professional executives and managers that there is a significant dollar cost to congressional encroachment in the management of federal agencies."

The federal government's essential problem, according to Grace, is that its day-to-day operations are "micromanaged" by 535 congressmen and senators who are vastly more concerned with the near-term good will of the folks back home than with the long-term welfare of the nation. The Commission's report cites scores of examples of Congress blocking perfectly sensible agency plans for streamlining. Of 4,000 Defense Department installations in the United States, for example, the Pentagon considers 312 important to the national defense. Why haven't the rest been shut down? Don't ask.

For the most part, Grace's congressional critics have responded to this kind of talk by charging that the Grace Commission exceeded its mandate to examine federal management practices and charged hell-bent into the realm of policy. Grace disagrees, while conceding that the line separating management and policy in Washington is too fine to walk. Grace, for example, argues that our welfare "policy" is that the income of all Americans should be raised above the official poverty line. He reasons that if that policy is to be effectively managed, it only makes sense to keep track of all the government aid—including "in-kind" aid such as rent subsidies, medical benefits, food stamps, and the like—that citizens receive, thus giving welfare agencies the information they need to ensure that additional help goes where it is most needed. To many in Congress, all questions about the definition of "need" are matters of "policy," as indeed, in a sense, they are. Grace counters that if keeping tabs on federal largesse runs counter to established policy, then that policy has been misrepresented to the American people. "The value of free school breakfasts and lunches is not taken into account in figuring out how many food stamps a family can get," he writes. "Is it heartless to suggest that the same child shouldn't be fed the same meal twice? Not at all. The object is to get the most benefits to the poorest people at the least cost to the taxpayers. It is not our objective to load up a lucky few with over-sized benefits while others go hungry and the taxpayers go broke.

In many other areas, the Grace Commission found federal programs that had a legitimate social purpose when they were first established, but which have long since been rendered obsolete by events. Far too many of these programs survive, Grace argues, because for every government program, needed or not, there is a constituency, and for every constituency, deserving or not, there is a vote-hungry congressman. Grace waxes sardonic on this phenomenon: "In 1825, when Army posts were isolated fortresses out on the wild frontiers of America, the government found it necessary to let the Army set up small grocery stores inside the posts. . . . Today, military commissaries number 358. . . . Such an isolated outpost as Washington, D.C., has six of them. Wild frontier towns like San Francisco and San Antonio have five. Remote San Diego and forlorn Norfolk, Virginia, have four."

Congress's tendency to preserve once-valid policies in perpetuity also helps explain the area of "waste" that seems to exasperate Grace most—the oversized pensions and fringe benefits of government workers. Those generous benefits, Grace explains, were initially instituted because government jobs were poorly paid compared with similar jobs in the private sector. That is no longer the case—except for management-level government workers—but federal fringe benefits continue to conform to the old realities.

Or, rather, to the ever-present reality of pressure-group politics. "If you're a congressman, you never hear from us, the ordinary working people," Grace says. "But these pressure groups organize the Congress so that the subcommittee on civil-service activities is composed largely of [representatives] from Virginia and Maryland and such—that's where [a lot of] these civil-service people live. If you're a congressman from those states, you don't vote against legislation that harms their interests, because if you don't vote their way, you're gonna lose [in the next election]."

Perhaps the one encouraging message that emerges from the Grace report is that there is a method to Washington's madness. We needn't be mystified, Grace says, by the irresponsibility of Congress once we understand the political forces at work on our representatives. Nor need we wonder long why federal management is inept once we grasp the degree to which government managers are handcuffed by congressional meddling and driven by powerful incentives to ineptitude. The federal manager, Grace says, will reap no reward for efficiency, for accomplishing more with less. Quite to the contrary, his power, prestige, and pay are determined by the number of employees he supervises and by the rank of those employees. Given those incentives, Grace says, we shouldn't be surprised that government managers scramble to involve as many highly paid people as possible in even the most elementary projects.

"The motivation of people in Washington is ridiculous," Grace says. "These people lead lives in fear of being exposed, completely defensive lives. Have you ever seen a hockey game? Then you've seen the team that's playing for a tie. They trail one wing, two defensemen never go down the rink, they never put less than four men on the opponent when he's trying to get into their goal. That's playing for a tie, and that's what these government people are doing. 'No trouble. I'll just stay 'till I'm 55, get my indexed pension, stay out of trouble, wait it out.' Tie ball game."

Doubtless the tie ball game syndrome is the affliction that debilitates most reform efforts in Washington. Even if all of Grace's recommendations were adopted—an exceedingly unlikely event—new inefficiencies and boondoggles would surely sprout like cherry blossoms along the Potomac so long as Congress, driven solely by parochial constituency interests, looms like a tyrannical board of directors over every federal agency and federal managers find rewards only in expanding their bureaucratic empires. Recognizing this, the Grace Commission recommended what amounts to a revision of the U.S. Constitution—a dramatic shift of power from the legislative to the executive branch—which is likely as appealing to congressmen as the prospect of being hanged.

Grace is, first, a mighty proponent of the "line-item veto," under which the president, like 43 governors, would be free to accept some portions of a bill and veto other portions, rather than being forced to accept or reject an entire legislative package as written. The line-item veto, Grace believes, would put an end to the "legislative riders" that sneak onto the most straightforward and essential appropriations bills like rats onto a ship, and through which Congress does most of its meddling in the government's day-to-day affairs. Some critics of the idea argue that the line-item veto would merely make Congress even more irresponsible, since the burden of weighing the merits of legislative riders would fall entirely on the president; others oppose it on constitutional grounds, insisting that the line-item veto would in effect permit the executive branch to write law—a power the founders invested solely in Congress.

But if constitutional purists are troubled by the line-item veto, they must be positively mortified by Grace's proposal for a new management office that would effectively prohibit Congress from interferring in the operational affairs of executive branch agencies. "We're going to operate the government like a company," Grace says. "We'll have a chief financial officer, a chief operations officer, and a computer czar. They'll report to high-level, tough business people who will tell them how to run their operations effectively. The top guy would report to the president, but he'd run the government, the operations. This would have nothing to do with policy. Once the policy is set, you'd turn the task over to him and he'd run it for you.

"We've got to get Congress to agree to this line-management structure, and then [Congress] wouldn't be running everything. Once they pass the legislation, the executive branch would say, 'Okay, we'll run it for you. Pass the bills and get out.' That's the way it ought to be. They'd pass, say, food stamps, and we'd figure out a way to stop fraud in food stamps. And there'd be no congressman to mess with it."

There is only one sure way to change things," says Peter Grace, "and that's to get everybody suffering so badly that they pay attention. It's like when New York City was going bankrupt. I was working on that [on the Citizens Budget Commission], and I was the one who had to go to the mayor and tell him that the banks weren't going to roll over the loans. We're watching money here like a hawk now because we went bankrupt. Maybe that's what will have to happen to the country. When people are going to sit up and take notice is when they're being screwed enough.

"That's the way it is with the world, because people don't think. Most people don't think. They don't know anything about the deficit. It's not hurting them right now, so why study it? People are naturally very selfish and ingrown. That's not everybody, but it's the majority."

At 72, Peter Grace has resolved the first great challenge of his life—to save his imperiled family business and build it into a secure corporate giant, largely invulnerable to the vagaries of any one marketplace. It is remarkable, though not at all surprising, that at this late date he has assumed so much personal responsibility for heading off yet another great, "unseen" peril—runaway spending—with such evident passion and, yes, pleasure. By his own reckoning, Grace is now working 60 hours a week on company affairs and 30 hours a week trying to persuade the American people that the economic house is built on sand, that Washington must be forced to enact sweeping reforms. Grace had committed millions of W.R. Grace dollars to a series of television and print advertisements that convey that message. He has helped form a speakers bureau that will, he hopes, bring the message to chambers of commerce, rotary clubs, and PTAs around the country. He has personally made hundreds of speeches and submitted to scores of interviews, and he means to keep at it.

And what if it can't be done? What if the tie ball game syndrome is incurable, and the federal government simply cannot be made efficient Should we then, as many conservative thinkers suggest, resign ourselves to the inefficiency of government and simply cut services to the level we can afford?

"I can't tell you, because I think it's so utterly ridiculous not to make it efficient before you start cutting services that I don't like to talk about it. What are you going to do if you can't eat tomorrow? Start stealing from grocery stores? I don't like that kind of question."

Later, though, he returns to it. "I think anything is possible. I really do. I think anything is possible. And even if it isn't possible . . . You know, Mother Theresa was on a street corner in Calcutta one day, and there were three bodies lying there, and she was working on one of them. And somebody asked her, 'Aren't you upset that you can't even get to all the bodies?' And she said, No. God created us not to be successful, but to be faithful.' So if you believe in something and you know it's right you have to be faithful to the cause, even if you're not going to be successful. That's life."●

FEDERAL COAL EXPORT COMMISSION TO BE ESTABLISHED

HON. NICK JOE RAHALL II

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. RAHALL. Mr. Speaker, this week the Congress passed S. 960, the International Security and Development Cooperation Act of 1985. Contained in this legislation as section 1304 is a provision which I authored that would establish a Federal Coal Export Commission. This provision is the product of a bill I introduced earlier this year, H.R. 1005, and which I offered as an amendment to the House version of the foreign assistance authorization bill, H.R. 1555.

It is important to note that for the first time, the Congress has passed legislation which has as a goal the expansion of the U.S. share of the international coal market. The legislation seeks to achieve this goal through the increased cooperation among all entities, both Federal Government and private sector, with an interest in the U.S. coal export trade.

The vehicle for this effort will be the Federal Coal Export Commission to be established under the auspices of the Secretary of Commerce. The Commission is to have 30 members with one-third representing Federal Government agencies and two-thirds representing the private sector.

The Federal seats are reserved for representatives of the International Trade Administration; the Energy, Transportation and State Departments; the Office of the U.S. Trade Representative; and the Export-Import Bank with consideration of the Agency for International Development.

The private sector seats are reserved for producers of export coal, coal labor, coal transporters, and financial institutions involved with coal exports.

Primary among the duties of the Commission will be to examine innovative methods of assisting U.S. coal exports through programs such as those of the Export-Import Bank and the Agency for International Development. It is no secret that the Export-Import Bank was essential to the development of the El Cerrejon coal mine in Colombia—a massive coal project which will not only displace U.S. coal exports in foreign markets, but which is today exporting Colombian coal to the United States. The Export-Import Bank has been relatively active in providing financial assistance to foreign coal projects. yet, when it comes to assisting the exportation of U.S. coal, I have found the Bank to have a dismal record. When such assistance is available, it is in the form of the bank's export credit insurance program; a program not highly responsive to the particular needs of U.S. coal exports.

As I stated on the House floor when I offered this provision as an amendment to the House foreign assistance bill on July 11, 1985, the Agency for International Development seems to try to be of some assistance to U.S. coal, but to date, has not been overly successful. The agency, at least, has stated that in no instance is it supporting the development of foreign coal which would compete with U.S. coal.

Both the Agency for International Development and the U.S. Export-Import Bank will, without a doubt, benefit through participation in the Federal Coal Export Commission. These Federal entities will learn, firsthand, from coal exporters and other Federal agencies with more expertise in coal matters just what type of financial assistance will be helpful to promote U.S. coal exports.

As the author of this legislation, I place great emphasis on the financial assistance element of the Federal Coal Export Commission's mandate, including efforts to expand the participation of coal producers in Export Trading Companies. However, the Commission is also to examine diplomatic channels to expanding the U.S. share of the international coal market and in this regard, the State Department has had a record of failure. It is my desire that through its participation in the Commission, the State Department will learn from the International Trade Administration and the private sector what types of concrete actions need to be taken with our trading partners, particularly the Japanese, with respect to increasing U.S. coal exports.

Another very important element of the Commission will be to examine domestic impediments to coal exports and I do not believe the Commission, in this regard, needs to waste its time and resources on any other issue but railroad rates on coal exports.

The Department of Transportation, as reflected by its blanket support for the decision on export coal rates made by the Interstate Commerce Commission, has virtually ignored the threat posed by unreasonable railroad rates to U.S. coal exporters. It is conceivable that if the Transportation Department and coal-hauling railroads are brought into a forum with coal producers and labor to discuss this matter, some benefit may be realized. This will, however, require a good faith effort by all parties.

Mr. Speaker, let me say in conclusion that new competition is being formed against U.S. coal exports aside from our historical competitors from Australia, Canada, South Africa, and Poland. This new competition is coming from Columbia, and possibly other South American countries such as Venezuela in the near future. The Federal Coal Export Commission will not be a panacea for the problems facing U.S. coal exporters, but it will provide a needed boost to our efforts to address many situations which can be handled by increased cooperation among the Federal and private sectors, and within those sectors.●

ACTION URGED TO REMOVE SOCIAL SECURITY TRUST FUNDS FROM THE UNIFIED FEDERAL BUDGET

HON. C.W. BILL YOUNG

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. YOUNG of Florida. Mr. Speaker, this morning I wrote my colleague from Oklahoma, JIM JONES, chairman of the Ways and Means Subcommittee on Social Security, urging the subcommittee to expedite consideration of H.R. 1385, legislation I introduced to accelerate the removal of the Social Security trust funds from the unified Federal budget effective October 1.

President Reagan endorsed my legislation yesterday and the subcommittee held hearings on the subject April 23. As I said in my testimony before the subcommittee, the Social Security system was established 50 years ago as an autonomous, self-supported program with independent trust funds financed by employee and employer contributions. The surplus in these trust funds cannot by law be commingled with general Treasury funds to pay for national defense, education, or agricultural programs, build roads or bridges, or pay for the interest on our national debt.

Still there are some who propose reducing Social Security benefits to lower the national debt. Such attempts, however, provide false budgetary savings because any savings made in the Social Security system cannot be used to reduce the Federal deficit. Accelerating the removal of the Social Security trust funds would return a sense of autonomy to the Social Security Program and will reassure our Nation's Social Security recipients that their benefits will no longer be in jeopardy.

Mr. Speaker, prompt action by Congress in this matter will prevent Social Security benefits from being the object of constant attack during next year's congressional budget process as they were throughout this year's budget negotiations.●

FISCAL YEAR 1986-87 FOREIGN AID AUTHORIZATION AND FISCAL YEAR 1985 SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH
OF COLORADO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House took two very important votes—on the conference reports for the fiscal year 1986 foreign aid authorization and supplemental appropriations for fiscal year 1985. I voted against both of these reports and want to take this time to explain my reason for doing so.

The reason is simple and straightforward: I cannot support policies designed to make military intervention our predominant tool of foreign policy, especially in Central America.

The supplemental appropriations bill contains $27 million for so-called "humanitarian" aid to the Nicaraguan Contras. The approval of this appropriation signals to the world that the United States advocates the overthrow of a government in a country with which we are technically at peace. This appropriation indicates our preference for fueling an illegal war instead of participating in the internationally recognized Contadora negotiating process. It means we would rather risk further bloodshed and the political destablization of our allies—such as Costa Rica and Honduras—than use diplomacy and economic development to heal the deep social and economic rifts from which the conflicts in Central America have emerged. I deeply regret Congress' lack of foresight and patience in ignoring this latter approach—one that is flexible and is the consensus policy adopted by our allies in the Organizaton of American States.

The inclusion of aid for the Contras in the supplemental is doubly regrettable because it compelled me to vote against an otherwise outstanding appropriations package. The most important provision in this package is the $1.5 billion in economic support funds for Israel. Thus far, Israel has done an admirable job of addressing its economic difficulties. For our most important ally in the Middle East, we can do no less than financially assist Israel's drive to overcome its economic problems.

The supplemental contained a number of other provisions of great importance to Colorado and the Nation.

A long delayed water storage project crucial to the long-term economic vitality of Colorado and the settlement of decades-old water disputes with Native Americans in the region was part of the package. The conference report provides start-up moneys for the Animas-La Plata project is southwestern Colorado. The authorization of these moneys provides the first concrete congressional support for Animas-La Plata since its initial authorization in 1968.

Federal assistance programs critical to thousands of Colorado farmers were also part of the supplemental appropriation package. The additional $2.9 billion to restore net losses to the Commodity Credit Corporation, combined with the $1 billion package recently approved, will assist many Colorado farmers who, with a near record crop on their hands, have few markets in which to sell their highly perishable product.

Finally, the additional appropriation of $318.9 million for the Food Stamp Program and additional funds for student financial assistance will serve to fulfill the important commitment we have made to assist countless needy families and deserving young people.

Yet despite the critical importance of funding for these programs, they pale in comparison to the commitment our country is making—by virtue of the supplemental—to an illegal and destabilizing war in Central America.

In contrast to my perspective on the supplemental, I have few reservations about voting against the conference reports on the fiscal year 1986 foreign aid authorization. This legislation is strewn with measures designed to involve the United States in conflicts around the world. It erodes our dedication to seeking the resolution of international conflicts primarily through diplomatic efforts rather than military.

Reflecting this attitude is the provision to repeal the Clark amendment, which prohibited U.S. military or paramilitary assistance to Angolan rebels. Although Congress did not match this repeal with the authorization of assistance for Angolan rebels, it has already had a devastating impact on efforts to remove the South African presence from Namibia and Cuban troops from Angola. Two days after the House voted for the repeal, the Government of Angola withdrew from sensitive negotiations which even the State Department acknowledged had a good chance of resolving the decade-old problems of occupied Namibia and the Cuban presence in southern Africa.

The foreign aid bill reinstates our military presence in Southeast Asia for the first time since 1975. It authorizes $5 million in military aid to Cambodian non-Communist rebels, even though their prospects for success are closely intertwined with those of the vicious and more numerous Communist Khmer Rouge forces, under the leadership of Pol Pot.

The bill also provides another $27 million in humanitarian assistance to the Contras. More importantly, it contains no language barring the Central Intelligence Agency—the same agency that illegally mined Nicaragua's harbors and financed the creation and distribution of assassination manuals—from distributing the aid to the Contras. With the Boland amendment due to expire on September 30, the lack of that restriction is ominous indeed.

In my critique of this rush to provide military assistance, I do not mean to imply that we should never assist rebel insurgencies. For example, I strongly support the conference report's authorization of $15 million in both fiscal year 1985 and fiscal year 1986 for the Mojaheddin of Afghanistan who are fighting the occupying forces of the Soviet Union. This case differs from the others I have cited because efforts at negotiation, under the auspices of the United Nations, have languished in the face of Soviet stonewalling. Moreover, the Soviet forces are presently engaged in a cruel—almost genocidal—attack on the Afghan people. The reports of indiscriminate Soviet bombing, maiming, and torturing of Afghan civilians must be met with a prompt and concrete response, something that we in the Congress have only begun to do.

There are numerous other reasons to oppose this legislation. First, the conferees have dramatically weakened the successful formula by which Congress has induced El Salvador to accelerate the democratization of its political system and bring an end to its terrible human rights abuses. The conferees replaced the House's explicit conditioning of aid on Presidentially certified progress toward democracy and human rights with report language that removes the stringency and effectiveness of the certification requirement.

Second, Congress is sending the wrong signal to the Marcos government of the Philippines by shifting the focus of our aid program back toward the military. At a time when the new people's army has spread throughout the archipelago and discontent with the Marcos regime is rampant, we must inform Marcos that the stability of the Philippines rests on his ability to engineer a peaceful transition to representative democracy. Our security consideration—namely our rights to Subic and Clark Air Force Bases—depend on such a transition and the continued good will of the Filipinos. Shifting more aid to the Philippines' military account will only encourage President Marcos to pursue a military strategy against the NPA—a strategy that will undermine Filipino hopes for democracy and long term U.S. security interests.

Third, the conferees may have done a disservice to the Middle East peace process by converting the House's firm restraints on arms sales to Jordan into

"sense of the Congress" language. I am strongly opposed to the sale of advanced weaponry to any Arab country that does not formally recognize Israel and enter into peace negotiations based on U.N. resolution 242.

After reviewing the conference report on the coming year's foreign aid authorization, I can find only several major provisions which truly serve our country's long-term security and foreign policy needs. Among them, first and foremost, is the authorization of $3 billion in military and economic aid to Israel, along with the $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1985 supplemental economic assistance. Our steadfast commitment to democracy and freedom in the Middle East is inextricably bound to the fate of Israel. I will always support necessary levels of aid to help Israel revitalize its economy and maintain its superior defenses.

I am also pleased that my colleagues retained the House provision concerning airport security which requires the Secretary of Transportation to pinpoint foreign airports with security deficiencies and grants the President the discretion to impose a boycott of such airports or to cut off American aid to the nations housing those airports. We must take every precautionary measure available to stem the tide of terrorism.

Mr. Chairman, to protect our country, to assist our allies, and to advance the spread of democracy, we need sound foreign aid legislation. We need legislation that emphasizes diplomacy and economic development and supplements those vital tools with a prudent security assistance program. By holding up this year's foreign aid bill to those objectives and conditions, we recognize how counterproductive this legislation truly is.

I am ready to support foreign aid legislation that represents our ideals and protects our interests. But neither the fiscal year 1986 foreign assistance authorization nor the fiscal year 1985 supplemental appropriations legislation, as reported by their conferees, fills these roles. Therefore, I must oppose these bills, although I do so with great reluctance in the case of the supplemental appropriations bill.●

WILLIE D. HARRIS' PRIVATE BILL

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. DORNAN of California. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a private bill to permit Willie D. Harris of Cerritos, CA, to present a claim against the U.S. Air Force. The bill would allow Mr. Harris the right to sue for damages for any injuries he suffered in connection with steroid injections administered to him by Armed Forces medical personnel during his service in the U.S. Air Force, provided that such injuries are determined to be the result of negligence on the part of such medical personnel.

As a result of ill-advised council and in ignorance of administrative and judicial remedies, Mr. Harris let his right to appeal the final, unfavorable Air Force administrative decision lapse. Due to the serious nature of his claims he deserves to have his right to bring his case to court reinstated. My bill, plain and simple, will give Mr. Harris a well-deserved day in court.

At 19, Mr. Harris could slam-dunk a basketball. But at 43, he can barely stand long enough to make a pot of coffee. Mr. Harris played basketball in the early 1960's for Kritland Air Force Base, NM. For 2 of those years he played on injured knees with the help of steroid injections. He did so upon the recommendation and concurrence of the military physicians assigned to the base at that time. His doctors now claim that the steroid treatments made him a cripple for life.

I have personally seen the thick scars from his five previous operations on his knees. He will be undergoing a sixth operation tomorrow, August 2, 1985, in Long Beach Veteran's Hospital. This operation will be an attempt to try and save his left kneecap. There is only a 50–50 chance that the doctors will succeed. Nothing will relieve the pain.

I believe that Mr. Harris was treated unfairly and this injury and as a result of mistreatment effectively killed the chance of pursuing a career in professional sports. Mr. Harris had a promising future in basketball. The old Oakland Oaks of the American Basketball Association had noticed him while he was on active duty, and upon his release offered him a tryout. At the time he was still unaware of the extent of his injuries. But the coaches and medical personnel of the Oakland Oaks told him that his knees would not stand up under the pressure of professional basketball.

It wasn't until 1972 that Mr. Harris learned that his knees were degenerating as a result of the steroid injections. His family life, his outlook, and even his pride have been affected. Mr. Harris told me, "After 18 years of pain and suffering and six knee operations—not to mention the pain medication—I hope this legislation will lead to some justice. I ask for your prayers for my surgery." Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleagues for their support in allowing Mr. Harris to pursue justice in the courts. Allow Mr. Harris to present his claim. Thank you.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE MICHIGAN FARMERS' HALL OF FAME

HON. HOWARD WOLPE

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WOLPE. Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the attention of my colleagues to a little known but very significant institution that is located within my congressional district in southwestern Michigan.

I am speaking about the Michigan Farmers' Hall of Fame. This institution is truly unique—both in its mission and in its structure. It is the only such institution in the United States that is dedicated exclusively to recognizing the contributions of American farm families to our economy and our society. It is unique also in its exclusive dependence upon volunteers and private contributions for its support and operation. The Michigan Farmers' Hall of Fame is truly an organization "of the farmer, by the farmer, and for the farmer."

It was Willis Aukerman, a farmer and Prairieville community leader who, in May 1982, decided that it was time those who comprise the economic backbone of our country be given the kind of recognition that has always traditionally been reserved for our Nation's athletic heroes. Willis Aukerman's idea quickly caught on, and local farm and community leaders joined with him in an effort to ensure that Michigan farm families would receive long overdue recognition for their labors and for their many social and economic contributions. Thus, the Michigan Farmers' Hall of Fame was designed both to provide recognition to particularly outstanding farm families and to expand general public awareness of the multiple contributions of American farm families.

To date, the Michigan Farmers' Hall of Fame has inducted 22 couples and, on August 10 of this year, 10 more couples will be honored by their admission to the Hall of Fame. The nine-member volunteer board of directors is currently constructing a building to house the memorabilia of the inductees. Plans have also been laid for a museum that will house old farm machinery and utensils.

Mr. Speaker, it has been my privilege to work with Willis Aukerman and all the other farm and civic leaders whose commitment and dedication have provided the inspiration for the Michigan Farmers' Hall of Fame. I know that my colleagues will want to join with me in expressing our collective appreciation for this most meaningful tribute to those American farm families who have contributed so much to the social and economic well-being of our Nation.●

FULL FUNDING FOR WALLOP-BREAUX

HON. MAC SWEENEY

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, a serious problem looms ahead for the people of Aransas County in the 14th District of Texas and for the entire country if we do not protect one of the best programs currently operating in the Federal Government. We must fight for full funding for the Boating Safety and Sport Fish Enhancement Act—the Wallop-Breaux fund.

This fund, operating successfully for over 30 years, provides money to promote natural resource protection and to enhance recreational opportunities for millions of Americans. The current program, as expanded by the Deficit Reduction Act of 1984, serves as a perfect example of the kind of program we need to keep Government spending down while at the same time contribute to the preservation of some of this country's most valued recreational resources.

The attitude of the Office of Management and Budget, which has proposed to use the trust fund money elsewhere, is heartless and foolish. It breaks the good faith agreement between the Federal Government and the sport fishermen who allowed themselves to be taxed on fishing equipment only because the money went to enhance the sporting opportunities they love.

I am especially concerned about the effect this action would have on the people of Aransas County. Cedar Bayou, located in Aransas County, TX, is one of the greatest sport fishing locations on the gulf coast. The bayou is an outlet from the inner bays of Aransas County to the Gulf of Mexico between Matagorda Island and San Jose Island. Cedar Bayou is essential to the flow of water and fish into and out of the bays. It was closed in the late 1970's and is now partially open, but not open nearly enough to allow for the proper flow of water and movement of fish.

Studies, conducted by the Texas Department of Parks and Wildlife in the 1960's, showed that millions of shrimp, crab, red fish, speckled trout, and many other fish larva were transported through this pass. Today, with Cedar Bayou's closure, the volume of fish in the inner bays has declined dramatically, and the adverse economic effects have been devastating.

A task force I appointed to study these effects has shown dramatic consequences for local businesses. Restaurants report 18 percent decreases in business. Motel business in the county plummeted 25 to 30 percent in 1984, and retail receipts dropped by 30 percent. The first 5 months of 1985 have proven even worse than the previous year. This crippling situation cannot continue much longer without permanent damage being done to this once thriving area.

We are on the verge of letting OMB commit a travesty against one of the most successful user fee programs ever established. I urge all of my colleagues to join with me to preserve this country's natural resources, wildlife preserves, and recreational areas. ●

OPPOSITION TO THE PRESIDENT'S TAX PLAN

HON. CARROLL HUBBARD, JR.

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, I am hearing daily—by telephone calls, letters, and postcards—from my constituents about their views concerning the President's tax simplification proposal.

I received a July 11, 1985, letter from Tom Jones of Paducah, KY, which is concise and to the point. Mr. Jones is opposed to changing our income tax code, and believes the President's plan is a "tax increase in disguise."

I hope my colleagues will take a moment to read the views of my constituent. The letter from Tom Jones is as follows:

JULY 11, 1985.

CARROLL HUBBARD,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, DC.

DEAR MR. HUBBARD, shortly, you will be voting on President Reagan's new Tax Bill.

For my part, I am perfectly satisfied with the present tax structure and from all of the material that I have read, the President's bill is a tax increase in disguise so I hope you will vote "NO" when the issue comes up to a vote.

Thank you.

TOM JONES,
Paducah, KY. ●

CONGRATULATIONS TO SAUL STERN

HON. STENY H. HOYER

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. HOYER. Mr. Speaker, this month marks the 70th birthday of one of Maryland's most distinguished citizens, Saul Stern. This anniversary marks a life of great achievement.

Mr. Stern has had a career as an extremely successful businessman. He has not been content, however, to be involved solely in that area, his involvement in civic and charitable activities is as impressive as are his achievements in the business world.

Saul Stern is a graduate of the University of Chicago and its law school. During World War II, he served in the South Pacific as a communications officer.

Following his return from the war, Saul Stern joined his brother in the furniture business. The Sterns have built that business into one of the largest office furniture concerns on the east coast.

Among his numerous charitable activities, Mr. Stern has been a moving force in the Jewish Social Service Agency. He is the founder of the Jewish Institute on National Security Affairs and is its current president. Saul Stern's work on behalf of many causes of great concern to the Jewish community resulted in 1983 in his receiving the American Jewish Committee's award for Distinguished Community Service. This is but one of the many awards he has received.

Saul Stern has been deeply involved in activities of special benefit to the State of Maryland. Foremost in this area is his nearly two decades of service as a member of the Maryland State Planning Commission and as its chairman. He has also served as a member of the Board of the University of Maryland Hospital.

Finally, Saul Stern had devoted much of his time and energies to Democratic Party activities, and our party is the better for his involvement.

Mr. Speaker, later this month Mr. Stern's wife Marcia, his son Stephen, and many other family members and friends will be gathering to salute Saul Stern with a birthday celebration. I know that my colleagues will want to join me in sending our best wishes to Saul Stern, a man of great dedication and love of family, his faith, his community and his country. ●

TAX REFORM AND EDUCATION

HON. JAMES M. JEFFORDS

OF VERMONT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. JEFFORDS. Mr. Speaker, I understand the desire and need for tax simplification and tax fairness. I also believe that we should examine the use of tax expenditures for various national priorities. I would concur that such priorities as home ownership, pension programs, charitable giving, and health benefits should be among those categories maintained as priorities for tax incentives in any new system. However, it is difficult to believe that under present circumstances anyone would disagree with including the enhancement of our education system on any such list.

I was alarmed upon studying the tax reform proposal referred to as Treasury II, to find that there is a drastic shift away from direct and indirect incentives to assist education. Although the exact figures are difficult to ascertain, it appears that the present Tax Code has in the neighborhood of $22 billion of tax incentives for education. Treasury II on the other hand, appears to retain only about 10 percent, or $2 billion, of those incentives.

This shift in priorities is of deep concern to me. It comes at a time when our Nation's education system has been designated at-risk. It comes at a time when States and local governments are already shouldering significant tax burdens. It comes at a time when many States and localities are undertaking efforts to improve the quality of their schools. And, it comes at a time of skyrocketing college costs. A nation where one out of every five adults is functionally illiterate has no business reducing its commitment to the support of education.

As ranking minority member of the Education and Labor Committee, I am today, along with the chairman, Mr. HAWKINS, introducing a resolution which states the sense of this body regarding tax reform and education. In any tax reform measure, education should be considered a national priority. Those deductions or credits which promote education should be retained. Tax reform should in no way impair the ability of State and local governments to maintain their education programs. If anything, tax reform should encourage the improvement of our Nation's education systems. Education is essential to growth, productivity and our status as a world leader. I can think of nothing more worthy of tax incentives than education.●

THE NATIONAL MOTOR CARRIER PRODUCTIVITY AND SAFETY IMPROVEMENT ACT

HON. JIM MOODY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. MOODY. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing the National Motor Carrier Productivity and Safety Improvement Act of 1985. This bill would improve efficiency, increase competition, reduce paperwork and upgrade safety standards in trucking.

I am pleased to be joined on this bill by Mr. DELAY of Texas, Mr. FRANK of Massachusetts, Mr. MACKAY of Florida, Mr. DREIER, and Mr. LEWIS of California.

The emphasis of the bill is on improving productivity and thereby increasing national industrial competitiveness. It builds on the deregulation process begun with the Motor Carrier Act of 1980.

The 1980 act eliminated many burdensome, anticompetitive and anticonsumer regulations. It reduced hauling costs by $6 billion and created productivity gains throughout industry and commerce totalling $40 to $50 billion. But there are considerable productivity gains yet to be realized.

This bill would be an important step toward achieving these goals, while addressing many legitimate needs truck companies have for: First, upgraded and standardized safety requirements; and second, uniform and centralized licensing and registration procedures.

The National Motor Carrier Productivity and Safety Improvement Act would establish a new class of motor carrier called a national carrier, which a company could choose to be if it served three or more contiguous States. A national carrier would be able to compete in both interstate and intrastate hauling and would be eligible for nationally uniform registration fees, fuel taxes and third structure taxes—something truck companies badly need. ICC control over entry, rates and tariffs for national carriers would end, as would ICC's authority to grant antitrust price fixing immunity—something consumers and shippers badly need.

Safety and insurance requirements would be strengthened and transferred from the ICC to the Department of Transportation which would establish safety and fitness requirements for national carriers, maintain safety compliance records, and take action against unsafe, fly-by-night carriers.

State regulation would continue for purely intrastate carriers and ICC regulation would continue for carriers of household goods and for passenger buses.

With the current emphasis on improving the industrial productivity and competitiveness of our Nation, and with 5 years of experience under the 1980 Motor Carrier Act behind us, now is the time to initiate these additional needed reforms.

I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

EPA'S ILL-ADVISED INSPECTION PROGRAM

HON. THOMAS A. LUKEN

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. LUKEN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing permanent legislation to prevent the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency [EPA] from imposing a premature and ill-advised inspection and maintenance [I/M] program on Ohio. In the absence of discernible benefits to be derived from a vehicle inspection program, I consider the imposition of such a program inherently unjust and unjustifiable.

The EPA has recently threatened to cut off an estimated $130 million in Federal highway funds from Ohio, presumably because the State has failed to initiate an inspection plan in Cincinnati and Cleveland. This action was taken after the EPA reversed its decision to approve the State's plan to meet air quality standards and instead opted to pursue an I/M program.

My bill would prohibit the EPA from implementing such a program unless the agency can demonstate that I/M is the most cost-effective way to attain air quality standards under the Clean Air Act.

A recent report issued by the U.S. General Accounting Office bears out my contention that I/M is unnecessary to attain clean air in Cincinnati. The report concluded that I/M programs are controversial because their benefits are not always clear and their costs are considerable. In Ohio, the cost of starting such a program has been estimated to be around $4 million, with costs of operating and enforcing it expected to exceed $20 million per year. Motorists would have to pay $15 to $20 yearly for each automobile they own, with the greatest burden falling on those who can least afford it: those people who own older cars out of economic necessity.

The effectiveness of current I/M programs has not been properly evaluated, and several States with ongoing inspection programs have shown that the benefit of a slight improvement in air quality is not worth the cost, and that other less costly solutions may produce comparable air quality improvements.

In Ohio, this burdensome and costly program might produce, at best, marginal improvements in the air quality of the Cincinnati region, which is enjoying a summer of good air so far.

In conclusion, I want to emphasize that I am a staunch supporter of efforts to improve our Nation's air quality. However, I believe that we should pursue the most cost-effective method if we want to succeed in achieving this goal with the cooperation of all our citizens. Thus, I am introducing legislation today that will enable us to take this approach and I will pursue its expeditious passage this year.●

INTRODUCTION OF HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION TO ESTABLISH NATIONAL FREEDOM OF INFORMATION DAY

HON. TIMOTHY E. WIRTH

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WIRTH. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a joint resolution which authorizes the President to proclaim March 16, 1986 as National Freedom of Information Day.

This day marks the anniversary of James Madison's birthday. Mr. Madison, our fourth President and Father of the Bill of Rights, is the American most responsible for many of the constitutional freedoms we enjoy today, in particular freedom of speech and the press.

What Mr. Madison understood, and what we often take for granted, is the importance of free speech, free press, and the value of information in a democratic society. He envisioned a society in which the American people be truthfully informed about their Government, thus able to enjoy what he called a "peculiar freedom" to scrutinize the bureaucracy. He believed that through encouragement of interaction of the press and people, the Government would become more responsive to the people.

His idea was considered radical in his day. Today, however, it is hard to imagine not being afforded these freedoms in our society. Yet, because many Americans have never known any other way of life, they do not recognize how important the freedom of information is to the preservation of their other freedoms guaranteed by the Constitution.

A National Freedom of Information Day would serve as a reminder to the American people and the rest of the world the vital role these liberties have played in shaping this country.

Moreover, it is important to recognize that the freedom of speech and press mean more than just being able to express one's thoughts. They are catalysts that spark a flow of information. This is the most fundamental right of an American—the right to a free and robust marketplace of diverse and antagonistic ideas.

My resolution would establish a National Freedom of Information Day to honor both the man James Madison, and the principles for which he stood. I urge my colleagues to cosponsor this resolution.●

REGULATORY PROGRAM OF THE U.S. GOVERNMENT—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT RECEIVED DURING THE ADJOURNMENT—PM 73

Under the authority of the order of the Senate of January 3, 1985, the Secretary of the Senate, on August 8, 1985, during the adjournment of the Senate, received the following message from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying report; which was referred to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

To the Congress of the United States:

The publication of The Regulatory Program of the United States Government marks a major milestone in our continuing effort to make government more accountable to the American people and more responsive to their needs. This document presents, for the first time, a comprehensive program of regulatory policy to be carried out over the coming year.

Regulations are a feature of almost every government program. Though many regulations accomplish worthwhile ends, we should not forget the huge hidden costs they entail. The Federal Government mandates tens of billions of dollars of expenditures every year—dollars paid for by the people but not included in any of the Federal budget accounts, not appropriated by the Congress, and not constrained by any spending limits.

Before 1980, these regulatory expenditures had grown out of control. More pages were published in the Federal Register in 1980 than during the entire period between 1936 and 1945—the first 10 years of the Register. Paperwork burdens had grown such that by 1980, almost two billion hours were expended annually by businesses and individuals to satisfy the Federal Government. Estimates are that Federal Government regulations imposed costs of over $100 billion annually by 1980, adding significantly to the burden imposed on the economy by excessive Federal spending. It has become essential that tools be developed to plan the rational evolution of Federal regulatory requirements.

In 1981, I issued Executive Order No. 12291 setting forth my regulatory principles and, under the Paperwork Reduction Act, my Administration mounted an attack to reduce the paperwork burden. These efforts have helped to reverse the trend of more intrusive and burdensome Federal regulations and paperwork. But more was needed.

The Regulatory Program is a critical step in this process. In order to see that the laws are faithfully executed, and that the policies of this Administration are reflected in the regulations issued under those laws, I issued Executive Order No. 12498 initiating this Regulatory Program. The Program covers the decisions that are within the scope of discretion afforded to the Executive agencies by law and describes the underlying policies and priorities that will influence those decisions.

To set goals and priorities for different programs, government officials must choose the right regulatory tools and identify legitimate needs for regulation as opposed to those that merely benefit special interests. Because some complex regulations take years to develop, involving studies, surveys, and the identification and selection of regulatory options, it is important that senior Federal officials be able to review regulatory options early in the rulemaking process and plan regulatory actions over a longer time horizon. It is also important that they examine and reexamine the nearly 200 volumes of existing regulations to see what regulations need to be modified or have outlived their usefulness.

This year's Regulatory Program is the first in an annual series that will document the efforts of my Administration to manage Federal regulatory programs. This should lead to an increased level of predictability, consistency, accountability, and rationality in Federal regulatory activity.

The objectives of the Regulatory Program are to:

—Create a coordinated process for developing on an annual basis the Administration's Regulatory Program;
—Establish Administration regulatory priorities;
—Increase the accountability of agency heads for the regulatory actions of their agencies;
—Provide for presidential oversight of the regulatory process;
—Reduce the burdens of existing and future regulations; —Minimize duplication and conflict of regulations; and —Enhance public and congressional understanding of the Administration's regulatory objectives.

All of this cannot be accomplished simply by publishing a book. This Regulatory Program is the end product of a long process of agencies planning their regulatory activities: gathering and reviewing information, evaluating past progress and program effectiveness, and setting goals and priorities. The publication of the Regulatory Program for 1985 is, however, only the first step in this annual planning process. The next step is for each agency to implement its part of this first Program, as planned and on schedule.

My goal remains to have a government that regulates only where necessary and as efficiently and fairly as possible.

RONALD REAGAN.

THE WHITE HOUSE, August 8, 1985.

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

RETIRING CONGRESSWOMAN MARJORIE HOLT

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, my Maryland colleague, MARJORIE HOLT has announced her intention to retire from the Congress at the end of seven terms in the House of Representatives.

MARJORIE HOLT gained public confidence the old-fashioned way—by earning it. In her courthouse years, she learned the basics not only of politics, but of human nature. She also learned that politics is hard work and that she was willing to invest the time and effort it requires.

She earned the public confidence not just of her constituents but of all her colleagues, especially those of us in the Maryland delegation. She was the staunch ally working with the rest of us to preserve the Chesapeake Bay, to guarantee shipbuilding jobs at Sparrows Point, to strengthen the economy of the Port of Baltimore, and to defend the rights of Federal employees.

MARJORIE HOLT'S success as a Member of Congress is the product of her experiences, and she will be missed.●

THE BOY SCOUTS OF AMERICA'S DIAMOND JUBILEE

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, the 1985 National Boy Scout Jamboree came to a close at the end of July, and as it did so, trees were sent home with each council and planted in their respective home States; this represented the theme of the jamboree, "the Spirit Lives On."

Indeed, the spirit does live on, and has for 75 years as the Boy Scouts of America celebrate their diamond anniversary in 1985. Some 75 plus years ago, William D. Boyce was lost in a London fog and was led to his destination by a young British Boy Scout who was, "doing a good turn." Later, because of this young scout, Boyce discussed bringing scouting over to America with Lord Baden-Powell, the father and creator of the Boy Scouts.

On February 8, 1910, the Boy Scouts of America were on their way as they became officially organized, and on June 15, 1965, Congress granted the Boy Scouts of America a Federal charter.

Since then, Boy Scouts around the country have been doing good turns, and having fun to boot. Boy Scouts have been learning about the outdoors, practicing first-aid skills, discovering out Nation's history, and researching new and experimental technologies.

Over 70 million people have participated in making the Boy Scouts of America a tradition which will live in the hearts and minds of people in the past, present, and future.

So, Boy Scouts, your 75th anniversary theme is appropriate, for you can have "Pride in the Past," as you pave the road for "Footsteps to the Future." I commend you.●

THE CORPS OF ENGINEERS' WORK IN THE CHESAPEAKE BAY

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, with the passage of the Energy and Water Development Appropriation Act, we assure the continuation of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers' work in the Chesapeake Bay, including the shoreline erosion study and the proposed shoreline erosion demonstration projects. Let me share with my colleagues some information about what the Corps of Engineers is doing to help save the bay.

The shoreline erosion study, which will be continued this next fiscal year as a result of our action today, examines the critical problems of eroding shorelines in the Chesapeake Bay. The goals are to identify eroding areas, to compare low-cost solutions for treating those areas, and to make recommendations for Federal and State approaches in solving the problems.

Last month, my colleague, the Senator from Maryland, Mr. SARBANES, with EPA Administrator Lee Thomas, Secretary of the Interior Donald Hodel, the Governors of Maryland and Virginia, and others joined me for a tour of Chesapeake Bay. We went to view the problems of the bay and see the progress being made by the Federal agencies working on those problems. We saw firsthand the shoreline erosion of the bay including large gullies on steep slopes, slopes slumping into the water, and bulkheads and vegetated areas used to slow the erosion process.

Chesapeake Bay has over 6,000 miles of shoreline. Much of it is subjected to erosion of various degrees and a significant portion of it is eroding at a rapid rate. During the past century, over 45,000 acres of the land have been lost to the bay water's unrelenting action.

The need to take steps to prevent or control this erosion has been addressed in many reports, including "The National Shoreline Study," the EPA Chesapeake Bay Study, and the Corps of Engineers' "Existing and Future Conditions" study. In addition, one of the recommendations of the Governors of Maryland and Virginia, resulting from a Chesapeake Bay Conference, was to "* * * improve programs for stabilization of eroding shorelines to reduce the effects of sediment in the bay." This recommendation was based on concerns which went beyond the potentially large, immediate, and local effects of loss of land.

Sediment, resulting from shoreline erosion, causes a variety of problems. It is the significant cause of filling of the bay and its channels and harbors. This sediment not only contributes to shortening the life of the bay but also increases the need for channel and harbor dredging.

Perhaps even more important are the effects of sediment from eroding shorelines and other sources on the bay's plants and animals. In its report on the Chesapeake, the EPA concluded that high levels of sediment-induced turbidity have contributed to the significant decline of submerged aquatic vegetation, often called SAV, and of bottom-dwelling species. Sedimentation must be controlled if these organisms are to return to the bay in any numbers.

On our boat tour, we learned firsthand of submerged aquatic vegetation, the sea grasses of the bay, and how they are smothered by sediment, decreasing their productivity and leading to their decline. This eventually leads to the loss of habitat for the bay's organisms, which use the sea grasses for food and shelter. Clearly, sediment entering the bay's ecosystem is a large contributor toward the bay's recent decline, and while nothing can stop erosion entirely, we can learn more about how to slow the process and improve the quality of our bay's waters.

The boat tour opened a lot of eyes to the ecosystem problems of the bay, and that is why the Corps of Engineers' Shoreline Erosion Study and the proposed demonstration projects are so very important to the future health of the bay. The purpose of the study is to identify the magnitude and location of shoreline erosion problems and to recommend specific erosion control projects. Reduction in shoreline erosion will contribute to the restoration of the bay's living resources, as well as improve recreational opportunities.

The study is being conducted in two phases: A reconnaissance phase will determine the extent of the shoreline erosion problem, define the Federal activities needed, and identify non-Federal support for detailed study. The feasibility phase will consist of detailed site-specific investigations leading to recommendations for projects.

The reconnaissance phase was started in October 1984 and is scheduled for completion in March 1986 at a cost of $500,000. Progress Report 1 was completed in March 1985. The report identified 1,260 miles of shoreline for further study—490 miles in Maryland and 770 miles in Virginia—out of a total of 7,325 miles of shoreline investigated. Progress Report 2 was completed on July 25.

The feasibility phase, which will be cost-shared on a 50-percent Federal/50-percent non-Federal basis, will take 2½ years to complete.

The corps has completed a nationwide demonstration program as part of the Shoreline Erosion Control Demonstration Act of 1974. Under this program, several demonstration projects were done around the country, but none in the Chesapeake Bay. The program produced a series of reports which contained evaluations of low-cost shore protection measures. The major thrust of the program was toward private property owners and small local governments. The proposed Chesapeake Bay demonstration projects, likewise, are small-scale projects, intended to show bay landowners how they, as individuals, can make a difference and improve the bay's water quality.

Both the State of Maryland and the Commonwealth of Virginia have expressed interest in having the corps to demonstration projects during the feasibility phase of the Chesapeake Bay Shoreline Erosion Study. These projects would protect typical shoreline stretches, such as bluffs, beaches, and marshes, and would demonstrate to private property owners on the bay the low-cost solutions which are available and which can be instituted immediately.

The State of Maryland has requested the corps to plan, design, construct, and monitor an erosion control demonstration project on State property at Patterson Point Farm in Calvert County. The State of Maryland is paying 100 percent of the estimated cost of $150,000.

As you know, I have been an ardent supporter of the Chesapeake Bay over many years, and I view these current and proposed activities of the Corps of Engineers as absolutely essential in the total ecosystem approach to cleaning up the bay. I hope my colleagues will agree and join with me in supporting a totally integrated Federal/State/local approach, including money for the corps' activities in the bay, so one day all of us will be able to say to our grandchildren, "I saved the bay."●

RAILROAD RETIREMENT

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, 50 years ago, on August 29, 1935, the Railroad Retirement Act was signed into law by President Franklin D. Roosevelt. This act established the foundations of the current railroad retirement system.

It was in the rail industry that the first formal industrial pension plan in America was established in 1874. By 1925, more than three-fourths of all railroad workers in the United States were covered by pension plans. However, relatively few employees actually received benefits under these plans, and during the Great Depression of the 1930's these plans had difficulty meeting their obligations. Older workers consequently exercised rights to continue working and accounted for a disproportionate number of the industry's employees. Railway labor sought legislation to continue railroad pensions as part of a reliable and equitable national program.

Although prior railroad retirement legislation had been enacted in 1934, it was declared unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, and the 1935 act was also challenged in the courts. Nonetheless, the Railroad Retirement Board made its first annuity payments 11 months after passage of the 1935 legislation. While subsequent Railroad Retirement Acts were enacted in 1937 and 1974, the 1935 act was the cornerstone of the present railroad retirement system.

During the past 50 years, railroad retirement benefits of $77 billion have been paid by the board to 1,600,000 retired employees, 800,000 spouses, and 2,000,000 survivors; unemployment and sickness benefits have totaled almost $6 billion. The first retirement annuities awarded under the 1935 Railroad Retirement Act averaged $60 a month and no monthly benefits were payable to spouses or survivors. In 1985, nearly 1 million beneficiaries will receive retirement and survivor benefits of about $6 billion, and about 135,000 persons will receive unemployment and sickness benefits of about $200 million.

Throughout the history of the United States, the railroads have played a very crucial role as a catalyst to economic growth and job creation. This 50th anniversary occasion gives all of us the opportunity to renew our commitment to the railroad retirement system. It was established in a time of national crisis and has faced many challenges during the past five decades. However, the act has flourished under nine Presidents from both political parties and 25 Congresses. Although provisions of the Railroad Retirement Act undoubtedly will change, as they have in the past, the act must remain a commitment to the railroad retirees, who have planned for their retirement based on guarantees made by the Government and who have contributed so much to our national strength.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales shall be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

In keeping with the committee's intention to see that such information is immediately available to the full Senate, I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point the notification which has been received. The classified annex referred to in the covering letter is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

The notification follows:

DEFENSE SECURITY ASSISTANCE AGENCY,

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: Pursuant to the reporting requirements of Section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act, we are forwarding herewith Transmittal No. 85-47 and under separate cover the classified annex thereto. POLICY JUSTIFICATION

NORWAY—TOM II MISSILES

The Government of Norway has requested the purchase of 7,612 TOW II guided missiles, 300 tubular launchers, ancillary equipment, and concurrent spare parts. The estimated cost is $126 million.

This sale will contribute to the foreign policy and national security objectives of the United States by improving the military capabilities of Norway; furthering NATO rationalization standardization, and interoperability; and enhancing the defense of the Western Alliance.

Norway needs these TOW II missiles to improve the tank-killing capacity of its infantry battalions. The new brigade concept of the Norwegian Army requires an approximate increase of 50% in antitank weapon systems. These brigades perform the forward land defense in northern Norway. Norway's highest priority is to upgrade their TOW's to TOW II missiles.

The sale of this equipment and support will not affect the basic military balance in the region.

The prime contractor will be the Hughes Aircraft Corporation of Tucson, Arizona.

Implementation of this sale is expected to require assignment of U.S. Government personnel and contractor representatives to Norway; however, the number of personnel and length of time they will be needed has not yet been determined.

There will be no adverse impact on U.S. defense readiness as a result of this sale.●

SOCIAL SECURITY

● Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, today marks the 50th anniversary of the enactment of the Social Security Act. President Franklin D. Roosevelt signed the 33-page bill into law on August 14, 1935. After 50 years of evolution and growth, the Social Security system is today a major part of our national life. It has served us well by helping to assure the dignity and independence of the individual, the integrity of the family, and the stability of the community.

The Social Security Act is more than old age, survivors, and disability insurance and Medicare. It includes the Federal-State system of unemployment insurance and other benefits and service programs, including Supplemental Security Income [SSI], Title XX, Social Service Block Grants, maternal and child health care, and Medicaid. The Social Security Act is vital to the security of everyone—young, middle-aged, and old, and the Congress has fortunately recognized this important fact throughout the history of the program.

This year also marks the 20th anniversary of the Medicare Program, an extension of the Social Security Program and the cornerstone of this Nation's commitment to adequate health care for 28 million older persons and 3 million disabled individuals. Clearly, without Medicare, millions of older Americans could not afford even the most basic health care services.

Since the Democratic Party, starting with Franklin D. Roosevelt, has had a longstanding commitment to Medicare and Social Security, I would like to insert the Presidential statement of the signing of the Social Security Act, August 14, 1935:

Today a hope of many years standing is in large part fulfilled. The civilization of the past hundred years, with its startling industrial changes, has tended more and more to make life insecure. Young people have come to wonder what would be their lot when they came to old age. The man with a job has wondered how long the job would last.

This social security measure gives at least some protection to thirty millions of our citizens who will reap direct benefits through unemployment compensation, through old-age pensions and through increased services for the protection of children and the prevention of ill health.

We can never insure one hundred percent of the population against one hundred percent of the hazards and vicissitudes of life, but we have tried to frame a law which will give some measure of protection to the average citizen and to his family against the loss of a job and against poverty-ridden old age.

This law, too represents a cornerstone in a structure which is being built but is by no means complete. It is a structure intended to lessen the force of possible future depressions. It will act as a protection to future Administrations against the necessity of going deeply into debt to furnish relief to the needy. The law will flatten out the peaks and valleys of deflation and of inflation. It is, in short, a law that will take care of an economic structure of vastly greater soundness.

I congratulate all of you ladies and gentlemen, all of you in the Congress, in the executive departments and all of you who come from private life, and I thank you for your splendid efforts in behalf of this patriotic legislation.

If the Senate and House of Representatives in this long and arduous session had done nothing more than pass this Bill, the session would be regarded as historic for all time.

The Social Security Act is by many measures the single most successful piece of domestic legislation ever created in the United States. From the words of the New Dealers come some lessons as fresh and true today as they were 50 years ago: A strong system of social policy is one that is inclusive—in everyone's interest—and flexible enough to evolve with the realities of the times. Economic security is a necessary component to economic progress, not a drain upon it. Problems of economic security should be considered as a whole, not as a fragmented set of issues, because they are a whole—resulting from a common source: the complex interdependencies of modern economic life.

The 1935 act represents a commitment made by this country to its citizens—a commitment upon which citizens have relied in planning their retirement years. The Social Security Act has flourished under 9 Presidents from both political parties and 25 Congresses. Although provisions of the Social Security Act undoubtedly will change, as they have in the past, the act will remain a dynamic and influential factor in American economic, social and political life.●

SOCIAL SECURITY AND THE DEMOCRATIC SYSTEM

● Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, August 14, 1985, marks the 50th anniversary of the enactment of the Social Security Act. By that act, the American Government made a solemn promise to the American people, and from one generation to another, that American workers and their families would be protected from the financial burdens of old age and disability, and American children from the worst ravages of poverty. No Government initiative since, and few before, has done more to improve the quality of life for more Americans.

Even more, Social Security is a bulwark of our democratic system. My friends from the Council Center for Senior Citizens in Brooklyn recently reminded me of President Franklin D. Roosevelt's words on this matter:

History proves that dictatorships do not grow out of strong and successful governments, but out of weak and helpless ones. If by democratic methods people get a government strong enough to protect them from fear and starvation, then democracy succeeds. If they do not, they grow impatient. Therefore the only sure bulwark of continuing liberty is a government strong enough to protect the interests of the people, and a people strong enough and well enough informed to maintain its sovereign control over its government.

I ask my colleagues to reflect on President Roosevelt's wisdom, and I especially thank my Brooklyn friends for their wisdom in bringing it to our attention.●

PROPOSED ARMS SALES

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, section 36(b) of the Arms Export Control Act requires that Congress receive advance notification of proposed arms sales under that act in excess of $50 million or, in the case of major defense equipment as defined in the act, those in excess of $14 million. Upon such notification, the Congress has 30 calendar days during which the sale may be reviewed. The provision stipulates that, in the Senate, the notification of proposed sales be sent to the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee.

A portion of the notification, which is classified information, has been deleted for publication, but is available to Senators in the office of the Foreign Relations Committee, room SD-423.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CLEAN CAMPAIGN ACT

HON. STEPHEN L. NEAL

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. NEAL. Mr. Speaker, certain parts of our Nation, including my own State of North Carolina, have been bombarded in recent elections with scurrilous, deceptive, misleading, distorted, and downright dishonest paid radio and television advertising. People are sick and tired of the lies, smears, statements used out of context, doctored photos, et cetera, yet are in a way powerless to do anything about it. One may say that they express their opinion at the ballot box, but oftentimes the real issues have been so obscured by these powerful, deceitful, slick, negative ads that the election contest boils down to those who believe the ads versus those who do not.

Sad to say, these ads continue to dominate some campaigns because they either work, or offer the best chance of electing a candidate who had little else but the attack ads to commend him or her to the electorate. Thus, organizations like the National Conservative Political Action Committee [NCPAC] have been able to say, through its spokesman Terry Dolan, that it could elect Mickey Mouse by using these tactics. As a consequence, a whole new political campaign specialty—the negative broadcast ad—has come into being. There is a ready market for the product, and a growing number of organizations and individuals willing to use it.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this kind of despicable campaigning—which does not even stop short of character assassination—is destructive of the democratic process. The strength of our system of government has been that the people, when given sufficient and accurate information, will arrive at proper decisions—whether in an election or on a jury in a court of law. The obfuscation of this information, by devious and deceitful propaganda, therefore deprives the people of a reliable basis for judgment.

This situation, has caused me grave concern for some time. I have searched for some remedy that would be, first, clearly constitutional; second, impeccably fair to all sides in an election campaign; and, third, contributive to, rather than destructive of, the democratic process. In most instances, any thinking along these lines eventually encountered the first amendment, which I consider to be one of our most cherished rights. In other instances, the road was blocked eventually by one objection or another. Then, Mr. Speaker, JOHN DANFORTH, Republican Senator of Missouri, introduced a bill which, I think, meets all the constitutional and fairness requirements, and which I believe would contribute in a meaningful way to the preservation of the democratic process. The bill was also sponsored in the other body by Republican Senator GOLDWATER and Democrats HOLLINGS and SIMON. It has been introduced on this side by my colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. LANTOS] and I have joined him as cosponsor.

The thrust of the bill is that if any candidate for Federal office airs or causes or permits to be aired any radio or television ad attacking his opponent, and does not do it by using his own voice and/or facial likeness, the candidate at whom the ad is aimed shall be entitled to free and equal air time to respond. If such an ad is placed independent of the candidate, the equal-time requirement will automatically apply.

This, Mr. Speaker, seems to me to be a fair and rational approach to the problem. Senator DANFORTH has caused his bill to be studied by constitutional experts, and says they are satisfied that the bill would survive a constitutional test. It does not censor political advertising, because it permits a candidate or an organization to say whatever they wish. It imposes no prior restraint, and calls no individual or organization to account, except by requiring equal time for the opposition and holding the perpetrator of the ad up to public judgment.

A prominent newspaper in my district, the Winston-Salem Journal, has commented editorially on both the negative ad problem and Senator DANFORTH's bill. At this point, I insert an editorial from the Winston-Salem Journal into the RECORD:

ELECTIONS AS CONVERSATION

Sen. John Danforth of Missouri is not the best known member of the U.S. Senate, but he is one of the most thoughtful.

Danforth spoke recently to a prayer breakfast of the American Bar Association. His subject was campaign standards, or the lack of them. And, more generally, the incivility now accepted as commonplace on the American political scene. A lot of what Danforth said applies to the last Senate race in this state. Before the next one, it might be good to think about whether we want screaming and name calling to become the norm.

Elections are not just about who gets to represent us, they are meant to do two other things. First, they help to clarify and apply our values and beliefs. An election ought not to decide the minutiae of public policy but it does help to set direction and tone. Second, more important and today more in peril, an election is one American way of holding a town meeting. We are not an ancient Gr ~k city state or a Swiss village. We are not only too big and diverse for direct democracy, we are too impatient and pluralistic. And we are not only pluralistic as a society, but as individuals. We have other things to do.

Yet, one of the things that makes us a people is our ability to come together periodically and reason as citizens. Not only to set the context of governance, but to listen and discuss.

The other American approximation of the town meeting is the process of representation. It is not entirely new or accidental that campaigning in our nation is perennial, almost existential. In meeting with our representatives, individually or in groups, in person or by letter, we not only express opinions but carry on the dialogue of democracy. The essence of the democratic spirit is conversation, because only a few truths are self-evident and because public opinion is more than popular prejudice only if it is informed. This is the reason Jefferson was so keen on a free press. It is also the reason Madison created a system that moved slowly. We are encouraged to think and talk things through.

Just as representation is not just handing power over to another citizen but a constant give and take between equals, so an election is not like choosing from a menu. In America a campaign is a long, and sometimes rather bawdy, conversation.

Danforth has said our ongoing town meeting is being drowned out by political commercials and PACS. We do not become better informed by campaigns today but have our prejudicial reflexes tapped by types of propaganda. They are not just argumentative but shrill and slanderous. And this is so particularly in the South where once politics was most gentlemanly. Much money is spent, and much time too. But our choices are not increased, for the degree of manipulation attempted and mud thrown is all that is purchased. Our public space is shrinking, our representatives less responsive, though campaigning and campaign management have become a major American service industry.

Sen. Danforth makes some proposals. For example, when a candidate runs a negative commercial, he ought to have to use his own face and voice in the ad. Or, when a bill is paid for by interlopers, so-called independent spending, the candidate attacked should receive free time to respond. Campaign commercials should be run only in the month immediately preceding the election. And 30-second spots should be banned altogether.

Some will cry that free speech is abridged by proposals such as these. But we ban cigarette ads on TV and now propose to ban liquor in the interest of the common good. The purpose of free speech is the liberty to pursue truth, not to manufacture or debase it.●

EXECUTION BY HUNGER, THE UNKNOWN HOLOCAUST

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, I am submitting for the RECORD a copy of a review of the book "Execution by Hunger, the Unknown Holocaust," by Miron Dolot. The review was written by Jack Miles, book editor of the Los Angeles Times, and it was published on Sunday, June 16.

END PAPERS

(By Jack Miles)

Last January, the Book Review received a review copy of "Afghan Refugees: Five Years Later," a 24-page booklet available free from the U.S. Committee for Refugees, 815 15th Street NW, Suite 610, Washington, DC 20005. Though the booklet was too short for review, I thought it worthy of mention: Information on Afghanistan was scarce enough that 24 pages seemed much.

When I read the booklet, I found some thing more than I had expected. "Over the past five years," wrote Allen K. Jones, its author, "the Soviets, along with forces of the current Afghan government, have been somewhat successful in gaining control of the cities and the roads linking them, but the resistance holds sway in the countryside. This balance could shift dramatically in favor of the Soviets, however, as they intensify their tactics, of killing off the civilian support population, terrorizing and driving off the survivors, and creating famine conditions."

Creating famine conditions. These last words caught my eye, for another, longer book, dealing with another Soviet famine, lay stalled on my shelf. I decided to read it.

"Execution by Hunger, the Hidden Holocaust" (Norton: $16.95; 231 pp.) is the first book-length, eyewitness account of the 1932-33 planned famine in Ukraine. The author, Miron Dolot, was 15 at the time. He describes the event as he lived through it.

Briefly, the Soviets induced a famine by confiscating the entire Ukrainian crop after the 1932 harvest—everything, down to the seed grain—and then sealing the border. Across the border, in the rest of the Soviet Union, there was no famine. But Ukrainians who tried to cross into Russia—that is, into the adjacent Russian Soviet Federated Socialist Republic—were stopped at the border. Those who made it across were forcibly repatriated.

In Ukraine itself, confiscation of the crop was not the only measure taken. A "Bread Procurement Commission" conducted house-to-house searches—repeated house-to-house searches—for hoarded grain or other provisions. Their logic was that if the crop had been confiscated and yet the people were still alive, then they must be hiding food somewhere. When the people turned to eating cats and dogs, it was declared that the state had urgent need of dog and cat skins; and the GPU—forerunner of the KGB—went on hunting expeditions.

How many died in the border-to-border death camp? The count can be made only indirectly, and different ways of doing it yield different results. The lowest estimate is 4.8 million, the highest 10 million. The book jacket speaks of 7 million.

Why did the Soviets do it? A full explanation must wait on the first full-dress scholarly treatment of the famine, a book to be published in England next year (at Hutchinson) by Robert Conquest and James Mace, under the auspices of the Ukrainian Research Institute of Harvard University. Another Harvard scholar, Adam Ulam, contributes an introduction to "Execution by Hunger" in which he mentions the Soviets' need to generate capital, their need to provision a vast internal police force, and Stalin's will to crush Ukrainian resistance to his collectivization of agriculture. These factors were operative elsewhere in the non-Russian Soviet Union, however. Only in Ukraine was the violence of the famine-weapon found necessary.

Why? Because only Ukraine (Dolot and other Ukrainians writing on this topic never say, as if their homeland were merely a region, "the Ukraine") was both large enough and nationalistic enough to challenge Russia itself. Once called, demeaningly, "Little Russia," as distinct from the "Great Russia" that grew outward from Moscow, Ukraine was and is a nation comparable to France in both area and population. Today, it constitutes 20% of the Soviet population and, thanks to fertile soil and a climate tempered by the Black Sea, grows 25% of the Soviet agricultural product.

After the fall of the czar, Ukraine declared its independence and was reconquered by the Red Army only with difficulty. In the 1920s, Soviet rule was tolerant; but with the rise of Stalin, russification and collectivization began with a vengeance. Ukrainian resistance grew apace, and the result was a struggle that Stalin told Churchill was more difficult for him than World War II. The climax of this struggle, Russia's climactic victory over Ukraine, and the definitive federation of the two most important nations in the Soviet Union came with the famine of 1932-33. With the intelligentsia dead or deported to Siberia and the rest of the population prostrate, Ukrainian resistance was at an end by spring, 1933, Stalin had won.

It is difficult to speak of Miron Dolot's book without speaking first, as I have, of history and geography. And yet the book remains deeply personal. Indeed, in a most striking way, it remains a boy's book. The author is now 70 years old. His tone of voice is fully, calmly adult. Nonetheless, he confines himself to reporting what the intelligent, observant 15-year-old that he was could take in.

Dolot's story has a natural and compelling structure. It opens in the prosperous, still largely undisturbed agrarian culture of his village, proceeds quickly through the fear and violence of the collectivization, climaxes with the horror of the famine, and ends with a rapid denouement his life after May, 1933; his ultimate escape to the West.

Dolot (a pseudonym) writes a steady, unadorned prose. He lets the awful events speak for themselves. And yet he is not concerned to maintain a blank, emotionless pose. When he cried, and he did, he tells us: It's a part of the story. And then he moves on. Once, once only, he tells us that he is weeping as he writes. The man knows what he is doing.

"One . . . Spring day we heard gunshots reverberating some distance from us. The sounds were coming from the east, and as the shooting approached closer, it was accompanied by the loud barking, whining, and yelping of dogs. At the same time, we heard some men shouting and laughing. This sounded very strange at a time when all the people in the village were downcast and silent. Suddenly, shots rang out in our own backyard, somewhere behind the barn, followed by the sound of a dog yelping and whining. We immediately recognized our dog, Latka. I ran out, and as I came to the place, I saw our Latka lying on the ground in a pool of blood, dead. Three gunmen stood beside her, looking down at her, talking and laughing. I broke out crying and tried to pet my dead dog. But my lamentations made no impression on the killers. One of them pushed me aside, took our Latka by her tail, and dragged her to the main road where a horse-driven cart already loaded with the bodies of other dogs and cats waited. Then all three of them mounted the car and drove away. After a while, we heard the sounds of more shouting in the distance, and of animals crying out in their death throes."

This little incident, however marginal to the main story, is told to near perfection. Dolot is no less equal to his more demanding material.

The harrowing core of the book covers the period from December, 1932, through April 1933. Ukrainians did not at first believe that when all their crop was taken, none would be brought back for them. The state had been harsh before, but it had never attempted—they could not believe it would attempt—extermination. Dolot's family survived by the ruse of burying a cache of food on government land, where the GPU would least expect it. Others were less resourceful; and as a winter of murderous cold and waist-deep snow set in, the smoke disappeared from one chimney after another.

With the first thaw, Dolot's mother sent Miron and his brother, Mikola, to the homes of families for whom she feared. In cottage after cottage, they found the body of a child, sometimes more than one child, neatly laid out as for burial—and the body of the despairing mother hanged from the roof beam. Typically, the man of the family had long since been sent to Siberia.

It was too late for the Dolot brothers to do more than bury the dead. It is too late for us to do even that much. And yet, as we learned recently at Bitburg, memory, even late, has its power.

Sen. Bill Bradley, D-N.J., and Rep. James Florio, D-N.J., succeeded in tacking $400,000 for a Ukrainian famine study commission to a major appropriations bill last October. President Reagan has named some of its members; others have yet to be named. Will this commission, will Dolot's or Conquest's book, will Harvard's Ukrainian Research Institute or a new film on the famine (screening at the Ukaninian Cultural Center, 4315 Melrose, June 30, 2 p.m.) do any good? The question is not easily answered. It might be asked, these days, with particular urgency in Afghanistan.●

COMMEMORATION OF THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOCIAL SECURITY ON AUGUST 14, 1985

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, August 14, 50 years ago, a law was enacted which changed the future for Americans. This day marks the signing of the Social Security Act.

At that time, we were enduring the Great Depression. The U.S. population stood at 125 million. A quarter of the 35 million workers in the country were unemployed. And, as we recall the words of President Franklin Roosevelt, a third of Americans were "ill-housed, ill-clad, ill-nourished." Social Security was created to provide income security for the elderly; to provide compensation when there was a loss or reduction of income from work in old age.

Since 1935, the program has been expanded to include workers' families, certain dependents and survivors, and the disabled. Twenty years ago, the Medicare Program was enacted, to provide health care insurance for the elderly. Today, 9 out of 10 workers in the United States are earning protection under Social Security. About one out of every six persons in the country receives monthly Social Security checks. Over 24 million people age 65 and over, almost all of the Nation's older population, have health insurance under Medicare. Another 3 million disabled people under 65 also have Medicare coverage.

Social Security has been expanded dramatically since its inception. It has also suffered from financial problems, which we took action to alleviate 2 years ago, and continue to watch closely today. However, as we look back on the program's first 50 years, I believe it is important to note the significant changes that Social Security has made in people's lives. It has provided a cushion for Americans in their later years, to ensure that no one shall go without life's basic necessities because he or she is no longer able to work. Social Security has shown that America, when faced with a crisis such as the one we endured in the 1930's, can emerge from it with a positive means of preventing its repetition in the future.

It has sometimes been said that Americans value everything old except their people. Perhaps the most significant aspect of Social Security is that it demonstrates America's commitment to its elderly. That we shall celebrate the 50th anniversary of Social Security displays the value we place on our senior citizens and the program which support them.●

READING IS FUNDAMENTAL

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, a new report released by the Northeast Midwest Institute found that one in five adults in this country are unable to read well enough to function effectively in society.

I am appalled that some 60 million Americans are functionally illiterate, but I am even more disturbed by the fact that this number is increasing by approximately 2¼ million people each year.

Steady increases in adult illiteracy represent a personal tragedy for millions of individuals. Functional illiteracy is also a threat to our society as a whole, for it hampers the productivity of American workers, contributes to crime in the streets, and weakens our ability to defend our Nation.

Clearly, we must do all we can not only to promote adult literacy, but to prevent this problem from recurring in the next generation. As new technology continues to replace many jobs requiring manual labor and the service sector of the economy expands, our young people will have an even greater need for communications skills in the future.

Mrs. Elliot Richardson, who is chairman of the board of Reading is Fundamental, Inc. (RIF), addressed the need for prevention in her testimony before the House and Senate Education Subcommittees at a hearing on adult literacy. Mrs. Richardson emphasized the importance of encouraging children to read and to learn at an early age. She suggested that parents read aloud to their children and ensure that they have a wide variety of books to choose from.

As a parent, I found Mrs. Richardson's suggestions particularly constructive. There are no simple solutions for the problem of adult illiteracy, but we can lay the groundwork for a more literate and secure America if we follow the example of the RIF program in our homes as well as our schools. I commend Mrs. Richardson's testimony to my colleagues.

STATEMENT OF MRS. ELLIOT L. RICHARDSON, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, READING IS FUNDAMENTAL, INC., AUGUST 1, 1985

Mr. Chairman, Members of Congress, thank you for giving me the opportunity to speak to you on a situation that threatens our economic health, our military preparedness, and even the democratic foundations of our country—the problem of illiteracy.

We are grateful that the committees are addressing the issue and hope that in their deliberations they will give serious consideration to the prevention of illiteracy. Our experience shows that this matter is of great concern to the public.

The members of this committee are well aware of the distressing facts that one in five American adults is functionally illiterate, that costs related to illiteracy exceed $225 billion annually, and so on.

Adult literacy efforts are working valiantly to help grown people open the doors now closed to them because they cannot read. Though excellent, these efforts cannot solve the problem alone.

According to current estimates, the number of functionally illiterate adults in this country is increasing by some 2¼ million each year.

In order to break into this vicious circle, we must not overlook our young. There are 67 million young people under age 18 growing up in America. Unless we take preventive measures, too many will add to the already alarming illiteracy statistics.

Experts have said that the current generation is the first in our nation's history to grow up less skilled in reading and writing than their parents.

Thirteen percent of all 17-year-olds in this country can already be considered functionally illiterate, though they are not yet counted as adults.

Eighty-five percent of the juveniles who appear before the courts are functionally illiterate.

And nearly one-third of our nation's young people drop out of high school before graduation; among inner city minority youth, drop-out rates often exceed 50 percent.

What can we do to prevent our young people from becoming the grim statistics of tomorrow? From my work in literacy programs for the last 16 years, I have learned that several factors are essential to preventing illiteracy.

The first is motivation—awakening in young people the desire to read and to learn. Although motivation is often regarded as something within, it can be sparked from without. We in Reading Is Fundamental have seen previously disinterested youngsters become avid readers through programs such as ours and the efforts of caring parents and concerned citizens.

Reading is a skill. Like other skills, it improves with practice. Extensive reading also quickens the capacity to think, to write, and to use verbal skills clearly and effectively.

According to a survey reported in Science '82, Fortune 500 executives rate communication skills as "the top priority for business leadership"—even more essential than financial, marketing, and technical know-how.

These executives are well aware that American businesses lose billions of dollars each year because so many employees don't know how to read, write, or think clearly and effectively.

The thousands of youngsters who write to RIF each year thank us again and again for helping them discover that reading is "fun." What they call "fun" is the ingredient that propels them to read. It is fun with a serious purpose and proven results.

The second element involves parents, a child's first and most influential teachers. Even before children go off to school, parents can nurture interest in reading by reading aloud to them, by providing a wide variety of books in the home, and by reading themselves.

Since its inception in 1966, RIF has emphasized the essential role parents play in their children's development as readers. Parents' strong support of RIF programs—nearly 40% of RIF's more than 98,000 volunteers are parents—and the deluge of mail we have received in recent months indicate that parents, even those who have difficulty reading, are eager to help their children. This year, some 40,000 parents have written to RIF for guidance and suggestions. RIF has developed publications to answer these needs.

The third essential element in preventing illiteracy is to ensure that children have an abundant supply of books. If motivated to read and free to choose what interests them, youngsters will read and continue to read, gradually building skills that are crucial to effective communication.

For almost 20 years, these three elements—motivation, parent involvement, and an abundant supply of reading materials—have helped Reading Is Fundamental reach millions of young people and turn them into readers. The recent NIE study, "Becoming a Nation of Readers," underscored the soundness of RIF's preventive approach.

Our future as a democracy is in the hands of our young people. We simply must provide the ounce of prevention that will assure that they grow up reading.

We need strong reading programs in our schools.

We need to help parents help their children.

We need to surround our young people with books, in their schools, their community libraries, and in their homes.

And we need the kind of visibility for the problem of illiteracy that this committee provides.

Thank you for inviting me to testify.●

H.R. 3067, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS

HON. JOHN E. GROTBERG

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GROTBERG. Mr. Speaker, on July 30, the House considered H.R. 3067, D.C. appropriations bill for fiscal year 1986. On the final amendment offered by our colleague from New Jersey, Mr. SMITH, which would bar the use of any funds in the bill to pay for abortions, I reluctantly voted "no." I did this because the amendment did not contain the "life of the mother exception," which has been a part of the so-called Hyde amendment since the mid-1970's. I am a strong supporter of the Hyde amendment, but felt that the Smith amendment, as offered, precluded Federal funding of abortions covered under the bill if the life of the woman was endangered. In Mr. SMITH's defense, he did attempt to ask unanimous consent to include the "life of the mother exception" in his amendment, but was prohibited from doing so by the chairman of the D.C. Appropriations Subcommittee, Mr. DIXON of California. I am hopeful that the conference report on H.R. 3067 will contain the Hyde amendment intact. If that is accomplished, I will have no hesitancy in voting for it providing the budgetary levels are lowered in the bill's final version.●

LIONS' INTERNATIONAL PRESIDENT HONORED

HON. PAUL E. KANJORSKI

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KANJORSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to bring to your attention a citizen of the 11th District who has risen to a position of great importance. As international president of the Lions, Joseph L. Wroblewski has shown his commitment and dedication to the fundamental values that have made the Lions such an important part of so many communities.

Joseph L. Wroblewski was born in the small town of Ashley, PA, in the heart of our State's anthracite coal mining region, just a few miles south of Wilkes-Barre. He attended Wilkes College and Eckels College of Mortuary Science, an affiliate of Temple University in Philadelphia. Soon after graduation in 1952, Wroblewski entered the Army, serving in Korea in the medical detachment of an artillery unit.

Returning 2 years later, one of the first things he did was marry the girl he left behind, Normajean. Soon thereafter, Joseph Wroblewski landed his first job with one of Wilkes-Barre's largest funeral homes. Eventually, he and his wife moved back to Ashley and opened their own business, which grew to 15 franchises in three States with more than 100 employees. Today, he still owns two funeral homes, an employment agency, and a travel agency.

While pursuing financial success, Joseph Wroblewski never failed to contribute in other ways to his community. He joined the Ashley Lions Club in 1954, and immediately took an active role. "I was impressed with the work the Lions performed in the field of sight conservation and in serving the needs of senior citizens," he recalls. He took an active role in raising funds for eye bank services, and assisting in the distribution of Christmas baskets to the shut-ins, elderly, and needy of the area. By the mid-1960's, his colleagues showed their appreciation for his hard work by electing him district governor of district 14-H.

In the 1970's, his attention turned to international Lionism, while still committing tremendous time and energy to projects in his own district. By 1976 Joseph Wroblewski had earned the support and respect of not only his fellow Pennsylvanians, but of Lions throughout the Nation. At the 1976 international convention in Hawaii he was elected international director for a 2-year term.

In 1982 he again received the support of his colleagues, and was elected third international vice president. His travels helped cement his commitment to relieving suffering throughout the world. As he noted, "I'm pleased we have adopted our long-term programs in drug awareness and diabetes education and are presenting them around the world." The 1,350,000 Lions members worldwide are a formidable resource in providing better medical facilities and services to the less fortunate in this Nation and abroad.

Mr. Speaker, the slogan introduced by the Lions during Joseph Wroblewski's term as international president sums up his long-standing commitment to improving his world "We Serve Better-Together." I know I speak for many of my colleagues in praising the invaluable work of the Lions. We of the 11th District of Pennsylvania are especially proud of Joseph L. Wroblewski, who has served with such distinction as their international president.●

TRIBUTE TO JANE HAGEDORN

HON. BILL GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to the attention of my colleagues the passing of a good friend, Jane Hagedorn, wife of New York publisher Charles Hagedorn.

Jane was known for her kindness and her quiet strength, a strength that undoubtedly helped her husband and their son, Chris, in their difficult task of maintaining the publication of quality newspapers in an era when many newspapers have been closed by economics and changes in society.

Jane's strength was also evident in the manner in which she handled her long and difficult illness. She concerned herself with the needs of others, her constant smile belied her pain.

Such courage and unselfishness are a legacy to those who knew Jane Hagedorn and a lesson for all of us. I know this loss has had a terrible impact upon her husband and their son, but I also know that they will do as she wished and carry on in the great tradition of journalism.●

THE 10TH ANNIVERSARY OF HELSINKI ACCORDS

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, I wish I could rise today to celebrate the 10th anniversary of the signing of the Helsinki accords. However, I find that there is little to celebrate. The Helsinki accords recognizes the territorial and political status quo in Eastern Europe, which resulted from World War II. In return the West has gained little except broken promises and dashed hopes. After 4 years of initial improvement and progress in human rights, the situation began to deteriorate with the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan and has grown steadily worse.

Recently, we marked the 26th anniversary of Captive Nations Week, commemorating the millions of freedom-loving people in Soviet-dominated countries throughout the world. This type of commemoration might not be necessary if the Soviet Union would uphold its part in the Helsinki accords. Of course the United States must continue to fight for freedom and human rights regardless of the Soviet stance. Let me repeat part of the statement I made on Captive Nations Week:

The United States since its inception, has championed fundamental freedoms. We must remain dedicated in our efforts to press for the recognition of basic human rights for all people. We must reaffirm our pledge of obtaining rights for nations under Communist dominion. We as a Nation must uphold the fundamental principle of self-determination and encourage the captive nations in their struggle for freedom from the oppression of the Soviet Union.

Although there has been increasing action and hope for the cause of oppressed people around the world, we must still focus on the latest examples of Soviet adventurism, whether in Europe, Africa, or Central America. The oppressive policies of the Soviets must be recognized and acted upon.

One of the indicators often used to gauge the ups and downs in Soviet human rights policy is the rate of Jewish emigration from the Soviet Union. In 1979 the rate stood at an all time high of 51,000. Since that time the flow has dwindled to almost nothing. In 1983 only 900 Jews were allowed to emigrate from the Soviet Union and the figures for the past few months are even lower. It is thought that at least 400,000 Jews presently reside in the Soviet Union and are unable to leave. In restricting Jewish emigration so harshly the Soviets are once again violating the Helsinki accords which allows the emigration of a people to their national homeland.

The plight of Soviet Jews has deteriorated. During the past year, we have seen the constant harassment of Hebrew teachers and Jewish cultural activists. A new strategy has been in use recently, by which Jews are brought to trial on trumped-up charges. We have a responsibility to do whatever is possible to make life easier for those repressed people who are forced to live under Soviet tyranny. The Soviet Jewry issue should be raised with high level Soviet officials whenever the opportunity arises. This 10th anniversary cannot be a very joyous occasion, but it can serve as reminder that there is much which must be done. The Soviets should be reminded of their part of the accords and held to it. At this time, I would like to insert into the RECORD the full text of an article which appeared in the Washington Post on July 31, 1985:

DON'T CELEBRATE THE HELSINSKI ACCORD; NULLIFY IT

(By Norman Podhoretz)

The other day I received a visit from Avital Scharansky, whose efforts to free her husband, Anatoly, from the Gulag to which the Soviet authorities consigned him seven years ago have given a new dimension to the word indefatigable.

This was not the first time she had come to see me, but this time there was a difference. In previous visits she had mainly appealed for help in getting her husband out of prison. On this occasion, however, her emphasis fell on getting out the 400,000 Jews waiting for permission to emigrate from that larger prison known as the Soviet Union.

Avital Scharansky thinks that a special opportunity to press the issue of Jewish emigration is provided by the meeting this week in Helsinski to commemorate the 10th anniversary of the agreement that was signed there by the Soviet Union, the United States and 33 other nations on Aug. 1, 1975. More generally, she believes that the Soviets are now in such desperate economic straits that they would be willing to trade 400,000 troublesome Jews for most favored-nation (MFN) status.

Is she right? Are the Soviets now prepared to bargain in the currency of what are for all practical purposes Jewish hostages? Perhaps. In the reports that have circulated recently of Soviet moves toward the restoration of diplomatic relations with Israel, broken off during the Six Day War of 1967, mention has been made to offers of pay for certain political concessions by Israel with an increase in the number of Jews who would be allowed to emigrate.

Some who follow these matters closely think the Soviets are also trying to wring political concessions, and not just MFN status, out of the United States in exchange for allowing larger numbers of Jews to leave.

The Soviets have been playing a similar game with the West Germans for some years now, exacting both hard cash and political accommodation for permitting a negotiated quota of East Germans to emigrate to the Federal Republic. Why then should they not try to open a trade in Jews as well? So many Jews for the return of the Golan Heights to Syria, so many for MFN, so many for the cancellation of "Star Wars."

Yet even if the Soviets are now ready to deal in this repulsive fashion, the United States refuse to go along.

In Helsinki 10 years ago, the Soviets promised, among other things, to allow much freer emigration in exchange for what amounted to recognition by the West of their hegemony over East Europe. In restricting Jewish emigration so harshly (from 51,000 in 1979 to about 900 in 1984), the Soviets are thus brazenly violating the Helsinki accord. Thus, too, in offering to exchange a higher emigration quota for economic or political concessions they are demanding yet another "quid" for a "quo" they have never paid and are at best still unwilling to pay in full.

It is because the Soviets have refused to keep their part of the Helsinki bargain in general that a large group of Soviet dissidents living in exile recently issued a statement calling for its nullification by the West. Not only, say these exiled dissidents, has the accord failed in its "initial goal" of promoting human rights in the Soviet Union and its East European satellites. It has "failed even to protect the Helsinki monitors" who have been imprisoned precisely for calling on the communist authorities to observe its provisions. Among these monitors is Anatoly Scharansky.

In English prose that touchingly bears the traces of their native Russian, the exiled dissidents go on: "We tried to persuade Western governments to make release of these people a necessary condition to continue the Helsinki process. It was not done in time, and the situation is irreversible now. Irreversible are the deaths of imprisoned Helsinki monitors Oleska Tikhy, Valery Marchenko and Yuri Letvin from the Ukraine and Eduard Arutyunyan from Armenia. Irreversible are the many years spent in prisons and labor camps by the founders of the Helsinki movement Yuri Orlov, Anatoly Scharansky and other prisoners of conscience."

But the fate of the 400,000 Soviet Jews who have applied for permission to emigrate may not be irreversible. Instead of offering the Soviet Union rewards for letting some of them go—rewards, in other words, for partially keeping commitments for which it has already been exorbitantly paid—the United States ought to be threatening a cancellation of the Helsinki agreement unless the Soviets immediately begin living up to its provisions.

That would mean, as the exiled dissidents say, the release of Scharansky and the other prisoners of conscience, and as his wife adds, it would also mean the simultaneous granting of exit visas to the 400,000 Jews wishing to emigrate.

Avital Scharansky thinks the Soviets would give in to pressure of this kind; the exiled dissidents seem to be more skeptical. But we are not about to find out this week which of them is right. The brutal and heartbreaking truth is that the chances of an American threat to nullify the Helsinki accord are almost nil.

What is most heartbreaking, however, is that even if such a threat were made, it would be no more credible than the empty threats we have repeatedly made to nullify all the other agreements, from the ABM treaty to the treaty banning the use of chemical weapons, that the Soviets have violated just as brazenly as they have the accord whose 10th anniversary is so farically being celebrated in Helsinki.●

TRIBUTE TO HAROLD D. WILKINS OF FLORIDA STATE UNIVERSITY

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER

OF FLORIDA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, in State university systems throughout the country, there are many dedicated individuals working in administrative capacities to make exciting things happen in education. These individuals deserve a great deal of credit for the growth and excellence of our State universities and, consequently, for the improvement of education in our country.

I am proud to take note of one such outstanding individual in Florida's State university system, Harold D. Wilkins, of Florida State University in Tallahassee, FL.

Hal is the president of FSU's foundation, a position he has filled for several years. Through his knowledge and expertise in obtaining funding for university programs and activities, FSU has been able in the past 3 years, to establish three eminent scholars chairs; two in the School of Theater and the Mildred and Claude Pepper chair in social gerontology. In addition, funds for several other chairs are in the process of being collected. Under Hal's able leadership, Florida State University foundation raised $9.1 million in the last fiscal year. In addition to funding the eminent scholars chairs, these funds have been allocated for student scholarships, for establishing faculty chairs, for research and development in meteorology, computer science and other important areas and for recognizing the work of outstanding professors.

Hal Wilkins and his excellent staff of 21 dedicated individuals are to be warmly commended for their achievement at Florida State University. Their work does not benefit FSU alone but has far-reaching effects as it culminates in raising the quality of education for our citizens, some of whom will be on the cutting edge of history tomorrow.

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask my colleagues to join me in paying tribute to the numerous individuals who devote their lives to education and particularly to Florida's own Harold D. Wilkins, president of the Florida State University foundation.●

SMOKELESS TOBACCO

HON. CARDISS COLLINS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mrs. COLLINS. Mr. Speaker, the prevalence of alcohol and illicit drugs in our society and their attraction to our children are well known. In recent months, public attention has been drawn to a new fad sweeping the country, one that has invaded our school playgrounds and college campuses. Although an age-old custom, smokeless tobacco, which refers to chewing tobacco and snuff, are the "in thing" among our Nation's youth, and its use is increasing at an alarming rate.

Over 22 million Americans are said to be using smokeless tobacco. Conservative estimates are that 8 to 10 percent of teenagers and preteens have taken up the pinch, chew, or dip habit. Individual State surveys have found even higher rates of use, up to one/third and higher among students in junior and senior high schools and in college.

One reason for this new found appeal is the increased fear over the dangers of cigarette smoking. Another is the Madison Avenue type advertising by producers of smokeless tobacco which features national sports stars and music celebrities aimed at enticing young, prospective users to "go smokeless."

A number of studies have found that smokeless tobacco is not a risk-free product. Oral cancer, dental disease, high blood pressure, and addiction are some of the findings researchers have uncovered. And while the volume of scientific information for smokeless tobacco products may not equal that compiled for cigarettes, it has raised a "red flag," prompting a number of major health organizations to voice strong concern and a call for action.

Only a handful of States have addressed this problem, however, either through product warning labels or minimum sales age limits. At the Federal level, the Federal Trade Commission has punted to the HHS, whose Office of Smoking and Health is now studying the issue. But because groups like the American Cancer Society, the American Medical Association, the American Dental Association, the National Cancer Institute, and even the U.S. Surgeon General have pronounced smokeless tobacco as detrimental to human health, we cannot afford to hold off action.

What is needed in my view is a comprehensive legislative solution. On July 25, I introduced the Smokeless Tobacco Control Act of 1985—H.R. 3078—which will not only make people more aware of the hazards associated with smokeless tobacco, but of the utmost importance, will make it more difficult for young people to get their hands on these potentially deadly products.

My three-part proposal will deal with this problem by requiring HHS to develop educational programs on the health risks of smokeless tobacco for use in our school systems and by health agencies. Grants to States will be authorized as an incentive to enlist help from the States in distributing these educational materials and in setting minimum sales age limits. My bill will also reinstate a Federal excise tax and will earmark the new revenues for the State grants and for cancer research. Lastly, my bill will prohibit producers of smokeless tobacco from deducting advertising expenses from their income taxes.

I believe my legislation will well serve the public health. It will meet the twin goals of making sure that those who wish to use these products are well informed about the inherent dangers, and it will discourage our Nation's children from engaging in an activity that might later result in serious health problems. I would urge my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to join me in working for the passage of this important and timely legislation.●

COMMEMORATING THE 250TH ANNIVERSARY OF THE FOUNDING OF THE FIRST CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH IN BLANDFORD, MA

HON. SILVIO O. CONTE

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. CONTE. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I rise today to pay tribute to the people of the First Congressional Church of Blandford, MA. On August 18, they will be celebrating the 250th anniversary of the founding of their church.

The founding of Blandford's First Congregational Church was truly a venture in American pioneering. The western part of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is beautiful and can be very rugged, and 250 years ago it was still considered wilderness. The Blandford church has fit in well, it is a picturesque building in a picturesque setting.

Pastor Brian Case and the entire assembly—past and present—of the First Congregational Church can be very proud of their heritage as they celebrate this very special occasion. On August 18, a plaque will be dedicated at the church, and the assembly will gather to ask God's blessing so that they can continue to serve his purpose in the western part of the Commonwealth.

Mr. Speaker, I wish all the best to those who are a part of this special church. Their past has been a rich one. Their present is a productive one, and their future is full of promise. It has been my pleasure to share this tribute to the First Congregational Church of Blandford with my colleagues in the House. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.●

● Mr. MARTINEZ. Mr. Speaker, as part of this years commemoration of the 50th anniversary of the Social Security Administration, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Social Security Administration's district office in Montebello for the continued service to the community and their efforts on behalf of my constituents of the 30th District of California:

CONGRESSIONAL RECORD TRIBUTE—LUIS LAINER

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with special pride and pleasure that I call to your attention a truly outstanding citizen of Los Angeles, Luis Lainer.

Luis was born in Mexico City and emigrated to Los Angeles with his parents as a young child. After his graduation from Yale Law School in 1968, he served as a VISTA volunteer for 2 years in a predominantly Puerto Rican neighborhood in New York City. Luis' experiences in the Williamsburg barrio left an indelible impression and formed the basis and direction his future life would take.

After returning to Los Angeles to practice law, he sought to recreate the idealism and sense of meaningfulness of his VISTA experience. Joined by a group of young professonals—lawyers, teachers, students, rabbis, and social workers—he founded Bet Tzedek, the House of Justice. Started as a storefront office over 10 years ago, Luis worked for a while as the only staff person performing all the necessary tasks himself—counseling, representing clients, recruiting and supervising volunteers, publicity, fundraising, and so forth. Bet Tzedek has flourished into a major community service agency serving, on a nonsectarian basis, thousands of aged, disadvantaged, and defenseless clients who are in danger of losing their homes, vital social benefits, and their dignity.

Although Luis is stepping down as president of the board, a position he has held since 1981, he will continue to serve on several important standing committees, including the executive and nominating committees which he will chair. In addition, the board has appointed Luis Lainer, president emeritus for life.

In his dedication to community service, Luis joins the other members of the illustrious Lainer family who have also committed their lives and resources to the well-being of others. His wife, Lee, and daughters, Jesse and Anne, have every reason to share in the joy and pride of Luis' life.

Terry Friedman, executive director of Bet Tzedek, perhaps best sums up the essence of Luis Lainer's spirit:

Some of us are dreamers. Others are doers. Few are both. Luis Lainer is that rare combination of dreamer and doer. More important, Luis is also a moral human being who, in every part of his life, sets the standard for the rest of us.●

THE 50TH ANNIVERSARY OF SOCIAL SECURITY

HON. PETER H. KOSTMAYER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, on August 14 we celebrate the 50th anniversary of the Social Security Program.

Social Security was established 50 years ago at the recommendation of President Franklin Roosevelt in reaction to the economic insecurity experienced by millions of elderly and unemployed workers during the Great Depression. President Roosevelt proposed a Federal system of old-age insurance, unemployment insurance and public assistance which was passed by the Congress and signed into law on August 14, 1935.

The original program covered 27 million workers. Since then the Social Security Act has been amended many times to meet the changing needs of our society. Last year 119 million workers and their employers contributed $186 billion in Social Security payroll taxes to the trust fund and 36 million received $180 billion in benefits.

The great majority of America's retired people count on Social Security as the foundation for their retirement. For many of them, it is the difference between security and poverty. Twenty-seven percent of our Nation's elderly people depend on their Social Security checks as their sole source of income.

In the past 50 years the Social Security Program has fulfilled its promise of providing security for America's workers. This anniversary gives us an excellent opportunity not only to recognize that achievement, but also to reaffirm our commitment to the program. That is why the theme of the anniversary celebration, "Social Security: Partnership With Tomorrow," is particularly appropriate.

Social Security represents a contract between the Government, retired workers and today's workers. Unfortunately, this year retired workers were once again threatened with the spectre of benefit cuts by those who would use the Social Security Program as a scapegoat for the irresponsible budget policies which have lead to record Federal deficits. Proposals to reduce Social Security benefits obscured the fact that the trust fund ran a surplus last year and that it is on sound financial footing for well into the next century. Such proposals also shook the confidence of today's workers in the future of the program.

We must use this 50th anniversary to restore the public's confidence in the Social Security Program and to reaffirm our Government's commitment to honor its contract with America's workers.●

DEROGATORY REMARKS OUGHT NOT GO UNCHECKED

HON. BARNEY FRANK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. FRANK. Mr. Speaker, last month, New York Mayor Ed Koch admitted that he had referred to our colleague, the gentleman from California [Mr. DELLUMS] as a "Zulu" and a "Watusi from Berkeley." Mayor Koch attempted to explain away these derogatory racial references to a very distinguished Member of this body with a disingenuous assertion that they were meant to be complimentary. I doubt very much that anyone—Mayor Koch included—believes this.

As I understand it, Mr. Koch uttered these distasteful remarks in the context of a discussion in which he defended the level of American aid to Israel. I am very much in agreement with Mr. Koch on this particular issue and it seems to me incumbent on those of us who are in agreement with Mr.

Koch that significant levels of aid to Israel are very much in America's interest to disassociate ourselves from the racism of his comments about Mr. DELLUMS.

Our colleague Mr. DELLUMS is a man who believes that public policy debates ought to be conducted on a very high level, and he is scrupulous on the floor and off in his efforts to avoid personalities and focus on real issues. In keeping with this, and with his general graciousness, Mr. DELLUMS chose not to make an issue of Mr. Koch's remarks and stated that he accepted Mr. Koch's explanation of them. That is I think a tribute to Mr. DELLUMS graciousness and distaste for personality politics, and not an indication that he is unduly credulous. Mr. DELLUMS' understandable unwillingness to engage in a name-calling spat with the mayor of New York in no way relieves any of the rest of us from the responsibility to speak out against Mayor Koch's unfortunate expression of sentiment in this case.

Juan Williams wrote an article for the opposite editorial page of the Washington Post which expressed dismay that so few people had publicly spoken out against the racial implications of Mayor Koch's remarks. I do not agree with everything Mr. Williams says in this article, but I believe its general thrust is accurate: Those who spoke out against the anti-Semitic remarks uttered by Jesse Jackson in 1984 are guilty of hypocrisy and inconsistency if they remain silent in the fact of similarly offensive ethnic slurs by Mayor Koch. Because I believe in this general point—that all of us have an obligation to speak out against bigoted remarks of any sort when uttered by significant public officials—I include Mr. Williams' article at this point in the RECORD:

OF ZULUS, WATUSIS . . .

(By Juan Williams)

In a soon to be published book, "I Koch—A Decidedly Unauthorized Biography," New York's Mayor Edward I. Koch is quoted as calling Rep. Ron Dellums (D-Calif.) a "Zulu warrior" and a "Watusi from Berkeley."

Koch admits the words are his. He says he intended them as compliments. He called Dellums after the quotation became public to tell the congressman that Watusis are "strong and tall" and the Zulus an "elegant and stylish" people.

Sure. And "Hymie" is a Jewish name.

According to Jack Newfield, a Village Voice writer who was the source for the quotation, Koch used the tribal references in 1976 during an acid volley against U.S. congressmen he felt were trying to reduce U.S. aid to Israel.

"He was specifically focusing on Dellums," Newfield said, "ignoring the substance of what Dellums had to say and then he called him a 'Watusi from Berkeley.' It was unmistakably hostile, derogatory and insulting. It was meant to be."

Dellums has decided to downplay it. The Berkeley congressman who has fought to avoid being labeled a "black militant" or the "congressman in bell-bottoms" is afraid that a personal response to Koch would allow his colleagues to dismiss him as an overly sensitive, angry black man.

But the incident begs comparison with the outcry last year when it was reported that Jesse Jackson privately referred to Jews as "Hymie" and rationalized it as a practice left over from his childhood.

In fact, Koch, in his role as a Jewish leader, led the way in condemning Jackson as an anti-Semite, largely on the basis of the "Hymie" comment. With that as his whip, Koch aired his suspicions that Jackson was an anti-Semite who favored Middle East policies that are antagonistic to Israel's best interests. His proof? The "Hymie" quote, Jackson's ties to Israel's enemies, the dark-skinned people in the Middle East. Jackson hugged Yasser Arafat, Koch reminded his audiences before urging unsuccessfully that Jackson not be allowed to speak at the Democratic convention.

Now Koch is in the hypocrite's corner. If he was so quick to throw stones at Jackson, he has no exemption from being stoned. No matter how expertly he dances away, by quickly admitting his intemperate words and calling Dellums to explain it all, he can't expect anyone to believe in his gut that he was complimenting the congressman.

Koch, who is running for reelection, should be haunted and harassed for every awful racist word revealed in his attack on Dellums. He should be questioned about it at every campaign stop.

Few would suggest that Jackson not be held accountable for his remarks. Why should it be different for Koch? There is no acceptable double standard on bigotry. Why don't Jewish leaders, in particular those who condemned Jackson at the hint of bigotry, condemn Koch?

Or can one group of Americans be freely slandered by a public figure while any hint of bigotry toward another group, in private conversation, is cause for moral outrage?

While proof of Jackson's animus toward Israel may lie in symbols, there is direct evidence of Koch's distaste for blacks. In a fiscal crunch he chose a Harlem hospital to be closed. After blacks gave him 60 percent of their vote in this first Democratic primary—a runoff against Mario Cuomo—he failed to support even moderate, establishment black politicians, stifling the growth of black political power in New York.

In 1981 he opposed David Dinkins, the city clerk, in his bid for Manhattan borough president. In 1982 he backed Alfred DelBello for the state's lieutenant governor's seat when Carl McCall, a moderate black candidate was running.

When it came to naming a superintendent for the New York City public schools, Koch chose Robert Wagner Jr. over Thomas Minter and Anthony Alvarado, a black and a Hispanic, respectively. Wagner was later denied the post because the state education commissioner found him to be unqualified for the job, having never taught school and lacking the necessary postgraduate degrees.

I wonder whether there will be a spate of newspaper articles casting doubt on the ability of Jewish reporters, in a town with a large Jewish population, to cover a Jewish mayor. It might seem crazy, but just such articles were written about black reporters after the Jackson incident.

But seriously, the absence of Jewish outcry at Koch's behavior toward blacks and his foul description of a black congressman amounts to the Jewish community's turning a blind eye to the sins of their own. The issue is not that Jewish leaders should condemn Koch so much as why they don't feel compelled to do it.

Not all Jews are defenders of Koch. Before the Dellums' name-calling became known, Rabbi David Saperstein of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations talked about Koch at an NAACP convention in Dallas:

"It is true that we have our ADL (Anti-Defamation League), and our Morris Abrams (vice-chairman of the Reagan administration's civil rights commission), and Ed Kochs . . . ," he said, "But make no mistake about it: to the majority of Jews and Jewish organizations their views are wrong."

More Jewish leaders needs to say the same and say it publicly and loudly.●

FOREIGN AID AUTHORIZATION AND SUPPLEMENTAL APPROPRIATIONS CONFERENCE REPORTS

HON. TED WEISS

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 31, 1985

● Mr. WEISS. Mr. Speaker, we are voting today on two conference reports which in important ways are interrelated, the conference report on the supplemental appropriations bill, H.R. 2577, and the conference report on the foreign aid authorization bill, S. 960.

I am voting in favor of the conference report on the $13 billion supplemental appropriations bill for fiscal year 1985, for reasons which I first explained when the measure was originally before this House. The supplemental appropriations bill includes funding for many valuable programs which I support, including the Social Security trust fund, guaranteed student loans, food stamps, veterans' benefits, aid to Israel, family social services, and many other items. Nevertheless, my vote for the supplemental appropriations bill is a difficult one, since that bill also contains an appropriation of $27 million for the Nicaraguan Contras, which standing on its own I have always resolutely opposed and will continue to oppose. That is why I vigorously sought, in committee and on the floor, to exclude all Contra funding from the bill.

The conference report on the foreign aid authorization bill for fiscal years 1986 and 1987 presents a different set of choices. That bill also includes provisions which I support, including substantial authorizations for military and economic aid to Israel. But it is of critical importance that the failure of this authorization bill would not block such aid from flowing to Israel. Indeed, funds for Israel have generally been appropriated without a separate authorization in recent years, and I have consistently supported such aid in votes on foreign aid appropriations in this House.

In many other respects, however, this bill sets a most unwise and dangerous course for American policy toward the rest of the world. During its consideration, we witnessed the spectacle of emotionalism and unreflective nationalism overwhelming rational considerations of foreign policy. In case after case, ill-considered amendments with far-reaching consequences were offered from the floor and approved with little debate. We have now become enmeshed, or are in the process of becoming enmeshed, in a half dozen or more wars on three continents, under vastly differing local conditions, with the motliest imaginable range of local proxies. An administration that professes to abhor terrorism has now been authorized, and thereby invited, to use state-sponsored terrorism as a deliberate instrument of policy around the world.

By repealing the Clark amendment, a cornerstone of our Southern Africa policy for almost a decade, this bill opens the door to U.S. military aid to terrorists whose main sponsor happens to be the Government of South Africa—a government which we voted this week to sanction.

By authorizing funding for the Contras in Nicaragua, under the fictitious banner of "humanitarian assistance," this bill subsidizes a band of terrorists whose principal targets have included teachers, health care workers, women, and children.

By exempting El Salvador and Honduras from the longstanding ban on U.S. training of foreign police, the bill opens the door to the very abuses, by Latin American police forces and the U.S. agencies responsible for training them, which led to the enactment of the ban in the first place.

The conference bill provides $70 million in military aid to the brutal and corrupt Marcos regime in the Philippines, almost three times that provided in the House bill.

The bill authorizes $5 million in military assistance to one faction of the guerrillas fighting to oust the Vietnamese forces from Cambodia. As laudable as that objective may be, if our recent experience in the region is any guide, we are not going to replace the Cambodian Government with one of our liking with $5 million, or $500 million, or even $5 billion. At the very best, this authorization will serve only to build unrealistic expectations among those we purport to be assisting. At worst, it will lead us down the bloody path of reintanglement in Indochina, and it may unwittingly contribute to the reinstallation of the Khmer Rouge, who were responsible for one of the worst genocides the world has yet seen. This is a mischievous provision which will come back to haunt us.

As the most comprehensive statement of the Congress on foreign policy, therefore, the bill is too seriously flawed for me to support. My vote against this bill should not be interpreted as signifying opposition to all foreign assistance, not as opposition to all foreign military assistance. The United States lags far behind many European nations in providing economic assistance to the developing countries, and this imbalance should be redressed. On the other hand, the United States has legitimate security interests in many areas of the world, and properly conceived foreign-aid programs can help to protect those interests. But this bill is neither well balanced nor properly conceived, and in the long run it will promote neither economic development nor national security. Let us hope that this turn in American foreign policy is as transitory as the emotionalism which spawned it.●

COMMENTS ON BUDGET RESOLUTION

HON. JOSEPH M. GAYDOS

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, August 1, 1985

● Mr. GAYDOS. Mr. Speaker, while I commend the members of the conference committee on the budget resolution for the many long and hard hours they have spent to develop the product we have just approved, I believe it is time that we put a halt to this concept of legislating in crisis.

I am appalled that we have almost no supporting material to back up the figures which we have been asked to support. The realization that the full conference report will not be in our hands until we return to Washington in September leads me to believe that the figures we have before us are guestimates, pulled out of the air to justify the cuts and freezes in some of the most important domestic programs in this country while permitting a substantial increase in military spending.

I am a firm believer in and strong supporter of the committee system, but I am not yet ready to surrender my vote without having before me some better justification for this document, especially when I see military spending increasing by inflation, plus 3 percent a year for the next 3 years while important programs such as urban development grants, revenue sharing, Medicare and Medicaid, and guaranteed student loans are being cut or frozen.

Just those few domestic programs alone are so vital to me and the people and communities I represent, that I cannot in good conscience support this document.

The demise of the steel industry in my district and the forced unemployment of so many people there, have driven too many cities, towns, and boroughs to the verge of bankruptcy. If it weren't for the funds from UDAG and revenue sharing, the people in those communities would have no services at all. I am dismayed by the agreement to cut UDAG funds by 20 percent for 1986, but I am dumbfounded by the 25 percent cut in revenue sharing for 1986 and the program's elimination in 1987.

Those revenue-sharing dollars are often the only funding source to keep some of the communities in my district alive. McKeesport would have to increase property taxes by 6 mills to make up the funds from the cut in revenue sharing. Clairton would need an 8-mill increase and Homestead a 7-mill hike. And those dollars just don't exist in those communities.

At the same time, we are led to believe that additional funds to trim the Federal deficit will be earned through savings in Medicare and Medicaid and the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. Those savings means cuts and reductions or stiffer means tests, no matter how nicely they put it. Where are we going to cut $450 million from Medicaid over the next 3 years? Or $11 billion from Medicare between 1986 and 1988?

It means that some deserving people, people who have no other resources, are not going to have the protection this Congress fought so hard to give them in the first place. It means the safety net is going to have a huge hole in it.

Then, of course, there is the Guaranteed Student Loan Program. At a time when we say we need as many college-trained young people as we can get to help us create and fill the new jobs in so many fields, we are saying: "I'm sorry, you'll have to find some other way of paying for the education we believe you are going to need. We have to save money by cutting $800 million from the GSL Program over the next 3 years."

What a waste. The military throws billions of dollars away through poorly operated and badly supervised purchasing programs, buying $400 hammers, $200 ashtrays, and so on, and we reward those wasters with an inflationary increase plus 3 percent a year. But, to those young people who will be the future leaders of this country, we say, "sorry."

Where is the balance? Where is the fairness and the understanding we have tried to provide for those Americans in need?

What am I supposed to tell the unemployed steelworker in my district who, today, can no longer afford to help their college-bound sons and daughters meet tuition and boarding expenses? How can I tell them I voted yes on this budget?

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, but I cannot and will not vote in favor of this budget resolution.●
